Sunday to Easter-Sunday have, in all ages of the Church, been observed with great solemnity and devotion. Palm-Sunday, the commemoration of the LORD's triumphal entry into Jerusalem; Holy-Thursaday, the Institution of the LORD's Supper; and Good-Friday, His Passion. The observance of this week as of universal obligation is spoken of in a Festal Letter in 260 A.D. Tertullian, who lived seventy-five years before, speaks of the continuous fasts during this week. The Gospel narrative of the Passion was read during this week from day to day in the Gospels, the book of Jonah being also read at this time. The fast was as strictly observed as possible. Many privileges were claimed and used during this week. Debtors were released from prison, actions at law were suspended for the week preceding and the week following, slaves were often freed in this week, and a cessation from all business and from unnecessary labor marked it. The several days had each their special name,—Palm-Sunday (also called earlier Indulgence Sunday), Monday in Holy Week, Tuesday in Holy Week, Wednesday in Holy Week, Maunday-Thursaday, or "Dies Mandati," the day on which the New Commandment was given, "that ye love one another," Good-Friday, and Easter-Even. The services in the Prayer-Book are only marked by the special Epistle and Gospel, the Palm-Sunday Collect serving till Good-Friday. In this as in several other places the services lose something of that marked character which they should bear, but doubtless the difficulties which beset the steps of the Reformers did not permit them to retain all that they would have wished. However we may regret this, yet by extraordinary acts of devotion and of abstinence and an observance of all the services given with conscientious fidelity and with earnest self-examination, the layman has it in his power to make Holy Week as truly a week of devout penitence as if it were overlaid with rubrical ordinances.

Homiouision. "Of a like or similar substance" with the FATHER, a term devised after the rise of the Arian heresy as a middle term between the Homocousion of the Catholic doctrine and the extreme position of Arius, who taught that the WORD was not of the same substance as the FATHER, but a mere created being, before all other created beings, and above them, but still created.

Homocousion. Of the same substance with the FATHER. The word was previously rejected in the controversy with Sabellius, as implying a trinity incompatible with the true Personality of each of the Three Persons of the TRINITY, but in the controversies with Arius its proper force was determined, and it was made the test word in the Council of Nice and was incorporated into the Creed. It was to express the reality of our LORD's sonship as being of the same eternal incomprehensible nature as His FATHER, which Arius denied.

Hood. A cap or cowl fastened to the cloak or outer garment and drawn at will over the head to protect it from sun or rain. It became the covering for the head the monks wore. It was afterwards worn in the Church service. As now used in England and in Ireland, it is simply an ornamental fold hanging down the back of a graduate to mark his degree. Therefore it varies considerably both in the universities the one from the other, and, too, as marking the wearer's academical degree, except that in all three universities the Doctor's hood is of scarlet. The English graduate is ordered to wear his hood upon his surplice.

Hosanna. "Save now." It was the processional refrain when our LORD made His entry into Jerusalem. "Hosanna to the Son of David!" It was chiefly used in the services of the Feast of the Tabernacle; on the last day specially, with branches waving and with Psalms, the Jews went seven times around the Altar, saying "Hosanna." The children were expected to take part in these services. Hence "the children crying in the Temple, Hosanna to the Son of David." Compare the Hallel Psalm cxviii. 24, with Ps. xx. 9 (Hebrew 10 verse).

Hosea, the first of the Minor Prophets according to the order of books in the Bible, prophesied in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, Kings of Judah, and of Jeroboam II., King of Israel (Hosea i.), and his date must accordingly be between 810 and 698 B.C. His name is the same as that of Hoshea, King of Israel, and in meaning is equivalent to Joshua, or Jesus,—i.e., Salvation. Of the prophet personally there is nothing to say besides that he was the son of Beeri, whom some, without reason, would identify with Beerah of the tribe of Reuben (1 Chron. v. 6). There is, however, a late tradition that he was of the tribe of Issachar, which is not improbable; for it is in some measure confirmed by expressions and allusions in his prophecy, which warrant the conclusion that he was a native of the Northern Kingdom.

The period during which Hosea prophesied has been the subject of much dispute; and objections have been raised on the ground of its great length. For if we reckon from the first of Uzziah to the last of Hezekiah (810 to 698 B.C.), we have an interval of one hundred and twelve years; or even if we stop at the sixth year of Hezekiah (and it seems unlikely that Hosea prophesied later than that, otherwise he would have appealed to the fulfillment of his own prophecy (Hosea xiii. 16) in that year), we still have ninety years (the Hebrew reckoning), which is an unusually long ministry. But it is not necessary to begin to reckon Hosea's ministry earlier than the last year of Jeroboam II., King of Israel, and contemporary of Uzziah, nor to continue it later than the first of Hezekiah; a reckoning which gives a period of fifty-eight years (784 to 726 B.C.), which is not improbably long. Hence objections to Hosea on chronological grounds may be disregarded, because the first verse of the prophecy does not require for its truth an interval of more than fifty-eight years, and there are abundant instances of men whose public life has been much longer than that.

It is believed that Hosea himself compiled his prophecies as now arranged after they were all delivered; yet there is no date nor connection by which their chronological order can be determined with certainty. But it is easy to divide the book into two chief portions: the first part consisting of the first three chapters; the second part of the rest of the book; when, however, the analysis and subdivision of these parts are attempted great difficulties arise, so that to give any account of the work of different critics would require much time and space, and it must suffice to say that the first part has been divided into three poems, corresponding nearly to the chapters (ch. iii. is the first poem); and the second part into five sections, with reference to the five contemporary kings; or by some into thirteen sections, according to the subject-matter. But the analysis and arrangement of this prophecy, both from obscure brevity and apparent confusion of order, is so full of difficulty, that Bishop Lowth has not inaptly compared it with the scattered leaves of the Sibyl. Not less difficult, also, has proved the interpretation of the first three chapters of Hosea and the prophet's relation with Gomer. Many have understood them literally, but in modern times the tendency of opinion seems to be towards an allegorical interpretation. The design, however, of this part of Hosea, whether taken literally or figuratively, as well as that of the second part, is sufficiently clear. The prophet declaims against the sins of Israel, exposes in the strongest terms the spiritual adultery of the idolatrous worship at Bethel, and denounces God's righteous judgment upon it, in prophecies, some of which were fulfilled in the near future; at the same time there is an accompanying strain of Messianic prediction of future blessings and redemption calculated to animate and encourage those who should heed the rebukes and turn to the cultivation of righteousness. It is on this account that Hosea has been so often quoted in the New Testament.

The importance of Hosea as a witness to the rest of Scripture is very marked; for the book furnishes abundant references and allusions to the Pentateuch, and the historical books of Joshua, Judges, and Samuel; and shows that that portion of the Bible as we read it now was the same before the destruction of the Temple and the captivity of Israel and Judah, in the ninth century before CHRIST. Still further, the state of affairs implied in Hosea is in strict accord with the contemporary history in the books of Kings; and many points of resemblance, allusions, and even quotations are traced between Hosea and contemporary or later prophets. (Vide Smith's Bible Dictionary, Bible Commentary, and Gray's Introduction.)

Hospital. The word is derived from the Latin hospes, a guest, through hospitium a guest-house, then hospitalis (domus), hospitale (cubiculum). The other word, hospitium, retained its meaning, but hospitale was used in later French and then in English to mean the apartments or the buildings set apart for the sick. We have no traces of any such establishments till after the Church began her LORD's work. It was His charge to heal the sick, to visit and relieve the poor, sick, needy, and imprisoned. In many places one-third, in others one-fourth, of the income of the Diocese was set apart for the poor and sick and needy. Since there was a careful supervision and no waste was allowed, the moiety, at least, of this sum went to the sick. At what date buildings were set apart for this work we do not certainly know, but we find them as soon as property could be securely held by Christian corporations; as, for instance, Basil the Great (about 350 and 390 A.D.) founded a hospital which lasted for some time. A century before this the brave conduct of the Christians in the epidemic in Carthage and in the plague in Alexandria won for the Church a great influence. To care for the sick, and to see that hospitals were erected for them in his See, was one of the duties of the Bishop. Chrysostom used all the surplus of the income of his Patriarchate in these works. Dwelling only on salient facts, we find when the monasteries were organized not only a large hospitality, but a special care of the sick was also organized, and from the portion of the monastic buildings set apart for this purpose we get the name Hospital. But the work was not necessarily monastic. Lanfranc founded a hospital for lepers and one for ordinary diseases in 1081 A.D. These are the earliest foundations recorded in England.

The Monastic Rule was eminently fitted for such work, and it responded nobly to the demand. Many of the arrangements of the infirmary are worthy of study yet, and have not been improved on since.

At the dissolution of the monasteries, the Monastery of St. Bartholomew was handed over to the citizens of London in 1547 A.D. for a hospital; that of St. Thomas was bought by the mayor and citizens in 1551 A.D. for this use; Henry VIII., in 1547 A.D., gave the Bethlehem (Bedlam) for an asylum for lunatics; Bridewell was first used as a hospital, but became a house of correction; and Christ's Hospital became a school. About 1719 A.D. the work of founding hospitals received a great impulse, and in seventy-eight years no less than fifty were founded in England and Ireland. Many more have since been erected in Great Britain. In this country very much has yet to be done. The last statistics give 45 Church Hospitals in 22 Dioceses and 6 Missionary Jurisdictions for 1883 A.D. The increase is large and direct, but it is by no means the exhibit of such charity work as it should be. No Diocese should be without one or more such institutions, and there should be one in each town of sufficient size in the Diocese, and an Infirmary and Dispensary in lesser towns. It is not merely the Bishop's care that such hospitals are established. It pertains to the Laity also to look to it that they aid in establishing and securing endowments for such institutions. They are the stewards of the ministry of the silver and the gold. Their business training enables them to attend to this financial work, and to see to it that it is based on common-sense business principles. Their secular habits give them a knowledge of men which is invaluable in selecting the proper officers for it. From them the many grateful gifts of necessities must come. From them the aid, sympathy, and encouragement which the workers need must largely come. In lesser towns, in feeble institutions, when the trained nurses are suddenly occupied with some special cases, or an epidemic breaks out, the Guild and Brotherhoods which should belong to every Parish would relieve much by taking the watching and care of the less dangerously ill patients as their special work.

Spiritual oversight and aid belong to the clergy. They minister to the sin-sick soul, to the diseased mind. But the physician to the body, the tender nurse, the gentle night watcher, the sympathetic assistant, are also doing CHRIST's characteristic work of love and sympathy. They exercise a part of their royal Priesthood. A hospital has a just demand upon the means of each member of CHRIST, and upon the treasury of the wealthy, second only to the claim which the support of the Priesthood makes upon them. Though the care and oversight of the hospital should be most largely under lay care, yet it must be remembered it is possible only because our LORD instituted His Apostolic Ministry. It is perhaps fairly a matter of regret, which time will doubtless remedy, that there exists in this country no Church Hospital vigorous enough to establish a Church Nursing School, and this for two reasons: I. The nurse approaches more nearly the individuality of any given sick person than others, save it may be the priest of God and the physician, ever can; to the nurse most frequently will come the opportunity for a gentle word of comfort or suggestion, while each act done in the body's service is one more invitation to pray for the soul which it hides from view. II. Wherever and whenever a Church Hospital is founded, experienced and trained nurses are needed, but can seldom be obtained; over and over we read the same depressing, everpathetic history. In prayerful spirit and earnest zeal some priest, or layman, secures a house or a few rooms, gives thereto the name of some saint of old, secures the services of physician and surgeon, appeals to the Church's children for substantial aid, throws open the doors to the wounded and sick of any creed and nation, and puts in charge of the daily life such workers as can be found; these, in most instances, are incompetent, though devoted. They struggle on, some for a few months only, when one by one they fall, discouraged, out of line; others, with stronger brain and more enduring purpose, labor for years, and at last come out into the clear light shed by knowledge. But they reach their goal, in most cases, with broken health and mental vigor scarcely sufficient to enable them to transmit to others any part of the fruit of their dear-bought experience, while these in turn go over the same rough ground with practically the same results. That this state of affairs has so long continued unremedied, wellnigh unnoticed, argues a weak spot somewhere in the Church's plan of work. It cannot be denied that each generation of workers in Church Hospitals leaves some sort of inheritance to its successor. But how small and meagre does it seem when compared with the investments made of devotion, health, talent, culture, money! And how rarely does aught of gain fall to one institution from another! The need is sore of a centre whence may be sent out women who have been taught, with that steadiness and slowness which are the sole guarantee of safe and good issues, how to serve the sick. When the day comes for its establishment,—and come it will,—it is to be hoped that special care will be given to teaching how to teach. In England and elsewhere some work has long been done in this department, but here it is wholly neglected in most secular nursing schools, and is but superficially and ill done in those which give any attention to it.

The popular idea that any one can impart to another that which he himself knows is wholly erroneous. The teaching power is as clearly a special gift as is an aptitude for languages, etc. Occasionally a person is met with who entirely lacks it; but most people possess it in some degree, and in all these it may be developed by judicious and quiet manipulation. The waste of physical strength and of time in Church Hospitals would startle Church folk outside, and even the workers within, could it be lucidly and fully set forth. The one great principle, economic yet wise use of material, which should underlie the system and work of a Church (or any) Hospital, has rare recognition even among Sisters.

For in planning work or in grappling with one and another of its petty details, few remember that effort should primarily be directed to the solution of this problem: How can be done the largest possible amount of work in the best possible manner with the least possible expenditure of time and strength? The charge is sometimes made against Church Hospitals that their size is in inverse ratio to the trouble of running them and the expense per capita. This is perfectly true. It is also true that there are two other facts which may counterbalance this one.

All Church Hospitals may grow, and some doubtless will grow; further, in a country so sparsely settled over the greater part of its area as this country is, the need of many small hospitals is obvious. But he who would start a hospital, as the saying runs, should be sure it is needed in the spot where he would put it. Often it would be far better merely to open some avenue, to feed some institution already existing, bringing all his influence to bear to this end. This is specially applicable in and near cities where, even when amalgamation is inexpedient, different hospitals might so affiliate themselves and their interests as to be mutually enlarged and strengthened. For example, a hospital for convalescents or one for chronic cases might connect itself with an ordinary general hospital, or a nursery or a children's hospital with one for childbirth cases. In a few instances such a plan has been tried here, meeting fair success, but it has obtained abroad to a far larger extent. Church Hospitals are at once too exclusive and too introspective. That is to say, those who do their work know too little, and oftentimes care not to know more, of sister institutions to win the help which comparisons afford, while absorption in details makes them forget the advantages to be derived from a "bird's-eye view." And the hospital walls are allowed to press upon them until shortened vision and stiffened muscles supervene. Perhaps a Church Hospital Association, by promoting discussion of principles and methods of work and by the free use of the interrogation point, would be the most effective antidote to this. In point of fact, the whole great question of Hospitals needs study, and it would seem that Church people as such have given slender attention to it. A valuable factor in its adjustment would probably be the deputing an intelligent Churchman with some knowledge of interior hospital life to study the whole system here and abroad, and then to publish a paper which should be at once philosophical and practical. The inventive instinct of man's nature ever runs a neck and neck race with his tendency to slide along in a groove. In art, in mechanics, in music, in business, in science, and in other forms of human interest it wins. Why should it not so do when the matter in hand is the prolongation of earthly life? since these words only constitute a synonym for a little longer space wherein the threefold forces of men may be developed for the life eternal.

When, after patient study, and after a just appreciation, both of the difficulties to be encountered and the discouragements to be overcome, and the imperfect instruments to be employed, it is resolved to open a hospital, still very much has to be done. A building, otherwise suitable, may not be properly located. In a city, to be of real use, it should be where the class it is to minister to should find it most accessible. Again, so many details have to be arranged in a house already constructed for other purposes,—for it usually happens that these ventures of faith have to prove their right to the attempt, not by a first outlay in erecting a proper building, but in running the risk of utter failure by hiring a house which was never intended nor is now fitted for such use. In all such instances remodeling has to be made to a large extent, and even then many inconveniences, especially in drainage and in easy access to the several suites of apartments,—wards they can hardly be called. It is not till success in its mission of mercy has won for it regard and confidence that a Hospital can really command the means to have a suitable building. But when a munificent layman is willing, or a number who can will contribute to consecrate of their abundance to such a work, then a building can be erected upon some such plan as will be now described.

The buildings should be arranged in accordance with the strictest requirements of sanitary science. It is now generally admitted that it is not well to gather a number of invalids under one roof, when several are in one room. The least cubic space for each patient should be about four thousand feet, or a floor space of ten feet each way for the bed, and twelve feet to the ceiling, and thorough ventilation should be secured, so as to remove all foul air as rapidly as can be done without creating a draught. The most approved form for hospitals is that of pavilion wards; that is, entirely distinct structures connected by corridors. Every hospital, however small, should have two wards, one for medical and one for surgical cases, and, if possible, a third should be added for infectious diseases. If this is impossible, one end of the medical pavilion should be cut off by a wall and provided with a separate entrance as the best substitute for a totally isolated building. A good model is the shape of the letter H; the wards on each side the offices for the staff, kitchen and domestic apartments in the middle. The chapelry should be so arranged that it can open into the wards on either side, that the patients may, if proper, enjoy the soothing influences of the Church services and prayers. But of equal importance with the building itself is the proper organization of the Board of Managers, the Superintendent (or Matron), the Medical Staff, and the corps of Nurses. They should all, from the chief to the lowest subordinate, be wholly unselfish. For in a hospital the first consideration (indeed, it is the reason for the existence of the hospital) should be, What will most benefit the patients? and all rules, etc., should be made with this end in view. Therefore everything that is self-seeking on the part of managers, doctors, superintendent, or nurses must be put aside in any well-managed hospital. Many of the troubles that have arisen from time to time in institutions have come from losing sight of this end.

Rules and regulations, or constitutions for the board, would vary for different institutions, of course, but the fundamental rule should always be that the Board of Managers should have entire control of the Hospital, and be responsible for its well-being.

The Medical Staff should have professional care of the patients. They elect fresh members at the meetings (subject to the Board of Managers), arrange their visits and work, and order what is necessary for the care of the patients.

The Superintendent (or Matron) of the Hospital should have the entire care of it, and be responsible for such care to the Board of Managers. Devoutness, tact, knowledge of men are necessary. The duties of the Superintendent are:

- (a) Engaging and discharging nurses and servants.
- (b) Controlling expenses.
- (c) Providing stores, etc.
- (d) Overseeing the proper care of each department.

In fact, he is responsible for the order and economy of the Hospital. In matters that refer directly to the professional care of the patients, he (or she) is subject to the Medical Staff. Matters that affect the order of the Hospital, and are of sufficient importance, should be at once taken to the Superintendent,—this does not refer to petty matters that are easily settled by the head of each department. Should the matter be of such importance, the Superintendent should bring it to the notice of the Board, or to such of them as may be appointed as Executive Committee. But on all occasions the Superintendent should, before acting, inquire into the matter from the person in charge of whatever Department in which the disorder may have arisen. Of course tact and discretion are necessary in a person holding the position of Superintendent; and it is equally necessary that he or she must have the confidence and support of the Managers.

The Nurses.—In training-schools for nurses, experience has proved that women between the ages of twenty-three and thirty are most fitted for nursing. This does not so much matter when the Hospital work is among children, but as a rule, women who enter under twenty-three years of age are apt to break down in health after a few years of nursing.

Some very necessary qualifications for a nurse are good health, good spirits, good temper, neatness, quietness, and self-possession. A nurse should be fairly well educated, and as intelligent and observant as possible. Care should be taken that the food provided for the nurse should be simple, good, and well cooked. The sleeping-rooms should not be near the wards, and should be light and well aired. These things are absolutely necessary if a nurse is to do her duty and keep her health. It cannot be too earnestly insisted upon that each nurse should be provided with a room to herself. Her spiritual well-being depends upon it almost as much as her physical comfort. Solitude at times is absolutely essential to every one, and more particularly to those who live under a great strain of mind and body. Any extra expense that may be incurred in this will be more than repaid by the increased service she will be able to render.

A nurse should pay strict attention to personal neatness. Her dress should be as simple as possible, and of washing material. A nurse should never repeat any story or gossip about the Hospital patients or Doctors. While care should be taken to instruct her in every detail, she must remember that she is not to supply the Doctor's place, but faithfully to obey his orders. After a nurse has been instructed a few times in the sweeping and cleaning of a room, it is quite unnecessary for her to spend her strength upon this work. All she needs to know is how this work should be done when her time may come to give like instruction. Anything more than this is, as a rule, a waste of her powers. The airing of beds, bedding, patients' rooms, wards, and cleanliness of everything about her patients is very necessary and quite the duty of a nurse, but sweeping and scrubbing unfits her for the time for waiting on her patients, as no nurse can, while doing this kind of work, be ready to wait upon them. But there is yet another qualification. The nurse should be a woman who comes to the work, if not from a love to it, yet from a love for her Lord and a desire to step in His footsteps. She should be prepared to bear, with unfailing patience and gentleness, the trying exactions of sick persons. She is with the patient always, and can speak many a word of comfort or warning, if once confidence is established between them. She can give practical lessons in forbearance, and long-suffering, and love unfeigned which will bear fruit when she least expects it. She can wisely find many opportunities of giving religious comfort, and often a short prayer or a verse of a psalm may be most soothing to a patient who may feel shy or be too sick to ask even for these. Even when this is not the case, much can be quietly done that will not cause excitement or alarm to the patient. Of course, in the case of a dying person, the course of every Christian woman is quite clear. In training-schools rules differ slightly, but these things are quite essential in all,—wise, strict discipline, prompt obedience to orders, and punctuality in being at her post.

The Chaplain should, if possible, in every Hospital, and certainly in every one of size, reside in the Hospital. He is then at hand to seize upon a favorable change in the condition of a patient. A short prayer, a few words from the Bible, can sometimes be listened to in an interval of ease, when an hour earlier or later it would be impossible to gain the attention. For in illness the thoughts turn instinctively to spiritual matters, and if the sufferer be within reach of his ministrations he can be touched and influenced far more easily than in health. In all cases of doubt the Chaplain should be guided (a) by the Physician's judgment; (b) by the desire of the patient himself. Only in the case of the dying can the Chaplain act on his own authority.

A few additional words may be permitted upon details.

The Furniture may be as simple or as elaborate as the means of the Institution permit; but whatever economy be practiced in a room or ward, good air, plenty of sunlight, soft coloring upon the walls and on window-shades, quiet and cheerfulness in the apartment are absolutely necessary. The beds should be comfortable, on wire-woven mattresses, and an ample supply of linen and blankets should be on hand.

The Food should be prepared by an experienced cook, and no food should be taken to a patient that is not tempting as well as nourishing. Everything provided should be on the dietary arranged by the Medical Staff, and should always be the best of its kind. There should be a dining-room for convalescents at the end of each ward, and it is desirable to have a cheerful sitting-room as well.

The Laundry. The washing should, if possible, be done outside the limits of the establishment, and every article well aired before it is returned.

One word more. Larger extension of her hospital work is fast becoming essential for the Church. The Missionary Jurisdictions and the Foreign Missions have, under their Bishops, nobly led the way. But the true success is equally in the hands of the Laity, who should see that sufficient incomes be provided for such Institutions, whether by endowments or by connecting them with regular parochial Institutions. To undertake the establishment of a Home or Hospital for the sick is a venture of faith,—to carry it on a great burden,—but it is CHRIST-like; and if, after a careful weighing of all the surroundings,—the obstacles, the necessary conditions for success, and the favorable circumstances that ought to justify it,—for ordinary human foresight must be used as well as prayer, and faith, and vows,—the work be resolved on in CHRIST's name, those who so resolve should never falter.

REV. A. C. A. HALL.

Host, from hostia, a victim. The term applied in the Roman Church to the consecrated Bread in the Holy Communion. Originally both the Bread and the Wine when consecrated were offered as one Host, and correctly, for both Bread and Wine together are the Sacrament. At the same date the thanksgivings, prayers, and oblations are called a Host. But when the error of Transubstantiation came into practice, the Bread was called the Host, and worship is addressed to it. "Therefore there is no room left for doubting that all the faithful of CHRIST . . . do in their worship render to this most holy Sacrament the cultus of Latria, which is due to the true God." (Council of Trent, Session xiii., De Euch. cap. v.)

Hours of Prayer. The older Church of the Jews had stated times of Prayer. Thrice a day, seven times a day, are spoken of in the Psalms. Daniel observed the hour of Prayer. So too St. Peter and St. John "went up together unto the temple at the Hour of Prayer, being the ninth hour." As the day, no matter what its real length was, was divided into twelve hours, the early use of the devout was to set apart a certain hour for these devotions. The first three hours were called together the third hour, the next three ended, at noon, were called sexts, or the sixth hour, then the interval ending at three o'clock was called the ninth, or nones, and then at sunset came the duodecima. These intervals of three hours each had special services assigned, which were generally of Prayers and Psalms and Lessons. Archdeacon Freeman's conclusion that these Hours and services, though neither of Apostolic nor early post-Apostolic date as Church services, had nevertheless probably existed in a rudimentary form, as private or household devotions, from a very early period, and had been received into the number of reorganized public formularies previous to the reorganization of the Western ritual after the Eastern model. (Principles of Divine Service, p. 219.) It was from the services of these Hours, which were probably of Gallican introduction into England, that the Reformers compiled the Morning and Evening Prayer, with valuable additions and some marked emendations. The Seven Canonical Services (beginning with a service before dawn and ending with a compline service at nine at night) had been reduced to three practically by aggregating the services,—i.e., reciting two or three Hours at once,—but the Reformers condensed them instead. The services for the antelucan, the fast, and the third hours were thrown into one for the Morning Prayer. The earlier Prayer-Books of 1549 A.D. began with "Our FATHER"; but in 1552 A.D. the sentences, confession, and absolution were prefixed. The Psalms were read in course,—which was a change for the better from the arbitrary selections before in use,—and the service compressed into the form we now use it. The same process was used to construct the Evening Prayer. So that in a separate and modified form we use daily the services which came over from Gaul into England and were in use before the Norman Conquest.

Housel. The Holy Communion. A Saxon term, chiefly used to mean the administration of the Communion. So as late as Shakespeare we read "Unhousel'd, disappointed, unaneled" (Ham., act i., sc. 5).

Hymn. A hymn, according to St. Augustine, must be praise to God in the form of song. Properly, this definition should be extended to lyrical prayers. In popular acceptance the term includes "spiritual songs" not directly addressed to the Deity, as "God moves in a mysterious way," "From Greenland's icy mountains," and large portions of the Psalms in any version. Ground has been taken for the exclusion of this class from manuals of worship, but neither past usage nor present opinion justify so sweeping a measure, though the form of praise and prayer is to be preferred.

The word hymn occurs four times in the New Testament. In St. Matt. xxvi. 30, and St. Mark xiv. 26, it refers to Psalms cxv.—cxviii., the latter part of the Great Hallel, chanted by the Jews during and after the Paschal Supper. Eph. v. 19, and Col. iii. 16, mention the three apparent classes of "psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs" to be used for instruction and admonition as well as worship. By that time probably devout verses other than those of Scripture were composed and sung among the early Christians, and their use rapidly increased. Pliny, when governor of Bithynia, in his famous letter to Trajan, 106 or 107 A.D., says that the believers of that province, on the testimony of some who had left them, "were accustomed on a stated day to meet before daylight and to repeat among themselves a hymn to CHRIST as to a god." Three centuries later St. Jerome says hymns were sung everywhere, by the plowman in the field and by the workman at his bench. Tertullian, in his "Apology" (c. 200 A.D.), says, "As every one is able he is invited to sing in public to God out of the Scriptures, or from his own composition," and it was not till the Council of Laodicea, about 370 A.D., that these private productions were forbidden to be used in public worship.

The Gloria in Excelsis and the Te Deum are merely the most illustrious of many early hymns which were produced in Greek, Latin, Syriac, and probably in every language wherein Christian worship was conducted. (See Mrs. Charles's The Voice of Christian Life in Song, 1858 A.D.) In Latin St. Ambrose (397 A.D.) founded a memorable school, whose productions are marked by severe simplicity. He was followed by Prudentius (d. about 413 A.D.), St. Gregory (d. 604 A.D.), Venantius Fortunatus, and others. The mediæval hymns are of richer and freer type. The great names here are St. Bernard (d. 1153 A.D.), Peter Damiani (d. 1072 A.D.), Hildebert (d. 1133 A.D.), Adam of St. Victor (d. 1192 A.D.), and Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274 A.D.). Several single poems by other writers of this age are of great fame and merit, as "Dies Iræ," "Stabat Mater," "Veni Creator Spiritus," "Veni Sancte Spiritus," and the "De Contemptu Mundi" of Bernard of Cluny. A few modern writers, as the brothers Santeuil (d. 1684-1697 A.D.) and Charles Coffin (d. 1749 A.D.), have done good work of this kind. (For the Latin hymns in general see the Breviaries, Daniel's Thesaurus Hymnologicus, and Mone's Hymni Latini Medii Ævi; and in translations, Newman's Poems, Chandler's Hymns of the Primitive Church, 1837 A.D.; Bishop Mant's Ancient Hymns, 1837 A.D.; Isaac Williams's Hymns of the Parisian Breviary, 1839 A.D.; Copeland's Hymns for the Week and Seasons, 1847 A.D.; Caswall's Lyra Catholica, 1849 A.D., and Hymns and Poems, 1873 A.D.; Chambers's Lauda Syon, 1857-66 A.D.; Dr. J. M. Neale's Mediæval Hymns, 1851-63 A.D.; Hymnal Noted, 1851 A.D.; Rhythm of St. Bernard, 1858 A.D., etc.) There were also sundry Greek writers of merit, 400-1000 A.D., some of whose lyrics were rendered with wonderful success in Dr. Neale's "Hymns of the Eastern Church," 1862 A.D. (See also Mrs. Browning's Greek Christian Poets, 1842-63 A.D.)

At the Reformation hymns began to be written in the vernacular in the lands most affected by that movement, and chiefly in Germany, where, under Luther's leadership, an immense and valuable body of hymns began to be produced. Very many writers, from that day to this, have taken part in the work, the greatest of them being Paul Gerhardt (1606-76 A.D.). (See Knapp's Liederschatz, a collection of 3000 lyrics; Koch's Geschichte des Deutschen Kirchenlieds, 7 vols.; and in English, Kubler's Historical Notes to the Lyra Germanica, 1865 A.D.; and Miss Winkworth's Christian Singers of Germany, 1869 A.D.) Many of the German hymns have been translated by John Wesley, 1737-40 A.D.; Jacobi and Haberkorn, 1722-60 A.D.; the Moravians, 1754 A.D., etc.; Francis E. Cox, 1841-64 A.D.; A. T. Russell, 1851 A.D.; R. Massie, 1854-60-64 A.D.; Jane Borthwick (Hymns from the Land of Luther), 1854-62 A.D.; and others, but especially by Catherine Winkworth, whose Lyra Germanica, 1855-58 A.D., and Chorale Book for England, 1862 A.D., are of great merit and value. Sweden, Denmark, France, and even Italy have hymns of their own, but in less quantity, and have contributed little to our stock, though Cowper's renderings (1782 A.D.) from Madame Guion (d. 1717 A.D.) have been valued, and sometimes used.

In England psalmody, rather than hymnody, was the use for two centuries. Myles Coverdale, who was Bishop of Exeter under Edward VI., issued in 153- A.D. forty Ghostly Psalmes and Spirituall Songes, partly from the German; but it is not known that they were ever used. Sternhold's Psalms, 1549 A.D., completed 1562 A.D. by Hopkins and others, were as popular as Clement Marot's for a time in France; and though their style was soon antiquated, were used in some churches well into the present century, long contesting the ground with Tate and Brady's New Version, 1696 A.D. These two were the only versions authorized or used entire in the Church of England; and the often quoted passage from Queen Elizabeth's Injunctions to the Clergy, "that in the beginning or in the end of Common Prayer, either at morning or evening, there may be sung a Hymn, or such like Song, to the praise of ALMIGHTY GOD," seems to have been applied to them alone or chiefly for one hundred and fifty years or more. James I. did indeed confer special privileges on Wither's Hymns and Songs of the Church, 1623 A.D., as "esteemed worthy and profitable to be inserted in convenient manner and due place into every English Psalm-Book in metre," but nothing came of it. England in that century had no lack of noble sacred poets,—Herbert, Quarles, Milton, Vaughan, Crashaw, etc.,—and a few of their lyrics have since been used as hymns, as have been some professedly such by Jeremy Taylor, 1655 A.D.; John Austin, 1668 A.D.; R. Baxter, 1681 A.D.; John Mason, 1683 A.D. But it was then supposed on all hands that only versions from Scripture, and as literal as might be, were fit for public worship. Meantime, the Scotch Kirk and some English Puritans used Francis Rous's version of the Psalms, 1645 A.D., as revised and allowed 1649 A.D.

The making and using of hymns on a large scale began with Dr. Isaac Watts, whose Horæ Lyricæ appeared 1705-9 A.D., his Hymns 1707 A.D., and his Psalms 1719 A.D. His fame and success were at first among his fellow-dissenters; indeed, the Established Church, for a century after these dates, rarely admitted anything metrical, except the Old and New Versions, into her worship. But indirectly and by degrees his influence, and that of the school which he established, were felt by Churchmen, and when they came to make hymn-books of their own, most of the material was necessarily drawn either from Nonconformists or from Methodists (Arminian or Calvinistic), who were within the Church, but had received their ruling principles and spiritual impulse chiefly from other sources. The state of things which prevailed through the eighteenth century was widely different from that which exists now: Churchmen of the sober average type neither wrote hymns nor cared to use them, and with a few exceptions, as Ken, Addison, Pope, Byrom, and Merriek, the tide of lyric devotion flowed from the two great sources supplied by Watts and Wesley. Every one else followed one or other of these, or wrote under their joint influence; so that all but a few dozen of the many thousand English hymns produced between 1700 A.D. and 1800 A.D. belong in matter, style, and spirit to one or other of these three schools, the last being composite.

Dr. Watts (1674-1748 A.D.), who is still considered by many, and probably by a majority, as the greatest of English hymnists, was a good man, who had read much, but (like all his followers) lacked the culture of the great universities. His claim to poetic talent, sometimes denied of late, was valid, though the talent was of no very high order; but his taste was the worst that ever afflicted a poet. With some grand lines and many vigorous lyrics he mingled much wretched bathos and a vast deal of commonplace verse, easy but ignoble. The descent from Vaughan, or even from Mason, to him is "from the mountain to the plain." His theology is average Calvinism; though softened by his amiability, it is sometimes rudely and offensively put. Such as he was, he suited his time completely; their very plainness and frequent vulgarity commended his Psalms and Hymns to most Britons who desired such provision; they were "laid level to the meanest comprehension," yet had a directness and occasional force unknown in previous compositions of the kind; finer work could not have attained the same success. For over a century "Watts entire" was used by many Dissenting congregations; as late as 1836 A.D. a "Supplement" to him was put forth by the Congregational Union of England and Wales. He is still the largest contributor to every Calvinistic hymnal, and was till lately one of the largest to Church collections. Thus he has done an incalculable amount of good, and of harm, for it is doing harm to keep a low standard when a higher one is obtainable. The gain in refinement and of feeling, in propriety of thought and expression, has been great since his day, and not more than a very small proportion of his verses is now fitted to guide the devotions of Churchmen.

His followers in this field were, like himself, devout and estimable persons, and mostly Dissenting ministers. Their work is usually neither so good nor so bad as his; and their many volumes show a somewhat tame uniformity of views and feelings, broken by little originality of thought or vehemence of temper; they are solid, sober, and often dull. Dr. Doddridge, the greatest of them, is (through a few favorite and indispensable pieces) almost as well known to Churchmen as Dr. Watts: his three hundred and seventy-four hymns, published after his death in 1755 A.D., have a "mild and human tone," and "shine in the beauty of holiness." Anne Steele (1760 A.D.), whose somewhat "feeble elegance" was more valued fifty years ago than now, ranked next to Watts and Doddridge in the Prayer-Book Collection of 1827 A.D., but from seventeen hymns is reduced to eleven in the present Hymnal. Beddome, Fawcett, and S. Stennett were Baptists. Simon Browne Dr. Gibbons, Needham, T. and E. Scott, Mrs. Barbauld, and the Scotch Paraphrasers have each given lyrics to general use.

A new school and era opened with Charles Wesley (1708-88 A.D.), the most fertile, fluent, and highly gifted of sacred lyric poets. With his brother John he began in 1738 A.D. the brilliant series of publications which continued till his death, including with what he left in manuscript some six thousand pieces. Their Poetical Works, collected in thirteen volumes, 1868-72 A.D., cover near six thousand pages; of this vast quantity John probably wrote but some forty or fifty, nearly all free versions from the German. C. Wesley had the best culture of his time, and a style of unsurpassed elegance; the grace, fire, and fervency of his muse made imitation hopeless. But he could neither condense, nor always control, his torrent of eloquent song; and his intense emotionalism, which often transcends all bounds, has little in common with that "sober standard of feeling" which Churchmen have generally maintained, and which Keble placed "next to a sound rule of faith." Though a genuine poet, he is pre-eminently "the poet of Methodism," and in proportion as his strains are invaluable to that sect, they are invalidated for Christians of quieter views and habits. It is from excess, and not from defect of qualities that these splendid lyrics so largely fail of general usefulness; their vehemence of feeling and expression is such that we cannot repeat them without insincerity. Thus no poet needs to be so carefully gleaned from as he; and inadvertent compilers have often forced his verses celebrating "sinless perfection" and the like on flocks which heard no such doctrine from the pulpit. Yet some of his best hymns, comparatively free from these excesses, have usually adorned our hymnals, and will long be prized in those of every communion.

C. Wesley could not be closely followed like Dr. Watts, and few have attempted it. Cennick, a man of some talent, little taste or judgment, and great enthusiasm, issued three remarkable volumes, 1741-45 A.D. Hammond (1745 A.D.) and Seagrave (1742 A.D.) were of better education but similar spirit. Toplady (1759-76 A.D.) had original force; an earnest devotee and a fierce bigot, he wrote the greatest hymn (Rock of Ages) and several of the most beautiful of that age, and some of the worst of controversial tracts; one with the Wesleys in everything but the Divine Decrees, their difference from him on that point seemed to him the unpardonable sin. W. Williams, R. Robinson, Olivers, and Bakewell produced each one or two good hymns in the trochaic measures never employed by Watts.

Of those who wrote under the joint influence of Watts and Wesley, the most important are Newton and Cowper, whose tender, faithful friendship gave birth to the famous "Olney Hymns," 1779 A.D. This book was almost a manual for the Evangelical party within and without the English Church; and never were the tenets of that school presented in a more attractive light. The romantic and tragic story of John Newton's earlier life, the mellow sincerity of his after piety, his modest and manly character, all had their due effect; the man is seen on every page, lending a charm to what is often little more than doggerel. His hymns are full of personal experience and wholly void of pretense, while of Cowper's, hardly distinguishable from Newton's, some are utterly unworthy of his then unproved powers, and others fully equal to any of his later poems. Minor but not unimportant writers were Medley and Ryland (Baptists), and Haweis, rector of Aldwinkle: the distinction between Churchmen (of this school) and Dissenters was at that time mainly nominal. Joseph Hart (1759-62 A.D.) may almost be said to have founded a school of his own. A blunt Briton and vehement dogmatist, his rude but vigorous lyrics have become especially dear to advanced Calvinistic sects, and have impressed themselves quite sufficiently upon English-speaking Christendom at large.

Such were the materials which supplied the hymnals of the eighteenth century. These collections were comparatively few, and almost wholly by and for Dissenters, or by Churchmen of the Methodist, evangelizing type, for the use of their "societies." Of the former class, though later in time, the most important book is Dr. Rippon's Appendix to Watts, 1787 A.D.; this gathered up much of the best work of writers of the old school and of some others, and long exerted an immense influence far beyond Baptist bounds. Of the other class, whose ecclesiasticism is so unobtrusive as often to be invisible, the leading representatives are Whitefield's, about 1755 A.D.; Madan's, 1760 A.D.; Lady Huntingdon's, 1764 A.D.; and John Wesley's, 1779-80 A.D. The last, a production then and long after incomparable for literary excellence, is still the manual of the English Wesleys, and has been the basis of every other Methodist collection.

Towards the end of the last century Churchmen, probably of the moderate Evangelical type, began to issue selections of metrical psalms, chiefly or wholly from Tate and Sternhold, with slight additions of familiar hymns. This practice grew apace, the number of hymns increased, and B. Woodd and others ventured on psalm renderings of their own. But the legality of all this was doubted, and in 1820 A.D. a suit was brought in the Consistory Court at York against Thomas Cotterill for having introduced a Selection of his own (1819 A.D.) into his parish at Sheffield: "its declared object was to prevent the use of any other metrical compositions than the Old or New Version of the Psalms." After a long hearing, the matter was referred to the Archbishop of York, who compromised it by preparing a selection of his own, and presenting copies in quantity to the aggrieved parishes, which seems to have quieted the malcontents. Thereafter collections were freely made, with or without the Bishop's sanction. None of them to this day have had in England more than Diocesan authority, and the voluntary principle was long since established, whereby each parish priest practically uses whatever hymnal he prefers, or makes and brings in one of his own.

Meantime the Church of England, or some of her members, were awaking to the fact that she ought to have hymns suited to her own spirit and services. A few by Heber and Sir Robert Grant, of an elegance anticipated by the Wesleys and Toplady alone, appeared in the Christian Observer, 1806, 1811 A.D., etc. Some others, as Gisborne, Cawood, and G. T. Noel, wrote with equal intention if less talent. Cotterill filled his short-lived book with originals that were eagerly copied into others: of modest literary merit, they took a place unfilled before, and held it worthily till most of them gave way to others of higher quality but in the same vein. By these aids Anglican hymnals became in some degree (though as yet very imperfectly) recognizable as such, apart from their title-pages. When, in 1827, appeared Bishop Heber's Hymns written and adapted to the Weekly Church Service of the Year, and Keble's Christian Year, the English Church had proved her claim to the possession of some lyric life.

Two eminent writers had meantime arisen outside her pale, though one of them was on the boundary line. James Montgomery was a Moravian and a poet, and produced many hymns which were fit to be used anywhere. His main landmarks were Cotterill's Selection (1819 A.D.), in which he helped largely, and his own Songs of Zion (1822 A.D.) and Christian Psalmist (1825 A.D.). Living to collect his three hundred and fifty-five Original Hymns in 1853 A.D., he left a saintly and venerable name, to which Churchmen are as much indebted as any others. Thomas Kelly was an Irishman of humble capacity and of singularly naïve and childlike style, from which his considerable learning would never be suspected. He was fond of missionary themes and of trochaic measures. Beginning to publish in 1804 A.D., his Hymns reached an eighth edition (miscalled on the title-page the seventh) in 1853 A.D., then numbering seven hundred and sixty-five. The best of these are among the earlier: many of them have had an immense currency and a wide popularity, and a few of them are likely to live. Covering the same period of time, Josiah Conder, a Congregational layman of literary culture and churchly spirit, wrote with some force and much grace, giving us, among others, one of our best Communion hymns, which was objected to in the General Convention of 1870 A.D. for its too lofty doctrine. Edmeston, Collyer, Raffles, and A. Reed produced some good hymns; and Sir John Bowring, a devout Unitarian, eminent in various fields of labor, wrote many, of which we might well use more than one. Of very recent Dissenters the most eminent is Dr. Bonar, without some of whose lyrics no collection is complete. After him came G. Rawson and Mrs. S. F. Adams.

But for the last half-century the hymnic life of England has been chiefly in the English Church. The way was prepared, as has been shown, by Cotterill, Keble, and Heber, the last of whom had the accomplished and successful co-operation of Dean Milman. Harriet Auber's Spirit of the Psalms (1829 A.D.) anticipated both in character and title the work of Lyte (1834 A.D.), whose exquisite "Abide with me" is much later. Bathurst, Mant, Osler, Charlotte Elliott, J. H. Gurney, Dean Alford, and others have made important additions to our stock. The Oxford movement of 1833 A.D. gave a mighty impulse to the development of metrical provision for the Church's wants, and resulted in a genuine revival of sacred song. Newman, Caswall, Bridges, and Faber did their work mainly or wholly after their perversion to Rome; but many loyal adherents of the Anglican Establishment have been as busy on similar lines. Original hymns suited to her teachings and usages have been produced in abundance by Bishop Wordsworth, Dr. Monsell, Sir H. W. Baker, Mrs. C. F. Alexander, Bishop How, J. Ellerton, W. C. Dix, and translations from the Latin, Greek, and German, as mentioned above. The clarum et venerabile nomen of this period is that of a great scholar and saint, Dr. John Mason Neale. The leading Hymnals of to-day differ widely from those of forty years ago. In some respects and cases the change has no doubt been overdone, but in the main the improvement in taste and fitness is obvious and great. "Hymns Ancient and Modern" (1861; Appendix, 1868; Revised and Enlarged Edition, 1874 A.D.) was prepared with unusual care and skill, and as estimated by the sale of copies, long ago counted by millions, has attained a success probably unrivaled by any collection in any language.

In America comparatively little has been done or needed, the supplies of England being at command. Above two hundred writers have furnished more than one thousand hymns, which are or recently have been used in home collections; some of these are well known across the ocean, and a few of them are of high rank. The chief names outside our own communion are Thomas Hastings, Dr. Ray Palmer, and Dr. S. F. Smith. Native writers, apart from those admitted to the Prayer-Book collection of 1827 A.D., are little represented in our present Hymnal.

The history of our Episcopal hymnody is brief and simple. In 1789 A.D. the "New Version" of Psalms by Tate and Brady was adopted, with twenty-seven hymns, to which thirty were added in 1808 A.D. Of these fifty-seven, seventeen were from Watts, ten from Steele, and nine from Doddridge; not more than twenty were by Churchmen. In 1827 A.D. the two hundred and twelve hymns appeared, Watts, Doddridge, Steele, C. Wesley, Montgomery, and the Scotch Paraphraser being the chief contributors; but seventeen new lyrics, some of them of great value, were furnished by Drs. Onderdonk, Muhlenberg, and Doane. In 1833 A.D. the one hundred and twenty-four selected psalms, all but fourteen being from Tate and Brady, displaced their entire version. This meagre provision served exclusively for our public worship for near half a century, though several collections by Dr. Andrews and others were prepared for week-night services and the like. In 1866 A.D. sixty-five Additional Hymns were sent forth by the House of Bishops, and from that time the English "Hymns Ancient and Modern" were allowed in several Dioceses. The present Hymnal appeared in 1871 A.D., and was slightly revised and enlarged 1874 A.D. Little attention had been given to hymnology among our clergy or people, and the Committee could hardly command adequate facilities for such a task; but the result, though not to be compared with the best English collections, is a great improvement on what we had before. It contains an abundant, if not an excessive, supply of psalm versions; some sixty—or half the precious assortment, in number if not in length—being taken from Tate and Brady. Where the use of metrical psalms, standing by themselves as such, is abandoned (as is the nearly universal practice now), there seems no adequate reason for retaining more of them among other hymns than may deserve that rank by intrinsic merit. Then come Dr. Watts with thirty-seven lyrics, C. Wesley with twenty-eight, Montgomery with twenty-six, Doddridge with nineteen, and Newton, Heber, and Steele with eleven each. If the origin of all the five hundred and thirty-two hymns be noted, Dissent appears at length to be somewhat in the minority. Of translations from the Latin there are thirty-seven, from the German sixteen, from the Greek seven; of these together Dr. Neale supplies twenty-one, his originals being somewhat slighted.

Our Church people have cared less for hymns than other Protestants, and been less dependent on them, having the service. To non-liturgical bodies the hymn-book is the only ritual, and its contents take the place of chants, glorias, psalter, and largely of common prayer. But even with us metrical hymns are not to be despised, especially since the growing taste for music causes them to be sung in many parishes at the opening of service, as well as in the old time-honored places in its course. Their possible, and doubtless in many cases their actual, influence is incalculable for good or ill. They reach multitudes who know little of canons, rubrics, or articles. "A verse may find him who a sermon flies," and songs have a power long recognized as beyond that of laws or learning. They sink into the mind in youth, and color its ideas of doctrine, devotion, and duty. They have been repeatedly the solace of poverty and age, the support of the sick and dying. Backed by the subtle charm of melody, they appeal to our emotional even more than to our intellectual nature. As authorized and employed by the Church, they bear an essential part in that constant education which her members are unconsciously receiving at every service. Their place in divine worship is as high as any; for, whether metrical or not, they afford the most fit and natural means of praising God. In singing them, as St. Paul has it, we are "speaking to ourselves" and to the Lord. Lack of care and skill in selecting and using them is therefore irreverent and injurious. They carry a double message, and both the human and the divine direction they take deserve and demand our best.

The qualities needed in hymns, individually or collectively, are obvious. They should harmonize with the beliefs and principles of those who use them, or else they promote insincerity. They should not, for common occasions, go beyond the range of ordinary Christian experience, or, at most, imagination. There is a large and varied class of unreal hymns, the utterance of which involves falsehood, as "I want to be an angel," which is impossible and against nature. They should not tend to excited and strained feeling. On this account, as has been shown, many of Charles Wesley's most beautiful lyrics, besides many of inferior quality but equal currency by other writers, are not available. They should voice, adequately and genuinely, human penitence, need, and aspiration. They should represent us at our best, holding up a standard which we may follow, so that the worshiper be raised, and not (as may too easily be the case) lowered, by their means. They should, in most cases, be direct addresses to the object of worship. Versified moralities, arguments, and exhortations are out of place and out of date here.

We are supposed to sing, not at each other, but to the Lord. Effusions like Hymns 384 and 381 should be relegated to Gospel meetings.

So much for the substance. As to the form, a hymn should be poetical and lyrical, and not merely "prose tagged with rhyme;" however excellent the sentiment, it fails of any real value for its purpose if wooden or mechanical. It must be smooth and singable, and it should, like any other literary product, have unity, compactness, and completeness. Abrupt beginnings, as in 111, and endings, as in 110, mar the effect, though the latter may in part be mended by affixing a "Gloria Patri." But when a piece has the true lyric inspiration and hymnic fire, grave faults in its structure may be condoned. No one questions that "Rock of Ages" is a genuine hymn, though some of its lines have always needed and received emendation.

Textual changes have sometimes been sweepingly condemned, and the ground taken that a hymn should be used as its author left it, or not at all; but probably no collection was ever made for public use, or could have been, upon this principle. The practice of "tinkering," i.e., taking needless and wanton liberties with the text (of which there are too many examples), is scandalous, but in many cases some alteration either is necessary, or will produce obvious improvement. To know when these changes are requisite or desirable, and to make or adopt them with a sparing and judicious hand, is part of a compiler's business,—for which, indeed, many of them were not well qualified. Abridgment is a simple matter. Often a hymn is too long, or unequal in the merit of its stanzas, and may be improved by omitting some of them. "Abide with me," and "Sun of my soul," as now everywhere used, are faultless hymns, full of tender and noble life, though only parts of the original poems.

The value of hymns cannot in every case be precisely determined by universal canons, for much depends on position and association. Some that are precious to us may be useless to our brethren of other names, and vice versa. Still, the rules of criticism apply here; a hymn has a literary character, though not that alone. In proportion to the culture of those who use them, stress must be laid upon this point. It should be remembered that the end does not sanction the means, and that charitable intent cannot cover intellectual or literary sin. All hymns, we may suppose, were piously meant, yet multitudes of them are worthless except as curiosities. Many are dull and lifeless; many more have an unhealthy life in them, being coarse, ignorant, narrow, or heretical. The more accurate taste of our time condemns as gross or ranting not a few that were useful to former generations. The services and methods of the Church, as happily fixed long since, are no less admirable for their æsthetic than for their spiritual character. "The beauty of holiness" shines in her course of Festivals, Fasts, and Seasons, and in her order for public worship. The Prayer-Book is a study in English style, as well as in grave devotion. With its tenor should agree our rendering of the whole, and those musical appurtenances which were so long dreaded or undervalued, but are now firmly established and vastly enjoyed. There is nothing in rhyme and metre to excuse their contradicting, or falling far below, the tone of Morning Prayer, Litany, and Communion office. The spirit which forbids all "light and unseemly music" should exclude unworthiness of whatever sort in hymns as well. In this particular we have been too easy, too negligent. Yet any sound and cultivated judgment, applied here with the same fidelity it bestows on other important subjects, should be able to see what sacred songs are best fitted to edify Christians, and to be offered as incense to the ALL-WISE. There is no lack of models; our most approved and blameless hymns might serve as tests of others. "GOD," says Toplady, in the preface to his Collection of 1776 A.D., "is the God of Truth, of Holiness, and of Elegance. Whoever, therefore, has the honor to compose, or to compile (we may add, or to employ) anything that may constitute a part of His worship, should keep those three particulars constantly in view."

REV. PROF. FREDERIC M. BIRD.

Hyperdulia. The second of the three imaginary grades of worship which the Romanist is taught to consider allowable. The first is Dulia, which may be paid to a saint; a worship implying service. (Vide DULIA.) The second is Hyperdulia; and the third and highest, the Latria, due to the HOLY TRINITY. Hyperdulia is paid to the Blessed Virgin because of Her privilege in being the Mother of our LORD, but it is claimed that this hyperdulia is as distant from Latria as the creature is from the Uncreated. But it is a feat of imagination to place any difference so vast between these two prayers: "We fly to thy patronage, O holy Mother of God! Despise not our petitions in our necessities, but deliver us from all our dangers, O thou ever-glorious and blessed Virgin" (Catholic Piety, p. 35), and these words of the Collect: "O LORD, we beseech Thee mercifully to hear us, and grant that we to whom Thou hast given a hearty desire to pray, may by Thy mighty aid be defended and comforted in all dangers and adversities through JESUS CHRIST our LORD." In fact, the words of the Hyperdulic prayer to the Virgin are stronger than the words of the Collect, which dates as far back as the sacramentary of Gregory, 600 A.D.

Hypostasis. A term used very frequently in theology, in discussions upon the Holy Trinity, but one which is not always clearly apprehended by those who use it so freely. It expresses, primarily, "reality," and from this the real identity of nature in the Three Persons, thus showing that the oneness of nature proves that there is but One GOD, but the sharing of this reality of nature in the SON from the FATHER, and in the HOLY GHOST proceeding from the Father, there is a separation of the persons. This union is called the Hypostatical Union. Probably Hooker expresses it as tersely and plainly as any one can: "The substance of GOD, with this property to be of none, doth make the Person of the FATHER; the very self-same substance in number, with this property to be of the FATHER, maketh the Person of the SON; the same substance having added to it the property of proceeding from the other two, maketh the HOLY GHOST. So that in every Person there is implied both the substance of GOD, which is one, and also that property which causeth the same Person to be really, and truly to differ from the other two. Every Person hath His own subsistence, which no other besides hath, although there be others which have the same substance." (Eccl., v. 51.) The last two sentences contain especially the true notion of the word Hypostasis,—the unity of substance in the reality of each Person, by which in One GODHEAD there is yet the subsistence of the Persons. With such a poor language as we have for expressing the delicate shades of thought and the distinctions necessary in theology, we naturally are unable to express it by a single word.

Ichthus (ΙΧΘΥΣ). The initial letters of the Greek words Ιησους Χριστος Θεου Υιός Σωτηρ—JESUS CHRIST, the SON of GOD, the SAVIOUR—made the word ΙΧΘΥΣ, which means "fish." The mystical enthusiasm of the early Christians caught at this in connection with the Parable of the Net and with the Miracles of the Fishes, and to St. Paul's allusion, "I have caught you with guile." The image of a fish appears very often in Christian Art. Tertullian (180 A.D.) refers to it. Clement of Alexandria allows the fish as a device on a seal or ring proper for Christians to wear and use, as itself fitting, and as, too, the heathen would not perceive its mystical connection with the Christian doctrine, as they would if a cross were worn.

Ides. In the English Calendar the month retains the triple division—the Calends, Nones, and Ides—of the old Roman use. The Ides begin in March, May, July, and October on the eighth day, and in all other months on the sixth day, and run on for eight days.

Idiotæ. Private persons; laymen. It is the word used by St. Paul (1 Cor. xiv. 16) when speaking of the Eucharistic Service, and the responses of the congregation. The translation in the A. V. "unlearned," is still worse translated in the margin of the revised translation, "him that is without gifts," since the Greek commentators, as Chrysostom, make it to mean the Laity (cf.

Wordsworth's Greek Testament, l. c.) It means "unprofessional" in 2 Cor. vi. 11, and so too in Acts iv. 13, where the Apostles are said to be "unlearned."

Idolatry. The worship of idols. It is not necessary that the idol should be an image of man or of beast. Idolatry can also be rendered to relics. It is rendered often to any passion or pursuit that overshadows the spiritual life and leads the soul away from the love and worship due to God before all else. It is giving to another the glory that is due to God (Is. xlviii. 11), and is directly in opposition to the Second Commandment.

It was most sternly repressed by the early Christians in every one received from paganism, since every Christian made a special renunciation. It crept in when men were received more freely after Christianity became dominant. The old superstitions were not so readily thrown off, and the edicts of Emperors and Penitentials of Bishops are filled with penalties inflicted upon those who practiced strange and revolting rites and sacrifices to demons. These Canons begin from the time of the Spanish Council of Elivira, go on to the close of missionary efforts in Europe, a space of over six hundred years. The tendency to superstition and idolatrous practices took a more dangerous form when, under the specious form of reverence for relics, it entered into the Church and tainted her worship, under the cloak of a pretended but uncalled for reverence. The open idolatry of the pagan is harshly reprobated though he knows no better; but the idolatry that is defended under the specious names of dulia and of hyperdulia—words that are barbarously twisted out of their true sense—deserves deeper condemnation; the idolatry that offers the Latria, due, as even the iconolatrous Council of Nicæa asserted, to the Divine nature only, to the Elements of the sacrament.

Illinois, Diocese of. The Diocese of Illinois was organized at Peoria, on the 8th day of March, 1835 A.D. There were present, three Presbyters and laymen representing three parishes. The Rt. Rev. Philander Chase, D.D., was chosen Bishop. Dr. Chase, being one of the first to introduce the Church west of the Alleghany Mountains, was elected Bishop of Ohio in the year 1818 A.D. He had founded Kenyon College and was its president. Because of misunderstandings and complications growing out of the administration of the institution he had resigned not only the presidency of the college, but also the Bishopric of Ohio. On his retirement he had removed with his family to Michigan, and was residing on a farm when the call to "come over and help" the new Diocese of Illinois reached him. He accepted the election in the following words: "As I had no agency direct or indirect in producing this important event, I cannot but regard it as entirely providential, and as such implying a command from the great Head of the Church to enter anew in the discharge of my Episcopal duties, so solemnly enjoined in my consecration, and lately so painfully, for conscience' sake, remitted. . . . In accepting the appointment to the Episcopate of Illinois I cannot refrain from mingling with a deep sense I have of the honor they have done me the melancholy reflection that the days of my strength and ability to bear the fatigues of planting churches in the new and pathless sections of our country, widely spread and illy provided with temporal comforts, are forever past."

The resignation of the Diocese of Ohio by Bishop Chase and his election to the Diocese of Illinois, and his acceptance of the same, were without the sanction of Canonical law and without precedent. But the General Convention, recognizing the emergency, admitted the Diocese of Illinois into union with Bishop Chase at its head. The Committee of the House of Bishops to whom were referred the documents from the Convention of Illinois, made the following report:

"The Committee have examined the Constitution and Canons adopted by the Convention and find them not to be inconsistent with those of the General Convention. The Church of Illinois presents herself for admission into union with the General Convention with a Bishop at its head. By recurring to the journal, there appear to be some circumstances in regard to this appointment which may be thought not entirely in consonance with the regulations of the Church, yet the Committee do not deem them of such vital importance as to invalidate his election, and the Committee feel disposed to regard them with the more indulgence, as the case was unprovided for by the Canons of the Church. . . . The Committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Church of Illinois, under the Episcopal superintendence of the Rt. Rev. Philander Chase, D.D., be, and hereby is, received and acknowledged as a Diocese in union with the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States.

"All of which is respectfully submitted.

"WILLIAM MEADE."

Bishop Chase at once conceived the plan of founding a collegiate institution and a Theological Seminary in his Diocese; and with the intention of securing funds for this purpose went to England. On his return he bought land in Peoria County, and on the 3d day of April, 1839 A.D., laid the cornerstone of Jubilee College. Near the college he made his home, living for years in a comfortable log house, which he called "Robin's Nest," filled in with mud and sticks, and within which was a family of children. In time the college grew in usefulness, and became one of the best known and most successful institutions in the West. But many adverse circumstances have arisen to thwart the well-laid plans of the noble founder.

Bishop Chase was far advanced in years when he came to Illinois; still, notwithstanding the difficulties of traveling in that early day, he visited with promptness and regularity his great Diocese,—great in the extent of its territory, in its trials and its hardships. New towns were springing up; new parishes were formed; new missionary stations were appointed. The Bishop felt that the Diocese required more Episcopal oversight than he was able to give it, and he therefore asked the Convention, which met at Alton in 1847 A.D., to elect an Assistant Bishop. In response to this request the Convention elected the Rev. James Brittain, a Presbyterian of the Diocese of Ohio. But the General Convention, which met soon after, refused to confirm the choice. It is due to the memory of the gentleman thus rejected to say that this action of the General Convention was not personal to himself. The opposition to him and his final rejection was due to the heated temper of the times,—to the party spirit that was so violent in the Church.

But the great increase in the growth of the Church, and the physical infirmities of the Bishop, made it necessary that another effort should be made to secure the aid of an Assistant Bishop. Accordingly a special Convention was held at Pekin in September, 1851 A.D., which elected the Rev. Henry John Whitehouse, D.D., rector of St. Thomas' Church, New York. Bishop Chase died September 20, 1852 A.D. Few men in the Church have been more laborious and self-sacrificing than Bishop Chase. He was the pioneer Bishop of the great West. Ohio and Illinois bear evidence of his faithfulness and devotion to the Church and its Divine Head.

To Bishop Whitehouse is due the credit of courage and wisdom in adopting a Cathedral system adapted to the condition of the Church in this country. Like all new projects, it at first met with great opposition; and this opposition retarded for ten years the beginning of the undertaking. The Bishop though discouraged was not cast down, and in time he saw some of his cherished purposes put to practical use. The Bishop's plans for a commencement were very modest. He intended that the Bishop should have a church of which he should have control, and whose sittings should be forever free. Connected with this church there should be a staff of clergy to conduct daily and other services, to educate the young, to prepare candidates for the ministry, and to do a certain kind of missionary work in Chicago and its suburbs. He never supposed that all this could or would be accomplished in his lifetime. He wished to lay the foundation as a wise, far-seeing master-builder, and let others as years passed build thereon. He selected the chief city of his Diocese in which to build this Bishop's church, and hoped that coming generations would recognize its power and help to enhance its usefulness.

His Episcopate convinced him of the impossibility of any man administering with satisfaction to himself or as the Church expected a Diocese so great as the State of Illinois. He had, therefore, recommended a division of the Diocese, and some preliminary steps had been taken to that end; but no definite plans had been adopted at the time of his death, which occurred on the 10th day of August, 1875 A.D. Twenty-two years of active work had brought with them cares, then troubles, and then disappointments; and when clouds were lifting and a clearer sky was appearing, the aged Bishop, though strong in body and intellect, was suddenly called from his labors.

The regular Convention, which met in the Cathedral, Chicago, in September, 1874 A.D., elected the Rev. George T. Seymour, Dean of the General Theological Seminary, Bishop. But the General Convention failing to confirm the election, a special Convention was called, which chose the Rev. James DeKoven, Warden of Racine College, Bishop. Dr. DeKoven not receiving the consent of a majority of the Standing Committees, the Annual Convention, which met September, 1875 A.D., elected the Rev. William Edward McLaren, rector of Trinity Church, Cleveland, Bishop, who was consecrated in the Cathedral, Chicago, December 8, 1875 A.D.

Bishop McLaren brought to the Diocese a large knowledge of men and of affairs, a strong intellect, a sound judgment, a warm heart, and a catholic spirit. At once all the elements of discord, and dissensions and variances, the election to the Episcopate of two most worthy gentlemen and their rejection had engendered, were allayed. The Diocese united with its new Bishop in the hearty desire to forget the past, to strengthen and develop the things that remained, and to plan wisely and hopefully for the future.

Bishop McLaren recommended to his first Convention a division of the Diocese. This was followed in 1877 A.D. by the organization of the Dioceses of Quincy and Springfield. Bishop McLaren selected the Diocese of Illinois in which to exercise the duties of his office, as the Canon permitted him to do. The Diocese has now 63 clergymen, 46 parishes, and 32 organized and unorganized missions. Communicants, 7467; amount of contributions for the Conventional year ending Easter, 1883 A.D., $309,102.79.

In 1877 A.D., Bishop McLaren, when recommending, suggested the propriety of forming a Federate Council, under Canon viii., Title iii., of the General Convention. In 1880 A.D. the three Dioceses within the limits of the State of Illinois met and organized, under the name of "The Federate Council of the Province of Illinois." This Council meets annually, and is composed of the Bishops and four clergymen and four laymen from each of the three Dioceses. Its objects are:

"The organization and administering an Appellate Court for adjudicating cases brought before it by appeal from the courts of the Dioceses within the limits of the State of Illinois, etc.

"The charge and care of such educational and charitable institutions as it may canonically establish, or as may be established under its jurisdiction.

"The charge and conduct of matters pertaining to the extension of the Church, so far as these matters may be intrusted to it.

"The acceptance and administration of all funds and donations of any kind which may be given or intrusted to it.

"Legislation upon subjects of common interest to the several Dioceses, the passing of statutes and rules for the government of the Federate Council, and the enacting laws for the due exercise of its powers."

Illumination. The spiritual enlargement of the understanding and the conscience that cometh from the gift of the HOLY GHOST and of the indwelling of CHRIST, "the Light of the World." Baptism bore the name of the Enlightenment. When received, the adults, the newly baptized walked in the new light they had received. Traces of this application of the term illumination appear in St. Paul, as to the Hebrews (x. 32), he writes bidding them remember how "after they were enlightened" they endured a great fight of afflictions; and in vi. 4, occurs that terrible passage which begins, "For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift." Not so clearly applicable to baptism, but to its effects as making us new creatures in CHRIST JESUS, are the several passages wherein he speaks of Christians as the children of the light (Eph. v. 8; 1 Thess. v. 5); also St. Peter uses the same language to the Christian Jews whom CHRIST had called "into His marvelous light" (1 Pet. ii. 9), and St. John saith that "he that loveth his brother (a new commandment I give unto you, That ye love one another. . . . By this shall all men know that ye are My disciples) abideth in the light." So, from sub-apostolic times, those who had just received baptism were called the Illuminated. But this gift of light flowing from CHRIST the true Light which lighteth every man, is also by the grace of the HOLY GHOST, who lightens the reason, quickens the conscience, fills out the ability, and gives the several gifts fitted for our capacities. By His light in our hearts we can confess CHRIST (1 Cor. xii. 8), and by His light as by a candle (Prov. xx. 27) are our inward parts searched out and known, and from His presence we cannot escape. So by the gift of the Comforter, which includes all other gifts, for from Him is every grace and gift, we receive that illumination that is for our spiritual growth (cf. 1 Cor. xii. 1-16). The prayer in the Confirmation office shows this His office when the Bishop pleads that we may receive His sevenfold gifts, all of which are for spiritual insight and ghostly strength to walk upon the path of light. "In His Light we shall see light." By humble and lowly use of His illumination can we see both to use aright the graces He bestows, to use the opportunities for growth in holiness, and to use the spiritual knowledge that comes by study of the Word of God and of strict self-examination. These as instruments touch the inmost life. These as habits stir up the moral perceptions. These as dwelt in quicken the spiritual insight, that it can rejoice in the knowledge of God's overshadowing Presence and guidance. He that by prayer and meditation, and by active use of what he has thus learned, will try to draw day by day nearer to God, has received and lives in that light which CHRIST hath shed from Himself into the world to lighten every soul.

Image of God. No subject has exercised the devout speculation of the greatest theologians with as little tangible result as this question, Wherein doth the Image of God in us consist? It is positively taught in Holy Scripture; we are told of the ruin of this Image, the redemption in CHRIST, and its restoration to us is the Gospel. The Resurrection-day shall see us redeemed, reclothed with it. It shall be the complete satisfaction of the soul, yet nowhere is it explicitly taught us wherein this Image lies. If in the Body, strictly, then, we are led to anthropomorphic conclusions about the Divine Nature. If in the soul, it is in the spiritual life, yet the soul of man is the breath of God, and it cannot be said that this Image is concluded in that only. If in gifts that were conferred, and which we sum up in the phrase "Original righteousness," then it was not strictly in the creation, but in the gifts crowning that creation, that our likeness to God lieth. We cannot certainly know here, but we shall know hereafter; this is the sum of all our speculations, which involve the conceptions we form of the functions of the Church as His restoring Body for us, and of the work of the HOLY GHOST in us, and of the Resurrection Body hereafter. Yet it is not wasted time, since whatever the outcome of our investigations, if we remember that He has chosen to conceal these things, and yet to tell us that they exist, we will be drawn nearer to Him, for we will have something surer from our own research than blind reliance on others' thoughts. There are collected below the chief tests which apply to the main questions raised in the inquiry, subdivided into, I. The creation of man in God's likeness. II. The wearing by the Son of God of the Image of God in man. III. The restoration of the Image of God in man by all the means offered.

I. And God said, "Let us make man in our Image, after our Likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. So God created man in His own Image, in the Image of God created He him: male and female created He them" (Gen. i. 26, 27). "In the day that God created man, in the likeness of God made He him; male and female created He them; and blessed them, and called their name Adam, in the day when He created them" (Gen. v. 1, 2). "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the Image of God made He man" (Gen. ix. 6). "For a man indeed ought not to cover his head, forasmuch as he is the Image and glory of God; but the woman is the glory of the man" (1 Cor. xi. 7). "Therewith [the tongue] bless we God, even the FATHER; and therewith curse we men, which are made after the similitude of God" (Jas. iii. 9). These directly state the bare fact that we are in God's Likeness. St. Paul throws upon it a significant side light by adding the word "glory," and asserting that woman (made out of man) is the glory of the man. This, however, cannot here be expanded. The second division of the subject is the fact that the Word of God became truly man. Here must be omitted the texts of the Old Testament of the One like to the Son of God or in the "similitude of the sons of men."

II. "Jesus Himself, . . . which was the son of Adam which was the Son of God" (St. Luke iii. 23-38). "God . . . hath in these last days spoken unto us by His Son, . . . who being the brightness of His glory, and the express image of His person, and upholding all things by the word of His power (Heb. i. 1-3), took on Him the end of Abraham" (Heb. ii. 16). "God sending His Son in the likeness of sinful flesh" (Rom. viii. 3). "For whom He did foreknow, He also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of His Son, that He might be the first-born among many brethren" (Rom. viii. 29). "Let this mind be in you which was also in CHRIST JESUS, who being in the form of God, . . . was made in the likeness of men, and being found in fashion as a man, He humbled Himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the Cross" (Phil. ii. 5-8). "So it is written, The first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit" (1 Cor. xv. 45).

This class of texts can be expanded indefinitely, but they indicate that the word of God, the brightness of His glory (cf. "the glory of God" above), and the express Image of His Person, could wear fittingly, for our salvation, the likeness of God corrupted through sin, and wore it because He was to restore all things. Under the third division of texts this is very directly taught.

III. "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also Himself likewise took part in the same; that through death He might destroy Him that hath the power of death, that is, the devil; and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage" (Heb. ii. 14, 15). "For our conversation is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Saviour, the LORD JESUS CHRIST: who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto His glorious body, according to the working whereby He is able to subdue all things unto Himself" (Phil. iii. 20, 21). "For as in Adam all die, even so in CHRIST shall all be made alive. But every man in his own order. . . . As we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly" (1 Cor. xv.). "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when He shall appear, we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is" (1 John iii. 2).

Here again these leading texts constantly point to other and less vividly worded texts, binding the whole history of man from the time in which he stood forth the sinless Image of God in the Paradise of Eden, throughout his sinful corrupted course, till in the Resurrection-day, redeemed through the second Adam, he shall be restored to the Paradise of God.

But as was said above, the lost gifts and faculties have been classified in the most opposite ways. The true clue to the maze is to be found in whatever the LORD JESUS has to bestow, to restore to us. Putting aside forgiveness, because that must be preliminary to any restoration whatever, we see that all His gifts are summed up in the HOLY GHOST. Therefore, in whatever way He reaches into and satisfies and crowns our nature, in these things we can recover the lost traces of our original likeness. To recount these is to recount the strengthening, the glory, the indwelling, the sanctification of the HOLY GHOST, and to describe the work He doth, sent by CHRIST to abide in His Church, in and through the Church and all the restorations she has to give to us. Thus the earthly image of God shall, through the eternal Image, be restored to its original state.

Images. The use of images in the heathen world was of course largely, if not wholly, for idolatrous purposes. In the first days of Christianity the use of images at all was forbidden, and the artisan who had made his living thereby was, when converted, compelled to seek some other employment. With the daily sight of their worship, it was not possible that the Church could permit them to appear in the comparatively few places of worship she owned. Her earliest teachers, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Minutius Felix, Lactantius, Arnobius, all denounce the sculptor's art in more or less measured terms. There is a thorough consensus of the writers down to 350 A.D., testifying that such a thing as an image of CHRIST in a church was abhorrent to the Christian. This included painting also. But after this date we find the churches begin to be ornamented with paintings of historical scenes from the Bible. Already a simple monogram, and then a figure of a lamb or a vine, and then of figures of the Good Shepherd, had appeared in the catacombs, and upon the chalice of the Eucharistic vessels the Good Shepherd had been chased. But it had gone no further. But henceforth we begin to find traces, first of paintings, then of images proper, placed in the churches for adornment and instruction. Epiphanius tells how in one of the churches of Palestine he found a veil with a figure of CHRIST upon it. He tore it down and ordered that it should be used to shroud some poor man, and paid the price of the veil into the Church treasury. But the adornment of the churches had begun and went on apace. The next generation saw with complacency this beautifying of the House of God, and justified it on the ground that it was the most convenient way to teach the unlettered in the congregation. The future evil was by no means apparent as yet. But by the year 600 A.D. it began to show itself. Serenus of Marseilles had to remove and destroy all the statues in his Diocese, for the reason that adoration was paid to them, for which Gregory the Great blames him, as destroying what was useful for instruction. In both East and West superstitious ideas were connected from this time on with images, paintings, and relics, and Gregory himself sets the example of recording absurd tales of miracles performed by the relics of saints. The struggle in the East to purify the Church of such a sin gave occasion to the famous Iconoclastic Controversy.

In England, the Saxon Prelates tried to follow the lead of the Council of Frankfort, to which they had informally assented through King Offa. There are abundant proofs that they were fully alive to the danger. But with the Norman conquest came in the later Gallican practice, and soon it passed over the whole kingdom. Though, as in the mandate of William Grenefeld, Archbishop of York (1313 A.D.), there was an effort made to stem the evil.

The Reformation in England put an end to this use of images, with greater zeal than knowledge, for in destroying the images and defacing the shrines much wanton destruction was also committed. The Homily on the Peril of Idolatry was the Church's declaration against one of the crying sins of the day.

What is the true feeling of the Church upon this subject? Probably it may be accurately expressed in this paragraph from Blunt's "Dictionary of Doctrinal and Historical Theology": "There is no rule respecting the use of images given to us in the New Testament. It may be concluded therefore that the Church is left (I.) to that in the Old Testament, which is of perpetual obligation; (II.) to the rules of reason, enlightened by the principles of a complete revelation; (III.) to the measures of a spiritual prudence. Thus (I.) the severity of the Mosaic Law, by which God forbade the making images of visible creatures, was only of temporary reason, from the singular proneness of the people to idolatry; the precept of Deut. iv. 15, 16 (comp. Acts xvii. 29), giving a natural reason for a natural duty, is binding on Christians; (II.) reason points out the instruction which may thus be given to the ignorant, the stimulus to a devout imagination, the aid to the memory, the suggestions which may holily minister to faith, while (III.) spiritual prudence remembers that the more ignorance there is the more proneness to superstition, and reminds us that we must be ever on the watch lest faith should become dependent on sight, lest the body should overweight the mind, lest any innate or proper holiness should be attached to the image, and the mind instead of being helped to pass beyond the image, should rest upon it, as an object of worship. Upon such general principles the Church has a lawful use of images." Our appeal being to the use as well as doctrine of the first six centuries as warrant for our customs, there is nothing in which we can more safely follow them than in the limit the Fathers and Bishops in those ages put upon the adornments of the House of God, and in the strictness with which they sacrificed these ornaments when they found that they tended to superstitious veneration. It is better to be far within limits than to dare to exceed them.

Immaculate Conception. The dogma that the Virgin Mary was herself conceived without sin, which was made an Article of Faith in the Roman Church December 8, 1854 A.D., and which must be believed by every Romanist on pain of excommunication. It is, of course, utterly contrary to what Scripture has revealed. It is contrary to all the principles of theology to draw any such deduction. It was a suggestion which was scouted by St. Bernard in 1130 A.D. in memorable words. He did not deny that to her, as to Jeremiah and to St. John Baptist, there was a sanctity before birth. But to assert sinlessness of the Blessed Virgin was to go beyond reason and revelation. "What if another should assert that festal honors should be paid to each of her parents? But then the same could be urged for similar reason for her grandparents, and her great-grandparents, and therefore it would go on infinitely, and there would be no end of Feasts. . . . Though it is given to a few of the sons of men to receive sanctity before they receive birth, yet it is not given to be conceived without sin. To one the prerogative of a sinless conception was given who should sanctify all others, and Himself coming without sin, might purge us of our sins." (Letter to the Canons of Lyons, Ep. 174.) It was resisted by a long series of theologians, and curiously, all were forbidden finally by Pope Gregory XV. (1622 A.D.) to discuss it except the Dominican Order, who had always opposed it! But under the influence of the Jesuits the heresy, for it is no less, was promulgated by Pius IX., and made binding upon the Faith and Conscience of all Romanists.

Immanuel. The name prophesied by Isaiah as the name of Him whom the Virgin should bear, and which was given by the Evangelist St. Matthew to the son of the Virgin. The two passages should be compared together.

Isaiah vii. 10-16: "Moreover the LORD spake again unto Ahaz, saying, Ask thee a sign of the LORD thy GOD; ask it either in the depth, or in the height above. But Ahaz said, I will not ask, neither will I tempt the LORD. And He said, Hear ye now, O house of David: Is it a small thing for you to weary men, but will ye weary my GOD also? Therefore the LORD Himself shall give you a sign: Behold, a Virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and shall call His name IMMANUEL. Butter and honey shall He eat, that He may know to refuse the evil, and choose the good. For before the child shall know to refuse the evil, and choose the good, the land that thou abhorrest shall be forsaken of both her kings."

With this compare St. Matt. i. 22, 23: "Now all this was done, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the LORD by the prophet, saying, Behold, a Virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call His name EMMANUEL, which being interpreted is, God with us."

The Church has always held the prophecy in Isaiah to be fulfilled as the Evangelist by the HOLY GHOST has recorded, and Immanuel is one of the titles of our Blessed SAVIOUR which declares to us His Divinity and the certainty of our redemption. Late neology has tried to attack the prophecy mainly on the ground of the latter part: "Butter and honey shall He eat, that He may know to refuse the evil, and choose the good. For before the child shall know to refuse the evil, and choose the good, the land that thou abhorrest shall be forsaken of both her kings." It is claimed that there must have been a local fulfillment. It is now admitted that Almah can only mean a pure virgin. It is also conceded that prophecy commingles the present and the future in a mode that makes it difficult to separate the one from the other till after the event has given us the clue to the interpretation. Here we have a double intermingling, for the Child (who should not be born, in fact, till seven hundred and forty years after) should not know to distinguish between pleasant and unpleasant food before the allies Pekah, King of Israel, and Rezin, King of Syria, should be defeated, Rezin killed, and Pekah deprived of half his dominions. The obscurity lies in the assertion to Ahaz, that this should be a sign then, within a definite time, whereas its proper fulfillment was in CHRIST. There is undoubtedly a reference to some detail which is not recorded, while this special prophecy is bound up with the other clear reference to CHRIST, "For unto us a child is born" (Is. ix. 6). And that IMMANUEL was the name of the child of the distant future is clear, "And he shall pass (i.e., the Assyrian king, as Sennacherib and Nebuchadnezzar) through Judah; he shall overflow and go over; he shall reach even to the neck; and the stretching out of his wings shall fill the breadth of thy land, O IMMANUEL."

Implicit Faith. A childlike disposition to receive doctrine or demands on obedience without question. But it is not the right of our free-will to surrender this Faith to any series of statements or to any doctrine, or to render such personal obedience save to those propounded to us by Him who has all-infallible authority. Therefore GOD alone is the Person to whom implicit faith can be yielded. Such a faith Abraham apparently yielded to GOD thrice. Such a faith the father of the lunatic child prayed for: "LORD, I believe; help Thou mine unbelief."

Imposition of Hands. A ceremony in blessing, ordaining, and in consecrating, which is of the earliest use in the Jewish and in the Christian Church. So the Patriarchs blessed their sons. Isaac blessed Jacob, Jacob blessed Joseph's two sons, so our LORD blessed the children brought to Him. So too the sick had His Hands and the hands of His Apostles laid upon them. So Ananias laid his hands on the blinded Saul. So in confirmation this Imposition was and is essential (Acts viii. 17; Heb. vi. 2). In ordination the Hands of the Apostle gave authority (2 Tim. i. 6; 1 Tim. v. 22). So in consecration, Joshua had Moses' hands laid upon him. So the Bishops lay hands on Bishops for consecration. As Moses laid his hands upon Joshua, so they give of their honor and rank to the Bishop elect.

Impropriation. Ecclesiastical property whose profits have passed into lay hands. Appropriation is when a college receives such profits. Henry VIII. gave monastic property to lay favorites. Archbishop Laud endeavored to redeem such Impropriations.

Imputed Righteousness. It has been terribly perverted so as to be made to mean that CHRIST'S Righteousness is so given to us that no sin after that is laid to the charge of the believer. In other words, as one (Dr. Crisp) wrote over two hundred years ago, "Though a believer, after he be a believer, doth sin often, yet GOD no longer stands offended and displeased with him when he hath once received CHRIST," or Hervey, "Notorious or confessed transgressors in themselves, they have a sinless obedience in CHRIST." Now this is wholly opposed to all the teaching of Holy Scripture. It denies the force of what is taught in Heb. vi. 4-6; x. 29, of innumerable other places which are scattered throughout the Epistles of St. Paul. But there is an imputed righteousness to the baptized person which is clearly taught in Holy Scripture, which yet teaches us that we can forfeit it. This imputed righteousness is set forth by St. Paul most emphatically, in his Epistle to the Philippians iii. 8-11: "Yea, doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of JESUS CHRIST my Lord: for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung, that I may win CHRIST, and be found in Him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of CHRIST, the righteousness which is of God by faith; that I may know Him, and the power of His Resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings, being made conformable unto His death; if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead." Here it is all dependent upon CHRIST's righteousness found in the believer, yet that believer must be risen with CHRIST, suffering with CHRIST, conforming to His death, and, in the hope of the future resurrection of the dead, with a clinging, working dependence upon CHRIST. Also we are taught that in Baptism we put on CHRIST and are brought into a Holy BODY, His Church, and are called to be saints, and there is given to us a share in that Holiness, a right to the privileges of CHRIST's Church. As an adopted son claims the rank and honor of the family that adopts him, and is shielded by its power and influence and shares its privileges in the face of the world, so CHRIST grants these to him, though he may not live in all things up to the lofty standard required. But should he throw away or misuse these advantages given to him and allowed before all the world, surely the Head of the House who adopts may also deprive him and finally disinherit him of those grants his adoption bestowed on him. In these respects we have CHRIST's righteousness imputed to us, that we may retain it and grow in it. Grace and the Sacraments are given us, and we are urged to live after the SPIRIT. Our dear LORD gives freely, but He demands a hearty, faithful use of what He so lovingly gives, and we may not dare trespass willfully upon His forbearance.

Incarnation, The. This central doctrine of all Christian faith in God the FATHER and in our LORD JESUS CHRIST is so freely discussed or used in other articles (vide CREED, GOD, JESUS CHRIST), that it is only necessary to make a somewhat more compact and formal statement of the Church's doctrine upon this momentous fact.

The Incarnation was provided for in the eternal counsels of God. St. John saw our LORD as the Lamb of God as it had been slain from the foundation of the world (Rev. xiii. 8). It was promised at the Fall, it was foretold with ever-increasing fullness in succeeding ages, till Malachi closed the long series with the herald cry that the Angel of the Covenant was at hand (Mal. iii. 1). In the fullness of times the Word of God the SON from everlasting took upon Himself flesh,—not the nature of angels, but our flesh,—of the seed of Abraham in the royal line of David; took upon Himself our flesh,—not a phantasmic garb of human form. He was conceived by the operation of the HOLY GHOST in the pure womb of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and was made truly man. He took no body that could be inhabited by another soul. But the body prepared for Him (Ps. xl. 6; Heb. x. 5) He so united to Himself, being the WORD from everlasting, that in the several stages of its conception, development, birth, and growth to full manhood He was ever present in it, filled it as our soul fills our body and is enrobed by it and dwells in it as our personality. He being two Natures, eternal WORD and Perfect Man, became but one Person, JESUS CHRIST. And so He truly united Himself with us, taking body and soul to Himself, entered into and became a part of the vast stream of human beings who are born unto and live in sin, toil, and are disciplined in this world of ours. So He stooped to enter into time, emptied Himself of the glory He had in His FATHER's courts, took our flesh, became man, suffered pain and hunger and thirst most truly; was sorrowful, and wept and watched and prayed and fasted, as we should; loved His disciples and friends, sympathized with all in sorrow, need, sickness, and affliction, and compassionated the sin-sick, repentant souls; taught as man to fellow-men the wondrous facts about themselves, and of Himself and His purposes, and, making atonement, died as truly as ever man died, and as truly raised Himself the third day, and became, as before, subject to mortal change, so now immortal and above all mortal change.

This but prepares the way for the fuller effect of His Incarnation upon our nature and history. It is a fundamental law that when men realize God's presence and power they acknowledge a duty of service and worship. Were CHRIST but a sinless, perfect, yet mere man, none would feel this duty, but being God-man, at once all own a bounden service and worship to Him, and a desire to be overshadowed by His mercy and share in His love, to be bound by His laws, to come into His covenant; and this is intensified by our instinctive recognition of the compassion and wondrous wisdom of His Incarnation, of the fact that it touches our deepest common humanity; that His manhood is related to the poorest and the highest at once in as true and perfect a sense (and with a healing efficacy superadded) as is Adam's. "The first man Adam was made a living soul, the last Adam (is) a quickening spirit. . . . The first man (was) of the earth earthy, the second man is the LORD from heaven." The first Adam died, the last Adam liveth forever; death hath no more dominion over Him. He has arranged the instrumentality by which we enter into His human nature, are fed and nourished and grow therein,—not simply are in mystical covenant relations, but are made thereby as truly partakers of the Divine Nature (2 Pet. i. 4) as we by human birth are made, and only so made, sharers in the dead Adam's human nature. Therefore the Incarnation of our LORD JESUS CHRIST was, and is, not only the pivotal fact of our history, but it is the restoring and perfecting act of our most loving Father, whereby our sins are forgiven, ourselves are restored,—nay, more, are immortally set in the eternal throne of JESUS CHRIST, His SON (Eph. ii. 6; Rev. iii. 21, 22).

Incense. Its ritual use, while enjoined in the Old Testament and used in the sacred visions of St. John's Revelation in the New Testament, was not known in the early ages of the Christian Church. How early it was used in the East it is not easy to determine, but after 380 A.D. and before 594 A.D. In the West, it did not become general in Europe till after 850 A.D. and before 1000 A.D., while in Italy it was introduced probably about 700 A.D. All the references to incense that have been quoted to prove its possibly early use can be very fairly interpreted mystically, and a great many passages in the same Fathers cannot be reconciled with any fact of its actual use. Strongly objected to by the early Christians probably because incense was used at heathen altars, and introduced late and very gradually into general ritual use, it became general only by about 950 A.D. In the English Church after the Reformation it gradually passed out of use, though cases are to be noted here and there of its continuance. And its later revival has partaken too much of the partisan spirit. There is no canon or enactment against it, but the tone of the Anglican Church is against its use.

Incomprehensible. In its theological use, means limitless, unbounded. The term is so used in the Athanasian Creed. "The FATHER incomprehensible, the SON incomprehensible, and the HOLY GHOST incomprehensible. . . . As also there are not three incomprehensibles . . . but one incomprehensible." It is the translation of the Latin immensus, which means omnipresent. The earlier rendering was immeasurable, which is nearer the sense of the Creed, though the word incomprehensible did not then bear it. The fact of the Incomprehensibility of the Divine Nature is asserted (as elsewhere also) in the very familiar verse, "If I climb up into heaven, Thou art there:

if I go down to hell, Thou art there also: if I take the wings of the morning and remain in the uttermost parts of the sea—even there also Thy hand shall lead me, and Thy right hand shall hold me" (Ps. cxxxix. 8, 9). Yet it may well be said that to the human mind God is Incomprehensible.

Incumbent. The holder of a Benefice at a given time.

Indefectibility of the Church. I. "And the gates of Hades shall not prevail against it" (St. Matt. xvi. 18). "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world" (St. Matt. xxviii. 20. So too, Is. lxi. 8, 9; Dan. ii. 44; John xiv. 16, 17). In these passages we have pledged to us that God's Church shall not fail as a whole. Branches of the Church may forfeit their participation in the promise. So Laodicea, Ephesus, Pergamos, and Thyatira have vanished. So any part may be found wanting and have its candlestick removed. Faith may fail. Heresy may—nay, does infect parts of the Catholic Church. Yet the promise is sure that till the end shall come His Church shall surely survive.

II. Inerrant, indefectible in Doctrine. That she should finally fail to teach the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, it is impossible to believe. Our LORD's promise covers in its perfect language the doctrine of the Church's inerrancy: "And I will pray the FATHER, and He shall give you another Comforter, that He may abide with you forever. Even the SPIRIT of Truth. . . . But the Comforter, which is the HOLY GHOST, whom the FATHER will send in my name, He shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you. . . . He will guide you into all Truth, for He shall not speak of Himself, but whatsoever He shall hear that shall He speak, and He will shew you things to come" (St. John xiv. 16, 17, 26; xvi. 13; comp. 1 John ii. 27). In this is traced the very outline of the Church's course upon her teaching. She has Him as her guide, her abiding Leader, the Advocate pleading in her and through her. But as He is her guide, she may stray and falter in following His leadership, but as He is to abide in her forever, she cannot fail to return and to receive of Him the full truth, and through Him to teach it to all. The XIX. and XX. Articles practically set forth this doctrine in teaching that some Churches have erred, not only in life and ritual, but in the Articles of the Faith, and the XX. Article notes that the Holy Scripture is the only source from which she draws her Articles of Faith. She teaches and acts as a judge who must abide by the Law, not as a Lawgiver, for that it is from CHRIST by the HOLY GHOST. Therefore the Church is inerrant. Yet as in a court, the case must be made up, to be tried, so evil doctrine may infect the Church for a long time before it so shapes itself that it can be tested and repudiated. But we have every pledge that when she does decide it will be by the grace of the HOLY GHOST, who will keep her from error and lead her into all truth. It is, however, proper to remark that there are two modes in which error, false doctrine, and heresy can arise. Either from additions to the Faith (Mariolatry, Infallibility, Immaculate Conception), or by denials, or imperfect analysis, of the Articles of the Creed (Arianism, Nestorianism, Monothelitism, Monophysitism). It is hardly probable that there can be any more heresies upon the dogmas in the Creed. But additions to the Faith may be infinite. To these, as they come up for the judgment of the Church, must be applied the test of Scripture, and each part of the Church must use this test rigorously till it shall be, in the course of Providence, possible to hold a true General Council. It is in this position that the Churches of England and America hold themselves.

Indefectible Grace. A doctrine which logically inheres with the Calvinistic theory. But as has been elsewhere shown that Grace is given to us all to use, but that we can lose it. It is not irresistible, robbing us of our free-will, but filling out, strengthening, and sanctifying our will, and therefore if not irresistible, then it is not indefectible. We can fall from grace, and can be restored. Such is the teaching of the XV. Article: "After we have received the HOLY GHOST we may depart from grace given, and fall into sin. And by the grace of GOD we may arise again and amend our lives. And therefore they are to be condemned which say they can no more sin as long as they live here, or deny the peace of forgiveness to such as truly repent."

Indiana, Diocese of. The State of Indiana had among its early settlers many persons who had been baptized and trained in the Episcopal Church. It was at rare intervals that they received its ministrations by visiting clergymen, who on some week-day or Sunday held service in a court-house or in a borrowed house of worship. Curiosity, of course, attracted many outsiders, who wanted to see what kind of religion these "Episcopals" had, who, when they saw the black gown and bands, and heard prayers read from a book, went away shaking their pious heads. These adverse influences caused many, no doubt, to drift with the popular current into other persuasions, as they were called in those days.

In the year 1835 A.D. the General Convention elected as its first Missionary Bishop the Rev. Jackson Kemper, S.T.D., then Rector of St. Paul's Church, Norwalk, Conn. He was consecrated on the 25th day of September of the same year, in the forty-sixth year of his age, and at once set out for his assigned field of labor in Indiana and Missouri. He began his work along the Ohio river towns at Madison, Jeffersonville, New Albany, and Evansville, and also visited Vincennes and Terre Haute on the Wabash. In the summer and fall of 1836 A.D. he revisited the towns on the Ohio. In January, 1837 A.D., he visited Indianapolis, Richmond, and Crawfordsville, and in the fall of that year, in company with Rev. Samuel R. Johnson, Missionary at Lafayette, he made a tour of the northern part of the State, taking in Loganport, Michigan City, Laporte, South Bend, Mishawaka, Lima, and Fort Wayne, and thence descending the Wabash Valley he visited Delphi, Americus, and Lafayette.

It thus took two years for the Bishop to do a work which could now be done in two months. Indiana roads were almost impassable for six months in the year. The mud wagon, drawn by four horses, was the only conveyance that could be pulled through the mire or that was safe in fording swollen rivers and creeks. Bishop Kemper was often in great peril by land and water, but Providence had given him a short and compact body, a vigorous constitution, and a cheerful disposition with which to endure the hardships of travel.

At a Convocation of the clergy of Indiana, summoned by the Missionary Bishop, which met at Evansville on the 9th of June, 1838 A.D., it was resolved to hold a Convention at Madison on the 24th of August following, for the purpose of organizing a Diocese. At the time appointed the following delegates assembled, viz.: Rev. Ashbel Steele, Missionary at New Albany; Rev. Melancthon Hoyt, Missionary at Crawfordsville; Rev. James B. Britton, Missionary at Indianapolis; Rev. Geo. Fiske, Missionary at Richmond; Rev. Archibald H. Lamon, Missionary at Evansville; and Rev. Samuel R. Johnson, Rector of St. John's Church, Lafayette. The lay delegates were James W. Borden, of Richmond; Thomas P. Baldwin, of New Albany; Isaac C. Lea, John Creagh, Joseph L. White, Matthew Temperley, N. C. Brace, John McIntire, and James Sidall, of Madison; and James Morrison, of Indianapolis. The other clergy officiating in Indiana but not present were Rev. Henry Caswell, of Madison; Rev. D. V. M. Johnson, of Michigan City; and Rev. Robt. Ash, of Jeffersonville.

The following parishes were reported as organized: St. Paul's, New Albany; Christ Church, Madison; Christ Church, Indianapolis; St. John's, Lafayette; St. Paul's, Evansville; St. John's, Crawfordsville; St. Paul's, Jeffersonville; St. Paul's, Richmond; and Trinity, Michigan City.

The Diocese as organized was received into union with the General Convention held at Philadelphia in September, 1838 A.D., and was represented in that body by Rev. James B. Britton, Rev. Henry Caswell, Rev. Saml. R. Johnson, and Rev. Melancthon Hoyt; and by Messrs. Horace Thurston, James Morrison, Geo. W. Leonard, and E. T. Turner.

At the fourth Annual Convention the Rt. Rev. Jackson Kemper was elected Bishop of the Diocese, but declined, as it interfered with his missionary duties in other States and Territories.

At a special Convention held at Indianapolis, September 29, 1843 A.D., the Rev. Thomas Atkinson, Rector of St. Peter's Church, Baltimore, Md., was elected Bishop of the Diocese, but he declined the office. The same gentleman was again elected the Bishop at the ninth Annual Convention, held at Indianapolis, July 9, 1846 A.D., and again declined the office.

At the tenth Annual Convention, held at Delhi, July 15, 1847 A.D., the Rev. Saml. Bowman, D.D., Rector of St. James' Church, Lancaster, Pa., was elected the Bishop of the Diocese, but declined the office.

At the eleventh Annual Convention, held at Lafayette, June 1, 1848 A.D., the Rev. Francis Vinton, Rector of Emmanuel Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., was elected the Bishop of the Diocese, but declined the office.

At the twelfth Annual Convention, held at Indianapolis, June 28, 1849 A.D., the Rev. George Upfold, D.D., Rector of Trinity Church, Pittsburg, was elected the Bishop of the Diocese. He accepted the office, and was consecrated in Christ Church, Indianapolis, December 16, 1849 A.D., by the Rt. Rev. Benjamin Bosworth Smith, D.D., Bishop of Kentucky, assisted by the Rt. Rev. Charles Pettit McIlvaine, D.D., Bishop of Ohio; the Rt. Rev. Jackson Kemper, D.D., Missionary Bishop of the Northwest; and the Rt. Rev. Cicero Stephen Hawks, D.D., Bishop of Missouri; and thus became the first Bishop of the Diocese of Indiana.

He was born in Shenley Green, near Guilford, Surrey, England, on the 7th day of May, 1796 A.D. In 1804 A.D. his parents removed to the United States, and settled in Albany, N. Y. He graduated at Union College, Schenectady, N. Y., in 1814 A.D., and at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, in New York City, received his degree of M.D. in 1816 A.D. In 1817 A.D. he took up the study of Theology under Bishop Hobart, who ordained him Deacon in Trinity Church, New York, in October, 1818 A.D., and Priest in July, 1820 A.D. He became Rector of St. Luke's Church, New York, in 1822 A.D. In 1830 A.D. he became Rector of St. Thomas' Church in the same city, and in 1831 A.D. became Rector of Trinity Church, Pittsburg. Bishop Upfold received the degree of Doctor of Sacred Theology from Columbia College, New York, in 1831 A.D.; that of Doctor of Laws from the Western University of Pennsylvania, in 1856 A.D.

Bishop Upfold entered immediately upon the duties of his office, and upon the evening of the day of his Consecration administered the rite of Confirmation in Christ Church, Indianapolis. He resigned the rectorship of Trinity Church, Pittsburg, January 1, 1850 A.D., removed his family to Lafayette, Ind., having for additional support accepted the rectorship of St. John's Church in that city, which he held for one year, and in March, 1857 A.D., removed his residence to Indianapolis.

Bishop Upfold died at Indianapolis, August 26, 1872 A.D., having been for seven years totally disabled from work by neuralgic rheumatism.

The Rt. Rev. Joseph Cruikshank Talbot, D.D., LL.D., the second Bishop of Indiana, was born on the 5th day of September, 1816 A.D., in Alexandria, Va. He was educated in Piermont Academy of that city, and in 1835 A.D. removed to Louisville, Ky., where he was engaged in business for several years. He was baptized and confirmed in 1837 A.D., ordered Deacon on his thirtieth birthday, and on the 6th day of September, 1848 A.D., was ordained Priest by the Bishop of Kentucky. He organized St. John's Church, Louisville, while in Deacon's orders, and upon his ordination to the Priesthood became its Rector. In 1853 A.D. he became Rector of Christ Church, Indianapolis.

He received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from the Western University of Pennsylvania, Pittsburg, 1854 A.D., and that of Doctor of Laws from the University of Cambridge, England, 1867 A.D.

In 1859 A.D. the General Convention assembled at Richmond, Va., elected him Missionary Bishop of the Northwest, a jurisdiction embracing the Territories of Nebraska, Dakota, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, Montana, and Idaho. His consecration took place in Christ Church, Indianapolis, February 15, 1860 A.D., by the Rt. Rev. Jackson Kemper, S.T.D., assisted by the Rt. Rev. Benjamin Bosworth Smith, S.T.D., the Rt. Rev. Cicero Stephen Hawks, D.D., the Rt. Rev. George Upfold, S.T.D., and the Rt. Rev. Gregory Thurston Bedell, D.D.

After five years' active labor in his extensive missionary jurisdiction, he was elected Assistant Bishop of Indiana, and was translated to that Diocese October, 1865 A.D. Upon the death of Bishop Upfold he became the Bishop of Indiana.

Bishop Talbot was stricken with partial paralysis in 1880 A.D., which finally terminated in his death at Indianapolis, January 15, 1883 A.D.

At a special Convention of the Diocese March 6, 1883 A.D., the Rev. Isaac Lee Nicholson, D.D., Rector of St. Mark's Church, Philadelphia, was elected Bishop of the Diocese, but he declined the office.

At the forty-sixth Annual Convention of the Diocese, held at Indianapolis, June 5, 1883 A.D., the Rev. David Buell Knickerbacker, D.D., Rector of Gethsemane Church, Minneapolis, Minn., was elected Bishop of the Diocese. His Consecration took place in St. Mark's Church, Philadelphia, Sunday, October 14, 1883 A.D., by the Rt. Rev. A.

C. Coxe, Bishop of Western New York, assisted by Rt. Rev. Theo. B. Lyman; the Most Rev. J. Medley, Lord Bishop of Fredericton and Metropolitan of Canada; the Rt. Rev. H. W. Whipple, Bishop of Wisconsin; Rt. Rev. Wm. W. Niles, Bishop of New Hampshire; Rt. Rev. George D. Gillespie, Bishop of Western Michigan; Rt. Rev. John Scarborough, Bishop of New Jersey; and Rt. Rev. George F. Seymour, Bishop of Springfield.

Bishop Knickerbacker was born in Schaghticoke, N. Y., February 24, 1833 A.D. Graduated at Trinity College, Hartford, Conn., 1853 A.D., and from the General Theological Seminary 1856 A.D. Ordered Deacon 1856 A.D. Ordained Priest July 12, 1857 A.D., and spent his whole clerical life in Minneapolis. Received the degree of D.D. from Trinity College in 1873 A.D. Entered upon his work as Bishop November 1, 1883 A.D.

The statistics reported in 1883 A.D. are as follows: Organized parishes, 40; organized missions, 5; missions not organized, 6; clergy canonically resident, 31; value of churches, $436,740; rectories, $46,500; communicants, 3884; Sunday-school scholars, 3171; teachers, 297; offerings, parochial, $79,598.54; diocesan, $4044.08.

HON. ISAAC A. KIERSTED.

Induction. The form by which, in the English Church, a clergyman is put in possession of the church to which he is presented, the glebe land belonging to it, and other temporalities. The usual method of induction is by virtue of a mandate under the seal of the Bishop to the Archdeacon of the place, who either himself, or by his warrant to all clergymen within his Archdeaconry, inducts the new incumbent by taking his hand, laying it on the key of the church in the door, and pronouncing these words: "I induct you into the real and actual possession of the rectory or vicarage of H—, with all its profits and appurtenances." Then he opens the door of the church and puts the person in possession of it, who enters to offer his devotions, which done, he tolls a bell to summon his parishioners. Compare the office of Institution in our American Prayer-Book. (vide Hook's Church Dictionary.)

Inerrancy. vide INDEFECTIBILITY.

Infallibility. There is a marked gradation in the meaning of the words Inerrancy, Indefectibility, and Infallibility. The first two are God's gifts to His Church, the last is His own prerogative. In practical application the first may be defined as having, as the point from which they issue, His bestowal of them on the Church, but Infallibility may be defined as an inherent attribute.

Therefore to assert as an article of Faith the dogma that in any one person resides an infallibility, no matter how hedged in that infallibility may be by canonical or theological definitions, is to impute to mere man an attribute belonging to God, and therefore to fulfill the warning prophecy of the Apostle, that foretells that the "man of sin is the son of perdition who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshiped, so that He as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing Himself that He is God" (2 Thess. ii. 3, 4).

Infant Baptism. vide BAPTISM.

Infidel. He who is faithless to a cause to which he was pledged. It is very often improperly used to mean an Atheist. An Infidel is usually an Atheist, but an Atheist may have never been a Christian, while an Infidel must necessarily have been so to bear the name at all correctly. Such were those who went out from the Church (1 John ii. 18, 19). Such is the man who not providing for his own "hath denied the faith, and is worse than an unbeliever" (1 Tim. v. 8 R. V.).

Infinite. Boundless, whether in space or in time. (vide PREDESTINATION.)

Initiation. The early term applied to the baptized, as intrusted with all knowledge of Christian verities. When the Church's doctrines were taught only to the baptized, and were carefully hidden from all others, it was frequently the case that the preacher to a congregation would say, "The initiated know what I mean." It occurs, e.g., in the Catechetical Lectures of St. Cyril of Jerusalem (370-90 A.D.).

Inquisition. A tribunal erected in Papal countries, and once very formidable. It was established by the Popes for the examination and punishment of heretics. An engine of terrible cruelty, it was used with ruthless energy. It was one of the means of reducing Spain to Roman obedience, and the political result was disastrous. So, too, in Italy and Portugal. While it had sway in other states (as, during their occupation by the Spaniards, in the Netherlands), in France and Austria its violence and power were a great deal curbed. Its history has never yet been fully written.

Inspiration, or, as the word itself signifies, inbreathing, is an unseen and spiritual operation. The inspiration of the Holy Scriptures proceeded from an influence by the HOLY GHOST bearing upon the minds and wills of the writers, and compelling them to declare specific facts or doctrines in words that accurately expressed them. The inspired person may have been willing or unwilling; but he could not, while under inspiration, say or write anything but the truth.

In the economy of the Gospel the department of planning was and is the FATHER'S; that of forming or organizing belongs to the SON; while that of giving vitality and efficiency is the specific work of the HOLY GHOST. These departments coincide with, and in some respects overlap, each other; but their centres lie each in the three distinct persons of the HOLY TRINITY. The unity of every divine action is, therefore, always threefold. Creation itself, planned by the All-wise FATHER, was put into form by the WORD, while life was inbreathed by the HOLY GHOST.

Inspiration belongs to the special function of the SPIRIT, who is "the LORD and Giver of Life." The inspiration of the Holy Scriptures was according to the will of the FATHER, through His Only-begotten Son, The Word, by the HOLY GHOST.

Revelation is distinct from inspiration, as subject is from method. Revelation flows through inspiration, as the waters of a river down its bed and between its banks, or as force develops from energy. Inspiration thus controls the bounds of revelation, keeping it within the limits of truth. It also supplies the efficiency necessary for its accurate inception and full deliverance.

Revelation was progressive. It began with God's first intercourse with man, and proceeded until the Christian dispensation was first formally completed by CHRIST, and then efficiently spiritualized by the full outpouring of the HOLY GHOST. Inspiration took its due position towards revelation at the first, and continued with it until the whole Gospel was organized, as the Church or Body of CHRIST, with ministry, sacraments, and word, received its mission, and had its Scriptures completed.

Inspiration is twofold,—miraculous and ordinary. Miraculous inspiration is that operation of the SPIRIT which was needful to effect a true and complete revelation. The ordinary inspiration is that operation of the SPIRIT which disposes and helps "men of good will" to know the truth and do the right. The latter was, is, and ever will continue active, through all human progress on earth and in the world to come. It is not confined to the men of good will, for there are calls of the SPIRIT which even the unwilling may hear. He acts wherever God's love reaches. The world, which God so loved as to send to it His SON, is the field of the ordinary operations of the inspiring SPIRIT. The Church, which is the organized kingdom and specifically ordered household of the LORD, is the constant home of the inspiring SPIRIT. He presides in her councils, acts through her sacraments, imbues with grace her utterances of devotion, and waits to bless the word read or preached to willing priests and people.

This kind of inspiration is mingled with much human weakness and sin. We cannot separate often the one element from the other. We cannot know, for instance, what is divine and what human in any specific instruction, exhortation, or advice which may reach our ears from "those who are over us in the LORD." Still, the assurance of the ever-presence of the HOLY GHOST in the living Church is designed to make us take heed how we hear," and to ponder devoutly whatever words touch or pierce the conscience. Although the usual channel of this form of inspiration is the Church, acting through worship, administration of holy things, and preaching, yet the brooding SPIRIT does not neglect the chaos of the darkened "world lying in sin." This fact is the warrant and encouragement which sustains evangelic missions, and animates all good works for the bodies and souls of those who know not CHRIST.

Miraculous inspiration was granted as a merciful boon from the forbearing God of love to men who had wandered so far from original righteousness that they could no longer of themselves find out the way of Truth. Its recorded beginning was the Divine call, which Abraham was the first fully to heed and follow. Hence the history of the Divine Covenant, evolving through the Patriarchal, National, and Catholic Church, is coterminal with the history of this inspiration. It is miraculous in the sense of being a distinct, peculiar, and specific operation of the HOLY GHOST; made for the definite purpose of clearly setting forth the way and will of God in dealing with an elected people; to whom was committed the noble work and high honor of bearing visible witness to His name in the world. The means of grace were associated with this commission of witness, so that the way of salvation for fallen men covered the same path which preserved alive the knowledge and worship of the true God. These two conjunct objects of the Divine Covenant are to be carefully considered, in order to obtain a clear and accurate view of miraculous inspiration by the HOLY GHOST. By nature He gives ordinary inspiration. By grace He bestows extraordinary inspiration. Yet the two never conflict. They so work together indeed as to appear often in conjunction. Where the latter is sufficient the former is never resorted to. What even the inspired prophets and teachers could know through ordinary means, they were left to record by human wisdom. The HOLY GHOST, however, supervised even the original narratives of those who declared what they saw and heard, and brought to remembrance clearly the facts recorded. When existing documents were to be elevated to a place in the Scriptures of God, the HOLY GHOST supplemented the human talents and knowledge of the writers, and enabled them to eliminate errors and corruptions. An eminent instance of this is seen in the two records of the creation which Moses has given in Genesis. They are sometimes given by him in detached portions, and sometimes mingled together; but these were evidently two original records, out of which he selected the truth, and set it forth in the Book written by Divine command, under the inspiration of the SPIRIT. The "Elohistic" record dealt mainly with the relations of man to nature, while the "Jehovistic" record had for its leading idea and chief point the personal relations of man to the personal God. Usually, in the English Bible, the word God is used in the Elohistic narrative, and the word LORD in the Jehovistic. Both are none the less Holy Scriptures, because they were originally written before Moses. They became Holy Scripture by means of Moses, who put them in the book GOD commanded him to prepare, and which the HOLY GHOST inspired him to write with accuracy. This fact links the new dispensation, which began with Abraham, with all the old dealings of the Merciful FATHER with His beloved human creatures from the beginning, and shows that the GOD of nature and of grace is one GOD.

The resemblances between the Bible and some of the earliest writings held sacred in old heathen nations only strengthens the evidence of the miraculous inspiration of the Bible. It is entirely free from all those corrupt morals and wild mythical fancies which stain here and there the best books of heathenism. It gives, again, the true knowledge of the true GOD, which they had evidently lost, through the mere nature worship which evolved the various forms of heathen mythology. The sun, the stars, the elements, the forces of nature, which the heathen worshiped, and which they personified and called by various names, as well as the energies of good or evil, to which they also assigned names and functions, often in rivalry or opposition to one another, were all swept away by Moses, while only what was true in their records of facts, of statements of morals, and doctrine was retained. The inspiration of the HOLY GHOST appears in the perfectness and completeness of this redaction.

After Moses, when other writers of Scripture came on in due time, the same SPIRIT continued His inspiring aid. What the writers could record through ordinary knowledge they did evidently in their own way. Hence peculiarities of style distinguish the different books. They comprise together one book, the Bible, or Holy Scriptures, not because every word and form of expression was enforced by the Divine afflatus, but because the facts and doctrines contained were kept exact and true by the watchful Inspirer.

Under this continued influence the Divine revelation grew in volume. It, however, always kept even pace with the development of that visible kingdom, which was made formally complete when the Christian Church was established, being "built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, JESUS CHRIST Himself being the chief corner stone."

The Patriarchs were inspired in accordance to the measure of revelation they were required to record, and under which they were to live and serve GOD. The revelations given to them are the word of GOD.

The Prophets were called personally. They appeared from time to time, and acted, spoke, or wrote as they were sent and commissioned. Hence their revelations also are the word of GOD.

The Old Testament as a whole is the word of GOD, in accordance with the sense and meaning we have given of the inspiration of the HOLY GHOST. Not everything that is recorded is the word of GOD, for many acts of the otherwise holy men of old were obviously wrong and sinful, and many words they said were evidently erroneous, while some were partially or wholly wise only in the human sense. When, however, the definite "Thus saith the LORD" appears, or whenever the circumstances show that the LORD was giving His word, then the true revelation may be perceived. Still, the inspiration reaches even beyond the revelation, and assures the accuracy of narrative, even where the thing narrated was neither inspired nor approved of GOD.

Throughout the Old Testament the inspiration of the HOLY GHOST continues subservient to the Law. Gleams now and then appear both of the spirit and the facts of the Gospel. These, however, were foreshadowings or foretellings of things to come; not enough to lay open the future, but enough to show, when that future became present, the essential unity of the great divisions in the one developing Divine dispensation. One and the same spirit appears all along, from Abram to St. John the Evangelist. A marked and wonderful community of truth runs like a gleam of light through Holy Scripture from beginning to end, and binds all together in one golden chain of many links. The Divine element appears in every part, while the perfect correspondence of the parts stamps unity upon the whole, making it and showing it to be the very one Holy Scripture, or word of GOD.

Both Testaments are of course open to criticism. No attempt should be made to exempt them from any fair form of investigation, or to place them beyond the reach of any legitimate tests. Mere scholarship, even when skeptical, should be met by Christian scholarship. GOD in His providence has hitherto provided the human wisdom and learning necessary for the defense and elucidation of the Bible upon merely scholastic grounds. Deep understanding of the word of GOD is, however, only possible to those whose own spirits are in harmony with the DIVINE SPIRIT. Spiritual things are spiritually discerned. This point should be duly considered and weighed not only in scholastic criticism, but in practical use of the Bible.

Every writer in the books of the Bible was inspired, whether he were historian, psalmist, moral or religious instructor, warner, foreteller of future events, or speaker or actor in the advancing work of the developing church, kingdom, and household of GOD. The human and peculiarly personal characteristics of each one give, indeed, variety of form to their styles and modes, but the essence of all remains Divine and therefore infallible truth.

Although the stream of authentic revelation lay hidden for four hundred years after

Malachi—the last prophet of the Old Testament—spoke and wrote, yet the ever-present inspiring SPIRIT doubtless continued “still to strive with man.” The books that were written in this interval preceding the coming of CHRIST were evidently not inspired as were those of the Old Testament. Still, because of the SPIRIT’S presence ever with the chosen people, even the Apocrypha “the Church doth read for example of life and instruction of manners; but yet doth it not apply them to establish any doctrine.” (Art. VI.)

The inspiration of the New Testament is essentially the same with that of the Old Testament. The revelations of the latter coincide with, while they supplement those of, the former. Together they constitute the whole Holy Scripture. Similar characteristics mark both. The four Gospels give narratives of the life of CHRIST; but they are evidently the work of writers who each viewed CHRIST from their own natural standpoints. Hence the true humanity of JESUS is the central and pervading idea of the Gospel of St. Matthew; His royalty fills the mind of St. Mark; His sacrificial offering and work of atonement imbues St. Luke; while His light of truth, on earth and in heaven, is the chief theme of St. John. The inspiration which guided and controlled each writer acted in and through his personal character and peculiar circumstances, while the result is a record of the mortal life and work of JESUS that coincides in all essential particulars, and yet gives a whole presentation such as no one man could have delineated and recorded.

The Acts, the Epistles, and the Apocalypse exhibit these same characteristics. St. Paul sets forth the Church, with the word, prominently on its Catholic side. He emphatically pronounces it to be the one Body into which Jews and Gentiles are called and admitted on equal terms. St. James holds on to the Law. While making that prominent, he still presents the Gospel as the fulfillment of the Law. St. Peter’s chief mission was to those of the circumcision, and his writings turn upon the unity of the new and old dispensations. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews was some one who, to natural eloquence and high rhetorical culture, added a full knowledge of the facts and principles of the Jewish worship. Hence that epistle is full of the essential unity of the offerings and priesthood of the Temple with those of the Catholic Church; while their conjunction in the One High-Priest and full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice—JESUS—is distinctly detailed and clearly shown. The Revelation of St. John the Divine is the effect of a Divine afflatus, poured through an Apostle, evidently the same as that with which Ezekiel and other old prophets were inspired.

The fact of the inspiration of the Holy Scriptures by the HOLY GHOST fits into the necessities of the whole case, and thus shows the unity of all the acts of the God of nature and of grace. Could men have recovered the lost knowledge of God, and restored the personal communion with Him which sin had broken, they would have been left to their natural powers. Because they could not do this, and because the patient mercy of the loving JEHOVAH sought to restore man, therefore the HOLY GHOST inspired the revelation of the way of salvation. He did this, however, step by step, as the organization of the one Divine family was developing towards the completed unity of the visible Body of CHRIST. He did it also in conjunction with human talents and attainments, and in accordance with the concurrent environments of political, social, and ecclesiastical progress, and of knowledge. Divine facts, and precepts, and doctrines He revealed. Mundane facts, and opinions, and views He permitted to be recorded as contemporary wisdom and learning regarded them; only preserving from corruptions and error the moral and doctrinal instruction they were interwoven with. Hence science and philosophy were not inspired. When they appear therefore in the Bible, they are open as elsewhere to criticism. Only the Divine truth, embalmed in them or illustrated by them, was inspired by the HOLY GHOST; and this Divine truth stands now as hitherto, and as it ever will continue, the very word of the very God, infallible, sure, ever living, the foundation truth. The written word of God is so one with the person distinguished by name as “The Word of God” that they are true as He is “The Truth.”

REV. BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, D.D.

Installation. The act of giving a Prebend or Canon possession of his seat by placing him in his stall. So too it is the placing of a Bishop in his Episcopal throne in his Cathedral church.

Institution. I. “Institution of a Christian Man,” a book issued in the later years of Henry VIII.’s reign, which contained instruction in the Christian religion. It is of value as giving the position and views permitted to Cranmer and his colleagues at that time, and as throwing light upon the advance that the Reformation had made in England. The book is called the Bishop’s Book, since the Bishops dedicated it to the king, while a later modification of the same book was entitled “A Necessary Doctrine and Erudition for any Christian Man, set forth by the King’s Majesty of England,” etc., 1543 A.D., and so called the King’s Book. There are marked variations between the two books, and in some things a retrogression.

II. The act in the English Church by which the Bishop commits the cure of a church to the clergyman who is nominated. To this the Office of Institution in our Prayer-Book is nearly the equivalent. (Vide MINOR OFFICES.)

Institutions of the Church. There must be, from the nature of the case, a difference in the relations which the several Institutions, Organizations, and Associations hold to the Church in the United States, or to the several Dioceses. Some Institutions are under the direct control of the General Convention and received their Constitution from it, and their corporators are chosen according to its directions, or as it has made provision in the rules it has given. It is of these Institutions that this article briefly treats. Other institutions are Diocesan, or are general voluntary organizations which are not confined to one city or Diocese, but have some common aim or purpose, which attracts members to it in other States, such as the Church Temperance Society.

The first of the General Institutions of the Church in date of formation and second to none in importance to the Church is The General Theological Seminary. It was established by the General Convention May 27, 1817 A.D. Its plan was drawn up in 1818 A.D., by Bishops White and Hobart. The present location, in the then country village of Chelsea, a suburb of New York, was the munificent gift of Dr. Clement C. Moore. Its earliest Professors were the Rev. Drs. Jarvis and Turner. In May, 1819 A.D., it began with six students, who recited first in a room attached to St. Paul's Chapel, then in the vestry-room of St. John's Chapel, and afterwards in a building on the corner of Broadway and Cedar Street. Its financial straits were so great that in 1820 A.D. it was removed to New Haven, but in 1822 A.D. the Sherred legacy of $60,000 brought it back to New York. The corner-stone of the east building was laid in 1826 A.D. From that time on the seminary remained in New York, despite many efforts to have it removed. Active efforts were made to secure endowments and gifts for scholarships, and the Dioceses of New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Maryland, North Carolina, and South Carolina now hold scholarships upon the basis of their gifts to the Seminary Funds. Its Professors and teachers have always numbered among them men of great ability and mastery in their several chairs. To name but three, Drs. Turner, Johnson, and Mahan, worthily carried forward the reputation of their departments won by their predecessors, and their successors have not failed to maintain the lofty standard they established. Recent efforts to increase the endowments and to restore and refit the building have been highly successful under its present Dean, Rev. Dr. E. A. Hoffman.

The Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society.—The sketch of the operations of this Society is given in full in the article of the MISSIONS OF THE CHURCH, and here it will be only necessary to refer to such outlines of its history as are fitting. In the General Convention of 1820 A.D. "there was proposed by the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies, and concurred in by the Bishops, a Constitution of a Missionary Society for Foreign and Domestic Missions, which became inefficient from an irregularity in the choice of Trustees. The Society was located in the city of Philadelphia, and the members there resident, after frequent consultations, did not think themselves authorized to proceed. The error resulted from the press of business on the last day of the session." (Bp. White's Mem.)

At a special meeting of the General Convention, 1821 A.D., the oversight was repaired and a Constitution was adopted. It worked under the Constitution till 1835 A.D., when the great alteration in its Constitution was made. It was recommended by the Society that the Church herself, in dependence on her Divine Head, and for the promotion of His glory, undertake and carry on in her character as the Church, and as "The Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America," the work of Christian Missions. The change was at once made; the Church recognized her true missionary character, and instead of appointing a Society, resolved itself into that Society, as in truth it is, and appointed two committees to carry on its work, one for Domestic and one for Foreign Missions. The two committees were kept apart, and at the close of the late war a Commission on the Colored Work was added as an appendage to the work of the Domestic Committee, but in 1871 and 1877 A.D. it was merged with the other committees into one General Management of a Board of Missions with a Board of Managers. The members of the Board of Missions are all the Bishops and the Deputies of the General Convention, and the Delegates from the Missionary Jurisdiction. But the Board of Managers is an elective body, not necessarily drawn from the General Convention. It exercises the powers of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, and appoints from its own members the two committees and such other committees as it may deem desirable, and appoints the officers necessary for its work. These committees now are the Committee for Domestic Missions; the Committee for Foreign Missions; the Noble Women's Auxiliary to the Board of Missions; and the Church Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews. In the Domestic Department, 14 Bishops and 470 Missionaries, of which are employed among white people 372; colored, 55 (23 colored clergymen); Indians, 57 (13 native clergymen and 15 native catechists). In the Foreign Department—Ordained clergy, Africa, 13; China, 18; Japan, 9; Hayti, 3; Mexico, 12; total, 65. Unordained workers, 201; candidates for orders and postulants, 26; communicants reported, 2668.

The third organization, which is under the General Convention, is

The American Church Building Fund

Commission.—The Commission was established October 25, 1880 A.D., by the Board of Missions, comprising in its membership both Houses of the General Convention. It consists of all the Bishops, of one clergyman and one layman from each Diocese and Missionary Jurisdiction, and of twenty members at large appointed by the Presiding Bishop. Its object is to create, by an annual offering from every congregation for three years, and by individual gifts, a fund of one million dollars, the income of which shall be given, and portions of the principal of which may be loaned, to aid the building of new churches.

And lastly, one of the most deserving of all, which ought to be thoroughly endowed indeed,

The Fund for the Relief of Widows and Orphans of Deceased Clergymen, and of Aged, Infirm, and Disabled Clergymen.—Its present resources are a royalty upon the Hymnal, and such collections and legacies as may come into its scanty treasury.

These organizations were formed by and are under the control of the General Convention, and belong to the whole Church, have a claim upon it, and owe to it a faithful discharge of their various trusts.

Intention. The motives which lie behind the act and impel the doer to commit it have a modifying effect upon the moral value of the act. For no act can be committed which does not have more or less distinctly a moral value. The time, the place, the opportunity, all affect it so, therefore still more the intention which precedes the act and is its efficient cause. In this lies a large measure of the responsibilities which attach to the person, because of the act and its consequences,—though apart from the intention, the actor is held responsible for much that flows from it. Both in morals and at law it is only equitable to allow due force to the motive, so in a notable class of moral and legal acts, the rule must be that intention makes marriage, and intention makes murder.

Still, while intention has so much influence in determining the status of an act, intention can have no power to affect the validity of acts directed in behalf of others. A witness signing a deed,—his intention not to witness it cannot affect the validity of the signature. A magistrate executing his official duty cannot alter the authority of his acts by merely intending that they shall be of no effect. Therefore the declaration of the Council of Trent, "If any one shall say that in ministers, whilst they effect and confer the sacraments, there is not required the intention at least of doing what the Church does, let him be anathema" (Sess. vii., Can. xi.), is invalid and absurd, for if the validity of baptism depends upon the intention of the administrator, it is then impossible for the recipient to be assured that he is baptized, and, consequently, to be assured that he is a Christian at all, and the same is true of the Holy Communion. Indeed, were the doctrine even a remote fact, the possibility of there being no Church of God is, to say the very least, strongly suggested to the skeptic, and a powerful weapon is put into the hands of the atheist. A sacrament may be parodied by impious or by unauthorized men, and therefore invalid, but beyond this, the intention of the proper administrator cannot affect the efficiency of the sacrament if the several parts of that sacrament are duly administered.

Intercession of Christ. The doctrine of the Mediatorship of our LORD must, as one of the offices of a Mediator, involve that of Intercession. Our LORD pledged Himself to His Apostles to do this: "I will pray the FATHER, and He shall give you another Comforter." "Wherefore He is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him, seeing that He ever liveth to make intercession for them" (Heb. vii. 26). "If any man sin, we have an advocate with the FATHER, JESUS CHRIST the righteous" (1 John ii. 1). It is, therefore, His work in His cession "at the right hand of God the FATHER Almighty," as we confess in the Creed. It is part of His priestly office as it was constituted. St. Paul's argument, that He is a Priest forever after the order of Melchizedek, that His is an unchangeable Priesthood, has this fact of His intercession given as the conclusion. It is of the essence of the priestly office to intercede, and to intercede with an offering, therefore St. Paul's argument requires that "this man, after He had made one offering for sins, forever sat down on the right hand of God." For "CHRIST being come a high-priest of good things to come, . . . by His own blood He entered in once into the Holy Place, having obtained eternal redemption for us." And since He remaineth in the Holy of Holies till the consummation of all time, it follows that He offers and pleads His one sacrifice continually. "Intercessions and giving of thanks be made for all men; for kings, and for all that are in authority; that we may lead a quiet and a peaceable life in all godliness and honesty. For this is good and acceptable in the sight of GOD our SAVIOUR; who will have all men to be saved, and to come into the knowledge of the truth" (1 Tim. ii. 1-4). This intercession underlies the structure of the Eucharistic office,—appearing in the "Prayer for the whole estate of CHRIST, Church Militant," and in the Invocation. It is the act binding the subordinate derivative office of His Church with CHRIST's own High-Priestly office of Intercessor, and therefore is second in far-reaching consequences only to the atonement the LORD hath made. But it is to be noted that as our LORD's coming brought divisions, a sword and a fire, so it is said that the angel who offered the prayers of the saints put fire from the altar into the censer wherein the prayers were placed, and cast the censer thus inflamed upon the earth, and there were voices, and thunderings, and lightnings, and an earthquake. Prayer and intercession is at first a disturbing power, that afterwards procureth peace, light, and glory.

Intercession of Saints. It is a pious opinion that the saints in Paradise, as they with us have learnt the duty and preciousness of intercession, should continue it there. But since they cannot hear us, or know of us and our condition from any prayer, or words, or thoughts, of ours, it is merest superstition to call upon them to pray for us; therefore it was but common sense in the Church of England and in our own to sweep away all such prayers, collects, or litanies from her service-books.

Interdict. An ecclesiastical censure frequent in the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries, said to have been used first in France. Lyndwood defines it as an ecclesiastical censure, inflicted as a penalty on contumacy or offenses whereby people are prohibited from receiving the sacraments. It could be general or personal. The first instance of its being fulminated against a people was the interdict pronounced by Gregory VII. against Poland, 1073 A.D. For details of the more famous interdicts,—e.g., of England by Innocent III.,—see the Histories of England, France, Germany, and Venice. "This censure hath been long disused, and nothing of it appeareth in the laws of Church or State since the Reformation." (Burns, Eccl. Law, sub voc.)

Intermediate State. The place where all souls are gathered and kept till the resurrection. (Vide HADES, HELL, PARADISE.) The language of Scripture, which, however, should not be pressed too far, implies that it is within the earth. "He also descended first into the lower parts of the earth" (Eph. iv. 9). So other places. But without concerning ourselves where, we may concern ourselves how souls are there. In a former article (Hades) we have seen that there is a great gulf therein dividing it into two parts (St. Luke xvi. 26). In these there is a foretaste of the natural consequences of the facts of our past human life, and of our already formed characters. It would seem that however much consequences may be suspended or avoided here, there there is no interference or suspension. It is useless to speculate upon details, but the feeling, at least of the early Church, was clear upon the felicity of those who died in the true faith of our LORD JESUS CHRIST (vide PRAYERS FOR THE DEAD), as is seen from the language of one of the oldest Liturgies which has come down to us: "Remember LORD, the GOD of the Spirits and of all flesh, the orthodox whom we have commemorated and whom we have not commemorated, from righteous Abel unto this day. Give them rest there in the land of the living, in Thy Kingdom in the delight of Paradise, in the bosom of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, our holy Fathers, whence pain, sorrow, and groaning is exiled, where the light of Thy Countenance looks down and always shines. And direct LORD, O LORD, in peace the ends of our lives, so as to be Christians, and well pleasing to Thee, and blameless, collecting us under the feet of Thine Elect when Thou wilt, and as Thou wilt, only without shame and offense, through Thine Only-Begotten SON, our LORD and GOD and SAVIOUR JESUS CHRIST, for He alone hath appeared on the earth without sin." (St. James' Liturgy.) This intermediate state of anticipative felicity was called the Beatific Vision, the Bosom of Abraham, the Paradise of Pleasure.

Interpretation of Scripture. It includes both Hermeneutics, the principles of Interpretation, and Exegesis, the detailed interpretation. It is clear that since the inspired penmen wrote under the direction of the HOLY GHOST, their writings cannot in every respect be subjected to the same mode of interpretation as that applied to ordinary writings; of course the time at which, the conditions under which the books were written, the surroundings of the national polity, or the spiritual development of the Church, whether Jewish or Christian, must be considered, and the historical sense must be placed first with the grammatical construction, but if the guidance and inspiration of the HOLY SPIRIT be admitted, there must be also added to these principles of interpretation, the allowance of a further and deeper sense, which comparison with other Scriptures or which time would explain. The admission that a large part of the Scriptures are prophetic, and that under another large part there is an ethical application that cannot be narrowed by the letter of some special case (e.g., eating meats offered to idols, or the various senses in which Faith is taken), modifies the use of the broad principles of both Hermeneutics and Exegesis. The Fathers finding CHRIST everywhere, made His presence the basis of their principles of interpretation, and so developed a noble system of Exegesis, marred indeed in places by a fanciful or an imperfect appreciation, and sometimes by a prepossession in favor of some topic, but above all devout, sincere, and having an insight that comes only from prayerful and prolonged study of the Word. The real defect of the Patristic Exegesis was the defect of a sound criticism. This, however, was not their fault; it was the fault or want of the whole space of time from St. Clement to the Reformation. Those who drew nearest to its principles were Chrysostom and Theodoret. Origen had it, but his Alexandrian education and his own devout enthused fancy prevented him from using it, and in this critical faculty too, whenever he did use it, as in the Hexapla, he was too far in advance of his day.

The Fathers distinguished between the (a) grammatical, (b) the historical and logical, and (c) the mystical senses of Scripture; and this last underlying sense they subdivided still further into spiritual, figurative, allegorical. It will be seen that these subdivisions may be carried still further, and some ancient expositors advocated as many as ten or twelve forms. St. Augustine says we must look for things that are eternal, that have been done, that must be done, that are future, and therefore hold to three, historical, moral, mystical.

Modern interpreters, though often disclaiming any such subdivision, are forced, often unconsciously, to use this; otherwise there could be no possible profit to us in a very large part of what has been written for our learning. It is too large a subject to be treated of in this work, but the reader may be referred to the very devout work of Williams on the Study of the Gospels, and to Blunt's and Wordsworth's introductions to their several editions of the Bible.

Intonation. (Vide MUSIC.) The notes which introduce the chant or hymn. The Gregorian Tones have this intonation regularly prescribed for the first words of each Psalm.

Intoning. The improper term for the musical rendering, on a monotone and inflected closes, of the service by the officiating minister.

Introit. The hymn or anthem sung by the choir when the officiating minister goes up from the stalls to the sanctuary to begin the ante-communion service. This is his entering into the chancel. The word occurs as early as in St. Mark's Liturgy. The Introit, therefore, was used very early in the East. It was probably introduced from Spain, which used many Eastern rites, so far as the West used it. The Spanish introit varied very much, but probably was at first the xciii. Psalm. The first book of Edward VI. (1549 A.D.) gave the Introits for the several Sundays' Feasts and Fasts throughout the year. The use of the Introit is so ancient and so significant, that it were well to select the hymn upon some principle of continuous reference to the Church's season.

Invitatory. The xc. Psalm is called the invitatory Psalm, from the spirit of the first verse, O come, let us sing unto the LORD. It was in very early use, having been, as Archdeacon Freeman shows, imbedded, as it were, into the structure of the morning services from the earliest notices of them that have survived. The Psalm was daily used in Jewish worship, which was probably the reason why it was so markedly referred to in the Epistle to the Hebrews (ch. iii.). St. Augustine tells us in a sermon that it was so used: "We have chanted the Psalm, exhorting one another with one voice, with one heart, saying, O come, let us adore Him and fall down before Him, and weep before the LORD who made us." But the invitatory of mediæval usage was different. A sentence that varied according to the season was interpolated at the close of each verse, and was sung after one verse entire and after another only in part, but always entirely at the close of the Venite, before the Gloria Patri. This was done away when the Prayer-Book was arranged.

An invitatory anthem is substituted for the Venite at Easter (from 1 Cor. v. 7; Rom. vi. 9; and 1 Cor. xv. 20).

The Invocation. The invoking of the grace and Presence of the HOLY GHOST upon any special act or undertaking.

It is technically the name of the second part of that noble prayer which follows the words of Institution in the Scotch and American Prayer-Books. It is strictly in the spirit, and very nearly in the language, of the prayers of Oblation and Invocation in use in all the Eastern Liturgies. While there is a maimed and dislocated oblation in the English Liturgy, and a mere fragment of it in the Roman use, and in other now disused Western Liturgies, there is no Prayer for the blessing of the Elements by the HOLY GHOST. It was in the Scotch Prayer-Book of 1764 A.D., which was a revival of the book of 1637 A.D., and revised under the influence of the Non-jurors. From this Bishop Seabury succeeded in having it transferred to our own Prayer-Book in 1789 A.D., the only changes being that for the direct words, "that they may become the Body and Blood of Thy most dearly-beloved SON JESUS CHRIST," there were substituted, "that we receiving them according to Thy SON our Saviour JESUS CHRIST's holy institution, in remembrance of His Death and Passion, may be partakers of His most blessed Body and Blood." There was an insertion of the word "humbly" before "beseeching."

The Western Church always held that the words of Institution were all-sufficient, but the Eastern Theologians taught that whatsoever the HOLY GHOST touched is sanctified and changed (St. Cyril, Catechetical Lectures). This is the concurrent teaching of the Eastern Doctors: That as CHRIST offered Himself by the ETERNAL SPIRIT a full, sufficient, and perfect Sacrifice, so the Invocation of the HOLY GHOST in the act of Consecration is necessary in the Eucharist, the Memorial pleading that one Sacrifice. For this prayer, then, we cannot be too thankful, as it makes our office so perfect.

Invocation of Saints. A practice wholly without warrant in Holy Scripture, and removed from the Offices of the English and American Church. (Vide INTERMEDIATE STATE, INTERCESSION OF SAINTS.)

Iowa, Diocese of. In July, 1853 A.D., the Rt. Rev. Jackson Kemper, D.D., the venerable Missionary Bishop of the Northwest, issued an invitation to the clergy and representatives of all organized Church congregations in the State of Iowa to meet him at Muscatine on Wednesday, August 17, at six o'clock P.M. In accordance with this invitation the parties designated assembled at the time appointed, in the chapel of Trinity Church, Muscatine.

The Bishop being absent, the meeting was presided over by the Rev. Alfred Louderback, Rector of Trinity Church, Davenport. By this Convention a Constitution and Canons for the Diocese of Iowa were unanimously adopted, and the following memorial appears on the last page of the journal as a fitting tribute to this Apostolic man, whose remarkable zeal, wisdom, and virtue were chiefly instrumental in planting the Church in the Northwest:

"The Clergy and Laity of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Iowa, in separating the canonical connection between them and the Rt. Rev. Jackson Kemper, D.D., cannot allow this occasion to pass without expressing their deep sense of obligation to him for services rendered to the Church in this State. We shall ever hold in grateful remembrance his untiring zeal and unwearied labors in behalf of the Church in this Diocese; and although our canonical connection is dissolved, we hereby unanimously invite him to continue his Episcopal supervision of this Diocese until we are provided with a Bishop of our own."

Upon the day appointed by the Primary Convention, May 31, 1854 A.D., the first Convention of the Diocese of Iowa was called to order by Bishop Kemper. The place of meeting was Davenport. At the close of his report the Bishop thus addressed the assembled Clergy and Lay delegates:

"As you are now fully organized you will be anxious to enjoy every privilege, and at the earliest possible day to secure to yourselves a Diocesan. I will cordially co-operate with you in such efforts, and will rejoice to welcome another Bishop in the West. Seek out a man of God; one who is earnest and simple-hearted, one who is patient of fatigue, ready to endure hardship with a cheerful spirit for the REDEEMER's sake, and who will consecrate all his energies to the work before him, which unquestionably will be the building up of the Diocese in strength and holiness."

The choice of the Diocese fell upon a man whose future work made most justly applicable to him the words of the good Bishop. The Rev. Henry Washington Lee, D.D., Rector of St. Luke's Church, Rochester, N. Y., having been duly elected, accepted the position, and was consecrated in his parish church, October 18, 1854 A.D., as the first Bishop of Iowa. Bishop Lee preached in his Diocese for the first time October 29, in St. John's Church, Dubuque, of which the Rev. R. D. Brooke was rector. Among Iowa's pioneer missionaries none was more earnest and worthy than the Rector of St. John's, Dubuque, and his parish had the honor of being the first in the new Diocese voluntarily to relinquish missionary aid. The first confirmation by Bishop Lee in Iowa took place November 5, in Trinity Church, Davenport.

The second Annual Convention convened May 30, 1855 A.D., in Christ Church, Burlington, and at its opening service Bishop Lee held his first ordination, admitting to priest's orders the Rev. George William Watsin, who remained for many years one of Iowa's most respected, able, and successful Presbyters.

Bishop Lee's first effort in behalf of the material interests of his Diocese was the formation of the "Iowa Episcopate Fund," in which effort he was most successful. Through the liberality, chiefly of Eastern Churchmen, he obtained means for the purchase of six thousand acres of land in Iowa, which land was held until, through increase in value, sales became desirable, thus securing a constantly increasing capital. A wise investment of this has already furnished means for the erection of an elegant and commodious house for the Bishop's residence, besides contributing materially to his support.

On the 1st day of August, 1856 A.D., Bishop Lee having completed the purchase of the property in Davenport known as the "Iowa College," the Diocese took possession, giving it the name of the venerable Bishop Griswold. On the 12th of December following, the Preparatory Department of this Institution was opened, under the charge of the Rev. F. Emerson Judd, who is still one of Iowa's working parochial clergy.

In May, 1863 A.D., the College property, for which was paid $36,000, was in the hands of the Trustees, free from incumbrance. During the year 1864 the Trustees purchased a building in Dubuque for a girls' school, which in September, 1865 A.D., was opened as the "Bishop Lee Seminary for Young Ladies." The following year the Rev. F. Emerson Judd became the principal of this Institution, and held that position until May 1, 1871 A.D., at which time the work was discontinued.

In June, 1866 A.D., by the generosity of David J. Ely, Esq., of Chicago, the "Ely Professorship of Ecclesiastical History" in the Theological Department of Griswold College was endowed, and the Rev. Willis H. Barris was appointed its first Professor, a position which he still holds, being the oldest resident Presbyter in the Diocese. The "Ely Professor" occupies a beautiful residence, erected upon the College grounds by the liberality of Mrs. Ely, who after her husband's death thus supplemented his most valuable gift; simultaneous with Mr. Ely's donation was one of $10,000 towards the endowment of an "Anthon Professorship" by a lady in New York.

The Trustees of the College having authorized the erection of a Diocesan Church edifice upon the centre of the east block of their beautiful grounds, on the 27th of June, 1868 A.D., the corner-stone was laid by Bishop Lee, with most impressive ceremonies. This expensive and very handsome building having been completed, with the exception of the tower and spire, was duly consecrated as "Grace Cathedral," June 18, 1873 A.D., by Bishop Lee, assisted by the Bishops of Nebraska and Minnesota, the Bishop of Minnesota preaching the consecration sermon. In elegance of structure and beauty of situation Grace Cathedral is unsurpassed by any Church edifice in the West. The "Bishop's House," built by the Trustees of the "Iowa Episcopate Fund," was completed before the consecration, and at that time was the pleasant home of the Bishop's family. But this happy home was soon to become the scene of an unexpected and sore bereavement. The good Bishop, although realizing that his health was seriously impaired, yet gave to his friends no indications of immediate danger; therefore his death, which occurred on the 26th day of September, 1874 A.D., after only a few days of alarming illness, both shocked and deeply grieved the entire Diocese. On the 29th his funeral services in Grace Cathedral were attended not only by a very large concourse of the citizens of Davenport, but by lay representatives from parishes throughout the State, by the mass of the clergy of Iowa, and by numerous friends, both lay and clerical, from neighboring and other Dioceses. The services were conducted by the Rt. Rev. Bishops Whipple, of Minnesota, Robertson, of Missouri, and Vail, of Kansas. The sermon was preached by Bishop Vail. The ceremonies at the grave were participated in by all the Bishops, and thus the first Bishop of Iowa was laid to his rest. At a special Convention held in Grace Cathedral December 9, 1874 A.D., a sermon commemorative of the late Bishop was delivered by the Rev. F. Emerson Judd from Romans xiv. 7. In this sermon the preacher paid to the memory of his late Diocesan the following tribute, which met with a hearty response throughout the State of Iowa: "In Iowa the foundations of the American Catholic Church have been wisely laid, broad and deep. No narrow bigotry and no effort of intolerance have ever found encouragement in the policy of the large-minded and large-hearted man, whose comprehensive views and charitable rule for twenty years have guided the development of our youthful Diocese. All of Bishop Lee's writings, his letters, his sermons, his Convention addresses, his pastorals and triennial charges, bear unmistakably the impress of CHRIST's character and teaching. . . . And if Bishop Lee was eminently catholic in his official position, he was eminently Christian in the various relations of private life. As a husband and father, tenderly thoughtful and affectionate. As a friend, considerate and true. As an acquaintance and neighbor, most sociable and charitable. His cheerful manners and entertaining conversation rendered his society unusually attractive, his words of cheer and deeds of unostentatious, but judicious benevolence, quieted many an anxious heart and gladdened many a needy home." The Churchmen of Iowa who knew him will most tenderly cherish the memory of their first Bishop so long as life shall be theirs; and through all time the Church will gratefully acknowledge the strength of the foundation which, amid the changes and excitements of a youthful but giant State, he with so much foresight and toil laid for her future welfare.

The special Convention elected first the Rev. Henry C. Potter, D.D., Rector of Grace Church, New York, who declined the position. The Rev. Wm. R. Huntington, S.T.D., was then duly chosen, and the Convention adjourned. Dr. Huntington also having declined, at the twenty-second Annual Convention, held in Grace Church, Cedar Rapids, May 25, 1875 A.D., the Rev. James Houston Eccleston, D.D., of Philadelphia, was declared by the President duly elected; but he, in consequence of opposition and alleged informality in the matter of his election, declined consideration of the subject. The twenty-third Annual Convention, held in St. Paul's Church, Des Moines, May, 1876 A.D., unanimously elected the Rev. William Stevens Perry, D.D., of Geneva, N. Y., who accepted the position, and became, by his consecration in his parish church, September 10, 1876 A.D., the second Bishop of Iowa.

During the interval, a few days less than two years, between the death of Bishop Lee and the consecration of Bishop Perry, the Rev. F. Emerson Judd, having been appointed "General Missionary" by the Diocesan Board, was instrumental in keeping alive the interest in vacant parishes and unsupplied mission stations, and the excellent Bishop Talbot, of Indiana, kindly made Episcopal visitations to the parishes having classes for confirmation.

Bishop Perry, already widely known through the important positions held in the Church's General Council, and in his pastoral and collegiate relations, received a most hearty welcome throughout the entire Diocese. He found in his new field three very valuable monuments of his predecessor's wise foresight, prudent effort, and untiring energy. The Iowa Episcopate Fund was represented by an elegant mansion, the "Bishop's House," upon which had been expended $21,165.38, also by 1762 54-100 acres of valuable land in the State of Iowa, and investments to the amount of $20,063.60, all of which was drawing interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum.

Griswold College was in possession of a handsome stone edifice for collegiate purposes, a convenient boarding-house, a chapel, and a commodious residence for the President, all situated in a commanding and very beautiful location in the city of Davenport. Two Professorships were permanently endowed, the "Ely" fully, and the "Anthon" partially. The Cathedral occupying the centre of the east block of the college grounds, and adjoining the lot upon which stands the "Bishop's House," was completed with the exception of the towers and spire, and had been consecrated by Bishop Lee as being "free from incumbrance." But with the two latter of these advantages were associated very grave responsibilities and many serious difficulties. The college and theological schools were to be reorganized, and an adequate support secured, and a suitable cathedral system was to be inaugurated. To the accomplishment of both these objects Bishop Perry was singularly adapted, having had peculiar advantages in connection with both educational and Diocesan institutions. As was to be expected, therefore, under his wise administration and successful efforts, both college and cathedral were soon put in a position to do good and permanent work. Also at a Conference held in Davenport by the eight Bishops whose Sees and Jurisdictions lie between the Mississippi and the Rocky Mountains, it was decided "to unite on Seabury and Griswold as Theological School and College for the great West stretching from the Mississippi to the Pacific slope."

But the extent of the Diocese might well have appalled the stoutest of heart and the strongest in effort. "Larger than all England, or than the five Dioceses of New York, with Connecticut besides," and embracing nearly half a million of souls, it was no wonder that the Diocese of Iowa compelled her second Bishop to say, "We are unable to do this work. It can be no experiment to seek the up-building of a future See." The huge Diocese remains undivided, and its one hundred counties still look to Bishop Perry for Episcopal care, nor do they look in vain. The older parishes, with scarcely an exception, are progressing most favorably, many new ones are springing up, and everywhere the Church is rapidly gaining in favor.

The Diocese was most materially benefited by the bequests of a very estimable lady, who was one of the most efficient Church-workers in Iowa when under the jurisdiction of Bishop Kemper. Of this truly good woman Bishop Perry, in his Convention address of 1879, thus speaks: "In the decease of Mrs. Charlissa C. Cook, widow of the late Hon. Ebenezer Cook, the Church in Iowa has lost one of her members whom generations yet to come will rise up to call blessed. During her years of widowhood she had devised and executed a noble charity,—the building of Trinity Church and School in memory of her husband, and at her death she gave back to God most of the wealth He had permitted her to acquire. With a thoughtful care for those who must ever be a care to others, this devoted Churchwoman devised nearly half of her estate to the founding of a 'Home for the Friendless' in the city of Davenport, while a sum second only to this bequest was given for the support of the indigent clergymen and the widows and orphans of deceased clergymen of the Diocese of Iowa.

The Board of Missions and the weaker parishes within our bounds were kindly remembered, while the gifts to her parish church and to the congregation of Christ's Church, and to other Church charities outside of the Diocese, attested the interest of this excellent woman in the work of the Church at home and abroad." From Mrs. Cook the Diocese received for Missions $10,000, for weak parishes $10,000, and $5000 placed under the direction of the Bishop. The "Old Clergy Fund" received a direct bequest of $10,000, and was also made the recipient of half of the "rest and residue" of the estate after all legacies had been paid. As residuary legatee the Fund has received thus far $65,000. In the Bishop's address to the Convention of 1882 A.D. is found the following most encouraging statement:

"From the Convention journals it appears that the increase of permanent values of Church property, exclusive of stipends, salaries, subscriptions for current expenses, and offerings for local or general Church work, and inclusive only of moneys paid to redeem Church property from indebtedness; for the erection or purchase of churches, chapels, and rectories, and endowments for Church purposes raised in Iowa and from the Diocese alone, has been at the rate of upwards of one thousand dollars per week for the nearly six years of the present Episcopate. If to this large sum we add the gifts from outside to our college and churches and Church work in various forms, and the appreciation of Church property in Iowa during the last six years, we can estimate the increase of Church property in Iowa during the last six years as nearly or quite half a million,—a sum equal to the permanent acquisitions of the preceding quarter of a century. Gratefully do we record these proofs of a material prosperity. In spiritual things the blessing has not been withheld. The net increase of communicants alone during this period has been fifty per cent. For all these tokens of His power to God alone be the praise."

The Diocese when organized in 1853 A.D. numbered ten places, in which services were held with seven clergy and sixty-five communicants. In 1883 A.D., thirty years after, the number of parishes and stations reported in the journal is one hundred and eleven, while the number of clergymen canonically connected with the Diocese is fifty-eight. The communicants reported number four thousand two hundred and forty-seven, and the individuals under pastoral care twelve thousand four hundred and eighty-nine. This paper cannot perhaps find a better conclusion than in quotations from Bishop Perry's last Convention address (1883 A.D.): "It is of little moment the number of clergy and congregations in Iowa has increased tenfold, that the number of communicants has multiplied in far greater proportion, even an hundredfold; that we have more than ten times the number of churches, chapels, and rectories that we possessed in 1853 A.D.; that we have acquired a noble property in endowments for the Episcopate, for the college, for the Theological School, for our indigent, disabled clergy, for the widows of deceased clergy, for feeble parishes, for missions, and for various educational, eleemosynary, and parochial purposes,—what has been accomplished is only to be regarded as a beginning. Foundations have been laid. We are to build thereupon. . . . It is not our privilege as a Church to boast of numbers in comparison with the religious bodies about us. It will be enough if we abound in good works, if we take the lead in good deeds, if, like the Master, we care for the bodies as well as the souls of our fellow-man. There have been noble beginnings in this direction. The establishment and endowment of Homes for the Friendless by the late Hon. J. M. Griffith, at Dubuque, and the late Mrs. Cook, of Davenport, and the successful founding of the more distinctively Church charity at Des Moines, the Cottage Hospital, are each and all steps in the right direction. Gratefully and gladly do we remember and record the fact that Churchmen and Churchwomen have taken the lead in the inauguration of these charities. They are part and parcel of the work given us by God to do.”

REV. F. E. JUDD.

Ireland, Church of. Though some of the Irish had probably received Christianity from the British at some earlier date, yet the conversion of Ireland is attributed to Palladius, who (410 A.D.) was consecrated Bishop for the Irish by Pope Celestine, but it is nearly certain that he never reached Ireland. The work of conversion was really effected by St. Patrick, whose whole history was very romantic. His knowledge of men, his good common sense, energy, and courage gave him great influence, and he was able to effect the conversion of a large part of the Irish clans. But he fashioned the methods of Church work to suit the wild people with whom he dealt. The principle was a monastic one of the simplest mode. Bishops were very numerous, and were probably engaged without Dioceses in Missionary work, or were Bishops in charge of a monastery, or working in a clan as tribe Bishop, with the honors which belong to the chief of a tribe. Pagan customs would naturally long survive, though the exiled British, fleeing from the Saxons, helped somewhat to elevate the Irish.

The energy that had been expended in piracy and clan feuds now took a missionary form, and the active Irish, hardy, bold, enthusiastic youths, were the pioneer missionaries among the Picts, and among the tribes of Northern and Central Europe, whose work was garnered by men carrying a stronger plan of organization. St. Aidan's mission from Lindisfarne to the northern Saxons was in truth the firmest and most enduring of the missions in England. This simple flexible mode of work broke down before the later organized methods, when the people were prepared for them, but not before. The Christianity avowed moulded but slowly the character of the tribes, but it produced many noble Christian men and women.

As they rose into more regular system the Irish Archbishops obtained consecration from England. The Archbishop of Dublin was consecrated by Lanfranc 1079 A.D. But in 1155 A.D., Hadrian IV. granted Ireland to Henry II. This led to the Norman invasion (1170 A.D.). From this date the island was the theatre of guerrilla wars and raidings. The conquered possessions, whose limits varied with the political fortunes of the colony, were called the English Pale. The clans in the more difficult parts of the island long remained unbroken. The native Irish Church was at a great disadvantage, and disabilities were declared against the native clergy. The Church of history is practically the Norman-English establishment. The Councils, as of Cashel (1172 A.D.), Dublin (1217 A.D.), of Nova Villa (1216 A.D.), when Paparo, the Legate, presided, were under Anglo-Norman rule. Gradually, however, there was more amalgamation, and some time before the date of the Reformation the Norman influence had re-moulded the Irish Church, and Diocesan Episcopacy ruled the Irish Church. Abuses had arisen. Papal aggrandizement had gone forward since it could act as a mediator between the two parties.

Henry VIII. easily dissolved the monasteries, but some escaped his ruthless rapacity, and the Reformation he had begun in England but proceeded to the same point in Ireland, and more laxly, for Bishops nominated at Rome were not refused their Sees. Edward's Prayer-Book was accepted by the Archbishop of Dublin, but was rejected by the Archbishop of Armagh. Mary's accession drove out the Bishops inclined to Reform. But Elizabeth's supremacy and the English ritual were accepted in a Parliament in 1560 A.D., where there were three Archbishops and seventeen Bishops out of twenty-six. The records are doubtful, but as only two Bishops were a little later deprived of their Sees (and these were intruded under Mary), it is very fair to assert that the rest followed the example of the Archbishop of Dublin and conformed to the reform introduced by Elizabeth. But Roman intrigues obtained a representation at Trent in 1563 A.D. The unhappy antagonisms of the races which were in the island gave a powerful opportunity to the Jesuits to set the two parties at greater variance, and to establish a schism which has included by far the greater part of the Celtic population and has paralyzed all efforts for raising it to a higher level.

The political disturbances were too often fomented by the Priests, and the unfortunate Irish have been used as tools for designing men. There is no space here for detailing the guerrilla wars in Elizabeth's and the Stewart reigns. In the iron rule of Cromwell Irish representatives sat in Parliament in London. James II. made his only stand in Ireland. From that time on Ireland was a banned country, misunderstood, restive, misruled. After the insurrection of 1798 A.D., the Act of Union joined the two countries and the two Churches together politically.

But the gift of emancipation from political disabilities granted to the Romanists in 1829 A.D. led to further concessions, till at last the Irish Church was disestablished, its revenues seized, its incomes commuted. It was enacted in 1869 A.D., but went into effect in 1871 A.D.

By it the Irish Church was freed from dependence on the Crown. It confined ecclesiastical Law only to the members of the Church. It confiscated to public uses, but subject to life interests, revenues to the amount of £581,000. The Irish Church had to organize anew its work. It declared its sisterhood with the English Church in a General Convention in 1870 A.D. (February), and took preliminary steps for organization.

The General Synod was finally shaped, and became the Church Council. The governing arrangement for the Church is as follows: It consists of the House of Bishops, consisting of two Archbishops and twelve Bishops, and the House of Representatives, consisting of two hundred and eight Clergy and four hundred and sixteen Laity; but, except for special reasons, the two houses sit together. They are presided over by the Archbishop of Armagh by ancient right. The Diocesan Synod consists of the Bishop, Clergy of the Diocese, and Synodsmen sent by the Vestries. There is a Diocesan Court for cases arising in the Diocese, and a Court of General Synod to hear appeals and to try greater causes. The ancient offices of Dean, Archdeacons, and Canons are retained. The Archbishop of Armagh is elected by the Bishops, but the Archbishop of Dublin is elected in Diocesan Synod, as are also the other Bishops.

The present Clergy by law are entitled to an annuity from the Government, for which they may commute, by transferring the capital sum it represents to the Governing Body, the corporation in the Church which controls the property; and a composition also may be effected, by which a clergyman may compound his right to this annuity by resigning his liability to duty, and receiving a reduced share according to an established scale, varying with age, etc. Vigorous efforts were made to raise the endowments needed and to fund the capital received from Government: the result is a capital of over $35,000,000. The Irish Church has about 640,000 members out of a total population of 5,200,000, or forms one-eighth of the whole. There are 1218 parishes in the twelve Dioceses.

It will be seen that as a historical fact the two parties into which the Old Irish Church has been divided by political and race antagonisms have changed sides. So long as the Anglo-Roman Church was in the Papal obedience the old Irish Church, while holding the same doctrines, was in opposition. As soon as the Anglo-Irish Church initiated reform, the Celtic Irish Church threw itself eagerly into the Roman obedience.

Irregularity. A canonical impediment; an incapacity for holding a benefice for some act requiring punishment. It also means the impediments to the reception of Holy Orders, such as occurred by a personal blemish, as under the Jewish law, or under some disability, as being slaves or serfs, or illegitimate, or having received baptism on a sick-bed, or as guilty of some crime which rendered them notorious. The 113th Canon of 1603 A.D. threatened the clergyman revealing "any crime or offense committed to his trust and secrecy" in confession with the "pain of irregularity." It involved the loss of his benefice, if the clergyman had one, or else incapacitated him for holding one if he had not.

Isaac. The incidents of a life which has such momentous lessons in it are strangely few. The child of a promise made to Abraham in consequence of his faith, he had from his youth ever before him the memory of that act of still greater faith in which he was a participant, even though in a subordinate mode. His character seems to have been ever quiet, thoughtful, reserved, and deeply devout. His mother seems to have resented for him the jealous ridicule of Ishmael. When a youth, certainly old enough to know something of the transaction, he was offered up by his father, who received him again in a figure from the dead. It would seem that this solemn action shadowed his life ever after. His father procured for him his wife Rebecca when he was forty, and he was childless for twenty years. Fifteen years later he buried his father. By a famine he was forced to leave Lahai-Roi and go to Gerar. Here God renewed His covenant with him. The same timidity which influenced his father led him to deny that Rebecca was his wife to Abimelech, the Philistine king. In this quiet life lay, too, the capacities for something greater, for he increased in wealth and in importance till he roused the jealousy of the Philistines, whose herdsman contended with his servants for the wells. The deceit of Jacob, in wrongfully claiming what God would have given him openly, broke into Isaac's domestic peace, and by Rebecca's persuasion he sent him to Laban, in Padan Aram. His life is now for us a blank till we read that Jacob returned with a large family and considerable property, in time to see his father before his death. "And the days of Isaac were a hundred and fourscore years, . . . and his sons Esau and Jacob buried him." The quiet patience and the peaceableness of his character are the leading traits, which seem to be CHRIST-like, but in one great point he stands the sole, the pre-eminent type of our LORD. In the act of sacrifice by which Abraham placed him upon the altar of wood and was about to slay him, he was the type of the atonement. It was the prefigurement in action of the one great sacrifice on the same mount nineteen centuries later, by his descendant according to the flesh, JESUS CHRIST. It was a figure, a type, and a prophecy of the death and the resurrection of CHRIST, and if larger teaching were given to him as to its meaning, he may well have loved to meditate upon it ever after.

Isaiah (Heb. Geshayahu,—JEHOVAH is helper), a name in its abbreviated English form found only in connection with the earliest of the four greater prophets, but in its fuller Hebrew form occurring also as the name of certain Levites in the time of David (1 Chron. xxv. 3; xxvi. 25). The prophet was the son of Amos, of whom nothing is known except that he is not the same with the prophet Amos, the two names being very different in Hebrew, though written alike in the Greek of the Septuagint. Of his personal history almost nothing has been preserved except the few incidental notices in the course of his prophecies. In 2 Chron. xxvi. 22, we are told that he was the historian of Uzziah's reign. There is a tradition that he lived to the reign of Manasseh, and was put to death under that monarch by being "sawn asunder," to which Heb. xi. 37, is supposed to allude; but this tradition is very doubtful. We only know that he prophesied "in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah" (Isa. i. 1), and that he was still actively engaged in his duties in the fourteenth year of the last reign (Isa. xxxvi. 1; xxxvii.—xxxix.). Supposing his prophecies to have begun in the last year of Uzziah (comp. Isa. vi. 1), they must have extended over a period of at least forty-seven years, and as neither the beginning nor the end of them is fixed, they may have covered a considerably longer period. Isaiah is shown by his prophecies to have been a man of high culture and of great eloquence. He was the counselor of kings, an eminent patriot, and a wise statesman. He was evidently much esteemed by Hezekiah (Isa. xxxvii. 2; xxxviii. 1; xxxix. 3-8).

Isaiah, Book of. This, in point of time and of the order of the Canon, is the first, as it is in many respects the most important, of the "Greater Prophets." The author lived in Judah before, during, and after the captivity of the kingdom of the ten tribes, which took place in the sixth year of Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii. 9-12). Its prophecies are mainly addressed to Judah, although, as in the other prophets, there are burdens in relation to other nations occupying xiii.—xxiii., and some other utterances not especially relating to Judah, as xxviii.

Isaiah's prophecies are the centre of a large prophetic activity. Amos also prophesied under Uzziah, and Hosea and Micah were strictly contemporaries of Isaiah, while Joel is referred by many writers to the same period. It was a great crisis in the history of Israel, when the northern kingdom was carried into captivity and the southern also was threatened with the same fate. At no other period in the history of the ancient Church was there such an outburst of prophetic teaching, except at the still darker time of the captivity of Judah.

The period was one of great political vicissitudes, and to understand the prophecies of Isaiah it is necessary to take into consideration the great political events of the several reigns under which he lived. Uzziah was a wise and good monarch, succeeding to the throne at the age of sixteen, after the assassination of his father, and reigning fifty-two years. His long, wise, and pious reign brought about a state of great comparative prosperity. He subdued the Edomites and other lesser tribes of that part of Arabia, and took Elath, which he fortified as a commercial port at the head of the east branch of the Red Sea. He extended his sway over the Ammonites and Moabites on the east of the Jordan valley and the Dead Sea. They had hitherto been tributary to Israel; he made them tributary to Judah. On the west also he was successful against the Philistines, and razed their principal cities and built new fortified towns in their territory. He also strengthened Jerusalem, and brought a large army into a high state of efficiency, and thoroughly equipped them according to the fashion of the times. His internal administration was equally good. He loved agriculture, dug many wells, and built towns for the protection of the flocks in the parts of the wilderness fitted for pasturage, and he cultivated vineyards and orchards for himself. He was under the influence of a certain prophet Zechariah (not the later Zechariah of the Canon, 2 Chron. xxvi. 5), and never fell away from the worship of JEHOVAH. But towards the close of his reign his prosperity was too much for him; he became inflated with pride and insisted on taking upon himself the priest's office of burning incense (ch. xxi. 16-21). The High-Priest remonstrated with him in vain, and he was smitten with leprosy. In consequence of this he was obliged to live apart the rest of his life and govern the kingdom through his son Jotham (2 Kings xv. 5). The only prophecy of Isaiah distinctly dated in this reign is chapter vi., in its last year; but the previous chapters may probably be considered as belonging to its closing years, except chapter i., which is rather a general introduction to the whole book. It was, however, under the state of things brought about by this reign that Isaiah's earlier prophecies were uttered.

Jotham succeeded his father at the age of twenty-five years and reigned sixteen years. He does not appear to have been a man of the same force of character, but followed his father's policy as far as he was able. He further strengthened Jerusalem, and built various fortifications in Judah. He also subdued a revolt of the Ammonites. Near the end of his reign the confederacy between Pekah, King of Israel, and Rezin, King of Damascus, against Judah, began to assume threatening proportions. There are none of Isaiah's prophecies dated as belonging to this reign.

Jotham was succeeded by Ahaz at the age of twenty. He reigned also sixteen years, and was both a weak and wicked king. The league of Israel and Syria for the utter destruction of the kingdom of Judah now came into active operation. They invaded the territories of Judah, and finally laid siege to Jerusalem. They failed in the latter attempt, but carried off vast spoil and an immense number of captives. The latter were given up at the instance of the prophet Oded (2 Kings xvi.; 2 Chron. xxviii.); but the kingdom of Judah was otherwise greatly crippled. The allies took the port of Elath, and, as they had no use for it themselves, they restored it to the Edomites; they laid waste the eastern part of Judah and gave an opportunity to the Philistines to invade the south and west. Ahaz, in his distress, and thus encompassed with enemies on every side, sought the assistance of Tiglath-Pileser, the king of Assyria. He helped him just so far as suited his own purposes, conquering and annexing to his own dominions Syria and the trans-Jordanic and northern parts of Israel; but he impoverished Ahaz by the enormous tribute laid upon him. He also led (or probably forced) him to introduce the worship of his own gods into Judah. During this reign Isaiah appears as a patriot prophet, and probably the saving of Jerusalem was largely due to his energy and influence. The prophecies of chapters vii.-ix. belong to this reign, and probably also those of x.-xii. The difficulties in the interpretation of the former are largely removed by remembering that the purpose of Pekah and Rezin was nothing less than the utter and permanent destruction of the kingdom of Judah, and that the promise of the MESSIAH was a proof that this purpose must fail.

Hezekiah, the best of the kings of Judah, succeeded Ahaz, and reigned twenty-nine years (2 Kings xviii. 5, 6). He restored the temple and its worship, and destroyed the "high places." He also destroyed the brazen serpent which had been preserved from the time of Moses, but which had become an object of idolatrous worship. After the fall of the kingdom of Israel, which occurred in his sixth year, he invited the remnants of those tribes to join in his great celebration of the Passover. His invitation was generally ridiculed (2 Chron. xxx. 10), yet was finally accepted by "many of Ephraim, and Manasseh, Issachar, and Zebulun" (ch. xxx., 18), and probably by smaller numbers of other tribes. From this time the remnants of all the tribes seem to have looked upon Judah as their head, and gradually becoming incorporated with it, the continuity of the whole nation was thus kept up. This fact is of some importance in understanding those later passages of the Old Testament, and especially those of the New, in which the existing nation is considered as representing the whole "twelve tribes." Hezekiah attacked the Philistines, retook the lost cities and gained others; he also refused the payment of tribute to Assyria. Shalmaneser (successor to Tiglath-Pileser) marched against him, but was detained five years by the unsuccessful siege of Tyre. Meanwhile Hezekiah strengthened Jerusalem, and the people were prevented by the efforts of Isaiah from forming an alliance with Egypt. Shalmaneser was succeeded by Sargon, who invaded Judah twice. His first attack had no important results, and is merely alluded to in the history; in the second he took large numbers of the cities of Judah. Hezekiah at this time (in his fourteenth year) was very ill, and in answer to his earnest prayer received the promise of the prolongation of his life for fifteen years, the going back of the shadow upon the sun-dial of Ahaz being given him as an assurance of the promise (Isa. xxxviii. 1-8). The report of his sickness and recovery reached Babylon, and the king sent him an embassy of congratulation. There is every reason to suppose that this embassy covered a political purpose, and the suggestion of an alliance between Judah and Babylon against their common oppressor, Assyria. It was doubtless to prove the value of his alliance that Hezekiah ostentatiously showed to the ambassadors all his possessions, especially his treasures and "the house of his armor." In consequence of this, Isaiah pronounced the doom that all these things, together with the descendants of Hezekiah himself, should be carried away to Babylon, — a prophecy which in the existing state of empires seemed impossible of accomplishment, but which was accurately fulfilled after the conquest of Nineveh by Babylon. Sennacherib succeeded Sargon and twice invaded Judah. Hezekiah paid him three hundred talents of silver and thirty of gold, and suffered the loss of part of his dominions, which were given to the Philistines. Egypt also was terribly defeated by Sennacherib. His second attack on Judah was most contemptuous of the God of Israel, and was miraculously defeated. Whenever the people relied on Egypt, they suffered; when such aid was out of the question, they were delivered. Hezekiah survived this last invasion only one year.

In the opening of the book he describes his prophecies as "the vision of Isaiah." This word is here evidently to be taken in the general sense of the revelation communicated to him. Of "vision" in the stricter sense, as used by several of the other prophets, there is but a single instance (ch. vi.)

in the whole book. The style of Isaiah has been generally recognized by critics as of the highest order. He has been truly described as the most complete and many-sided of all the prophets, and passages of surpassing eloquence may be selected from almost any part of his writings. He is often called "the Evangelical Prophet," from the clearness and fullness of his Messianic predictions, and especially from the distinctness with which he foretells our Lord's vicarious suffering for our sins (lii. 13-14).

During the last century the integrity of the book has been very earnestly called in question. The book naturally falls into two great parts, chapter i.-xxxix. and chapter xl.-lxvi., the latter forming one complete and closely connected prophecy, while the former is made up of a great number of shorter and more or less disconnected prophecies, and includes some historical matter. The first suspicion that the whole was not the work of Isaiah was suggested by Koppe, about 1780 A.D., and related only to a different authorship of these two parts. His views were taken up and extended by many German writers, until now the supposition of a "Deutero-Isaiah" has become the prevailing one among German scholars. There have been, however, all along, earnest defenders of the integrity of the book among German scholars. Of these, during the present century, may be mentioned Jahn (1802 A.D.), Möller (1825 A.D.), Kleinert (1829 A.D.), Henstenberg and Hävernick (1849 A.D.), Stier (1850 A.D.), Keil (1853 A.D.), and Nägelsbach (1877 A.D.). The last is translated in the large commentary edited by Schaff. In the course of the controversy it became evident to both parties that the arguments relied on to disprove Isaiah's authorship of the last twenty-seven chapters were of equal force against many in the earlier part. The critics were therefore compelled to dismember that also, and reject Isaiah's authorship of (as stated by Ewald) chapters xii. 2; xiv. 23; xxi. 1-10; xxiv.-xxvii.; xxxiv.; xxxv., or about one-quarter of the whole. Other critics differ in regard to several of these passages, and would deny Isaiah's authorship of other passages. Many subsidiary reasons have been urged against the integrity of the book, but these have been amply met, and confessedly are only of secondary importance. The chief argument, and the only one on which much reliance is placed, is that the author of the second part takes his stand-point at the close of the Babylonian captivity and thence looks forward to the subsequent future.

It is urged, with reason, that the date of an author must be determined from his own description of the times in which he lived and in which he places himself. This principle may be fully accepted, and on it may be constructed the strongest argument for the unity of Isaiah. The question is simply whether the author of the disputed portions actually lived in the time of the close of the captivity; or whether, living at an earlier date, he merely transported himself in prophetic thought to that period. Now, if we are willing to set aside entirely the unquestioned tradition of all the previous centuries, and the opinions of all students of the Bible in the ages before us; and if we can explain away the citations in the New Testament from the latter part of the book under Isaiah's name (St. Matt. iii. 3 and parallels; xii. 17-21; St. Luke iv. 17-19; St. John xii. 38; Acts viii. 30, 32; Rom. x. 16; x. 20, 21); if we can set aside the express statement of Josephus (Ant., xi. 1, § 2) that Cyrus read in the book which the prophet Isaiah had left behind him the prophecies concerning himself; if we can forget the unity of design connecting the last part with what has gone before, and attach no weight to the unity of diction pervading both parts; if we could account for the fading out from history of the name of the author of such magnificent and important prophecies, and their being falsely attributed to Isaiah;—if all these things, on which there is not here space to enlarge, could be set aside, there yet remain conclusive reasons why the second part of Isaiah cannot be assigned to the period of the close of the captivity. (1) There is in this second part a recognition of the sacrificial worship of the Jews as actually going on in the time of the writer. Chapter xl. 16 seems to imply this, but lxvi. 3 is a distinct recognition of it. Now we know that all such worship was entirely suspended during the exile. (2) The denunciations of the bold and open idolatry of the people occupy no inconsiderable portion of this second part (xl. 13-20; xlviii. 5; lvii. 5-8; lxx. 2-4, 11; lxvi. 17). But it is well known that they were finally weaned from idolatry by the exile, and that even the little practiced by them at the first of it was, as appears from Ezekiel, of an entirely secret character. The critics endeavor to parry the force of this evidence by supposing these passages to have been written for the idolatrous remnant who continued to live in Judea. History, however, shows that there was no such remnant. The people who were not carried off by Nebuchadnezzar sought refuge from him in Egypt, and on the return from the captivity there is no recognition of any Israelites as remaining in the land. (3) Throughout this entire part the prediction of Cyrus and of the things belonging to the close of the captivity are claimed as proofs of the foreknowledge of God, and therefore of His rightful claim to the allegiance of His people. (See, e.g., xlv. 24-xlv. 6; xlv. 19-21; xlv. 8-13; xlviii. 5-8.) It is inconceivable that any prophet could have used such arguments except he were writing so long before the events that they were not yet within the scope of human sagacity. The internal evidence of the book is therefore entirely in accordance with the unbroken tradition of its unity.

REV. PROF. FREDERIC GARDINER, D.D.

J.

Jacob. The grandson of Abraham. His father Isaac was fifty-nine years old when the twins Esau and Jacob were born. It was foretold to his mother Rebecca that Jacob's descendant should rule his brothers. From this Rebecca endeavored, on at least one memorable occasion, to push his interests forward at his brother's expense. The two young men were brought up together sharing their father's wandering life. Esau was loved by Isaac, Jacob by his mother. It was characteristic of Jacob that he should take advantage of his brother's faintness after a long chase, and buy of him the coveted birthright foretold to be his. Esau probably thought little of the sale of it for a mess of pottage, but Jacob treasured it up, and was the more ready to lend himself to his mother's instigation to perpetrate the well-known deceit upon his father. He obtained the blessing by fraud and it brought its own punishment, in the hatred of his brother and his own flight from home. Rebecca's influence over Isaac was great enough to persuade him to send Jacob to seek a wife in his kinsman Laban's family. On this journey was renewed to him at Bethel the covenant, which JEHOVAH had made with Abraham and Isaac, in the vision of the ladder reaching down to earth. The fraud which he had practiced was repaid him by Laban, who betrothed to him Rachel, the younger daughter, but on the marriage night substituted Leah, the older. Jacob was indignant, but Laban bestowed on him his other daughter also, and gave to each a handmaid. Leah bore to Jacob, Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah; Bilhah, Rachel's maid, bore him Dan and Naphtali; Zilpah, Leah's maid, Gad and Asher; Leah gave him Issachar and Zebulun and Rachel, Joseph and Benjamin. The wary, observant character of Jacob was shown in the management of Laban's flocks. It was while he was serving Laban, and before Rachel's death, that Joseph, a lad of seventeen, was sold by his brethren into slavery. His early sin was sorely visited upon him by Laban's fraud, the turbulence of his sons, and the loss of Joseph. After twenty-one years' absence, finding Laban very jealous because of his success in caring for his own flocks, he set out to return home to his father. His journey home was marked by three dangers,—the angry pursuit of Laban, whom God warned not to speak either good or bad to Jacob; the meeting with his angry brother Esau, whom he propitiated with a present, which, however, Esau would not accept; on the night before, when in anxious sorrow he sent his caravan forward and paused at the brook Jabbok, the Angel of the LORD, the Jehovah-Angel, wrestled with him. In that mysterious contest, which was typical of the religious earnestness and perseverance of the Patriarch, there is much significance, both of the weakness and the strength of the people. Both the contest, the halting, and the blessing have rested together with the name upon Israel. Jacob rested at Shechem, where occurred the disgrace of his daughter Dinah and the vengeance which Simeon and Levi exacted of the Shechemites. Here Divine interposition took him to Bethel, where he purged his family of the idols they had learned to use in Padan-aram, and renewed his covenant with God. Apparently he reached his father not long before Isaac's death. Jacob is left here by the sacred narrative, and the acts of Judah are next recorded and the history of Joseph is given. Jacob went down to Egypt to his son Joseph when he was an hundred and thirty years old.

The life of Jacob is marked in the sacred history. He was a type of CHRIST, as a supplanter; the second Adam, not casting out, but supplanting the first Adam with a better life. In this view his fraud is not to be considered as at all justified. The blessing would have been given him could he have waited God's time. His after-career was a just sequel to the deceit, while with it were mingled many Divine comforts and blessings. His character was undoubtedly formed in reality by his life and struggles under Laban's jealous and repressive treatment, and but for his own shrewdness he would have fared badly under his kinsman; thrice were his wages changed. His patience was tested and developed; he felt the power of God over about him; his deep religiousness was ever quickened. His dream on the plain; the meeting of the angels at Mahanaim; the wrestling with the Man at Peniel; his renewed covenant with God at Bethel, and throughout his whole career his vow of the tenth which could only be offered as a sacrifice, educated him in the life hid with God. In two points was his life a type of our LORD'S: he was the one who should be a substitute offering a better, holier life; he was a type of CHRIST in that he prevailed in his wrestling. So our LORD'S human trials and temptations and prayers and strong cry prevailed, and He, as the Patriarch of old (Gen. xlix.), has left a perpetual blessing behind Him on all who believe on Him who is the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob.

James, St., usually surnamed the Great, the brother of John the beloved disciple. The notices of him in the Gospels are very few. With his brother he was a fisherman, working in his father Zebedee's boat, when he was called by JESUS to follow Him. He was one of the Twelve, and of these he was the second of the three who stood nearest our LORD. ("And He taketh with Him Peter, James, and John.") He with the other two went into the death-chamber of Jairus' daughter. With them he was on the Mount of Transfiguration. His zeal procured him the surname Boanerges,—Son of Thunder. It brought upon him the rebuke of the LORD. For him and his brother his mother preferred her petition that they might sit, the one on the right hand, the other on the left, in His Kingdom. He was one of the four who questioned the Master about the last days. He was one of the three at the Agony in the Garden. Except the record of his name in the list in Acts i. 13, he is not mentioned till we read that Herod killed James, the brother of John, with sword (A.D. 44), when he drank of his Master's cup and received his Master's baptism. Every notice of him by the Evangelists, slight as it is, leaves the impression that there was a nobleness and loveliness in his character. That he and his brother were chosen to be our LORD's most intimate earthly companions proves their sympathy with Him, if not the insight, which they afterwards assuredly received, into His nature. Even their ambitions tended to better things. Of his labors we know nothing. Everything that is told of him outside the Gospels and Acts is purely legendary. His mission to Spain (of which he is the patron saint) is wholly mythical. His twelve years of work in Jerusalem were not wasted we may be sure, but it is one of the mysterious acts of Providence that he should have been killed just when, humanly speaking, he could have been most usefully employed.

James, St., the Less, properly the Little, the son of Alphæus, is another instance where the life of one chosen to do the LORD's work has left no earthly record save the name. Their work we know is not forgotten in the Book of Remembrance, and here it was merged into the sum of the labor necessary for founding the Church; but except his title, the son of Alphæus, and his own name in the list of the Apostles, we know nothing about him. It is here assumed that he is not the same as the James to whom the LORD appeared at His Resurrection (1 Cor. xv. 7), who presided at the Council at Jerusalem, and who wrote the Epistle. There is considerable difficulty upon either hypothesis, but upon a review of the whole evidence it is more probable that James the Little was not James the brother of the LORD.

James the Just, the brother of the LORD. It is claimed that this James was really the cousin of our LORD, and the son of Alphæus, or Clopas, names which can be shown to be identical, for the title Brother, often meant Cousin, as Son is often "descendant;" that when it is said, "neither did His brethren believe on Him," it does not necessarily include all His brethren; that the omission of the title Brethren of the LORD from the names of James the Little and Jude, his brother, does not prove that they were not His brethren; that it is strange that our LORD should have intrusted His mother to St. John, when there were those whose duty it was to care for her, had there been any brethren according to the Flesh. The reply is that "brother," denoting a kinship, is always used accurately in the New Testament, that the LORD's brethren appear separately in the Gospel; that the LORD's brethren are separated from the Apostles in 1 Cor. ix. 5; that James was called a pillar and distinguished from the Apostles by St. Paul (Gal. ii. 9, and Gal. i. 9). The arguments can be seen in full for the identity of the two in Smith's "Dictionary of the Bible;" for the view that they are separate persons, see Professor Plumptre's Introduction to Epistle of St. James, in the Cambridge Bible for Schools.

Assuming, then, that James, the brother of the LORD, was a separate person, the recorded facts of his life are almost as meagre as those in the life of St. James the Greater. His brethren did not believe on him during his life. "A prophet," said our LORD, "is not without honor but in his own country and among his own kin and in his own house." They, with His mother and sisters, seek Him out, desiring to speak with Him to withdraw Him from His course. They were at the last feast of Tabernacles that preceded His Passion. They were, or at any rate James was, at Jerusalem at the time of His Passion, for the risen LORD was seen first of Cephas, then of the Twelve, then of the five hundred brethren at once, then of James, then of all the Apostles (1 Cor. xv. 5-7). The brethren were present with the Twelve at the election of St. Matthias. Then James appears as the pillar of the Church at Jerusalem when St. Paul goes up thither, then he is the presiding Apostle at the Council (Acts xv.). Then he receives St. Paul upon his last visit to Jerusalem. There is nothing more recorded in the sacred narrative. His Epistle is his great work. That tells us more of his character than anything else we have. The account of his death as given by Eusebius (E.H., ii. 23) out of Hegesippus fits into the current of events and is marked with the traits implied in his Epistle so as to bear at least the air of the truth. "Noted for his asceticism—a Nazarite—he had gained great influence with the people, whom he taught concerning JESUS the Door. He bore the title of Oblias, the bulwark of the people, and the Righteous or Just. He frequented the sanctuary in constant prayer for the people, so that his knees became callous. He was urged to stay those who had gone astray after JESUS, and for this purpose was put upon the pinnacle of the Temple and called upon to proclaim from thence, 'What is the door of JESUS?' 'And he answered with a loud voice, Why ask ye me concerning JESUS the SON of Man? He hath sat down in heaven on the right hand of the GREAT POWER, and is about to come in the clouds of heaven.' Upon this many believed and cried 'Hosanna to the son of David.' But the Scribes and Pharisees who had set him upon the pinnacle were filled with wrath and cast him down, and the people in the court stoned him, and a fuller beat out his brains while, like St. Stephen, he was praying for his murderers." Such is the bare outline of the beautiful narrative Eusebius quotes in full. In it there is nothing improbable, but rather it falls in with all we know of the state of mind among the Jews then.

It is difficult to fix the date of the death of St. James. If the Epistle to the Hebrews be St. Paul's, is there a reference to St. James in chapter xiii. 7? "Remember them which have the rule over you, who have spoken unto you the word of God: considering the end of their conversation: JESUS CHRIST the same yesterday, to-day, and forever." If so, then, as the Epistle was written about 64 A.D., the martyrdom occurred later. In fact, Heggesipus (Eusebius, E. H.) says, and straightway Vespasian began the siege, placing it then about 70 A.D. His EPISTLE has been questioned, rejected, and when received has been the subject of countless controversies. The Church has always received it, though it was classed for a time with the doubtful Epistles. This hesitation most likely was because it was imperfectly circulated, being addressed to the Jewish converts. At the time of the Reformation it was violently discussed, and by some rejected because of its teaching, which seemed so opposed to that of St. Paul. The date of the Epistle has much to do with considering the extent of that alleged antagonism. If (with the Cambridge Editor Plumptre) it is dated before the Council of Jerusalem, it must be placed before 51 A.D. As our space only permits us to give the results, not the details by which this conclusion is reached, we will accept as proven this date in place of the later one of 61 A.D.

The contents of the Epistle have caused great debates, it being claimed that he was opposed to St. Paul. There is no foundation whatever for this in the inspired narrative. Its real source is in the perversions of the heretical romance of the Recognitions and the Homilies of the pseudo-Clement, used with critical skill and infidel principles by the German critics. This, then, is summarily dismissed, for James the Just was not the man to give the right hand of fellowship to a man to whom he was opposed. Let us look at the contents of the Epistle, and then we will be able to judge of the relation of St. James' doctrine of Works to St. Paul's doctrine of Faith. There are many paral-lelisms of thought and of teaching in this Epistle to that of St. John Baptist. Of these are James i. 22-27 with St. Matt. iii.; James ii. 15, 16, with St. Luke iii. 11; James ii. 19, 20; St. Matt. iii. 9; James v. 1-6; St. Matt. iii. 10-12. There are others to the Sermon on the Mount (e.g., James ii. 14; St. Matt. vii. 21-23; James v. 2 to St. Matt. vi. 19). The Jewish cast of thought, the references to the Old Testament history (to Abraham, Job, Rahab, and Elijah), the probable influence of the Wisdom of the son of Sirach, make this a peculiar Epistle. It is more intense than the Epistles of St. Peter, and in this respect is like the First Epistle of St. John. Its ascetic tone, its practical teaching, its stern reproofs, all mark it. But its doctrine of the relation of Faith to Works gives it a special prominence relative to St. Paul's Epistles to the Romans and Galatians. St. Paul asserts Faith without Works alone can save. St. James teaches, "I will show thee my Faith by my Works." St. Paul condemns dead works. St. James condemns a dead Faith. St. Paul adduces Abraham's obedience before circumcision as the obedience of Faith, "and it was counted unto him for righteousness." St. James adduces the obedience of Abraham in offering up Isaac as the righteousness by works. "Seest thou how Faith wrought with his works, and by works was Faith made perfect (ch. ii. 22). Is there any antagonism between these two Apostles, both zealous for their Master, both of the strictest sect, both eager to teach the whole truth? It is impossible to believe this. The Apostle to the Gentiles was writing to the Gentiles as well as to the Jews, and he adduces one part of Abraham's life, the beginning of his wonderful career. Faith in him must be precedent to action, and all have their blessed significance from his faith. St. James the Just, the unceasing pleader for his people, the Bishop in the Holy City, argues with the faithful of the Dispersion, from the crowning act of faith in Abraham, when his act in its sublimity proved his faith. There is no antagonism, but, rather, both taught the very same truth. For in one of those grand outpourings of his enthusiasm, St. Paul longs that he may "be found in Him," not having mine own righteousness, which is of the Law, but that which is through the faith of CHRIST, the righteousness which is of God by faith, that I may know Him, and the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings, being made conformable to His death if by any means I might attain to the resurrection of the dead." It is impossible to exclude work, life-long work, sanctified by Faith, from these words. The fellowship of His suffering, the conformation to His death, the capacity for having the power of His resurrection unto life resting upon him, demand a preceding and continuing presence of Faith shown in and by works. It is noticeable that St. James does not appeal to the Law, "which was four hundred years after," but to the life of Abraham to establish his position. So doth St. Paul, but St. Paul contrasts it for the Gentiles with the mere literal outward obedience to the Law, while St. James in all his teaching which refers to the Law is writing to those Christians who yet felt the binding authority of the Law, and urges the true law of liberty. It is the fact that a similar use of the Law is made by the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews that indicates that St. Paul must be its author. It is a caviling spirit, or one which, too curiously contrasting the two Apostles, does not mark their agreement, and overlooks the fact that they were addressing Christian audiences differently trained, that can now insist that St. James and St. Paul are in opposition to each other.

The Epistle is not written upon any fixed plan. It deals just with the unsettled, tempted, self-indulgent, self-excusing man. Then it passes to practicing the duty of caring in every way for the poor as a matter of practical faith. Then St. James reproves his readers for sins of the tongue; roused by this, the next chapter (iv.) and part of the fifth are filled with warning and invective against the careless, the rich, the worldly-minded. The pause is sudden, the return to a gentle tone is quite remarkable after so vehement an outburst, and with earnest suggestions upon patience and prayer, he closes with an abruptness that occurs in no other book in the New Testament. It is in perfect keeping with the character of one who was filled with noble, devout asceticism, who was a keen observer and a fearless denouncer of sin, who though not having a polished education was a master of the learning which maketh wise unto salvation, who deserved pre-eminently the title of the Righteous.

Jehovah. The glorious name of God. In the English Version it is always translated LORD, as Elohim is translated God. It occurs in its simplest form JAH in the lxviii. Psalm, 4 v., and is transferred without translation in Ex. vi. 3; Ps. lxxxiii. 18; Is. xii. 2 (JAH JEHOVAH) xxvi. 4 (JAH JEHOVAH), and in compound names several times. It was the ineffable name, the Tetragrammaton, the name of four letters, and its true pronunciation is said to be lost. Its formal announcement to the nation (for it was known before) was itself a step up for the chosen people. Its meaning, the self-existent ONE, the living God (vide ELOHIM), involved a doctrine which was the greatest revelation that the Israelite had yet received, and one which of itself separated him from the heathen. It was held to be wrong to pronounce it (Lev. xxiv. 16), and other vowels were attached to the four consonants, so that it is claimed that its true pronunciation is lost, but from the law of the formation of words in Hebrew its true pronunciation was Jahaveh or Jahveh. Its meaning from the Hebrew verb "to be" is I Am that I Am.

He has the attribute of self-existence, and therefore of eternity. "I am Jahveh, I alter not" (Mal. iii. 6). Again, in Joshua (xxii. 22) and in Psalm l. 1, the three titles EL, ELOHIM, JAHVEH follow in ascending intensity of meaning. "The Mighty, The Mighty Ones, The Self-Existent," hath spoken, or knoweth. It implies, then, personality in the strictest sense, and gives the true Israelite a knowledge of Him, a knowledge which revelation can alone establish, that is beyond all the speculations of men. The distinction between EL (and ELOHIM) as God known from nature, and JEHOVAH as known by His revelation of Himself, will give a clue to the reason why God—Elohim is used at times, LORD—Jehovah at others, and why again both names are combined. A study of these will reveal to him who will undertake it devoutly the marvelous depth and accurate language of Holy Scripture even when it apparently is most arbitrary.

Jeremiah. The prophet whose life and prophetic work was spent in protests against those sins of his people, both political, ecclesiastical, and social, which led to the captivity and to the burning of the Temple by Nebuchadnezzar.

He was the son of Hilkiah, who may have been the Hilkiah the High-Priest, who discovered the Book of the Law in the House of the LORD (2 Kings xxii. 8). He was sanctified for his work from his mother's womb, ordained a prophet unto the nations. His birth-place was in the priestly city of Anathoth. He was called to his life-work quite early. Just at that date Egypt and Nineveh were the upper and lower millstones between which Judah feared she would be ground, and was wavering between alliances with either power, and finally chose to side with Egypt. The people still hankered for the old idolatries, the Ashera (A. V. groves), Astaroth and Moloch. They were guilty of open adultery, false swearing, and murder, and claimed that they were given over to do these abominations; and withal punctually performed the offices of the Temple. Whatever training Jeremiah as the son of a Priest and marked out for a prophet's work received, it had as its basis a deep study of the Law and a grasp of its true spiritual meaning. He prophesied in the last eighteen years of Josiah's reign (629 or 627 B.C.?), and through the reigns of Jehoahaz (three months), of Jehoiakim of eleven years, and of Jehoiachin (three months), and of Zedekiah of eleven years, in all, his prophecies were uttered during a period of forty years. It was a career full of sorrow and of misunderstanding and gainsaying. He was exposed to reproach and derision, his fellow-townsmen of Anathoth sought his life, his brethren dealt treacherously with him. He was smitten by a fellow-priest, and put in the stocks because of his prophecies. The roll of his prophecies was burnt in the king's presence. Though many of his prophecies had been fulfilled and political events were rapidly hurrying to the final catastrophe which he foretold, yet he met with but little attention, and when he tried to leave the now nearly beleaguered city to attend to his private affairs at Anathoth, he was arrested as a deserter and put into ward under Jonathan the scribe in the prison till Zedekiah sent for him. Jeremiah told him plainly his coming fate and asked for better treatment. The king remanded him to prison, but ordered bread for him. But his political opponents obtained him from the king and cast him into a pit in the prison court, where Jeremiah sank in the mire. From this he was saved by Ebed Melech. Another interview, first with the feeble-minded King and then with Pashur and with Zephaniah, proved useless.

In the eleventh year of Zedekiah the city was stormed, the Temple burnt, Zedekiah captured, his sons slain, and then himself blinded. But Jeremiah himself was cared for by Nebuzaradan, the captain of the guard, who had a special order about him. He settled at Mizpah till Gedaliah, the governor under Nebuchadnezzar, was murdered by Ishmael and the refugees at Mizpah carried away captive. Jeremiah was rescued by Johanan, who, despite Jeremiah's prophecy of evil attendant on such a step, carried the whole company down into Egypt, where the prophet ended his days. The noble form of Jeremiah, the greatest of all the historical and literary prophets, fades from our sight together with the monarchy. In misery and continual peril of death he witnessed the fall of the state and the destruction of Jerusalem; he survived it, but found his tomb in an alien land. His was a rare courage, yet he was of a quiet, retiring disposition, shrinking under the great weight of responsibility laid upon him, despairing because so misunderstood and hated; alone, and sustained only by divine comfort. He speaks plainly, simply, honestly; he makes no pretensions to great literary polish, and does not hesitate to repeat phrases and images and the same thoughts over and over, yet there is such intensity in his purpose that it is no mere repetition, but rather a Divine insistence. He falls back upon the Law and upon earlier predictions. His prophecies do not only relate to the Jews but also to the heathen, for whom also he was ordained a prophet. He bears the cup of fury to the Jews and to the Gentiles from the petty kings of Palestine to the kings of Egypt and Babylon (Sheshak). The burden of woe passed upon Egypt, Philistia, Moab, Ammon, Edom, Damascus, Kedar and Hazor, Elam and Babylon (ch. xli.-li.).

The prophecies, as they are now arranged, are evidently not in the order in which they were uttered. It is probable that when the prophet added many more like words to the new roll, which Baruch wrote at his mouth, he made the nucleus of the present work, but that it took a new shape. There are transpositions, and the whole order bespeaks haste and oversight such as would most naturally happen to one who was so hated, imprisoned, maltreated, and forced into a foreign land to die there a sorrowful death. The transpositions that are often dwelt upon as against the authenticity of the book are, in fact, the best internal proof of its genuineness. The later prophecies, inserted in the midst of certainly much earlier matter, show that the prophet had no opportunity to arrange the transcripts of prophecies uttered in so troubled a time. It is probable that the last chapter was added by another hand, possibly by Baruch. Chapter xli. ends, "thus far are the words of Jeremiah." The next chapter contains material found in Jer. xxxix. and in 2 Kings xxiv. 8; xxv. 30; but it also contains other matter besides, and records some things Jeremiah probably did not live to see,—the liberation of Jehoiachin, and the placing him at the royal table.

Jeremiah, in some respects, is himself a type of CHRIST. A parallelism runs through their lives. Not only does he prophesy of CHRIST as the righteous Branch, the LORD our Righteousness, and utter other allusions to the Messianic kingdom, but in his own person there are analogies. In both there is the same early manifestation of the consciousness of a Divine mission; the persecution which drove the prophet from Anathoth had its counterpart in the enmity of the men of Nazareth. His protests against the priests and prophets are the types of the woes against the Pharisee, the scribe, and the lawyer. His lamentations over the coming miseries of his country are as the weeping of the SON of Man over Jerusalem. His sufferings, of those of the whole army of martyrs, come nearest to those of the Teacher against whom princes and priests and elders and people were gathered together. He saw, more clearly than others, that new covenant, with all its gifts of spiritual life and power, which was proclaimed and ratified in the death upon the cross.

Jesus Christ. I. Divinity of.—Our LORD asked, "Whom do men say that I the SON of MAN am?" Simon Peter replied, "Thou art the CHRIST, the SON of the Living God" (St. Matt. xvi. 13, 16). The SAVIOUR then blesses him and declares that GOD the FATHER has revealed this important doctrine of CHRIST's Divinity to Him (v. 17). Still the Manhood of CHRIST is constantly kept in view in Scripture. "The Word was made flesh" (John i. 14). As "the Angel of the LORD," CHRIST appears to Abraham at Mamre (Gen. xviii. 22, and xix. 1), to Hagar (Gen. xvi. 11), to Jacob (Gen. xxxii. 1 and 30), to Moses at the bush (Ex. iii. 1, 2), to Joshua (Josh. v. 14), to Gideon (Judges vi. 11 and 22), and to Manoah and his wife (Judges xiii. 3-24). Our LORD declared that the Old Testament testified of Him (John v. 39), and the Theophanes add their testimony to prophecy, "No man hath seen GOD" (John i. 18) the FATHER, hence "the only-begotten SON" is the One who

"bath declared Him." Our LORD's plan to form a world-wide spiritual Kingdom was a Divine one, and its execution implied Divine aid. Without human greatness and position JESUS CHRIST leaps in a moment beyond the widest view of the greatest emperor. The Kingdom of CHRIST still advances, though its moral requirements are high. The miracles were the work of GOD. The SON claims "absolute Oneness of Essence" with the FATHER, in St. John x. 30: "I and my FATHER are one." He asserts pre-existence thus: "Before Abraham was, I am" (St. John viii. 58). He has life in Himself (see St. John v. 26). He is "the Pure Light" (St. John i. 9). He is "the Way, the Truth, and the Life" (xiv. 6). The love of GOD shines out in the death of CHRIST (I John iii. 16). Life, Love, and Light meet in GOD and in CHRIST. The title "Son of God" is given freely to JESUS in the highest sense, and GOD's voice from heaven calls Him "Beloved Son" (St. John iii. 17). St. John, the closest companion of our LORD, is the one who most strongly and constantly asserts His Divinity. In the sermon of St. Peter on the Day of Pentecost, and in St. Paul's discourses and writings, it is the assertion of CHRIST's Divinity that gives the power by the co-working of the HOLY GHOST. Creative power is claimed for JESUS CHRIST. "All things were made by Him" (St. John i. 3; compare Col. i. 16). "Faith in CHRIST" as Divine is St. Paul's frequent theme (see Col. ii. 5; Phil. i. 29; Rom. x. 14; Philem. 5). JESUS CHRIST has been adored as GOD from the beginning of Christianity. St. Thomas addresses Him as "my LORD and my GOD" (St. John xx. 28). When St. John sees Him in glory he falls "at His feet as dead" till he feels the touch of His right hand, and hears the comforting words "Fear not" (Rev. i. 17). The worship of JESUS CHRIST, begun by the Wise Men and repeated by those who had experienced the benefit of His miracles, and by the holy women after the Resurrection (St. Matt. xxviii. 9), and by the early Christians described by Pliny, who at their morning service sang responsive hymns to CHRIST as GOD, has continued and increased on earth, and will continue and increase till "at the name of JESUS every knee" shall bow and "every tongue" . . . "confess that JESUS CHRIST is LORD, to the glory of GOD the FATHER" (Phil. iii. 10, 11). Heaven itself shall continue the song of praise to the Divine CHRIST, "for the LORD GOD ALMIGHTY and the LAMB are the temple of it" (Rev. xxi. 22).

II. Life of.—Our Blessed LORD and SAVIOUR JESUS CHRIST, both GOD and man, was born in Bethlehem in Judæa, of the Blessed Virgin Mary, by the power of the HOLY GHOST. The Incarnation of JESUS CHRIST is the foundation-stone of Christianity. To it the prophets looked forward as seamen peer in darkness for a light-house; those who lived in CHRIST's day could rejoice in His light as those who are opposite the light-house. We now look back upon it, but with like rejoicing. The heathen themselves longed for it, and had their dim prophecies of it. Every heathen idol in human form was but a blind groping after the God-man. Jesus came as a child to sanctify childhood. He came in poverty to teach contempt of mere worldly riches. The Collect for the second Sunday after Easter shows the double purpose of the Incarnation as "both a sacrifice for sin, and also an example of godly life," and it prays that through His grace we may strive "to follow the blessed steps of His most holy life." The example of humility presents itself at every step. The retirement and obedience of His childhood are a pattern for the young. The early visit to the temple at Jerusalem is a lesson of confirmation. The toil of the Carpenter (St. Mark vi. 3) has given dignity to labor. In early manhood the CHRIST comes into public life. The Baptism teaches His followers to imitate Him in this sacred act. The presence at the wedding feast, and the miracle there performed, indicate the sanctity of domestic life. The whole social intercourse of our LORD is an example to the Christian. The halt, the maimed, and the blind were as near to Him as the rich and the great. He entered the dark and humble dwellings of Jewish peasants, and conversed with them as an "Elder Brother." Wherever sickness or sorrow met His eye He strove at once to lighten or remove the load. The unselfishness of this Divine, yet human life, has never had a parallel. The many miracles recorded, and implied, were not acts of display, but means of healing and blessing poor suffering humanity.

Our LORD sought in every way to instruct men in the Divine life. The Parables forced all nature into service, and the growing grain, and the singing bird, or the innocent lamb were used to inculcate the highest lessons.

While the blessed self-denying work of healing and teaching advanced, Satan instigated men to take the life of the Redeemer of men. The SAVIOUR sees the dark cloud approaching, but meets hatred and persecution with love. That His work may be continued on earth, He founds His Holy Church, and appoints the Apostles as Bishops of it. He institutes the Holy Communion, and commands its observance. In agony He prays for relief from the approaching struggle with the powers of evil, but submits meekly to the FATHER's will. He dies on the cross, but in dying prays for His murderers and pardons a dying penitent. He rises from the tomb, and for a time teaches His wondering disciples. He then ascends heavenward, and now the man CHRIST JESUS, in His life of glory, rules and guides His Church on earth and aids His saints, that when their earthly life is ended, they may be with Him and behold His glory (St. John xvii. 24). The "sacrifice for sin" was the object of this earthly life. It all looked forward to the cross, and now the world looks back to it. "I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto Me" (St. John xii. 32). The tree of scorn is now the tree of glory, and no monarch's crown compares with the cross of CHRIST. Keble asks,—

"Is it not strange . . .
That to the Cross the mourner's eye should turn Sooner than where the stars of Christmas burn?"

So it is the sin-sick have looked for centuries to that cross as their only hope, and from it have heard the words of pardon and forgiveness, "Thy faith hath saved thee," and, "Go, and sin no more." To that cross the eyes of the dying have been turned in faith, and, like the stricken Israelites bitten by serpents in the desert, they have found new life. The character and work of our LORD JESUS CHRIST stand alone in the world's history. Such grandeur and humility, such purity, charity, and forgiveness, never appear in any other record. Such wisdom was never before heard on earth. It was the officers sent to apprehend Him who exclaimed, "Never man spake like this Man" (St. John vii. 32). It was a soldier who watched Him, who cried, "Truly this Man was the SON of GOD" (St. Mark xv. 39). It is remarkable that sinful men and women constantly seek this "Sinless Sufferer," while they fear to confess their faults even to their wicked fellow-mortals. But the LORD's life teaches that pity is a Divine attribute, and that the LORD GOD, the "lover of souls" (Wisdom xi. 26), is more merciful than man. The work of JESUS CHRIST the SON of GOD, and the SON of man, was not intended merely to excite wonder; it is intensely practical. "He appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself. And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment: so CHRIST was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for Him shall He appear the second time without sin unto salvation" (Heb. ix. 26-28). He who reads this wonderful life is to make the example and the sacrifice influential in his own life-pilgrimage, and to strive by faith to learn the full meaning of those words, which show CHRIST's life repeated in every believing heart, "CHRIST in you, the hope of glory" (Col. i. 27).

Jew. It was not known as a separate name till after the ten tribes revolted, and was not in current use till the tribal distinctions were lost at the Captivity and the Tribe of Judah overshadowed the others. It then became common, partly as this tribe was the largest and most powerful, and partly because of the Temple and all the religious associations connected with it were, together with the Priesthood, within the territory of Judah. After the Captivity, Judæan (Jew) was the usual term for the Israelites of whatever descent. In the synoptic Gospels the terms are, the People, the Pharisees, Herodians, Sadducees, till the Passion of our LORD is recited. St. Matt. (ch. ii. 2) alone uses it elsewhere. But St. John uses it often, and distinguishes between the people, the Galileans, and the dwellers at Jerusalem. As a restored nation after the Captivity they were ruled first by the Persians (536-333 B.C.), by the Seleucidæ (333-167 B.C.), by their own Asmonæan Princes (167-63 B.C.), and by the Idumæan Herods (63 B.C.-70 A.D.), till the Temple was burnt, Jerusalem razed, millions slain or sold into captivity, and the remnant wanderers upon the earth. But their history of six hundred years had a great effect both upon them and upon the Christian Church, for the training in obedience to a holy law and a ritual, the lessons in faith, the fact forced upon them that the Spiritual Kingdom was separate from the temporal, all were impressed upon the early Christians who were cradled in the very midst of these teachings. The Christian owes the Jew a debt of love and compassion, and desires to bring him to the knowledge of the MESSIAH, a reunion which shall be the glory of the Jew and Gentile together (Rom. x., xi.).

Jewry. Of Judah. It occurs once in the Old Testament (Dan. v. 13), and once in the Prayer-Book (Ps. lxxvi. 1). In the Continental cities, and in Oxford, London, and elsewhere in England, the Jews' quarter was and is known as the Jewry.

Job. This book upon the man of Uz, recording his afflictions and his patience, is filled with some of the most magnificent thoughts and most sublime imagery ever given to men. The endless theories of adverse critics upon its genuineness and antiquity are so mutually destructive that they need no refutation. As Ezekiel (ch. xiv. 14, 20) and St. James (ch. v. 11) both refer to him as a real personage, surely we cannot doubt the truthfulness of the work. Job's riches, patriarchal influence, devout and noble character, are not merely proverbial. They stand forth as characteristics of the devout rich man. It is beyond the plan of this Cyclopædia to discuss the many questions its contents suggest upon the law of our trials and the extent of Satan's permitted power, upon the scope of the arguments of a natural theology so strongly stated in it, upon the knowledge Job had of a Redeemer and a Resurrection, and of the power of intercessional prayer, or upon the invisible and supernatural facts it reveals to us. His patience is proverbial, yet it is full of self-respect. He confesses humbly his sinfulness, and the justice of GOD towards him in this affliction. Yet he is conscious of no willful sin; and he defends himself against the insinuations or open attacks of his three friends. "Though He slay me yet will I trust in Him, but I will maintain mine own ways before Him" (ch. xiii. 15), well expresses the tone of his defence before the three friends. And his humility when God speaks displays his devout submission. His losses were doubly repaid when God restored him to his health. When so much is, at least at present, conjecture, the opinion that Moses either obtained a copy of the book or himself wrote down the narrative when he was in Midian is the most consonant with the style of the book, and that Job lived about the time of Joseph is most consonant with its contents. (Vide Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, and Canon Mozley's analysis of the book in the Christian Remembrancer of 1863 A.D.).

Joel. The second in the order of the minor prophets. He is called the son of Pethuel, but beyond this we know nothing of him. His prophetic work was in Judæa. It was in the distress of a public calamity that seems to have given occasion to his prophecy, but only the occasion. Its scope is as vast as the judgments ЖЕHOVAH has revealed. It uses the immediate event as a type for the greater events that lie in God's future. The plague of the locusts is probably merely figurative, as the prophet uses it as the type of the terrible scourge of stern, disciplined armies passing through the land. His calls to repentance and to intercession and prayer are most sublime, and his promise of restoration and blessing and increase and the pouring out of the Spirit so gloriously fulfilled on the day of Pentecost, are full of spiritual beauty and force. But his prophecy passes swiftly farther than that great day, and under the type of the gathering of all people in the valley of Jehoshaphat he pictures the valley of this world, the time of the long-suffering and forbearance of God in this valley of decision, over which the day of the LORD hangs as a cloud either of mercy or of judgment. The world is ripe for the sickle of the angelic harvesters (Rev. xiv. 14-20), and then will come the Day of Judgment. The prophet closes with a picture of ineffable peace and joy and plenty. In his prophecy are the germ phrases for the revelations only outlined by him, but more fully given to other later prophets to develop. He uses the term "great and terrible day of the LORD," which means for us the Day of Judgment. The intercessions dictated by him have passed into our Litany. The ingathering of the Gentiles is implied by him (Joel ii. 32). His imagery is probably more freely used in the Apocalypse than that of any other single prophet. (Vide Smith's Bible Dictionary, The Speaker's Commentary, Pusey on Joel, in Minor Prophets.)

John, St. The beloved disciple, to whom the English-speaking people owe more than to any other of the Apostles, since from him they have received that Apostolic succession to which they appeal at once for their Apostolicity, Catholicity, and proper independence. The sons of Zebedee seem to have drawn more of their disposition from their mother Salome than from their father. John appears as a devout young man, energetic as his friend Simon, but better balanced, as fervent and as active. Doubtless the four, Simon and Andrew, James and John, had often spoken together of the hopes of Israel then filling every heart. He and Andrew knew the Baptist, though apparently not among his disciples, and were present with him when JESUS walked in Bethabara beyond Jordan, when St. John pointed Him out to them with the words, "Behold the Lamb of God" (St. John i. 35-39). They immediately followed JESUS, and abode with Him that night. Then began that love, that attachment to the Person of the LORD, which seems to distinguish St. John and St. Peter from the others. Zebedee did not hinder his sons from following the new Master. They were with Him as yet informally, yet as disciples in Jerusalem when He purged the Temple the first time, and at Cana when He manifested His glory and they were confirmed in their faith. When called, they left all and went with Him. Afterwards chosen into the band of Apostles, John and his brother James, with Simon, are taken more closely into our LORD's confidence. It is noticeable that St. John in his Gospel does not speak of the band as Apostles, but as Disciples. Going in and out with Him, seeing His miracles, listening to His gracious words, wondering at His love, forbearance, patience, the disciples were trained for their future work. Yet, how dull they were! How slowly the truth, brought back to their memory, was afterwards understood! The character he developed, his zeal, his love, his readiness, all endeared him to his LORD. He was not devoid of ambition, as is shown by the request which the disciples, or their mother on their behalf, preferred to our LORD, to sit the one on the right hand, the other on the left, in His Kingdom. Our LORD at once questions: "Ye would have this; can ye pay its price? Are ye able to drink of the cup that I shall drink, and to be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with? They say unto Him, We are able." His reply was afterwards fulfilled, when this baptism was of blood for the one and of long toil and martyrdom for the other.

The Apostle's zealous energy, that gained for him and his brother the appellation of "the Sons of Thunder," was shown in the request to punish the inhospitable Samaritans with fire, and in forbidding one who did a miracle in CHRIST's name. With Simon and his brother James he was chosen to witness the Transfiguration, and was afterwards taken to watch at Gethsemane. Though after joining in the avowal of readiness to die with the Master he fled in the tumult of the arrest, yet he came back and gained an entrance with Simon Peter into the court-yard of the High-Priest's palace, and it would seem that his courage rose, for he followed to the Cross, and was with the Holy women as they stood by, and he received the charge of caring for the Virgin Mary from her Divine Son, and apparently was present at the taking down of the Sacred Body. He was first at the Sepulchre on the morning of the Resurrection, was present when the LORD appeared to the disciples that even, and afterwards was the first to recognize Him when He stood on the shore of the Sea of Tiberias and called to them. "Therefore that disciple whom JESUS loved saith unto Peter, It is the LORD!" Of him from the LORD's words, "If I will that he tarry till I come," the report went out that he would not die. In the Acts we find him (ch. i.) after the Resurrection in the upper chamber with the little company of the faithful when St. Peter proposed that one should be selected to fill the place of the traitor Judas. He was a constant attendant upon the Temple worship, with St. Peter he was taken before the Sanhedrim, with St. Peter he is sent to confirm the Samaritans. Later he also, with St. James the LORD's Brother, and St. Peter, welcomes Barnabas and Paul into the Apostolic fellowship. Where he labored during this time, whether in Jerusalem or elsewhere, we cannot know. He has no place in the record of the Acts when the Apostle whom he so cordially welcomed into the Apostolic brotherhood came forward. His Epistles, written before the Revelation, and the Gospels, written after it, are the precious legacy the SPIRIT has given us through him. From the Revelation we can gather only these facts: that he was banished to Patmos for the testimony of JESUS CHRIST. It has been conjectured with some truth that he had exercised Apostolic oversight over the seven Churches of Asia Minor to whom CHRIST sends His messages of warning and forbearing love. An early tradition says that upon the death of Domitian (97 A.D.) he was released from Patmos and went to Ephesus, where the Presbyters of that Church, since St. Timothy was dead, prayed him to take the oversight of it. There at their request he wrote the Fourth Gospel, and the last written of the books finally accepted as inspired. He must have attained a great age. The cup of sorrow, and of loneliness, of pain, because of the defection of those who should have proved faithful, because of the denial of the LORD, was his to drink to the dregs. Yet what solace was his! From the little company of one hundred and twenty names to so vast an ingathering! He who was wrapt in the horror of the great darkness of the Crucifixion was permitted to stand in the white light of the Presence of Presences. He who in sorrow had committed to him the care of the Virgin Mother of CHRIST, saw in joy the Church, the New Jerusalem, the Bride of CHRIST, descending from heaven.

His intense, energetic, enthusiastic love, fused every power and capacity into its own great heat, and made him use words that smote with their strength, that could brook nothing less than utter devotion to the Person of Him who so loved us, suffered for us, died a death of shame for us, and rose again for us. This love, strong and overbearing, makes St. John the Son of Thunder for the Church, in the writings he has left it.

His Feast is well placed (December 27) two days after the Nativity of his Master.

John, St., Gospel of. It has always till recently been claimed as the last written of the Canonical books of the New Testament, and has usually been placed after the Revelation, which was dated as about 95 A.D., making the date of the Gospel about 98 A.D. But recent conjectures make the banishment to Patmos earlier and under Nero, and place the writing of the Gospel between the destruction of Jerusalem, 72 A.D., and 95 A.D. This is not the place to enter into elaborate discussions, and while giving these later dates, it is well here to assign to the Gospel the latest date of 98 A.D. It is more generally admitted that it was written at the request of the Ephesian Presbyters. The destruction of Jerusalem, and so the severing of the direct tie that bound the Church to Judaism, the expansion of the work among the Gentiles, had made a restatement of the Apostolic teaching of JESUS CHRIST eminently proper. St. Paul's writings and the use of doctrinal terms had now paved the way for it,—e.g., the use of the word Logos (Word) as applied to our LORD's eternal nature was growing (Heb. iv. 12; Tit. i. 3), the regeneration which St. Paul had taught (Tit. iii. 7), the Faith in the Person of the LORD, which the doctrine of the Justification by Faith had brought forward, these and the growing errors which might break into heresies within the Church and the heresies without, all demanded a final restatement of the Truth. These facts led the Apostle to compose the glorious Fourth Gospel. It has no statement which cannot be found in the germ in the other three, except the statements of the sixth chapter, but it expands some things and adds some facts not in the others, though it repeats but few of the incidents they record. The fibres that bind it to the other three are many and subtle, but they are no less real. There are sentences in the others that seem as if they were from St. John himself, while again many statements they make are found in his Gospel. A rapid analysis of his Gospel is annexed, but first it may be well to say a few words respecting the controversy about the genuineness of this the Fourth Gospel. It was not suspected at all till within the last century. A fierce attack has been made upon it from rationalistic writers, and it is to be feared from some who sought for notoriety more than for the truth. The objections are, that it comes into prominence only sixty years after the alleged date of its composition; that it contains allusions that are not compatible with the Apostolic age, and combats later heresies; that is different in style from the other acknowledged Apostolic writings, that it belonged to a much later date, and every year from 116 to 150 A.D. has been assigned for the date of its composition. But the truth is that it is either quoted or alluded to in unmistakable ways by Ignatius. The early written, but not genuine Epistle of Barnabas, Justin Martyr, Polycarp, refers to the First Epistle, and as the Gospel is admitted to be from the same hand, his quotation establishes the Gospel also. This catena of Christian doctors is strengthened by the use the heretic Basilides made of it. These all wrote between 107-150 A.D. Beyond the last date it is needless to go. But the internal evidence that it was written by an Apostle who companied with JESUS from the beginning is still clearer. He says at the outset "we beheld His glory" (ch. i. 14). The narrative differing in so many things from the Synoptic Gospels, implies an eye-witness, and this the writer claims to be. "This is the disciple who witnesseth concerning these things, and who wrote these things, and we know his writing is true" (xii. 24). "He that hath seen hath borne witness, and his writing is true" (xix. 35). None but an eye-witness could have given such life-like descriptions or reported concourses as that of the sixth chapter. He was an Apostle, for he is intrusted with the motives and wishes of his Master,—e.g., xiii. 1-2; xix. 27-28.

That it combats later errors is no more than what all the Gospels are now doing and will do so long as error exists. Who is it that has not noted with apparent surprise that a single word written eighteen centuries ago seems to have its full force only now, and with reference to some current modern error?

But too imperfect as this outline is, it is needless to go further into a controversy which only serves to bring out still more clearly the wonderful truth of this Fourth Gospel. The plan of the Gospel is clear, distinct, and straightforward; the main outlines (Cambridge Bible for Schools, vol. on St. John) may be given somewhat thus:

I. The Prologue (i. 1-18).—1, The Word in His own nature (1-5); 2, His Revelation to men and rejection by them (6-18); 3, His Revelation of the FATHER (14-18).

II. First Main Division, Christ's Ministry, or His Revelation of Himself to the World (i. 19; xii. 50).—(a) The Testimony. 1, of John the Baptist (i. 19-37); 2, of the Disciples (38-51); 3, of the first sign (ii. 1-11). (b) The Work. 1, among the Jews (ii. 13; iii. 36); 2, among the Samaritans (iv. 1-42); 3, among the Galileans (iv. 43-54); (the work has become a conflict) 4, among mixed multitudes (v.-xi.). (c) The Judgment. 1, of men (xii. 1-36); 2, of the Evangelist (37-43); 3, of CHRIST (44-50); close of CHRIST's public ministry.

III. Second Main Division, Issues of Christ's Ministry, or His Revelation of Himself to His Disciples.—(d) The inner Glorification in His last Discourses. 1, His love in Humiliation (xiii. 1-30); 2, His love to His own (xiii. 31; xv. 27); 3, the promise of the Comforter and of His return (xvi.). (e) The outer Glorification of His Passion. 1, the betrayal (xvii. 1-11); 2, the ecclesiastical and civil trials (xviii. 12; xix. 16); 3, the crucifixion and burial (xix. 17-42). (f) The Resurrection. 1, The manifestation to Mary Magdalene (xx. 1-18); 2, the manifestation to the Ten (xx. 19-23); 3, the manifestation to Thomas with the Ten (xx. 24-29); 4, the Conclusion (xx. 30-31).

IV. The Epilogue or Appendix.

There is no one of the other Gospels which is so rich in spiritual insight. All the Evangelists have this more or less, but none so fully, for neither of the other three had that ripe experience, that conviction from long trial, that thorough habit of spiritual apprehension that characterizes St. John's writing. It was a glorious gift, and lightly purchased by the cross he had to bear after his Master, and he has transmitted it to us. To a mind so richly stored with deep knowledge both of the things of CHRIST and of men's character, and so filled with the HOLY SPIRIT and with love, there was no difficulty in selecting those things which should meet the needs of men, and comfort and strengthen their minds for all time to come.

Epistles of.—The three Epistles, together with those of St. Peter, St. James, and St. Jude, are called the Catholic Epistles, since they are not addressed to any one Church by name, but are, as it were, universal, catholic, in their use and purpose. But in these Epistles which were written by the Holy Apostle we find combined the same characteristics which gave him both the surname of the Son of Thunder and the far gentler title of the Disciple whom JESUS loved. There is the same energy and zeal and sternness, an uncompromising trait, yet there is throughout a tenderness and an outpouring of love. It would seem at first sight that these are incompatible, but if we consider the Person on whom his love was poured, and the deep reality of the consequences of either loving or hating that Person, which he felt in all their intensity, and know that his whole Epistles are but a comment upon St. Paul's passionate utterance, "If any man love not the Lord JESUS CHRIST let him be anathema," we can see that they are not merely compatible, but they are the proper and true outcome of such a strong nature as we have seen St. John to have possessed. The evils which pressed upon the Church at the time he wrote, the solitariness of the Apostle, the need for a strong, positive proclamation of the love of God, and that it was not a sentiment, but a law of life or of death to men; the pain of seeing those in the Church worldly, of seeing those who misunderstood and perverted the truth leaving it, to their own destruction, branding themselves as anti-CHRISTS,—all these things enter into the Epistle which the HOLY SPIRIT moved the Apostle to write. Its contents may be summarized thus: (A) A declaration of our LORD's Incarnation as the Word of Life, of whose real human subsistence the Apostle solemnly affirms, and the claim that those who would share in the gift of Life eternal must be in the Apostolic fellowship, which is bound up in the FATHER and the SON, in which fellowship lies the forgiveness of sin, by the blood of JESUS CHRIST, who is our Advocate and the Propitiation for our sins (ch. i.-ii. 3). (B) This forgiveness from Him claims our love, but our love to Him implies love to our brother and a renunciation of the world (ch. ii. 4, vs. 20). (C) A second positive statement of the Sonship of CHRIST follows, with a further reference to the gift (anointing) of the HOLY GHOST in Confirmation (ch. ii. 20-29). (D) A magnificent appeal, based upon GOD's love to us and our hope of a resurrection by our union in His SON, to love one another, and to put away all hatred, and to show all compassion (ch. iii.). (E) Chapter iv. implies some partial withdrawal of the gift of prophecy, as the Church needed it less, but it was not the less influential and pronounced in power whenever given and used to proclaim the Sonship of our LORD. Again the Apostle reverts to the topic of brotherly love, which he mingles with short, clear enunciations of doctrine. And as his Epistle draws to an end he puts forward again the absolute need of unity with Him. "Little children, keep yourselves from idols. Amen. And we know that the SON of GOD is come, and hath given us an understanding that we may know Him that is true, and we are in Him that is true, even in His SON, JESUS CHRIST. This is the true GOD and Eternal Life." So ends the first Epistle of the greatest Apostle of the original Twelve.

The second Epistle has been doubted, but its contents are so similar to those of the first, in fact principally restatements, in so concise a form that no forger would care to give himself so much risk for so little result, and the tone of the letter is unmistakably that of St. John. Who the elect lady was, whether a phrase for the Church or some influential lady within St. John's jurisdiction, has been questioned, but the personal allusions make this latter supposition the only really tenable one; her children are spoken of in the first verse and her sister's children in the last verse. The subject of the Epistle is a restatement of the main topic of the first Epistle, the doctrine of CHRIST come in the flesh and a warning against deceivers.

The third Epistle, though much the shortest, has one or two points of great interest in it. It is written to Gaius, whose hospitality and zeal he commends. But he then speaks of a certain Diotrophes who rejected his authority and would not receive those whom St. John sent, but cast them out. St. John threatens to discipline him. The Apostle also commends Demetrius as bearing a good report from all men. Who was Diotrophes? It has been generally assumed that it was some turbulent Presbyter who rejected St. John's authority. But one in that order would scarcely have dared to do so. Nor would any attention have been paid to him had he held only that office, while one in the Apostolic office holding the same relation to St. John that St. Timothy, or Titus, or Silas did to St. Paul, might endeavor to shake off the inconvenient restraint St. John held over his ambition. This is much more likely than that an Elder would act in so authoritative a manner as to reject those whom St. John had sent, and discipline those fellow-Presbyters who would receive them, since he would be in no position to do so, nor could he criticise and speak maliciously of St. John. Altogether it would seem that Diotrophes held a higher office, and one in which it needed St. John's presence as his sole superior to restrain and chastise him. In this letter to Gaius he reiterates some of his positive sentences found in the first Epistle.

Jonah, though the sixth in order of the Minor Prophets, is generally considered the earliest of all the prophets, whose writings are extant. The reason for this opinion is based on 2 Kings xiv. 25, where it is stated that Jeroboam II. "restored the coast of Israel from the entering of Hamath unto the sea of the plain, according to the word of the LORD, which He spake by the hand of his servant Jonah the son of Amittai, which was of Gath-Hepher." Now Jeroboam began to reign 825 B.C., and on the supposition that Jonah made the prophecy some time before his accession, the prophet's date is fixed about the middle of the ninth century B.C., or as given in the Bible, 862 B.C.; but Canon Rawlinson prefers a later date. (vide Five Great Monarchies.) As already stated, Jonah was the son of Amittai, of Gath-Hepher in Galilee, from which, therefore, a prophet did arise contrary to the proverb of the Pharisees. His personal history is entirely drawn from the Book of Jonah, which is an account of his mission to Nineveh. It was perhaps after prophesying to Israel (for Jonah begins in the Hebrew with "and the word of the LORD," etc.) that the prophet was bidden to go to Nineveh and prophesy against it. But Jonah shrank from the task, probably from timidity (for Jonah means a dove), though other motives are suggested, such as a desire that Nineveh might be destroyed in the interest of Israel. So he sought to flee from the presence of the LORD,—i.e., from discharging this mission before the LORD,—and he took ship at Joppa, now Jaffa, for Tarshish, which may have been Tarsus in Cilicia, or Tartessus in Spain. This attempt to escape duty proved of no avail, for such a storm arose as to imperil the ship; and when lots were cast to see who was the guilty cause of it, the lot fell upon Jonah, who bade the mariners cast him into the sea, "For I know that for my sake this tempest is upon you." The men being unwilling to do it, strove hard to row to land, from which it should appear that they could not have gone far from port. "But they could not, so they took up Jonah and cast him forth into the sea, and the sea ceased from raging." But the LORD had prepared a great fish to swallow up Jonah; and Jonah was in the belly of the fish three days and three nights. To this miracle great objection has been made, and some have affirmed that the book of Jonah is merely allegorical, others that it is purely fabulous, or a little history highly ornamented with fable. Of course, with those who deny the possibility of miracles at all, there can be no discussion; but others who find a difficulty in believing this experience of Jonah, should observe that one miracle is as easy to accept as any other, and that there is especial reason for believing this particular one, because it was a type of our LORD's entombment and resurrection, and referred to by Him as such; and those who believe the greater miracle of the Resurrection cannot object reasonably to the lesser one which foreshadowed it.

These difficulties on the ground of natural history are sufficiently met by the fact that there are fish large enough to swallow a man whole, though it may be a mistake to call such fish whales, as the translators have in St. Matt. xii. 40; it is simply a great fish in Jonah. At the end of the three days Jonah repented and humbled himself before God, and "the Lord spake unto the fish, and it vomited out Jonah upon the dry land." When the command to preach unto Nineveh came a second time it was obeyed, and Jonah came to Nineveh, an exceeding great city of three days' journey, and began to enter into the city a day's journey, and cried and said, "Yet forty days and Nineveh shall be overthrown." However these expressions of the day's journey be understood, they indicate a place of immense extent, and these indications are fully corroborated by modern explorations and discoveries. (Vide Five Great Monarchies.) Word of this strange message came to the king, who proclaimed a strict fast even for beast as well as man, and ordered intercessions, in the hope that God would repent and turn away from His fierce anger; and so it came about, for God saw their works and deferred the evil threatened to them. Now Jonah had already withdrawn from the city to watch and see what would become of it, and when the forty days were expired and the city was not destroyed, it displeased him exceedingly that his prophecy was not fulfilled, and he wished that he might die; but the LORD condescended to reason with him, in words and by the parable of a gourd (Palma Christi), which grew up suddenly and was a comfort to the prophet by reason of its shade and pleasing form. But no sooner had Jonah realized its worth to him than it was destroyed by a worm, and again he wished he might die. Then the LORD said to Jonah, "Doeest thou well to be angry for the gourd? And he said, I do well to be angry, even unto death. Then said the LORD, Thou hast had pity on the gourd, for the which thou hast not labored, neither madest it grow; which came up in a night, and perished in a night; and should not I spare Nineveh, that great city, wherein are more than six-score thousand persons that cannot discern between their right hand and their left hand; and also much cattle?" Here the book of Jonah ends. It may be that some fail to see in what respect Jonah is a prophet of any but near events, whose interest ended with their fulfillment; but such persons may learn to find a deeper meaning in the book if they will observe that its subject is not so much the mission to Nineveh as the spiritual instruction of Jonah—and the world,—that in every nation he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted by Him, and that God has a tender compassionate care for every man, whether he be a King of Nineveh or a Phœnician sailor.

Further, the book, as already stated, is a prophecy by types of the death, burial, and resurrection of our LORD, as is shown not only by our LORD Himself in His references to it (St. Matt. xii. 40; xvi. 4; St. Luke xi. 30; xxiv. 46), but also by St. Paul, whose allusion in 1 Cor. xv. 4, is understood to mean the Book of Jonah.

Joseph. The oldest son of Rachel, the well-loved wife of Jacob. The history of his life is one of the most beautiful passages in the book of Genesis. It is stamped with a naturalness and an inwoven truthfulness that make the objections to it appear as they are, pitiful and but the merest wantonness of hypercriticism. His father's love for him, his own gentle goodness, yet the vanity which was the result of Jacob's treatment; the rough turbulence of shepherd sons, his elder brethren, who lived a hardy, roving, out-of-door life, filled with free, undisciplined willfulnesses; the jealousies that arose, which were the scourge of Jacob's own former deceit; the robe, probably a white tunic embroidered or edged with purple, the gift of a father's love, and the petty cause of hatred; the dreams of the boy and the wonder and hatred they elicited; the cruel sale, the career in Egypt,—all these, so well known, are chiefly dwelt upon as links in the Providential preparations made for the preservation of the chosen people. But while this is true, there is something more. The patriarch was chosen, in and by the very means that his brethren sought to destroy him, to become the deliver of Egypt for the sake of his father's house, and so to aid in further and larger political events which flowed to all the world from his conduct and statesmanship. Remembering these things, to the Christian his career is a type of CHRIST in its outlines. As was remarked in the article on Jonah, we must carefully separate the human channels from the Divine purpose that flows through them, the human earthiness from the divine gold mingled in it. Jacob's love for Joseph is a type of God's love for His Son. The sale of Joseph for the price of a slave typified the sale of the LORD for the same price. His courage, obedience, and his disgrace while yet finding favor in the eyes of his enemies, are a type of the far lovelier character of CHRIST. His deliverance and his Lordship, and the provision he thus made, both for Egypt and for his father's house, is a type of both the Resurrection and the untiring, loving care of CHRIST over all men, willing that none should be lost, and providing still better things for the household of faith. These are salient points in his life that make him an especial type, but a close study of the incidents will develop other and beautiful suggestions. His coat of many colors the royal robe, the type of the robe of righteousness. His prospering in all things committed to his care as steward. His resisting evil suggestions, the patience with which he bore the discipline (Heb. v. 7-9), and other points of resemblance which would lead us too far afield to trace here. In these, and in the blessings which were bestowed upon him by his father and upon his two sons, and later upon the ten thousands of Ephraim and the thousands of Manasseh, he is pre-eminently a type of JESUS the CHRIST. His history is recorded in Gen. xxx. 22-24; xxxvii., xxxix. to the end of the book. The blessing of Moses upon the two half-tribes, Ephraim and Manasseh (Deut. xxxiii. 13-17). For a full discussion of the history see Geike's Hours with the Bible, and Smith's Bible Dictionary. The date of Joseph's birth is placed there at 1906 B.C. Since the date of the Pharaoh of Joseph's famine cannot be certainly identified as yet, this is the approximate date.

Joseph. The husband of the Blessed Virgin Mary, who was most probably of the family of Nathan, the son of David. But little is told us of him. A just man, of the house and lineage of David, and thoughtful and kind. He lived in Nazareth, a carpenter by occupation, betrothed to the Virgin, probably his cousin, and whom, upon the direction of the Angel, he took to wife. He carried the Virgin Mary to Bethlehem, there to be enrolled with himself as of the royal house of David, where her son was born. He carried the mother and the young child into the Temple, was present when the wise men offered their homage; he fled to Egypt, and remained there until he was divinely bidden to return, and finally settled in Nazareth, where he continued to care for the wondrous child growing up into a favored, loved youth. When JESUS was twelve years old, Joseph and Mary took Him up to the Temple to keep the Passover, and when they returned to Nazareth, the Child continued to be obedient to His parents, increasing in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man. Here our knowledge of him ends, for there is no further record of him in the Gospel history.

Joshua. The Son of Nun, one of Israel's great generals. He appears first most suddenly at the battle of Rephidim: "And Moses said unto Joshua, Choose us out men, and go out, fight with Amalek" (Ex. xvii. 9). In 1 Chron. vii. 27 his descent from Ephraim is given, giving thus some ground for the blessing Moses put upon the tribes of Joseph: "His glory the firstling of his bullocks, and his horns the horns of unicorns; with them he shall push the people together to the end of the land,"—i.e., Canaan (Deut. xxxiii. 17). Joshua's instincts are military. The attendant upon Moses what time the Leader went up into the cloudy top of Sinai, when Moses came down at God's bidding to quell the apostasy of Israel, Joshua, as they turned to go down to the riotous people, exclaimed, "There is a noise of war in the camp!" He is annoyed at the irregularity of Eldad and Medad's prophesying in the camp unbidden. Apparently it seemed to him a breach of discipline,—an act without proper commission. Next he appears as one of the spies who traversed the promised land. Of all the band he and Caleb alone insisted that the people could take possession of the land at once. He drops out of mention till Moses is ready to lay down his burdensome charge. Most probably he resumed that attendance upon the tabernacle which apparently fell to him when the tabernacle was first erected (Ex. xxxiii. 11). But upon the plain of Moab, this side Jordan, he has the commission given him to lead the people over the river to take possession of the Land, by the laying on of Moses' hands, before Eleazar the priest and the whole congregation, and by a special charge (Numb. xxvii. 14; Deut. xxxi. 14, 23). After Moses' death Joshua sent out spies to Jericho, crossed the Jordan, and at Gilgal circumcised all the males; and had a vision of the Captain of the LORD's Host. Jericho fell by a miracle; Ai was taken after Achan's sin had been purged; the Law was recited upon Mount Ebal; the treaty was heedlessly made with the Gibeonites; the victory at Makkedah, won by Divine aid, opened Canaan up to Kadesh Barnea and Gaza; that at the waters of Merom broke the Canaanitish kingdoms of the north under Jabin, King of Hazor. "So Joshua took all that land, the hills, and all the south country, and all the land of Goshen, and the valley, and the plain, and the mountain of Israel, and the valley of the same; even from the Mount Helak, that goeth up to Seir, even unto Baal-gad in the valley of Lebanon, under Mount Hermon: and all their kings he took, and smote them and slew them. Joshua made war long time with all those kings" (Josh. xi. 16-18). In six years he broke the power of the Canaanite, destroyed the Anakim, and established Israel firmly in the territory which God gave them; but he did not utterly dispossess them. It was expressly ordered that they should not be utterly destroyed; though against some, as against Amalek, the decree of extermination was finally carried out. There is no space here to point out the strategy and skillful planning of Joshua, which was the more noticeable that the composition of the army he led must have made any combined operations nearly impossible. Fearless, straightforward, enthused by his grand mission, noble and kindly, his was indeed a royal nature, born to lead and to command. Devout and unselfish, for he was trained by Moses, he showed the strength of the Israelitish character at its best. His book, which records his campaigns and the division of the land by lot to the tribes, was written either by himself or by an eye-witness in close relation to him. In the account of the division, when we remember that land was allotted to the several tribes which had not yet been fairly conquered and occupied, many alleged discrepancies will disappear. For instance, in chapter xiii. 3, it is stated that Ekron was yet to be taken; but in chapter xv. 45, it is assigned to Judah. Ekron was in the limits of the lot which fell to Judah, but Ekron was in the hands of the Philistines except for the period of the Judges; so of Gaza and Askelon, which remained finally as Philistine cities. Joshua's history is a clear, terse account of God's dealings in behalf of His people by the hand of Joshua, in fulfilling His promise to Abraham regarding the land. It falls into three sections: I. The Conquest. II. The Division. III. The Charge and Warning of the aged, war-worn Captain. There is not sufficient proof of it, but the indirect evidence goes to show that Joshua himself wrote the book. Not only Jewish tradition, but the minute notes of the transactions, the words of conversations, the phrases, point to Joshua's pen. Of course the closing paragraphs were added by another, probably contemporary, pen. But we must add the main points in which he was a type of Jesus. As Moses was His type as Lawgiver, so in name and in act Joshua was the type of Jesus the Captain of our salvation. Joshua began his life in Egypt, and, despite his protest to the people, wandered with them in the wilderness; so CHRIST our JESUS was with us in our Egypt of sin, and has borne with us in our life here. At Jordan Joshua crossed over; at the same stream JESUS was baptized and received His consecration for His work. At Gilgal Joshua rolled away the reproach of Egypt from the people; at Golgotha JESUS rolled away the reproach of the spiritual Egypt from His people. Joshua, by command of the Captain of the LORD's host, began his work; but the Captain Himself has begun the conquest for us. Joshua mastered Canaan, and gave all its strategic points and many of its strongholds into the people's hands, and broke the Canaanitish power and exterminated the vilest of the nations; so JESUS hath spoiled the strong man, and bound him, and given us his high places, but hath left to us to complete the conquest under His care by His might, with the armor He has furnished. And as Joshua at the first gathering of the people, so JESUS before His Passion; and as Joshua at Shechem at the second gathering, so JESUS after His Resurrection gave a solemn charge, and renewed the Covenant, and left a witness of it.

Jubilate. The anthem after the second lesson. It was adopted in the Prayer-Book of 1552 A.D., but is said to have been in use after the Gospel in some Gallican Churches as early as 450 A.D. It is a joyful anthem of praise to the Good Shepherd. Its continuous use should fall during the Sundays after Trinity.

Jubilee. The year of release, the fiftieth year, in which all lands by the Mosaic law reverted to their original owners, or their heirs. All debts were released, all Hebrew servants sold for debt were set free, unless they chose to remain in bondage. It was a placing upon a common footing, so far as it was possible in their original condition, all the relations of property and its dependencies. This idea of the Jubilee was taken up in mediæval times, and a general indulgence and release ordered by the Pope, and certain privileges granted to those who made pilgrimages, especially to Rome and its holy places.

Jude, or Judas. There were four who bore this name,—Judas, Judas Iscariot, Judas, surnamed Barnabas, who went with Silas to hear the Encyclical letter to Antioch together with St. Paul and Barnabas, and Jude the brother of James. The name Jude or Judas occurs beside as borne by others, but they are not at all prominent.

Jude, St., who wrote the Epistle. It is difficult in the clash of contending views to arrive at any definite conclusion as to whether the Jude the brother of James was the Jude who was the Apostle, or the Jude the LORD's brother. This last is the most probable conjecture, though it is not without difficulties. If so, then there were but three Judes. Of this Jude we know nothing. Eusebius says that his two grandsons were seized by Domitian's orders and carried to Rome and examined. But when he saw that they were poor laboring illiterate men, and listened to their description of the spiritual kingdom of JESUS the King of the Jews, Domitian dismissed them with contempt, and stopped the persecution of the Church. They were sent home to Jerusalem, and there were influential as being of the Lord's family and confessors.

Jude, St., Epistle of. It was held as one of the doubtful Epistles, not that it was a forgery, but, since it was so brief and as its contents were found elsewhere, it was questioned whether its author was of weight enough to have it placed in the Canon. As it came more into circulation this objection disappeared, and it was received into the Canon. It is in style so like the second Epistle of St. Peter that it is a question which was the earlier of the two. For the later writer was acquainted with the earlier work and used it with some freedom. If so, it is more likely that the shorter Epistle would be the earlier, as it was more probable that it would be incorporated into a longer one than that the shorter would be excerpted out of the longer, and, too, the difficult phrases in the Epistle of St. Jude would be eliminated from St. Peter's Epistle. It contains a couple of references found nowhere else: "Yet Michael the Archangel, when contending with the devil he disputed about the body of Moses, durst not bring against him a railing accusation, but said, The LORD rebuke thee," a quotation which has not been traced. "And Enoch also, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of these, saying, Behold, the LORD cometh with ten thousands of His Saints to execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sources have spoken against Him," a translation from the Apocryphal Book of Enoch, which had been written about 40 B.C. The Epistle of St. Jude is characterized by warmth and energy. The purity of the Faith once delivered to the saints is earnestly defended, and its corrupters are denounced with vehemence in one of the shortest of all the writings in the sacred Canon. The zeal of St. Jude in behalf of the Faith has left us a tracing of the trials and the discipline which the Church then as now had to undergo. The kinsman of the Lord Jesus, the brother of James, himself not of the original Twelve (vide v. 17), could not but be zealous, and this zeal was reflected in the later Epistle of St. Peter (2 Peter).

Judges. From the conquest of Canaan by Joshua to the Judgeship of Samuel were three hundred and fifty years. During this long period the record of the book of Judges is filled with the fragmentary details of the confusion, disobedience, and scourgings of the people. Throughout the greatest disturbances and under the sternest tyrants who subjugated them, they neither lost their nationality nor were they driven out, nor with all their departure from the Law did they lose their knowledge of JEHOVAH. He did not wholly forsake them, but bore with them while disciplining them severely. The books of Joshua and Judges, the one as it were the counterpart of the other in the Israelitish history, would correspond to the position of the Acts in the New Testament. It is divided into three parts: The introduction (i.-iii. 7). The condition of Israel after Joshua. The era of the Judges (iii. 8; xvi.). Incidents detailing the moral and social ills of the time (xvii.-xxi.). It is difficult to compress into a few paragraphs the discussions of events that have so much bearing upon Israel's future history. All that we can do here is to point out the faith, i.e., full trust in God, the Judges severally showed. Their personal shortcomings of duty and the deliverances they wrought would require too much space. The introduction is occupied with recording the prosecution of the conquest after Joshua's death; Caleb's capture of the possession assigned him; the sloth of the other tribes compared with the activity of Judah and Simeon; the intermarriages which led to idolatry, and then the mysterious visit of the Angel of the Lord at Bochim, and their temporary repentance; lastly, their lapse into such evil that they were given into the land of Cushan-rishathaim. The era of the Judges is parted into four groups: The deliverances and judgeships of Othniel (forty years), of Ehud (after eighteen years' oppression by the Moabites, for eighty years), of Deborah's deliverance (of forty years after Jabin's oppression of twenty years). Then follows the era of Gideon and his son Abimelech, whose resistance to Midian, after seven years' servitude, reached to forty-three years. Then as a transition group come Tola and Jair, who judged and defended Israel, the first twenty-three and the second twenty-two years.

The third group are, after eighteen years under the Ammonites, the Judges, Jephthah, Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon, a period of thirty-one years. Lastly comes Samson, whose wonderful birth, preparation, work, and fate are the most remarkable of all the histories in the book; he judged Israel twenty years. The story of the Benjaminites and their terrible punishment is to be placed as occurring just after Joshua's death (ch. xx. 28), and the story of Micah and the Danites is probably but little later, perhaps before the first oppression by Cushan-rishathaim. Various theories have been held as to the writer of the book. It is most likely that it was drawn up from documents which were put together before Samuel's time, and that the last part was added in David's time. But it is mere conjecture. Nathan and Gad both composed histories, and if this were by either one of these prophets, we would have the date of the work in David's reign. This, however, does not affect either the inspiration of the writer or the true place of the book in the Canon of Scripture. It is recorded for our learning, that we may see the result of religious disunity. Their service of JEHOVAH was the national bond of Israel, and whenever that was broken, every man did as seemed good in his eyes; each fell in with the superstitions of the Canaanitish communities about them, intermarried, forgot their national obligations, and were given over into the hand of successive oppressors. It is notable that each oppressor whose yoke was thrown off never renewed it. So first the Mesopotamian king, then Moab, then Jabin, then the Midianites, then the Philistines, whose power was shaken by the last slaughter by Samson. Some of these people fought with and successfully invaded Israel again and again, as did the Philistines and Moabites, but not in the sense of the oppressions during the eras of the Judges. Of all the Judges Samson was the leading type of CHRIST in many remarkable points, but for this we must refer to the article on Samson.

Judgment-Day. The doctrine of a judgment after death has always been associated with the idea of man's immortality. It is maintained on the ground of responsibility, and on the absence of a due proportion of rewards and punishments in human actions in this life. The ancient Egyptians passed judgment on the acts of men after their death. In Holy Scripture earthly judgments forecast future ones (Eccl. xi. 9; Heb. ix. 27; Joel iii. 1, etc.; Amos v. 18, etc.; Isa. iii. 14, xxxiv. 1, lxvi. 15, and Dan. vii. 22).

They explicitly declare that there will be a Day of Judgment, when, in great solemnity, before the universe, the Lord JESUS CHRIST is to appear in glory as Judge at the resurrection of the dead, when they that have done good shall be partakers of the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil of the resurrection of damnation (St. John v. 21-29; 1 Cor. xv. 22; Rev. xx. 11; St. John vi. 39, 40; xi. 24; 1 Thess. iv. 15). It is declared that the Judgment-Day shall be ushered in by the sound of a trumpet; as the Jewish assemblies were called together. This trumpet of God shall resound through the earth and call all men before His throne (1 Cor. xv. 52, and 1 Thess. iv. 16). (See Ebrard in Schaff-Herzog's Encyclopædia, and Chambers's Library of Universal Knowledge.)

Bishop Pearson, in his work on the Creed, thus expresses the necessity of a future judgment: "Nothing more certain than that in this life rewards are not correspondent to the virtues, punishment not proportionable to the sins, of men. Which consideration will enforce one of these conclusions,—either that there is no judge of the actions of mankind, or if there be a judge, and that judge be just, then there is a judgment in another world, and the effects thereof concern another life. Being, then, we must acknowledge that there is a judge, which judgeth the earth; being we cannot deny but God is that judge, and all must confess that God is most just; being the rewards and punishments of this life are no way answerable to so exact a justice as that which is divine must be; it followeth that there is a judgment yet to come, in which God will show a perfect demonstration of His justice, and to which every man shall in his own bosom carry an undeniable witness of all his actions." So the Church teaches the worshiper to say in the Creed of CHRIST, "From thence He shall come to judge the quick and the dead." The feeling with which men look forward to that judgment is shown in that old Latin hymn, "Dies Iræ." Theodoret observes, that if the loud sound of the trumpet at the giving of the law from Sinai was so dreadful to the Jews that they said to Moses, "Let not the LORD speak to us lest we die," how terrible must the sound be of the trumpet which calls all men to final judgment! De Quincey refers to a person in danger of death seeing "in a moment her whole life in its minutest incidents arrayed before her simultaneously, as in a mirror," and applies the thought to the judgment, saying that things are never forgotten, but disappear like stars. Rev. Dr. H. C. McCook likens the records of the heart to things written with invisible ink, which may be brought out by holding the paper to the fire.

Our Blessed Lord constantly kept the thought of a final judgment before His hearers, and showed the happiness and the misery of a future life of endless duration. The parables continually teach this lesson. See "The Unjust Steward" (St. Luke xvi. 1), "The Marriage of the King's Son" (St. Matt. xxii. 13), with joy within and darkness without, "The Vineyard, with the destruction of the rebels" (St. Matt. xx. 16), "The Wheat and the Tares" (St. Matt. xiii. 42), with the "furnace of fire" to destroy the wicked, while the righteous shine forth as the sun in the Kingdom of God. In the same chapter the parable of the Net teaches the same lesson of the "wailing" of the wicked. But the angels, and not men, are to separate the good and bad. "Judge nothing before the time" (1 Cor. iv. 5) is the command for the present life. While the wicked receive punishment the righteous are rewarded. It is declared by CHRIST Himself that the cup of cold water shall not be forgotten by God, and that he who feasts the poor, the maimed, the lame, and the blind shall be recompensed at the resurrection of the just (St. Luke xiv. 13, 14). He who neglected the Christian teaching was left in a worse condition than the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah as regarded the Day of Judgment (St. Matt. x. 15). If the Apostles shook off the dust of their feet in leaving a neglectful house or city, they were in danger of perdition. While our Lord came not to judge the world, premonitions of His final work are shown in His woes uttered against the Scribes and Pharisees (St. Matt. xxiii. 13-39). What a foretaste of the last day in verse 33!—"Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?" The judgments of Cain and of Pharaoh in the Old Testament and of Judas Iscariot and Ananias and Sapphira in the New are of the final work of judgment.

"If such was the splendor of His appearance then, and such its effects, what will they be when He comes hereafter in His glorious Majesty to judge the quick and dead?" (Bishop Wordsworth on Acts xxvii. 13.)

"Hannibal is said, after the subjection of Carthage by Rome, to have walked through the city, and as he saw the tears, and heard the wailing of the people who groaned under the terrible burden imposed upon them by the conquerors, to have laughed. Then, when his fellow-citizens rose up against him in indignation, he replied, 'I laugh not from joy to see your bondage, but I laugh at your tears, now too late, now in vain; for had you in proper time fought as men, now you would not be weeping as women.'" Jurisdiction. The sphere of law, whether spiritual, temporal, or territorial, and the limits under which the executive of the law can act. Thus a Bishop has jurisdiction territorially over his Diocese, and spiritually in the Church, holding a common authority with his brethren in the sphere of his duty and office. The LORD gave the Apostles jurisdiction. "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. . . . Go ye, therefore" (St. Matt. xxviii. 18, 19). This is the conjoint jurisdiction, but as local order demands that there should be a subdivision, diocesan divisions followed, and an assignment of territorial authority. This led to Churches in the several parts of the civilized world, and to the principle of Sees. The temporal jurisdiction is the Patriarchal. Temporal, for it is the result of the needs of the time, and is only so far territorial as the Patriarch is limited by the bounds of his Province, but is not so as using a mere local authority belonging to the Bishops of the Dioceses in the Province, and his jurisdiction is disciplinary and appellative. There are, then, for the Episcopal jurisdiction three forms historically: I. The Apostolic mission of CHRIST. II. The diocesan distribution for the sake of order, work, and development. III. The Provincial or Patriarchal jurisdiction for the sake of discipline and unification of Church work. But under this of the Apostolic there is also the priestly jurisdiction committed by the Bishop to the Priest as rector or pastor in the parish to be "Messengers, watchmen, and stewards of the LORD, to teach and to premonish, to feed and provide for the LORD's family, to seek for CHRIST's sheep that are dispersed abroad, and for His children who are in the midst of this naughty world, that they may be saved through CHRIST forever." This subordinate jurisdiction definitely committed to the Priest by the words of ordination (vide Ordering of Priests in the Prayer-Book) is the most important in the Diocese under the Bishop, and should be clearly understood both in its responsibilities and in its limitations, since the layman's covenant relation to God is made through the agency of the Priest in and by the Sacraments. Its responsibilities are well set forth in the charge given to the candidate for that holy order as set forth in the office. It is wholly subordinate to the Bishop, and its holder is properly the Bishop's representative, performing for him the functions committed to that order. Its limitations, then, are first in the nature of a limited agency having defined duties to discharge, and in the bounds set by the Canons, and by the conditions of the cure which he is to discharge, and by the canonical limits of the parochial work he is to do.

Justification. Much needless confusion has been imported into the definitions upon this most wholesome and comfortable doctrine. Luther, who brought the doctrine into prominence during the controversies of the Reformation, did much towards confirming it by his vehement assertions, which savor of a solifidianism that he would have repudiated. Again, terms which only partly state the doctrine have been introduced and sharply debated, such as forensic justification and inherent righteousness. And the words righteousness and justification represent the same Greek word, and are in some degree interchangeable, but as "justification" and "to justify" refer to God's acts to us, restoring us, there has necessarily been added a further meaning to the word. This is not so much an addition to, as it is an extension of, its meaning, if we can so speak of a word which denoting God's perfect righteousness descends also to imply His righteousness in us upon our forgiveness and our being taken into the membership of His SON. It is also difficult in so short an article to sharply define the transition to, and yet the later continuous parallelism with, sanctification. And, again, the formal statement of the doctrine of justification is hardly needed for one who spiritually apprehends the force of our adoption and the reality of our being made partakers of the Divine nature, and our growth in that participation by a continual living in the grace of our dear LORD.

It must be borne in mind that the root idea in the word righteous or in the word just must be the giving to each one who has a claim upon us his rights, whether it be to God, to self, or to our brother. Therefore St. John (1 John iii. 7) writes, "He that doeth righteousness is righteous, even as He is righteous." But this yielding to each his right is a complex act, as God's rights from us are Obedience, Love, Worship, and Works, with all that these imply; our brother's rights are all that we can give of love, forbearance, and aid; the rights due to ourselves are the life and holy happiness, which were ours by creation, and are offered and urged by God's mercy. It is equally true that we are impotent through sinful weakness to render to each party his rights, while we have a capacity with no true ability. External aid is needed to enable us; a preliminary act of forgiveness, of freeing from the punishment due to sin, and a restoration to that position wherein we may, under covenanted grounds begin to fulfill the duties bounden upon us. Herein lie the facts of our LORD's Atonement and the power of His Resurrection, and the gift of these acts conveyed to us in the Sacraments. "He saw that there was no man, and wondered that there was no intercessor," so He wrought our righteousness for us, fulfilling the Law for us. So He was made under the Law as well as born of a woman, therefore St. Paul declares that by the deeds of the Law there shall be no man justified in His sight (Rom. iii. 20).

Since without holiness no man can see God, and we cannot be or become holy by our own strength, God gave His only SON to become our righteousness, our holiness, our justification (1 Cor. i. 30; Rom. iv. 25; 1 Pet. i. 15). He by His fulfilling the Law for us, His brethren, to His Father, to Himself, and to us, obtained for us that He could become our bondsman, His righteousness be accepted for us, and we, under the covenant of CHRIST, be restored, adopted, and sanctified. Therefore God was in CHRIST reconciling the world unto Himself. God receives us because of JESUS CHRIST the righteous, who is the propitiation for our sins (1 John ii. 2).

The mode of restoration is prepared, the means and instruments on God's part are all ready. It remains for us to lay hold of them to make them ours, to use them, to grow in them, to become transformed by the renewing of our minds by the power of the HOLY GHOST. This latter part of our Christian life and estate towards our FATHER is more properly discussed under the title SANCTIFICATION. The means whereby we lay hold of those gifts and mercies of God are the two hands of the soul which we can stretch up to Him,—Repentance and Faith. Justification, then, the accounting us righteous because of, and solely through, the righteousness of CHRIST, is made ours by the forms and ways by which we lay hold of and secure it to ourselves. We are said very truly to be justified by repentance (St. Luke xviii. 14). Yet repentance cannot be repentance without faith. We are justified by the free gift of God, i.e., by grace, but we lay hold of the grace by faith. We are justified by works, but works to be works at all in any Christian sense must be done in faith. In fact, our justification has many sides, is applied in many ways, can be approached by many paths, but all of these have the common element of Faith mingled in them. As our LORD is called a Vine, a Lamb, a Fount, a Door, a Rock, that by these He may show His sympathy with all forms of the human mind, and may be to each what he needs, and yet He is the one JESUS CHRIST, so His righteousness is laid hold of in many ways, yet so that Faith is the infusing and controlling power. We lay hold of His justification by our repentance, but how can we repent unless we believe in a loving LORD, whom we have wronged, and also believe that He will restore us? Therefore the Fathers called Repentance and Faith the two hands we can stretch out to God. By these we receive His gift in Baptism, the adoption into the citizenship of the Kingdom of His dear SON, the new birth into a new creation in God, and into life. For as in Adam (by natural birth) all die, even so (by baptism) in CHRIST shall all be made alive. But this life is by the righteousness which we have in Him. His righteousness, as we are under covenant through Him, is ours, as He has purchased our redemption by His blood, and accounted righteous in Him by mercy, we must use this grace, grow in it, make it our second nature, and so grow in sanctification as we more completely assimilate our life to our LORD in habit and in principle, through the channels by which He pours His holy life into our hearts. It is not easy to avoid reverting to the original statements, but in so complex an act as this of our justification, which rests upon the several parts of our LORD's redemption, we have to go back in order to follow up another of its many applications.

Righteousness in us rests upon the forgiveness given us in CHRIST. Then, as redemption through His blood is conveyed to us upon our faithful reception of this forgiveness, it follows that Absolution and the Holy Communion are to the faithful so many means of laying hold of that righteousness that is from Him, and thus are approaches to our FATHER, who justifieth us in CHRIST. Baptism, then, conveys to us His justification, and the Sacrament of the LORD's Supper continues us in this state, and helps us to grow in it. "If any man sin, we have an advocate with the FATHER, JESUS CHRIST the righteous, and He is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but for the sins of the whole world." And it is with the same true, lively faith we lay hold on CHRIST, and receive Him and His righteousness in this solemn renewal of our covenant. But, again, as we are justified by repentance and by faith, and have it freely conveyed to us in the first Sacrament and renewed in the second, so we are also justified by works. "But works without faith are not pleasant unto God, as they spring not of faith in JESUS CHRIST, but they have the nature of sin. Therefore works which are the fruits of faith, and follow after justification, are pleasing and acceptable to God in CHRIST, and do spring necessarily out of a true and lively faith, inasmuch that by them a lively faith may be as evidently known as a tree discerned by the fruit." By works we show forth, and also intensify and strengthen, our faith, and stamp upon our characters so far the justification which God giveth to our faith. Works react upon faith, and aid it by their consequents, proving God's mercy and love, and that there is no unrighteousness in Him. What has been said is included in the wonderfully comprehensive language of St. Paul in three several passages, which are placed together, not that they should be torn out of their connection, but that they may be conveniently examined. The first is from Rom. iii. 21:

"But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets; even the righteousness of God which is by faith of JESUS CHRIST unto all and upon all them that believe: for there is no difference: for all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God; being justified freely by His grace through the redemption that is in CHRIST JESUS, whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in His blood, to declare His righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God. To declare, I say, at this time His righteousness; that He might be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in JESUS." In this it must be noted (a) that the Apostle could not suppose that any one could believe and not at once receive baptism; and (b) that St. Paul uses the word propitiation, referring to our redemption in CHRIST (the sprinkling of blood on the mercy-seat), and the Church gives a Eucharistic interpretation to it by using, among the comfortable words of the Communion Service, the parallel passage from St. John's Epistle.

The second passage is from 1 Cor. vi. 11: "But ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the LORD JESUS, and by the Spirit of our God." Here, again, it must be remarked, name means power and authority, and may most properly be connected with the threefold name in which we are baptized; but this verse is an outline of the Christian life.

The third passage is from Titus iii. 4-9: "But after that the kindness and love of GOD our SAVIOUR toward man appeared, not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to His mercy He saved us, by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the HOLY GHOST; which He shed on us abundantly through JESUS CHRIST our SAVIOUR; that being justified by His grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life."

These passages are in the main the basis of the XI. Article of Religion. "We are accounted righteous before GOD only for the merit of our LORD and SAVIOUR JESUS CHRIST by Faith, and not for our own works or deservings, wherefore that we are justified by Faith only as a most wholesome doctrine and very full of comfort, as is more largely expressed in the Homily of Justification."

This article while in the general line of the confession of Augsburg and agreeing with Luther and Melancthon's teachings, at the same time is on a very distinct and independent footing, rather following out the general ancient teaching than making such positive and exclusive statements as are elsewhere found, which give a narrowness to the all-embracing doctrine of justification.

In this outline no attempt has been made to give any sketch of the controversies, or to quote formal statements, or even to refer to all the texts which bear upon this doctrine. To do so at all adequately would far exceed our limits. But the "Introduction to the Epistles to the Romans and Galatians," by Bishop Wordsworth, the comment upon the IX. Article in Bishop Browne's work upon the XXXIX. Articles, and Hooker's famous sermon on Justification, refuting the Romish doctrine of an inherent Righteousness, are to be consulted and studied.

Kansas, Diocese of. The organic act of Congress under which the Territory of Kansas was thrown open to settlement was approved on the 30th day of May, 1854 A.D. The Constitution of the State was adopted by the Constitutional Convention on the 29th day of July, 1859 A.D., and was ratified and adopted by the people of the State at an election held on the 4th day of October, 1859 A.D. The State was admitted into the Union by an Act of Congress, approved on the 20th day of May, 1861 A.D. Between the organic act and the act of admission population came into the Territory, and the organization of Churches of different denominations went on side by side with other developments in the opening of a new country.

The first missionary of the Protestant Episcopal Church appointed for Kansas was sent by the Domestic Committee in 1854 A.D.,—the Rev. John McNamara, now D.D., and the head of Nebraska College. He had served for two or three years before in Western Missouri, at Weston and St. Joseph. His appointment in Kansas was for Leavenworth. He struggled on for a time, but was soon compelled to withdraw, for those were troublous times of intense political and partisan contest. His experiences are graphically described by him in his very readable book, entitled "Three Years on the Kansas Border."

The first Episcopal missionary who secured a footing and a home was the Rev. Hiram Stone, whose ministry was at Leavenworth, which city, then containing about two thousand people, he entered on November 24, 1856 A.D., and where he organized a parish on December 10 of the same year. In the course of the next three years parishes were formed in Atchison, Fort Scott, Junction City, Lawrence, Manhattan, Topeka, Troy, and Wyandotte. The Territory was a part of the Jurisdiction of Bishop Kemper, the Missionary Bishop of the Northwest, the first and only Missionary Bishop then in the Church.

In 1859 A.D. the few Churches at that time existing constituted themselves into a Diocese, at a Primary Convention at Wyandotte, on the 11th and 12th days of August, under the Presidency of Bishop Kemper, who, on the 26th of the previous July, had summoned the Convention for this purpose. There were at that time in the Territory ten clergymen,—the Rev. Messrs. Callaway, Clarkson, Drummond, Henderson, Nash, Preston, Reynolds, Ryan, Staudenmayer, and Stone. The Diocese was received into union with the General Convention at its Triennial Session in the October following.

At a special Convention held April 11 and 12, 1860 A.D., an attempt was made to elect a Bishop. Eight clergymen were present, and eight parishes were represented. On the twelfth ballot the Rev. Herman Dyer, D.D., of New York, was elected by the clergy, and their choice was confirmed by the laity. But a question arose as to the validity of the election, under the limitations prescribed by the General Canon "of Bishops." The incipient controversy was silenced by the prompt action of the Bishop-elect, who declined the election. That action of the Rev. Dr. Dyer was a happy thing for the Church, in so far as it retained him in that most important and commanding position in the centre of our Church work in the United States, which he has so long occupied in the city of New York.

At the Annual Convention in the September following, the Rt. Rev. Henry W. Lee, Bishop of Iowa, was invited to take the Episcopal charge of the Diocese until the Diocese should elect its own Bishop. The invitation was accepted, and Bishop Lee continued this provisional charge until the election of the present Diocesan, in September, 1864 A.D.

As a Territory Kansas included not only all the country now within its prescribed limits, but also so much of Colorado as extended through the three degrees of the width of the State from north to south, thence westward to the top of the Rocky Mountains, including and far beyond Denver,—a district known as Arrapahoe County, and almost as large as all the rest of the State. Kansas became a Diocese while it was a Territory, and as such was admitted into union with the General Convention, and had the right to remain so with all the domain which then belonged to it. Ecclesiastical divisions are entirely independent of the civil, as we may have, and have had, Dioceses made of parts of several States, or several Dioceses in one State. The parties concerned could alone remedy the trouble. Bishop Talbot, Missionary Bishop of the Northwest, consented to receive Arrapahoe County as a part of his jurisdiction; the Diocese of Kansas in its Convention, and the Bishop in charge of it, assented to the change, and the case was then finally referred to the General Convention of 1862 A.D., which ratified the change proposed, and made the Diocese coterminous with the State of Kansas.

During the four years of Bishop Lee's charge he made three visitations, confirming in the few parishes on the Missouri River, and once going into the interior as far as Lawrence and Topeka. West of these there were only about four nominal parishes, and these very small and feeble. The number of persons confirmed in these four years hardly exceeded a couple of dozen. Two Deacons, the Rev. Messrs. Henderson and Hickcox, were ordained by him to the Priesthood. One corner-stone was laid by him, which was found a few years later, by careful measurement and digging, when a fine stone church was built upon it. His work was during the long Civil War, when the wonder is that the Church in this new and border State was not entirely obliterated. But his happy influence in his brief visitations in Kansas, taken out of his crowding labors in his own large Diocese, was to keep alive "the things that remained," in expectation of the brighter day which came with the return of peace. The Diocese is under lasting obligations to this wise overseer.

At the Annual Convention in Atchison, at which Bishop Lee presided, on the 14th and 15th days of September, 1864 A.D., the Diocese, on the recommendation of the Bishop in charge, proceeded to the election of a Bishop. The Rev. William H. Hickcox was the Secretary. Six clergymen answered to their names,—the Rev. Messrs. Egar, Hickcox, Nash, Preston, Ryan, and Stone. Seven parishes were represented,—Atchison, Burlington, Leavenworth, Manhattan, Topeka, Troy, and Wyandotte. The Rev. Thomas H. Vail, D.D., Rector of Trinity Church, Muscatine, Iowa, was unanimously elected by the clergy, and their election was unanimously confirmed by the laity. The Rev. R. W. Oliver, Rector of Trinity Church, Lawrence, who arrived just as the election had been concluded, by permission added his suffrage to the electing vote.

The consecration of the Bishop-elect took place at Muscatine, on December 15, 1864 A.D. The Bishops present were Bishop Kemper, the first Missionary Bishop of the Northwest, and at the time of this service Bishop of Wisconsin, the Presiding Consecrator; Bishop Lee, of Iowa, who preached the sermon; and Bishop Bedell (assistant), of Ohio, and Bishop Whitehouse, of Illinois, who together presented the Bishop-elect. On the 1st of January, 1865 A.D., Bishop Vail started for his new field. On the 15th of December, 1883 A.D., he entered upon the twentieth year of his Episcopate.

When he came to the State there were three little churches in it in use, at Lawrence, at Leavenworth, and at Wyandotte, and four others had been commenced, at Fort Scott, Junction City, Manhattan, and Topeka. Larger churches have taken the place of the first three. The four then commenced have been finished or rebuilt, and twenty-five entirely new churches have been added to the previous number. So that now, in December, 1883 A.D., there are 32 churches built and paid for. In connection with these there are also 15 parsonages. In addition to the organized parishes there are some 30 or more missions and preaching stations, so that now there are about seventy points in the Diocese where the services of the Church are held by regular appointment at longer or shorter intervals. Every church which has been built in the Diocese has been aided by or through the Bishop, in amounts varying from $350 to $2500 each. The present rate of aid is from $300 to $500 each. There are now 32 clergymen on the clerical roll.

There is in the Diocese but one benevolent institution in the strict sense, Christ's Hospital in Topeka, arranged on the pavilion plan. The grounds, 10 acres in extent, in the form of a parallelogram, 600 feet wide by 727 feet long, cost $5000, and were presented by Mrs. Vail and the Bishop to the Board of Trustees. There is as yet but one building completed, 160 feet long. The administration end is 40 by 60 feet, and of three stories. The ward is attached of one story, 100 feet long by 28 feet wide, and 16 feet high in the clear. This ward is subdivided into two half-wards of 42 feet long, and each of these again into two quarter-wards of 21 feet in length. Between these half-wards is a reception-room 16 feet long, for receiving patients. Each quarter-ward will hold six or (in an emergency) nine beds, the entire ward holding a total of twenty-four or thirty-six beds. $5500 were raised for the building by voluntary contributions in Topeka, and $5500 were given by friends outside of Topeka through the Bishop. The total cost so far has been $16,000, all of which is paid.

Of educational institutions, besides two or three parochial schools, there is properly but one, the College of the Sisters of Bethany, exclusively for girls, the only one of the sort under any Protestant oversight in the State of Kansas, and for an immense country south and southwest from Kansas. This institution has proved a great success. For eighteen years it has been growing into favor as its facilities have been more and more extended. It now embraces four scholastic departments,—the Kindergarten, the Primary, the Preparatory, and the Collegiate. Girls may enter at a very tender age, and may graduate at eighteen or twenty, with an education about parallel with that of young men who receive their A.B. at other colleges. In connection with these studies, the ornamental branches of music, vocal, choral, and instrumental, and of art in the several grades and varieties of drawing, painting, and sketching in oil and water colors, designing, decorating on ceramics, silks, etc., are thoroughly taught. In the last year 153 pupils were trained in music, and 55 in art.

In addition to the chaplain, who is head-master, and the choir-master or precentor, and to the bursar, house-mother, matron, and health-matron, twenty lady teachers are employed in the College. Over 300 girls were in attendance during the last year. The institution must soon be greatly enlarged to meet its increasing opportunities.

RT. REV. THOS. H. VAIL, D.D., Bishop of Kansas.

Kentucky, The History of the Church in. Kentucky, as a State, was admitted into union with the nation June 1, 1792 A.D.; as a Diocese in the Church's federation, 1829 A.D.

Ante-Diocesan History.—Christ Church, Lexington, was organized July 3, 1809 A.D. Down to the first Convention in 1829 A.D., twelve clergymen can be named who, through "good or evil report," kept the work and name of the Church alive. Among these was the Rev. Mr. Lytche, Chaplain of the first Proprietary Legislature, which met at Harrodsburg in 1795 A.D., and who distinguished himself as a member of that body by offering a bill "To prevent Profane Swearing and Sabbath-breaking." Lytche was the first priest, as he was also the first minister of any kind or name, to offer up the sacrifice of prayer and praise to the Living God in Kentucky; and this, under the shade of an elm-tree, on the first Sunday after this Legislature assembled. Humphrey Marshall, in his "History of Kentucky," published 1824 A.D., writes of 1792 A.D.: "There were in the country, and chiefly from Virginia, many Episcopalians, but who had formed no Church, there being no parson to take charge of it at the period of separation from Virginia in 1792 A.D. It might have been hazarded as a public conjecture that no Episcopalian Church could ever be erected in Kentucky. There is, however (1824 A.D.), one pastor who has a church in Lexington. Education is with this fraternity a necessary qualification for administering the affairs of both Church and State. The forms of their worship are highly decorous, and their discipline calculated to make good citizens."

The Rev. Mr. Moore, educated for the Presbyterian ministry, and chosen President of the Transylvania University, was admitted into holy orders by Bishop Madison, 1794-98 A.D. He was the first clergyman who ministered to the Churchmen of Lexington, and was the means of erecting the first building. "The Rev. Mr. Kavanaugh came to the Diocese in 1802, and ministered generally that year, then removed to Henderson, where he died, respected and lamented, and followed by many good works, in 1806." Record is found of a Rev. Mr. Eliot, who had temporary charge of Christ Church, Lexington, in 1813 A.D. The Rev. Mr. Ward succeeded Mr. Moore in this parish; after him the Rev. Mr. Burgee, who was ordained by Bishop Chase, at Worthington, Ohio, June 16, 1819 A.D., who died shortly after, and then the Rev. Dr. Chapman, which brings us down to Diocesan times. It should be mentioned here that six of these twelve clergymen crossed the sea to receive holy orders. They were Sebastian, Gantt, Chambers, Johnson, Eliot, and Crawford. On their return the first named blossomed into a politician and a judge, and of the rest silence shall reign.

On the 8th day of July, 1829 A.D., the Primary Convention assembled in Christ Church, Lexington. Two Priests, one Deacon, with nine Laymen, representing the Parishes of Lexington, Danville, and Louisville, composed the body. To the Rev. Dr. Chapman is due the honor of organizing the Diocese. He was the sole rector in it. Anticipating the General Convention of 1829 A.D., in the spring of that year he issued public notices, visited Danville, organized Trinity Parish, which appointed delegates, and from thence to Louisville, arousing general interest. He was chosen President, and rightfully. He was a man of zeal, power, and learning; and all these virtues are attested, too, by his volume of sermons on the "Distinctive Principles of the Church," a book which was highly commended by Bishop Brownell and by Freeman, historiographer of Kentucky, as "having done more in all parts of the country to disseminate sound knowledge concerning the Church, and bring converts into her Fold, than any work since 'Daubney's Guide,' which our Fathers put in circulation." To this latter testimony this Diocese can attest that all her larger and more permanent churchly life is due. The Rev. B. O. Peers was chosen Secretary. He was then the Principal of the Pestalozzi Academy, Lexington, and afterwards became prominent in Diocesan affairs, "not only for his devotion to the cause of Christian education, but for his learning and ardent piety." He was the fifth President of the Transylvania University, which institution was largely controlled by Churchmen from its beginning to its close,—from Moore to Coil, to Peers, to Holley. Peers was untiring. He spent time, labor, and money, and is the father of common-school education in the State. He was a writer of considerable merit, his chief literary work being that on "Christian Education," although in Church circles he was better known in his connection with the old Sunday-School Union. He died at Louisville in 1842 A.D.

The Rev. John Ward, the other clerical member, was principal of a girls' school at Lexington. After the Convention had been organized, it was moved "That the Rev. Samuel Johnston, Rector of St. Paul's Church, Cincinnati, being present, be recognized as a member of this Convention," and he took his seat accordingly.

Kentucky owes much of her growth to the fact of the character of her devoted lay members. They have for the most part been unflinching in contending for the "faith once delivered." Notably in this first Convention we find Dr. J. Esten Cooke, a prominent citizen and a physician, learned and beloved, in Lexington. He was a convert from Methodism, "the most profound medical philosopher of his time," and wrote a masterly work on the "Invalidity of Presbyterian Ordination,"—which "attained a remarkable celebrity in England as well as America." Richard Barnes, "a man in moderate circumstances, but the moving spirit of Christ Church, Louisville." John Bustard, who afterwards endowed the Female Orphan Asylum of that city. From Danville that great physician, Ephraim McDowell, "Father of Ovariectomy," and whose memory is honored by his profession with the erection of a public monument in the city of Danville. H. J. Cowan, who lives in his devoted sons, and Frederick Jeiser. Resolutions were offered in this Convention for the "employment of lay readers in congregations destitute of clerical services," and that "it be recommended to all families of the Church in the Diocese to have daily family worship." It was at this Convention that Dr. Chapman learned that Bishop Ravenscroft, "that noble Cœur de Lion of the Church," was in Nashville, and an invitation was extended him to visit the Diocese; he willingly responded by appearing in Lexington on the 25th of July, and confirmed ninety-one persons. Near the close of the year Bishop Brownell, of Connecticut, visited the Diocese. From his "private notebook" and the manuscripts of his "itinerary" the fullest information is afforded, here briefly summed up. "Arrived at Louisville November 29;" "found the Parish in a cold and depressed state owing to its having been for fifteen months without a clergyman, and to the divisions which had taken place in regard to Mr. Shaw, the last Rector." During the Bishop's visit the new rector, Mr. Paige, arrives, and he departs from Louisville for Frankfort, leaving all things in the most hopeful state in that Parish, predicting that it will become "the most flourishing in the Diocese." "On board the boat we had a motley company,—several members of the Legislature, half a dozen blacklegs, and a couple of actors and actresses,—the latter the best behaved of the company. Constant gambling on board and much gross profanity. The members of the Legislature had been introduced to us in Louisville and treated us with great attention." "Lexington is the Athens of the West. A fine medical school, excellent buildings, and an able faculty, and two hundred students. Academical department has one hundred and thirty-six students, eighty of them collegians, the rest in the grammar school. The country the finest in the world; the society highly intelligent, yet plain and simple in their manners. Dr. Chapman's congregation embraces the most valuable part of it. Leaving Lexington, arrive at Frankfort December 7. Next morning call on Governor Metcalfe, and receive a visit from Mr. John J. Crittenden, the most eloquent lawyer in the State. Went with the Governor and Mr. Hanna to the House of Representatives, thence to the Senate, whence we heard speeches from Mr. Wicliffe and Mr. Hardin, the two most distinguished members. Took boat for Louisville; this is the great mart of the commerce of Kentucky. Kentucky is a noble State,—fertile soil; fine race of men." The official acts of the Bishop on this visitation were as follows: He consecrated Christ Church, Lexington, and confirmed three. He consecrated Christ Church, Louisville, baptized four adults and eleven infants, and confirmed thirty-one. Stirred up a great interest in Church work "by the dignity and suavity of his manners and the elevation of his piety."

The first recorded statistics of the Church are found in the fragmentary journal of the second Convention, held at Danville, May, 1830 A.D. Population, 687,917; number of parishes, 3; number of clergy, 4; baptisms, infants, 32, adults, 6; marriages, 3; burials, 10. At this Convention an invitation was extended to the Right Reverend W. Meade, Assistant Bishop of Virginia. He came into the Diocese on the 19th of May, 1831 A.D., and began his visitation at Maysville. This was general, extending over the State, and ending at Hopkinsville, June 20. The results were, consecration of Trinity Church, Danville; ordination in Christ Church, Louisville, to the Priesthood of Revs. Messrs. Ash, Deacon, and Giddinge, and at two confirmations fifty-four confirmed.

At the third Annual Convention, the Rev. B. B. Smith, the newly elected Rector of Christ Church, Lexington, was chosen Bishop, but by reason of some informality in the election he declined. At the following Convention, June 11, 1832 A.D., held at Hopkinsville, he was again elected unanimously. He was consecrated in St. Paul's Chapel, New York, on the 31st day of October, 1832 A.D. He was born at Bristol, Rhode Island, June 13, 1794 A.D.; graduated at Brown University, 1816 A.D.; made Deacon, 1817 A.D.; ordained Priest, 1818 A.D. "For more than twenty years the offerings in the Diocese did not exceed the Bishop's traveling expenses to and from the General Convention." When he came to Kentucky not a parish had a set of communion vessels, and but one had either bell or organ. Thomas H. Quinlan, L. H. Van Doren, and D. H. Deacon were the first candidates for holy orders. The first Presbyter ordained was the Rev. S. S. Lewis, and the first Deacon was Erastus Burr, both in 1833 A.D.

In 1834 A.D. the cholera prevailed in Lexington, necessitating the postponement of the Convention to October following, when a Day of Humiliation was fitly observed. In this scourge two Presbyters, three candidates for holy orders, and fifty communicants of the Diocese—one-fourth of its whole strength—had been carried away. In this calamity the Bishop had borne himself with a courage never excelled. He was the only servant of God in Lexington, save his Roman Catholic brother, who reported for service. After the cholera, and in this same year, the Diocese also lost largely by emigration to Illinois and Missouri. The Bishop, on May 25, consecrated Christ Church, St. Louis, and confirmed twenty-six, and also laid the first corner-stone in Illinois. Name of place not found.

The Theological Seminary was incorporated February 24, 1834 A.D. A building and two acres of ground were purchased at a cost of $9000. The institution opened with three professors, nine students, and a library of 3500 volumes. In 1835 A.D. the Bishop secured $14,000 for the Theological Fund. Among works undertaken by the students of the Seminary was a Sunday-school for colored children, numbering seventy-five, but going further than oral instruction, the mayor of the city requested its discontinuance. In 1836 A.D. there were eighteen students in the Seminary. Of the number receiving instruction within its walls there were twenty-five received ordination. In 1844 A.D. the building and ground were sold for $11,500, and the library was transferred to Shelby College. The Church Advocate was the first Diocesan paper, with Caswall as editor. Its existence was brief.

Shelby College was organized in 1836 A.D. and transferred to the Diocese in 1840 A.D. The Rev. Mr. Drane was its first President. Under the Presidency of Rev. W. J. Waller, covering a period of many years, over $40,000 were spent in improvements on the property, etc. After varying fortunes and many embarrassments the Diocese, on the 20th day of August, 1870 A.D., surrendered the property to the Trustees of the town of Shelbyville.

At the Convention of 1863 A.D., Bishop Smith had reached the seventieth year of his age and the thirtieth year of his Episcopate. The baptisms had been, from 1832 to 1862 A.D., 7470, confirmations 3402, and the communicants 1821.

On Friday, June 1, 1866 A.D., the Rev. George David Cummins, D.D., was chosen by the Convention as Assistant Bishop of Kentucky, Consecrated in Christ Church, Louisville, November 16, 1866 A.D. He was born December 11, 1832 A.D., in Kent, Del. In 1873 A.D. he sent his resignation to the presiding Bishop. Died June 26, 1876 A.D. In this decade the baptisms were 6219, confirmations 4805, and the communicants 3328.

Institutions.—The Protestant Episcopal Female Orphan Asylum, Louisville, organized October 6, 1835 A.D., has an endowment fund of $35,400, good building and grounds, and has accommodation for forty inmates.

Orphanage of the Good Shepherd, for boys, Louisville, organized 1869 A.D. Has a fine building, two acres of ground, and an endowment fund of $1000. Supported by voluntary offerings. Inmates are taught trades, and there is a fine printing-house connected with the building. The Diocesan paper, the Kentucky Church Chronicle, is issued from this press.

The Home of the Innocents, Louisville, was founded in 1879 A.D. Its work has so far been done in rented buildings. It provides for sick and destitute children under six years of age, and has also been reasonably successful in aiding fallen women. The work has received general sympathy since its inception.

Church Home for Females and Infirmary for the Sick of both Sexes, Louisville. Ground on which this building stands cost $6000, the structure itself $100,000. The charter was obtained in 1872 A.D., but the work was not begun until 1882 A.D. So far this has been the work of one man. Is not yet opened for patients.

The John N. Norton Memorial Infirmary, Louisville, 1882 A.D. Has a fine building, not yet completed. Cost to date $45,000. Will probably be opened within the present year (1884 A.D.).

Since the year 1872 A.D. the Bishop of the Diocese has, by permission, resided without its limits, save that he made a final visitation, and presided at the Annual Convention, May, 1874 A.D. At a Special Convention held in Louisville, November 11 and 12, 1874 A.D., the Rev. Thomas Underwood Dudley, D.D., was chosen as Assistant Bishop, and was consecrated in Christ Church, Baltimore, January 27, 1875 A.D. He was born in Richmond, Va., September 26, 1837 A.D. Graduated at the University of Virginia, 1858 A.D. Made Deacon 1867 A.D. Ordered Priest 1868 A.D. In the last decade the baptisms have been 5375, confirmations 3447, communicants 4382. The statistics for the year ending 1883 A.D. are as follows: clergy, 37; parishes, 33; missions, 5; candidates for holy orders, 4; Sunday-school teachers, 351; scholars, 3218; total contributions, $93,258.54.

Keys. Power of the KEYS. There is constant danger of emptying Holy Scripture of all meaning, and an equal danger of putting far more meaning into it than it can bear. This danger is further increased by the drift of language, and by the fact that when a doctrine has been understated stronger language is needed to restore the fuller form of the truth. This is the fact with the Doctrines of Absolution and Excommunication, or the "Power of the Keys." The term Key, in the Old Testament, means a power or stewardship conferred. The Key of the House of David (Is. xxii. 22) surely means something, when its possessor opens and no man shuts, and he shuts and no man opens,—a power CHRIST hath. Then to say that it was a mere formula, meaning nothing when the LORD gave it to St. Peter, and then to all the Apostles together (St. Matt. xvi. 19; xviii. 18), is to do a wrong to truth. To say that it was a gift to the Apostles alone, and to cease with them, is to take from the Human Agency CHRIST established, by which to confer on His Visible Church the very power to admit or to reject, the sole power which it was to exercise. The Key to open is to admit; the Key to shut is to reject. And these are of the essence of discipline. It follows that the power of the Keys must be an everliving gift in the Church, and is the pledge of His presence in and through His Apostles. But the real question is, having these Keys, how far are they in the power of the human agent, the proper officer? For it is evident that the admission into the Kingdom is by Baptism, and the Deacon being authorized to baptize, then can admit, and the rejection, before baptism, is also in his hands, and after baptism, in the Bishop's hands finally. Putting aside the refusal to baptize those who are evidently unfit,—the impenitent or the hypocritical,—the power of admission, the opening Key, is and can be very seldom refused. It is CHRIST Himself who is the Baptizer, as the Church has ever held. It is He who confers admission, and therefore, upon any reasonable evidence of a real though imperfect faith and repentance, no minister in the Church can refuse admission, and if in doubt, can always appeal to, and abide by, the sentence of the Bishop. The reality of the Power of this Key is identical with the reality and power of the gifts of Baptism. But the power of discipline, the Key to shut out, to reject, is not in any other hands but those of the Bishop. If the Deacon or Priest refuse Baptism to the applicant, he can lay his case before the Bishop. If after Baptism the Priest refuse the Holy Communion, the person so denied must be reported to the Bishop, and the wrong, if it be one, must be decided by him. As the Bishop holds the final authority from the LORD, and as each sentence must be decided by him under review finally by the MASTER, this Key of shutting is and will be very carefully wielded, for, after all, as the ministry is a stewardship of the mysteries and gifts of CHRIST, and as a strict account of these stewardships will be exacted, the LORD Himself will revise and repair wrongs. The discipline of the Church must be exercised and enforced, but in a large and loving mode, and with a constant reference to the grace and guidance of the HOLY GHOST and the personal superintendence of the LORD JESUS, who has promised to be always with His Apostles to the end of the world. Then the reply to the question, Does the man who holds these Keys act on his own responsibility? is this, No more and no less than an officer of the law has to do so in execution of his trust. Errors occur, even wrongs are willfully committed, but because of these facts no one would abolish the office, but would direct the officer to be admonished for not observing the limitations of his trust whenever there is error, and to be punished for willful misuse of the power committed to him. But the law must be executed, and this execution must be effected by man.

Kings, 1 and 2. It is very probable that Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, and these two books made one continuous history. In fact, the book of Kings was divided into two portions (1st and 2d) by the Bomberg Rabbinical edition (Venice, 1525 A.D.), after the example of the Septuagint. It was very probably composed by Jeremiah, since many phrases in Jeremiah appear in the Kings. The captives enumerated in 2 Kings xxiv. 14, correspond with Jer. xxiv. 1. The reference to the vessels of the Temple in the one fits in with the other,—2 Kings xxv. 13 sq. compared with Jer. xxvii. 19–22. The fate of Seraiah and Zephaniah and the other under officers enumerated in ch. xxiv. 18–21, is foretold in Jer. xxi. 1–7; xxix. 20 sq., and so of many minor points of resemblance and interconnection. The historical accounts of the books are thoroughly corroborated by the remarkable discoveries at Babylon and Nineveh, even in very minute particulars, where different statements might yet relate truly to the same facts. The names of Omri, Jehu, Menahem, Hezekiah are found in the Assyrian inscriptions, as also Tiglath-Peleser, Sargon, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon. But the chronology of the period covered by these two books—a period of 427 years—is filled with difficulties that point to the probability that some late Jewish writer had inserted the dates, since in several places the text can fairly be read without the date (e.g., 1 Kings vi. 1, compared with 2 Chron. iii. 2). These lead to discrepancies in synchronizing the reigns of the kings of Judah and of Israel, which amount to some twenty years. These discrepancies may be in part removed by supposing in places an unnoticed interval between the death of a king and the accession of his successor, and in counting current unfinished years—regnal years—as complete. Still the remaining differences are too great, especially as the main periods are noted in the text; as the simultaneous accession of Jeroboam over Israel and Rehoboam over Judah; the simultaneous deaths of Jehoram and Ahaziah; the fifteenth year of Amaziah, which was the first year of Jeroboam II.; the first three years of Ahaz, which synchronize with the last three years of Pekah; and the sixth year of Hezekiah, which fell on the ninth of Hoshea. These undoubted points of synchronization show that the attempted dates are interpolations. In scope the books of the Kings record the events which befell Israel from the accession of Solomon to the destruction of the Temple, a period of 427 years, ending 588 B.C., with a supplemental notice of Jehoiachin's better treatment twenty-six years later,—a period filled in with the most varied events for good and for evil: a Solomon, a Jehoshaphat, and a Hezekiah and a Josiah, with an Ahab, an Ahaz, a Manasseh, and an Ammon. The corruption in religion and in government; the weakness through apostasy; the slow but sure punishment that followed in the path of sin; the perfectly impartial statement of both good and evil acts; the constant reference to JEHOVAH's ever-superintending care; the prominence given to the prophets, as Elijah, Elisha, Isaiah, Abijah; notices of others, as Jonah; the glory of the Temple and its worship, and the profanation of it by Ahaz, and the surrender of its treasures for tribute by Asa and by Hezekiah; the retribution for the blood of Naboth upon Ahab and upon Jezabel; the rise of the flood of sin year by year, till the blood which had filled Jerusalem cried for retribution, and Nebuchadnezzar, with his bands of Chaldeans and his confederates, the Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites, but executed the commandment of the LORD upon Judah.

“But it is for their deep religious teaching and for the insight which they give us into God's providential and moral government of the world, that they are above all valuable. The books which describe the glory of Solomon and yet record his fall; which make us acquainted with the painful ministry of Elijah and his translation into heaven; and which tell us how the most magnificent temple ever built for God's glory and of which He vouchsafed to take possession by a visible symbol of His Presence, was consigned to the flames and to desolation for the sins of those who worshipped in it, read us such lessons concerning both God and man as are the best evidence of their divine origin, and make them the richest treasure to every Christian man.” (See for a full discussion of the critical questions concerning these books Lord Arthur Hervey's article in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible.)

Kiss of Peace. A salutation mentioned frequently in the Old and the New Testaments. In the latter it has also a ritual significance, since in the celebration of the Divine Offices the Kiss of Peace was exchanged between the communicants, at first exchanged with all of both sexes, but later it was only given by the men to each other, and by the women to their female fellow-communicants. It was a part of every act of Christian worship, but it was especially used at the Holy Communion. In the Eastern Church this salutation comes after the dismissal of the non-communicants and the Oblation. In the West its place varied. In the Churches which were derived from the East, as the Mozarabic and the Gallican, the Kiss came before the Preface. But in the Churches derived from Italy, as the African, it comes directly after the Consecration and before Communion. The Kiss is still used in the Oriental Church. The Kiss was given at Baptism, at Ordination, at Espousals, and to the dying; and the "voice of nature was listened to and a final kiss was given to the corpse before actual interment." (Vide Kiss in Smith's Dictionary of Christian Antiquities.)

Kneeling, as a posture in divine worship, has seemed most natural and fit for a suppliant, in all ages and nations, probably from the time "that men began first to call upon the name of the LORD." In the Western Church the practice has always formed a part of the services, and has been enforced by the Bishops and Councils. It is not only a voluntary act of personal humility and reverence, but also one that is required of every person as an individual, forming part of a large congregation, and to neglect it is to omit a duty imposed upon us by the customs of the Church in the worship of Almighty God. The Rubric in the Prayer-Book for the proper observance of Public Worship directs that all persons then present shall reverently kneel upon their knees when the General Confession, Litany, and other prayers are read. In the rite of Confirmation all those who receive the Laying on of Hands are to kneel, and in the Marriage Service, the Nuptial Benediction on the newly-married couple is received kneeling.

In the administration of the LORD's Supper the communicants are to receive the same kneeling, as a signification of our humble and grateful thanks for the benefits of CHRIST's passion therein given to all worthy receivers, and for the avoiding any profanation or unseemly disorder that might otherwise ensue.

In the Eastern Church the practice is dissimilar to ours. Kneeling is not observed, but the whole congregation stand throughout the entire service, with heads bowed low in reverence during the prayers. Even in receiving the Holy Mysteries they do not kneel, esteeming that our human nature has been so exalted by the union with the Divine in the Person of our LORD, and that so lowly a posture does not comport with so joyful and comforting a service. Once only in the year do the people kneel in the service of the Greek Church, and that is on Whitsunday, or the descent of the HOLY GHOST.

Kyrie Eleison (Greek, LORD, have mercy). The oldest, the most sorrowful plea of all obsecrations offered to God. It is the plea in the Psalms often repeated. It is the cry of the Prophets. It was the prayer of the publican, of the lepers, of blind Bartimæus. It has passed into the continuous solemn Litanies of the Church. LORD, have mercy upon us, CHRIST, have mercy upon us, has risen from the Church continually. It is retained in the Greek words in all Liturgies but our own, and there it is translated upon the general principle that the compilers of the Prayer-Book set for themselves. So Halleluia is translated "Praise ye the LORD." The Kyrie is used in the second part of the Litany, and forms the first portion of the responses to the Commandments: "LORD, have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to keep this Law." In many offices in the Greek Church, and in the older Western offices, it was repeated successively quite a number of times. In one of the monastic offices it is ordered to be said thirty times at one point in the service. In its use in the responses to the Commandments we imitate closely the publican, who, for his transgressions of the Law, would not lift up so much as his eyes to heaven, but smote on his breast, saying, "God be merciful to me a sinner."

Laity. The people of the Christian Church as distinguished from the clergy. In several relations they have different names,—the congregation as gathered into the separate Churches or Parishes, the Laity as a single body, Christians in relation to their Faith. The Laity, as distinguished from the clergy, have had their rights and duties duly noted from the earliest notices of Church history. In the New Testament they are called the Brethren,—though this title was not theirs exclusively,—the Faithful, and the Saints. As the recipients of the grace offered by the Embassadors of CHRIST, they are the governed in the Ecclesia or Church; but since the governed have rights and duties as well as the governors, the laity have had an influence, sometimes a controlling one, either for good or for evil, as saith the prophet, "and my people love to have it so." The responsibility in either case lies not wholly, but largely, with the Laity. The recognition of the Laity as such in the Church goes as far back as the Epistles of Clement (96 A.D.), and from that time on more or less frequent notice of them and their position is made by the Church writers. Their presence is necessary to the proper celebration of all acts of worship and for the due administration of all rites and sacraments, since our LORD's rule holds universally, "where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them" (St. Matt. xviii. 20). So Baptism, while it may not be refused because of the failure to have them, should yet be administered before witnesses. The Holy Communion is not a Communion (i.e., fellowship) in the ordinary usage of the word without communicants beside the celebrant. Marriage is before "a company." The Morning and Evening Prayer is in the presence of the dearly beloved brethren, and so every office either presupposes or demands their presence. This is, then, the duty which the Layman owes the Church as the visible Body of CHRIST, that he should be punctual and strict in attendance on her rites to receive her gifts and blessings. In her is the discharge of his Covenant with God, and therefore it is a matter of obligation as well as reverence to God to attend upon all her services. Being themselves so important a part of all services, the Laity have a right to demand all the services the Church can give them. Morning and Evening Prayer cannot be refused to any sufficient number of the congregation demanding it; nor can the Holy Communion if there be cause. With regard to the Diocese, the Laity have a representation in the Council or Convention, a voice in the management of Diocesan affairs, and their vote should be refused only on doctrinal definitions, but is theirs of right in all questions of local discipline and polity. They usually confirm the nomination of a Bishop made by the vote of the clergy. The reverse should be the case, and was so in the earlier elections. The Laity nominated, the clergy accepted and presented to the Metropolitan, though there were frequent exceptions to this rule.

The Laity having the purse have this duty and sacrifice as part of their Priesthood: "To do good and to distribute forget not: for with such sacrifices God is well pleased" (Heb. xiii. 16). But as the covenant is between God and them by His Embassadors, and He has ordered His Embassadors to live of the Gospel, it is a part of the layman's bounden duty to contribute liberally to the livelihood of the ministry. "Let him that is taught in the word communicate unto him that teacheth all good things. Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting. . . . As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith" (Gal. vi. 6-8, 10). And this support must not be limited to the Parish dues, but to the larger needs of the Diocese also. The true principle is in the old rule of a Common Diocesan Fund, out of which the needs of Bishop, clergy, and poor were supplied; the present Parochial system is later by a thousand years and more. The Layman, as a member of the congregation and a communicant, has a right, under the Canons of each Diocese, to a voice and a vote at all congregational meetings in the elections of the vestry and wardens, who are his chosen representatives for all legal ecclesiastical purposes, and in some Dioceses votes for the lay delegates to the Council or Convention of the Diocese. He has also a sharing in the Priesthood belonging to the whole Church, certain offices to which he may be eligible. His inherent Priesthood is discharged by his presence at all services and by his sharing in all acts of worship. But as lay-reader, and therefore as representative for the congregation in all prayer and supplication, he exercises this; so also as chorister in the worship of song. He should share in the general work of the Parish, such as aiding in visiting the sick, in distributing, under the direction of the Rector, proper tracts, doing his share of work in the Sunday-school, helping to form guilds or brotherhoods, and zealously aiding in sustaining them and in giving them efficiency.

These are duties and privileges which belong to his order in the Church, functions not less important, not inferior in their place, to the functions of the ministry appointed to serve him in all the gifts, graces, and blessings which the LORD has left in His Church for His people. Beyond these limits the Layman trenches on the sin of Korah; below these limits he fails of his duty to GOD and his SAVIOUR and to the Church he should so dearly love for the sake of his LORD.

Whenever the Layman takes an active interest in the parish work the parish will grow, and as his life is moulded by his active Church work, so will his own influence extend, and so will the Church's influence be deepened and broadened. It needs but little consideration to perceive clearly that there is really less, proportionately to their position, in the eloquence and popularity of the Rector than there is in the true, earnest zeal and in the devout moral courage of the Layman, that develops the healthy growth and influence of the Parish. Too frequently a Parish languishes because of the selfish carelessness of the congregation, who think that they have done all when they have only attended the ordinary services with convenient regularity. The devout Layman owes it to his own spiritual welfare and to his loving LORD and to the Church to spend a part at least of that energy he gives to his daily toil in her service, for he thereby exercises his ministry also.

Lamentations of Jeremiah. They were written by the Prophet probably immediately after the fall of the city into the hands of the Chaldeans. The book is written in a rhythmic style. The verses of the first, second, and fourth chapters begin with a successive letter of the alphabet. In the third chapter three verses in succession begin so. "Further, if we take the four alphabetical poems separately, we find the first three of each of the xxii. parts (or verses, but note in chapter iii. each part equals three English verses), may itself as a rule be subdivided into three, in chapter iv. into two only, while in the third chapter each of these subdivisions begins with the same letter, and is itself divisible into two. In chapter v., although the number of the verses is the same, the alphabetical order is dropped." "The subject, as we have noted, is the capture of the city under Nebuchadnezzar, and the sorrow and suffering thereby entailed. Herewith are united both the confession that this has come upon the people on account of their sins, and entreaties for deliverance. Taking the poems severally, chapter i. dwells upon the solitary condition and grief of the city. Chapter ii. sets forth the destruction that has come upon her, and acknowledges that it is the result of sin. Chapter iii., which, although framed for the most part in the singular number, yet includes the nation throughout, complains of the bitter cup which God's people have to drink, and yet acknowledges that the trials which are come upon them are inflicted by a FATHER'S hand. Chapter iv. describes the reverses in fortune that have been brought about by recent events, and again acknowledges sin. Chapter v. recapitulates the pitiful details of their condition, and ends by an earnest prayer for deliverance. "There are few portions of the Old Testament, perhaps, which appear to have done the work they were meant to do more effectually than this." It has not been connected with the theological or ecclesiastical disputes of any age, while it has supplied the earnest Christian of all times with words in which to confess his sins and shortcomings, as well as with a picture of Him who bore our sins and carried our sorrows, on whom was 'laid the iniquity of us all.'" The book is annually read among the Jews to commemorate the burning of the Temple. The first and a part of the third are read on Quinquagesima Sunday in the Lessons.

Lammas-day. The observation of this day (August 1) as a feast of thanksgiving for the first fruits of the corn dates from Saxon times, in which it was called Hlaf-maesse, or Loaf-mass, from the offering of bread made of new corn. Hence Lam-mass.

Laodicea. A Council was held at Laodicea some time in the fourth century, various dates being assigned, as follows: 314, 363, 365, 372, and 399 A.D. Thirty-two Bishops are recorded as present, and a large number (sixty) of Canons were passed, which, though the tone of the Council was semi-Arian at the least, have gained reception in the code of the whole Church. They are almost all prohibitory, and refer to discipline; some prescribe a proper and becoming order of services; the 57th forbids the placing of Bishops in villages and country places, establishing in their stead Visitors, corresponding nearly to Archdeacons or Rural Deans; and the 60th gives a list of the Canonical Scriptures, in which none of the Apocryphal books are found, nor the Revelation.

Lapsed. These were those Christians who had not strength to encounter persecution, who complied in some form or other with the demands of the heathen magistrates to take part in idol worship,—"they which for a while believed, but in time of temptation fell away." As the persecution ceased the greater part of those who had lapsed would seek reconciliation with the Church. In the first ages such penitents were, upon their confession, readmitted by imposition of hands, and confessors interceding for them often obtained a too speedy reconciliation for these penitents. It became a serious hindrance to the administration of discipline, and it was a lowering of the intensity of repentance in those who sought to be restored. St. Cyprian had both the courage and the tact to break the power of so dangerous an influence. He very wisely insisted upon strict discipline in time of rest, but when a fresh storm of persecution was at hand, he permitted the restoration of all the earnest penitents, believing that they would be stronger in the coming trial. This practice of the Church is a comment upon the modern teaching of some upon the impossibility of the restoration of those who have fallen. Compare the XVI. Article, which gives the true doctrine of Holy Scripture.

Lateran I. A Council was held in Rome in 649 A.D. by Pope Martin, "which, from having met in the 'Basilica of Constantine,' the great patriarchal church adjoining the Lateran Palace, is known as the first Lateran Council." As many as one hundred and five Bishops were in attendance, among whom was Stephen, Bishop of Dor, who had received a special charge from Sophronius, Patriarch of Jerusalem, to maintain the struggle against Monothelism. The decisions of the Synod were against this heresy, and in condemnation of the Ecthesis and the Type (edicts of the emperors favorable to it), and in opposition to them this positive dogma was published: "that there are in the SAVIOUR two natural wills and operations, the Divine and the human, the same LORD JESUS CHRIST, willing and working our salvation both as GOD and man." (Vide SIXTH GENERAL COUNCIL.) In retaliation for this reflection upon the Imperial edicts, Martin was dragged to Constantinople, subjected to various examinations concerning alleged political offenses, treated with cruelty as a condemned criminal, and finally banished to the Chersonesus to die in want and destitution, a veritable martyr to the truth. Much the same treatment was meted out to Maximus, a learned Abbot, and one of the most persevering opponents of Monothelism of his day.

Lateran IV. A Council was announced in 1213 A.D. by Pope Innocent III. with the avowed object of correcting the evils of the Church and the depravity of morals. It finally assembled in 1215 A.D. in Rome, and is by some styled the twelfth Œcumenical Council, and by others the fourth General Council of the Lateran. There were present 77 Primates and Metropolitans, 412 Bishops, and 800 Abbots, who, with the various ambassadors and others entitled to seats, made a total of more than 2000 members. But it does not appear that this imposing assembly did very much as a Council, for the Pope presented certain chapters of his own preparation which were not debated, and received consent only by the silence of the Bishops. In fact, they were quoted as the decrees of Innocent, rather than of the Council, for a long period after. Arrangements were made for a crusade, which, however, was never carried out; and the English troubles between King John and his barons were meddled with, not to mention interference in French affairs. "But the fourth Lateran Council is chiefly memorable for two Canons, relating to matters of doctrine and discipline respectively; the first, which for the first time laid down, by the authority of the whole Western Church, the doctrine of transubstantiation in the Eucharist; and the twenty-first, which prescribed for every Catholic Christian the duty of confessing once a year, at least, to his own parish priest, and of yearly receiving the Holy Eucharist at Easter.

Latitudinarianism. A school of thought in the Church,—now generally represented by the term Broad-Churchmanship, which dwelling upon the Church of God and the gifts therein, does not yet set forth, as fully as might be insisted upon, "the power of CHRIST'S Resurrection and the fellowship of His sufferings" as a principal portion of our spiritual life. It is an undervaluing of the necessity of strong dogmatical teaching. The school of Latitudinarians as an influence in the Church has closed since the days of Dr. S. Clarke (1720 A.D.), but much of its teaching was later reproduced in Coleridge's "Aids to Faith," and under the vague name of Broad Church, which, however, does not by any means yield as much as did the older Latitudinarian, has included many very able and influential men.

Latria. Worship of GOD. The word is used exclusively for the service and worship of the Holy and Blessed TRINITY. If given to any other, or if the so-called hyperdulia trenches on the Latria or adoring worship, it is idolatry. Latria is, then, the generic term to describe all acts of worship that are or can be offered to JEHOVAH by every worshiper, and it includes the simplest and merest act and reaches to the highest and most solemn. But it should be noted also that this worship includes some idea of sacrifice more or less distinctly connected with it, and that it is offered under a covenant. "Gather My saints together unto Me, those that have made a covenant with Me by sacrifice."

Lauds. The daybreak service of the English Church before the Reformation, and a part of which was incorporated into the Morning Prayer. The Benedictus and the 1st and 2d Collect were specially drawn from it.

Laura. The name given to a collection of little cells at some distance from each other, in which the hermits of ancient times lived together in a wilderness. There was no community life here, each hermit providing for himself. The most celebrated Lauras were in Palestine and in Egypt. (Vide Kingsley's "Hermits.")

Lavipedum. The washing of feet after the example of our LORD (St. John xiii.). It was observed yearly in the churches on Maundy-Thurs day, and has been continued in many places, as in Jerusalem, Constantinople, Milan, Rome. Bishops and sovereigns have performed this act. Queen Elizabeth, in 1572 A.D., washed the feet of thirty-nine poor people, that being the number of years of her age. The last English sovereign who used this service was James II., but the lord high almoners continued it till 1731 A.D., and perhaps later. A trace of it is still retained, in the service for Maundy-Thursdays, at Whitehall, the almoner and his assistants being girt with linen towels during the service.

Law of Christ. The Gospel and the principles of it developed and applied by the Epistles. CHRIST'S Law is the binding of the precepts of the moral Law to His spiritual life and raising them, illuminating them, and giving them a sanctifying influence. It includes the influence of His revelation upon human life, moulding it anew, since He has brought to light life and immortality. It gives a new stand-point, CHRIST Himself the chief foundation, a fresh motive, love to Him, for obedience, a new end to be attained, everlasting life. But to apply CHRIST'S Law by the inspiring motive of love to Him leads to new arrangements of the details of our life. It brings out our moral courage and tests it in many ways. It shows the intensity of our purpose, the steadfastness of our will, the depth of our self-denial; therefore our LORD said, "He that endureth to the end shall be saved." This has introduced the whole subject of casuistry (vide CASUISTRY), or cases of conscience. It is the elevation and consent of the heart which quickeneth both the doctrine of faith and manners. These wise words of Bishop Taylor are well worthy careful thought: "There is no other positive measure of a Christian duty but that which can have no measure itself, and that is love. He that loves will think everything too little; and he that thinks so will endeavor to do more and to do it better. We are for the present children of God by adoption, sealed with His Spirit, renewed by regeneration, justified by His grace, and invited forward by most glorious promises greater than we can understand. Now he that considers this state of things and hopes for that state of blessings, will proceed in duty and love together toward the perfections of GOD, never giving over till he partake of the purities of GOD and His utmost glories." The Law of CHRIST is to imitate Him, for His life, and therefore all the part of it, is our example. When He gives no precept but leaves an example therein we have our Law.

Lay Co-operation. In order to obtain a correct and definite idea of the proper work of laymen in the Church and the best methods of performing it we must first clearly understand the relative positions of clergy and laity. Under the Roman, or Hierarchical, idea of the constitution of the Church the laity have by right neither voice nor office in her. The clergy are the Church, and they only are the working element, except in so far as they may assign certain duties to her lay members, which are to be performed entirely under clerical control and direction. Under what may be termed "the Congregational" idea, on the other hand, the laity are the Church, and form the authoritative and working element, the clergy being selected and set apart by them for the duties of preaching and of various public and private ministrations. Under both these systems of organization an immense work has been done and is doing for the cause of religion and the extension of its influences. But for a true test of the correctness of these ideas we must look not to their practical results in this direction, but to the position in which, respectively, they place the clerical order, as compared with the position held by that order in the Apostolic and Post-Apostolic Church. By such comparison we find that the clergy are in the first case unduly exalted over the laity, and in the second unduly degraded, and that consequently in both cases the proper balance of co-operative effort is destroyed and the efficiency of such effort necessarily impaired. Hence neither of these ideas can be correct, and just in proportion to the influence and direction given by either to lay co-operation its practical usefulness must be lessened. In the organization of the Church as displayed in the New Testament we find that clergy and laity are essential, inseparable, integrant parts of an organism, possessing functions, rights, and responsibilities, some in common and some distinct and peculiar, but all necessarily co-operative to a common end, namely, the manifestation of "the Truth as it is in JESUS" and the salvation of mankind through its instrumentality. All baptized Christians who are not Apostles, Presbyters, or Deacons constitute the lay element, and are recognized by the Apostolic writers as co-workers with them towards the objects of the Church's organization. Under the Anglican system these principles are distinctly and prominently recognized, and they are the underlying and directing principles of all efficient and correct methods of lay co-operation.

The Church being an organization as well as an organism, of course organization is essential to the full efficiency of all her work, but we must remember that a most valuable and practical work can be done by laymen acting as individuals and upon the conviction of individual Christian responsibility. If this responsibility, which rests upon all baptized persons, were more generally recognized the labors of the clergy would not, perhaps, be lightened, but would certainly be immensely more fruitful. Nothing can be more obstructive to the extension of the Church's work and the accomplishment of her great mission than the idea that the laity are merely the receivers of benefits which she brings, and on the other hand nothing could more effectively increase her efficiency than the practical recognition of the fact that membership in her entails the obligation to work. The field for this kind of lay co-operation is almost without limit in every parish, and extends over almost every relation of life. The careful teaching of children and servants, the quiet effort to lead others to confirmation or to attendance on public worship, systematic attention to the poor and to strangers, the habit of giving to the clergy all information which may be useful in directing their labors,—these and innumerable other methods which will suggest themselves come under the class of unorganized lay co-operation. But while all these things are helpful and necessary, their efficiency may be vastly increased and strengthened by proper organization, and this organization should extend through the whole system of the Church. We find it exemplified first in the General Convention, where the laity form a most important element in the legislative authority, as well as in matters pertaining to general financial administration. While ecclesiastical law is a distinct system, differing from civil law in its application and details, yet the same general principles underlie all law, and it is of the utmost importance that minds thoroughly formed by legal training and experience, and proved by the test of success, should take part in the framing of a legal system which is to be enforced upon and for the benefit of laymen as well as clergymen. Hence the careful study of Canon Law by earnest laymen of legal knowledge and experience opens up a most useful field of co-operation. Again, in all business affairs the laity can render most efficient service, as well in the Diocese and Parish as in the General Church. Apart entirely from spiritual concerns, but absolutely necessary to the maintenance of that organization by which they are administered, there is a great amount of business detail which the clergyman, however competent, cannot attend to without serious hindrance to his more peculiar work. These details are exactly the same which pertain to all secular business, and must be conducted with the same accuracy, promptness, and fidelity, and upon precisely the same principles. Vestries especially may co-operate with their rectors most efficiently by observing the same business habits and rules in connection with parish matters as they do in those of banking or commercial houses, or of any other business corporations. Their meetings should be regular and conducted by parliamentary usage and law. The income and expenditure of the parish should be collected and disbursed with the most jealously accurate care, and the books of the treasurer should show the same exactness as those of the cashier of a bank. All parish property should be kept fully insured and in good repair and order. All subscriptions and pews should be promptly collected, and all salaries promptly paid. No debt should be incurred unless provision be made beforehand for its proper payment when due. Vestrymen and parish officers should be selected solely upon the ground of their active interest in the Church and their thorough fitness for the duties to be performed, and should be required to perform diligently all that they undertake.

Without such administration behind him a clergyman is as helpless as the captain of a vessel whose crew and engineers are incompetent or negligent of their duties, and there is no form or method of lay co-operation which is more practical or more essential to the progress and welfare of the Church. But to reach this point of efficiency a vestry must be truly representative of the congregation, and that can be the case only where the members of the congregation maintain an active interest in the parish as work for which they are responsible, keeping themselves informed of its affairs and using their right of suffrage with the same diligence which they would exercise in regard to a bank or railroad in which they might be stockholders. A parish so conducted, with an active and earnest rector at its head, supported and upheld by his laity, and encouraged by the assurance of their cheerful and hearty co-operation, will surely illustrate all the possibilities open to it for the performance of the Lord's work. Then the Sunday-school should be conducted entirely by lay-work under the supervision and direction of the rector. The superintendent should be always a communicant of influence and high standing, commanding the confidence of the parishioners and the rector, and the respect of the teachers and pupils. It is his place to relieve the rector, while acting entirely with his advice and approval, of every duty and care in the organization, management, and discipline of the school not necessarily and properly pertaining to the clerical office. The teachers should be selected and should perform their duties with the same conscientious diligence which they would exhibit as salaried assistants in a secular academy, so that the rector will always feel assured of the proper and systematic management of the school as well in his absence as when present, and of the careful and certain carrying out of all his plans and directions. It is hard to estimate the value of this branch of lay co-operation, since upon it depends the character of the future laity of the Church, not only as to religious instruction, but no less as to thorough grounding in all churchly knowledge and habits. Lay-reading is another co-operative duty to which special attention has of late been directed. There should be in every parish several men of high standing in the congregation and community who have been regularly licensed by the Bishop to read the services in the absence of the minister, or to assist him therein when present. Not only are the labors of a clergyman greatly relieved by such assistance, but he is often enabled to bestow his services upon some point where a promising opening is presented for implanting the Church. The lay-reader himself may often pave the way to such openings by gathering a few people around him and giving them the service, and many instances might be cited of flourishing parishes growing out of such beginnings. In England it has become quite customary for such lay-readers to preach sermons of their own composition under the Bishop's license, but they have always a wide choice in selecting from published discourses. Parish Guilds and Brotherhoods form another very important and efficient arm of the service of lay co-operation. So various are the modes of organizing these associations and so many the methods of operation, that it will be sufficient only to point out the principle upon which they should be formed, and to suggest some of the means which may be used through them. The rector should always be the president or chairman, and the memberships should comprise all the active men in the parish, old and young. Woman's work is most efficient when separately organized, and although her active zeal forms a most important part of lay co-operation, such organizations may be best treated under a different heading. The Guild should have regular and frequent times of meeting, and a code of by-laws suited to its special needs and objects. The work to be done should be systematically assigned to various committees, each of which should be composed of members specially qualified for the duties expected of them, the rector being ex-officio chairman of each committee, the object being to interest all in Church work by giving each some of it to do, the heavier tasks being laid upon the more earnest, and the less thoughtful made to realize that they are of some use in and to the Church. (Vide GUILD.)

Thus there should be committees on "Charities," on "Sunday-School," on "Visiting," on "Music," on "Finances," on "Hospitality," on "Amusements," etc. Those who will do nothing else will often consent to act as ushers in regular turn. Wherever practicable a hall or room should be furnished, and supplied with a library, periodicals, newspapers, chess- and checker-tables, etc., and if possible, a gymnasium attached. Many useful hints may be obtained from the "Christian Associations," where all these things are utilized in the cause of religion. A most important branch of lay co-operation is found in associations of laymen in every Diocese for the relief of aged and infirm clergymen, and the families of deceased clergymen. These associations should be regularly organized and have stated meetings. By a very small expenditure they may keep the life of the rector insured in some reliable company or society. On the death of a clergyman of the Diocese each member should pay a stipulated assessment for the benefit of his family, and a similar assessment may be made to relieve the aged or indigent. The best form of organization is a board of twelve directors, who shall manage all details, and a contributing membership as large as can be obtained in the Diocese. The regular contributions should go to form a permanent Relief Fund and a Widows' and Orphans' Benefit Fund, which, as soon as they begin to assume important proportions, may be readily increased by bequests, gifts, special offertories, and other like methods.

Lectionary (Lat. lectionarium, from legere, to read) is a word used to designate the Table of Lessons from the Holy Scripture appointed to be read in the public service of the Church. These Lessons are to be distinguished from the Epistles and Gospels. The latter are (1) short passages of Scripture (except in Holy Week); (2) are part of the Communion office, and (3) are appointed only for Sundays and the greater holidays.

The practice of reading portions of Holy Scripture in public worship is very ancient, and existed, in fact, before the coming of our SAVIOUR (Nehem. viii. 8; see also St. Luke iv. 7, for the custom during the time of our LORD). The Apostolic Church seems to have adopted the practice which the Synagogue had made familiar. And St. Paul charges the Thessalonians that his Epistle should be read unto "all the holy brethren" (1 Thess. v. 27). In early times there was probably no fixed Lectionary, though some traces of appointed Lessons are found in writers of the fourth century. In the following century, unquestionably, Lectionaries were in use, and one is still extant which is more than twelve hundred years old. (Daniel on the Prayer-Book, p. 114.)

At the Reformation the Lectionary was revised in the English Church so that the Old Testament should be read nearly through once a year, and the New Testament thrice a year. The Apocrypha was retained and read during a part of the year. The books of Chronicles were omitted because to a great extent they covered the same period of history as the books of Kings. The Song of Solomon, large portions of Ezekiel and the Apocalypse, were omitted because it was thought that their obscurity rendered them unfit for reading in public worship. Isaiah was read in Advent because his prophecies refer so largely to the coming of the MESSIAH. The old Lectionary of the English Prayer-Book continued until 1871 A.D. to be the only one permitted. In that year a new one was put forth, though the use of the old was allowed until January 1, 1879 A.D.

In the United States the Lectionary was revised when the new American Prayer-Book was issued, in 1785 A.D. The Lessons were considerably shortened, more appropriate chapters were chosen for the Sundays, and, contrary to the English practice, special Second Lessons were appointed from the New Testament on Sundays, both for the morning and afternoon. The chapters from the Apocrypha were much diminished in number, and these were taken from the Sapiential Books.

At the General Convention of 1883 A.D. a new American Lectionary was adopted, which included a special Table of Lessons for Lent. Many features of our new Lectionary closely resemble the English Lectionary of 1871 A.D., which is generally considered to be in many respects a decided improvement upon the old one. It was not introduced, however, without sharp criticism from several divines, among whom may be particularly mentioned Bishop Wordsworth, of Lincoln, Dean Burgo, and Dean Goulburn.

The following remarks on the New English Lectionary (of 1871 A.D.) are taken from Daniel on the Prayer-Book. They apply to a very large extent to the New American Lectionary. One important difference in the American Table is that special Second Lessons are appointed for Sundays, whereas even in the new English Lectionary the New Testament is read through in course, and the Second Lesson for Sunday is the one appointed in the Calendar for the month.

"The chief respects," says the Rev. Evan Daniel, "in which the New Lectionary differs from the old are the following:

"1. The week-day Lessons have been considerably shortened, and are no longer coincident with the present unsatisfactory division of the Bible into chapters, which often obscures the sense by separating premises from conclusion (see Heb. xi., xii.), or an exhortation from the grounds on which it is based (see Heb. iv. v.)." (The second of these instances is corrected in our American Lectionary, but the former remains.)

"2. The New Testament is read through twice in the year instead of thrice." (This change had been previously introduced into the American Lectionary 1785 A.D.)

"3. The Second Lessons in the morning, on ordinary days, are no longer taken exclusively from the Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles, nor the Second Lessons in the evening from the Epistles; but the Lessons are so arranged that when the Gospels are read in the morning the Epistles are read in the evening, and vice versa; so that persons who are able to attend divine service daily, either at matins or even-song, have an opportunity of hearing the whole of the New Testament, with the exception of portions of the Apocalypse, read through in the course of the year.

"4. The Lessons for Festivals and Holy-days have in some cases been changed for passages more appropriate to the occasion." (As an example, compare the new Lessons for St. James' day (July 25) with the old.)

"5. More portions of the Books of Chronicles, which supplement the Books of Kings, are now read. . . . It will be observed," continues Mr. Daniel, "that the new Lectionary is cast in the same mould as the Old, and only deviates from it for the purpose of carrying out more thoroughly the principles on which the Old Lessons were selected.

Persons unable to attend Church, except on Sundays, may now follow a course of Lessons embracing all the most important passages in the Bible; and persons unable to attend Church more than once a day, instead of hearing, as formerly, the same portions of the New Testament read over and over again, while others were never heard at all, may now hear nearly the whole of the New Testament read through in the course of the year. In the Lessons for Holy-days the relations between type and anti-type are more frequently indicated, prophecies are brought into juxtaposition with their fulfillment, and incidents from the New Testament are instinctively paralleled from the Old."

In the American Lectionary, as has been mentioned, there is a special table of Lessons for the Forty Days of Lent. The three rules following were adopted by the General Convention of 1883 A.D.:

"If in any Church, upon a Sunday or Holy Day, both Morning and Evening Prayer be not said, the minister may read the Lessons appointed either for Morning or Evening Prayer.

"At Evening Prayer on Sunday, the minister may read the Lesson from the Gospels appointed for that day of the month in place of the second Lesson for the Sunday.

"Upon any day for which no Proper Lessons are provided, the Lessons appointed in the Calendar for any day in the same week may be read in place of the Lessons for the day."

The following rules for determining the Lessons in certain doubtful cases are taken from the well-known volume entitled "The Prayer-Book Interleaved" (London, 1866 A.D., 2d edit., p. 29):

1. "A Proper Lesson always takes precedence of a Calendar Lesson. . . .

2. "A Lesson from the Canonical books always (?) takes precedence of a Lesson from the Apocryphal.

4. "The Lessons for the first and fourth Sundays in Advent, for the first Sunday after Christmas, for the first and fifth Sundays in Lent, for the Sunday next before Easter, for Easter-day, for the first Sunday after Easter, for Whitsunday, for Trinity-Sunday, take precedence of the Lessons appointed for any Saints' Days which may occur on those Sundays.

3. "The Lessons for the Circumcision, the Epiphany, St. John Baptist, St. Michael, St. Simon, and St. Jude take precedence of the Lessons for any Sunday on which they occur."

The above rules on a disputed question have the authority which may belong to the excellent manual from which they are taken, and which may be derived from extensive usage among clergymen. They are, of course, not binding in law. Any country clergyman, for example, who is unable to hold services on Saints' Days, may well avail himself, if he see fit, of the concurrence of a Saint's Day with a Sunday to let his congregation hear a fine chapter from the Sapiential books of the Apocrypha; for, owing to the sale of Bibles without the Apocrypha, very many persons are hardly aware of the existence of those books, much less of the wisdom and beauty to be found in them.

Legate. A person sent or deputed by another to act in his stead. The name is now confined to such as are deputed by the Pope to act in his stead in all matters to be negotiated, administered, or arranged in the different Churches which yield to his headship. Before the Reformation Legates could only enter the kingdom by Royal permission, or English Bishops appointed as Legates could only so act by Royal consent. After the Reformation they were not admitted into England. Cardinal Pole was the last Legate to the English Church. Queen Elizabeth forbade the Papal Agents sent by Pius IV. to set foot in England.

Legend. Anything to be read, hence a passage, either of Scripture or of the Fathers, or of history which was read aloud out of a book generally at Divine Service, but often in the refectory while the monks were at meals. The word Legend (legenda) became a synonym for all that is told as marvelous, and is absurd and improbable. The word Legend is now often used for traditional tales, orally transmitted, and has thus suffered a slight deflection from its original meaning.

Lent. A fast before Easter has been observed from the earliest Christian times; but the period of its duration varied in different countries and ages down to the seventh century. Of these variations Irenæus wrote in his Epistle to Victor, Bishop of Rome, about the close of the second century, when (speaking of the varying rules about Easter) he says, "For the difference of opinion is not about the day alone, but about the manner of fasting; for some think they are to fast one day, some two, some more; some measure their day as forty hours of the day and night." Tertullian, a few years later, speaks of the practice of the Church as founded upon that passage of the Gospel in which those days were appointed for fasting during which the Bridegroom was taken away; implying a fast extending from Good-Friday morning to the night before Easter. Some few years later, however, towards the middle of the third century, Origen speaks of forty days being consecrated to fasting before Easter. And at the Council of Nicæa this period was taken for granted as if long in use.

But however early the extension of the Lenten fast to forty days may have been, it is certain that the time was counted in several different ways, though always immediately preceding Easter. By various Churches the forty days were distributed over periods of nine, eight, and seven weeks (i.e., from Septuagesima, Sexagesima, or Quinquagesima to Easter), by the omission of Sundays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, of Saturdays and Sundays, or of Sundays alone, from the number of fast-days, and it would appear that Lent was sometimes called by the three names now confined to the three Sundays preceding, as well as by the name of Quadragesima.

St. Gregory the Great introduced our present mode of observance, or sanctioned it with his authority, at the end of the sixth century, by excluding Sundays from the number of fasting days and making the thirty-six days thus left of the forty-two immediately preceding Easter into an exact forty by beginning the Fast on the Wednesday before Quadragesima Sunday instead of on the Monday following it. This rule seems to have been very readily accepted in the West, but in the East Lent begins on the Monday after Quinquagesima, and the rule of fasting is so strict, that although some slight relaxation of its rigor is allowed on Sundays and Saturdays, not even the former are wholly excluded from the number of fasting days. The primary object of the institution of a fast before Easter was doubtless that of perpetuating in the hearts of every generation of Christians the sorrow and mourning which the Apostles and Disciples felt during the time the Bridegroom was taken away from them. This sorrow had indeed been turned into joy by the Resurrection, yet no Easter joys could erase from the mind of the Church the memory of the awful forty hours of blank and desolation which followed the last sufferings of her Lord; and she lives over year by year, the time from the morning of Good-Friday to the morning of Easter-day, by a representation of CHRIST, evidently set forth crucified among us (Gal. iii. 1). This was probably the earliest idea of a fast before Easter. But sorrow for CHRIST's death should be accompanied by sorrow concerning the cause of that death, and hence the Lenten fast became a period of self-discipline, and was so probably from its first institution in Apostolic times. And according to the literal habit which the early Church had of looking up to the pattern of her Divine Master, the forty days of His fasting in the wilderness while He was undergoing Temptation became the gauge of the servants' Lent, deriving still the more force as an example from the typical prophecy of it, which was so evident in the case of Moses and Elijah.

St. Chrysostom speaks of great strictness in fasting on the part of many in his day, such as is still found in the Eastern Church. "There are those," he says, "who rival one another in fasting and show a marvelous emulation in it; some indeed who spend two whole days without food, and others who rejecting from their tables not only the use of wine and of oil but of every dish, and taking only bread and water, persevere in this practice during the whole of Lent."

Lent was in the early Church the principal time for preparing the catechumens for Baptism, and a large portion of St. Cyril's Catechetical Lectures were delivered at this season. There were also constant daily sermons at the services. Public shows were more or less strictly forbidden, and works of charity were engaged in by all who could undertake them. It was a time when sinners were called upon to do outward penance as a sign of inward contrition, that they might be received back to Communion at Easter. Lent was in fact a season of humiliation, abstinence from pleasure, fasting, prayer, penitence, and general depression of tone on account of sin, and was marked on every side with the sombre token of mourning.

The Churches of England and of America have not expressly defined any rule on the subject of Fasting. But so far as any intimation of its use is of worth, the Homily on Fasting in the Book of Homilies, whose teaching is recognized as of authority (vide Art. XXXV.), has urged the example of the early Church, as if intending it to be followed with a considerable amount of strictness. The work that is set before most persons, in the Providence of God, at the present day makes it quite impossible, however, for those who have to do it to fast every day throughout Lent. But conscientious desire to do our duty to ourselves demands that we shall use fasting and abstinence. We can fast at stated times and use due abstinence at all other times in the Lenten season as becomes the faithful of the Church. It is impossible to lay down any general law as to the amount of abstinence from food which is compatible with individual duties, nor can any one except a person possessed of much physiological acumen determine what is to be the rule for another. But the general rules may be laid down: I. That it is possible for all to diminish in some degree the quantity of their food on fasting days without harm resulting. II. That many can safely abstain from animal food altogether for some days in the week. III. That food should be taken on fasting days as a necessity, and its quality so regulated that it shall not be a luxury. IV. That all can deny themselves delicacies on fast-days which may be very properly used at other times.

(e) Laws for priests (ch. xxi.); holy-days and festivals (ch. xxiii.); the episode of the blasphemer (ch. xxiv.) and the law about blasphemy (ch. xxvi. 2). (f) Promises and threats (ch. xxvi. 2-46). This book is linked to Exodus by the latter closing with the completion of the tabernacle, and its consecration by the descent of the cloud upon it. "From the tabernacle, thus rendered glorious by the Divine presence, issues the legislation contained in the book of Leviticus. At first God spake to the people out of the thunder and lightning of Sinai, and gave them His holy commandments by the hand of a mediator. But henceforth His presence is to dwell not on the secret top of Sinai but in the midst of His people, both in their wanderings through the wilderness, and afterwards in the land of Promise. Hence the first directions which Moses received after the work is finished have reference to the offerings which were to be brought to the door of the Tabernacle. As JEHOVAH draws near to the people in the Tabernacle so the people draw near to JEHOVAH in the offering. The regulations respecting sacrifices fall into three groups, and each of these groups again consists of a decalogue of instructions. Bertheau has observed that this principle runs through all the laws of Moses. They are all modeled after the pattern of the Ten Commandments, so that each distinct subject of legislation is always treated of under ten several enactments or provisions."

Objections asserted against other books of Moses seem to be in a great measure abandoned as regards this book. Its archaic form, the bold simplicity of its formulas, give disproof to any assertion of a late date; and if those who urge that the historical books of Moses were the work of the palmy days of Israelitish history, can only say that Leviticus must be not later than the times of the Judges, we can safely challenge them to show why it does not belong to the period of the Exodus.

The discussion on the groups of the laws in Leviticus is too intricate for the present work. "But we must not quit this book without a word on what may be called its spiritual meaning; that so elaborate a ritual looked beyond itself we cannot doubt. It was a prophecy of things to come; a shadow whereof the substance was CHRIST and His Kingdom. Of many things we may be sure that they belonged only to the nation to whom they were given, containing no prophetic significance, but serving as witnesses and signs to them of God's covenant of grace. We may hesitate to pronounce with Jerome that 'every sacrifice, nay, almost every syllable,—the garments of Aaron and the whole-Levitical system,—breathe of heavenly mysteries.' But we cannot read the Epistle to the Hebrews and not acknowledge that the Levitical priests 'served the pattern and type of heavenly things;' that the sacrifices of the Law pointed to and found their interpretation the Lamb of God; that the ordinances of outward purification signified the true inner cleansing of the heart and conscience from dead works to serve the living God. One idea, moreover, penetrates the whole vast and burdensome ceremonial, and gives it a real glory even apart from any prophetic significance. Holiness is its end. Holiness is its character. The tabernacle is holy; the vessels are holy; the offerings are most holy unto JEHOVAH; the garments of the priests are holy; all who approach Him whose name is 'HOLY,' whether priests who minister unto Him, or people who worship Him, must be holy. It would seem as if amid the camp and dwellings of Israel was ever to be heard an echo of that solemn strain which fills the courts above, where the Seraphim cry one unto another, 'Holy, Holy, Holy.'" (Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, sub voc.)

Libertines. The synagogue of the Libertines is mentioned in Acts vi. 9. Most probably the libertines were the Jews who had been taken and sold into slavery by Pompey and other Roman generals, and had afterwards been emancipated and had settled in Jerusalem or were there for the feasts. The larger part of the Jews in Rome were in the condition of "freedmen" and had a quarter in the Trans-Tiber, but were banished by Tiberius about 19 A.D. Probably many of these had found their way back to Jerusalem, and would become zealous defenders of the law.

Liberty. It would be out of place to do more than to hint at one or two points of Christian Liberty. True liberty is to be distinguished from false liberty, the equivalent for license and anarchy, by the submission to law, by the means used,—i.e., whether selfish and only for self-gratification, whether guided by a pure conscience or by a narrow prejudice substituted for a conscience; and also by the end proposed,—whether terminating in self alone. The truest liberty is always relative towards others, since our life is conditioned by so many antagonizing claims. It must be founded upon a practical compromise. But within ourselves the liberty we claim is that of sole accountability to God in the use of the laws, physical, mental, and spiritual, under which we display this triple activity of being. Yet no man is at liberty to harbor or believe in a wrong thought, since wrong antagonizes right and is destructive of all right liberty. Again, the Church permits the utmost liberty of mere opinion compatible with a hearty acceptance of the Apostolic Creed and an honest, sincere use of her formularies. She allows the broadest scope to the play of those faculties which mark individual minds whenever, to use Hooker's phrase, her members do not by their speculations "deny the foundation by the consequents." In these things there is the true Catholicity, for it is founded upon a firm adherence to the truths of the Faith. We must beware that the so-called liberty of conscience be not mistaken for a liberty to entertain prejudice, for conscience cannot claim to judge till it knows, and if it judges before it is properly informed it is no longer a true conscience, but a prejudging self-will.

Life. The creative gift of God to man. It is a complex gift, and is so recognized by Moses: "And God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul," when the Hebrew (and the margin) read "the breath of lives." It was not only a fact recorded by Moses, but it was also a part of that belief which belonged to the purer faith of patriarchal ages. "The breath of the ALMIGHTY hath given me life" (Job xxxiii.). It is therefore but a sequence to this truth that though modern science can trace out the adjuncts and manifestations of the physical life, it cannot touch the life itself,—the vital power that converts, combines, and employs all material presented to it for its use. Heat, light, electricity, nervous force, are intimately associated with the physical part of this complex power; respiration and other functions are intimately woven into its manifestation,—they are the conditions which it uses, by which it remains a tenant of this body of dust. But physical life in man provides also a mental or intellectual life. And since these are the gift of a beneficent CREATOR, and are of His breath, there is also the spiritual life added. Then it follows that in some as yet unrevealed way our LORD, in whom was Life, is intimately concerned in the restoration not only of a spiritual sense, but of actual living power, lost by the fall, heightening the lower forms of this life or living soul by this restoration. For as the FATHER hath life in Himself, so hath He given to the SON to have life in Himself,—“the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live” (St. John v. 25). Compare the teaching that “The first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit.”

Therefore we find the fact that “in Him we live and move and have our being” includes all forms of our life, however manifested, and binds them to Him. His own words, “I am the Life,” are true in the widest sense; and as He has given certain physical functions as the conditions under which the body retains the physical life, so there are certain spiritual functions also necessary for us to foster and develop. His quickening, reinforcing presence is felt in this our spiritual life. Our souls are the breath of lives which He gave, and which return to Him, not losing their individuality thereby, but ever most truly existing in Him with whom is the fountain of life, and in whose light we see light.

Life is a most sacred gift, hedged about with many defenses, and protected by direct command of God. Life is His, for His very Name JEHOVAH means He that is. Therefore there can be nothing more sacred to us than life itself, and being restored by regeneration in the Son of God who is the Life, and sanctified by the Holy Ghost who is the Lord and Giver of life, it must be looked upon as the holiest, as it is the basis of all else we can have,—the first of the talents committed to us.

Light. The gift to the world made on the first day of creation. It is typical of the spiritual light vouchsafed to the soul, “and in Thy light shall we see light.” So our Lord was to be the Light that lighteneth the Gentiles, and of Himself He said, “I am the Light of the world.”

Light has always been the attendant on whatever visible manifestations God has chosen to give us of His presence.

It was the “burning lamp” of Abraham’s covenant, the burning bush which spake with Moses, the pillar of fire, the glory as of a devouring fire upon Mount Sinai, which also filled the Feast of the Tabernacle at its consecration, so that Moses could not enter. And again, at the dedication of the Temple the glory of the Lord so filled the Holy of Holies and the House of the Lord that the priests could not stand to minister because of the cloud. It was the infolding fire Ezekiel saw; the light of burning coals at His feet of Habakkuk’s vision. These revelations all sum up in the glory of the Sun of righteousness, and who is the Light and Sun of His holy Temple. As soon as the Church ritual had developed, soon after the cessation of persecution, light was used symbolically, for the lights were burned at the reading of the Gospel and at other services, as at baptism (when a lighted taper was sometimes put into the hand of the catechumen), and at the celebration of the Holy Communion. Lights were used freely at different festivals and at funeral rites; but while the practice was general, the usages and times at which the lights were used varied very much in the Western Church in the different provinces. The ritual use of lights in the English and American Churches is not at all usual.

Limbo. A word of rather late introduction (i.e., after 1150 A.D.), and one which in the form “limbo” is so perverted by still later misuse that it cannot be employed for any theological purposes. It was invented to describe the place in Hades which the righteous heathen and unbaptized infants and those who lived before the Advent of Christ occupy. It was taught in a vague way by the early Church Fathers, but was more dwelt upon by the schoolmen, and received form from them. Every writer of the early Fathers who has occasion to dwell upon the state of the departed in general, had something to say of those who are “under the uncovenanted mercies of God.” But their teaching was perfectly distinct from even the thought of a Purgatory.

Litany. A supplicatory prayer restricted to a responsive form of intercession between priest and people. It was used in processions. The Litany received its greatest development in France about the fifth and sixth centuries. It passed into English usage in 747 A.D., though the first vernacular Litany was published in 1544 A.D. by Henry VIII. It was the earliest part of the English Prayer-Book that was published, for the Creed, Commandments, and Lord’s Prayer (1536 A.D.) were for general instruction. It was placed in the Prayer-Book of 1549 A.D., to be said before the Communion Office on Wednesdays and Fridays, but in 1552 A.D. it was ordered as now for Sundays, Wednesdays, and Fridays. It is a compilation from many sources, which Cranmer used freely, removing from them all objectionable phrases, but it is an incomparably perfect form of intercession for all estates of men. It may be divided into five main divisions:

I. The obsecrations offered to the Holy Trinity. II. The intercessions offered to our Lord, which take two forms of response: the first reciting petitions for special deliverances and pleading His redemptive acts, the second offering general intercessions for all estates. III. The Kyrie eleisons. IV. The prayers interspersed with responsive versicles. V. The closing prayers, which are enlarged in our American Prayer-Book by placing before the final collect the beautiful General Thanksgiving, which in a slightly different form (with space for special prayers for those who desired the prayers of the congregation) was in English occasional prayers. The practice which omits the versicle “Let us pray” loses the use of the ancient call to increased fervor in prayer, uttered by the Deacon at certain points in the old Liturgies.

Liturgy. The classical use of λεειτουργία, “a public work” or “duty,” was transferred in the Septuagint and New Testament alike to the ministration of public worship; at first, and for several centuries A.D., including the offices of worship generally, but gradually restricted in ecclesiastical language to the Holy Communion. In popular use at the present day, the older and wider meaning reappears of any precomposed form of public prayer; but we treat here only of those forms for the celebration of the Holy Communion found in all ages of Christianity.

The divinely prescribed ceremonial of the Passover was, in its essential features, observed by our LORD at the Institution of the Holy Communion; and His own acts and words on that occasion became the frame-work of all Christian Liturgies. Beyond these,—i.e., the breaking of the bread, the taking of the cup, the blessing or giving thanks (Eucharist), the words of institution, and perhaps the LORD's Prayer and a hymn (or psalm),—there was probably no original form of Liturgy from which later ones have been derived. In other words, each church, community, or Diocese had its own way of filling in this outline. But as the earliest centres of Church life and work grew into metropolitan and patriarchal Sees, their use or ritual became naturally that of the lesser Dioceses around them, and crystallized, so to speak, in fixed form as it extended its circle of observance. This was especially the case with the chief Apostolic Sees, afterwards the great Patriarchates of the East and West,—Jerusalem, Alexandria, Antioch, and Rome, and in later days Constantinople; and the Liturgies of these Churches, together with that of Ephesus, have been undoubtedly the sources of all modern Eucharistic offices.

1. Aside from the well-known mention of Christian worship in Pliny's letter to Trajan, where he appears to refer to the Eucharist, the earliest account of a Liturgy is given us by Justin Martyr; probably that of Antioch, about 150 A.D. St. Cyril, of Jerusalem (347 A.D.), in his last Catechetical Lecture, describes the Liturgical use of his day and place, and St. Chrysostom, a little later, that of Antioch, in terms from which it would appear that all these three were of the same family, and essentially the same as the so-called Liturgy of St. James, still in use in its Syriac version by the Jacobites (or Monophysites) of the East, though its Greek or orthodox form has long been disused. With them all may be compared the Greek Liturgy given in the Eighth Book of the Apostolical Constitutions, undoubtedly of or near the age of Chrysostom, and the most complete in all its parts which has come down to us from that day, though we have no proof that it exactly represents any Eucharistic service in actual use. A tabular view, taking the Liturgy of the Apostolical Constitutions as a standard, shows concisely the parts and order of each of these ancient services. All were preceded by Epistle, Gospel, sermon, and prayers for those not yet admitted to Communion,—in other words, a Missa Catechumenorum, or ante-communion service.

It is highly probable, however, that the LORD's Prayer was used in every form of Liturgy, though not always mentioned in the above accounts.

2. We come next to the Alexandrian family of Liturgies, the service of Egypt and Ethiopia; comprising the Greek of "St. Mark" and Coptic of "St. Cyril" (two most closely related), two others, each in Coptic, Arabic, and Greek, by name (and by name only) those of "St. Basil" and "St. Gregory," and the "Ethiopic Canon." Here again the points of agreement are many, the differences mostly in order of parts, which, however, is invariable for the "ante-communion" or preparation (where it is given),

Sursum Corda, Preface, Sanctus, and Consecration. In St. Mark and St. Cyril the Second Oblation both precedes and follows the Words of Institution (Consecration); and here occur liturgical phrases (intercessions) identical with those found in St. Clement of Rome,—a curious proof of early communion between Egypt and Rome. All have the LORD's Prayer after Consecration; the Ethiopic Canon alone after Communion (as in the English Liturgy), and this only does not mention either Sursum Corda or the reading of the "Diptychs," which, or some corresponding mention of the living and the departed, was undoubtedly a feature of every primitive Liturgy. It may be noted here that there is no trace of the Creed in any form in the Eucharistic Service before the sixth century; while, as is well known, it was an important part of the Baptismal Office.

3. The Liturgy of Cæsarea, commonly known as that of St. Basil (and rightly, as belonging to his Episcopate, and in part, no doubt, composed by him), with that of Constantinople, called St. Chrysostom's, but probably several centuries later, are in use throughout most parts of the Eastern Church at this day, but with many modern interpolations. We have both, however, in a comparatively early and incorrupt form, in MSS. of the close of the ninth century, at Rome. Both add to the earlier Liturgies, above noticed, the Creed; and in both, as in some of the Egyptian Liturgies, the Intercessions for the living and the dead follow the Consecration and Second Oblation.

4. Passing over three Nestorian Liturgies in Syriac, still preserved and used by the Christians of Mesopotamia (of "The Apostles," "Theodore the Interpreter," and "Nestorius"), and presenting no ancient characteristics of special note, we come to the Latin Liturgy of Carthage, no longer extant, but described quite fully by Tertullian, St. Cyprian, and St. Augustine. It differs from the Greek order chiefly, perhaps solely, in the introduction of the Pax and Kiss of Peace immediately after the Consecration and Second Oblation; and the Intercession for the Living and the Dead, not only before but after the Communion.

5. The next variation of importance is found in the early Liturgies of Spain (including the Mozarabic, preserved by the Christians of Granada after the conquest by the Moors) and France, long since superseded in both countries by the Roman, but having distinct traces of an independent Eastern origin, apparently from the Church of Ephesus; and this family has a special interest for us, as the principal, immediate source of the present English Liturgy. This type of Liturgy, although ascribed traditionally to St. John (as would naturally be the case from his late residence at Ephesus), may be supposed with much probability to have originated with St. Paul. (See Freeman, Principles of Divine Service, ii. 399, 404.) Like the Eastern Liturgies before noted, it is preceded by Lessons from the Old Testament, Epistle, and Gospel; the Offertory is accompanied by a Trisagion (in Greek); then comes the Apostolic Benediction, Kiss of Peace, Sursum Corda, Preface, Sanctus, etc.; the words of Institution begin as in Greek, "In the night in which He was betrayed," not, as in other Latin Liturgies, "the day before;" the "Sanctus Sanctus" and "Gustate" are given. The marked characteristics were the constantly varying Prefaces, and the Embolismus, or expansion of the Lord's Prayer, with variable introduction, in Spain before, in France after, Communion. Both the living and the dead are mentioned by name in the Intercessions. Before the Gospel was sung Benedicite, and after it was a Sermon, followed in the Spanish and Mozarabic, at least, by the Creed of Constantinople. In all there is a special Symbolical Fraction (not mentioned in other Eastern Liturgies) with minute rites, perhaps not as ancient as the substance of these Liturgies. Manuscripts and records of the Spanish and French Liturgies go back to the seventh century; but the original features of the Mozarabic only appear from their correspondence with those of the Eastern Church. The Gallican, with all its Eastern peculiarities, was undoubtedly the type introduced into England by St. Augustine of Canterbury, and many features of it were preserved in the Uses of York, Sarum, and Hereford, down to the Reformation,—e.g., the Hymn Veni Creator; the first Oblation after the Introit, of Bread and Wine simultaneously; the entire omission of Adoration after Consecration. All these seem to indicate a fusion, to some extent, not only of the Gallican, but of the ancient British and Irish forms observed at the planting of Christianity in Britain with the later general type derived from Rome.

6. The Roman Liturgy, through the influence of the Apostolic See, superseded in course of time all other Liturgies in the West. Special features of it can be traced with some certainty to the latter part of the fifth century; but in this instance we must distinguish carefully between the Sacramentary (Libri Sacramentorum) or variable portion of the service,—i.e., the Collect, Epistle, Gospel, Secreta (silent prayer before the Oblation), Preface, Thanksgiving, and Benediction, which is still extant, as arranged by (probably even before) Pope Gelasius (495 A.D.),—and the "Canon of the Mass," which in its earliest existing form is that of St. Gregory the Great, a century later. The earlier Sacramentary and later Canon were certainly long combined, and much of Gelasius's work is probably still included in the Roman Missal. The first part, or Ordo Missæ, in the Gregorian Sacramentary, consists of the Introit, Kyrie, Gloria in Excelsis, Collect, Epistle, Gradual (or Alleluia), Gospel, Offertory, and First Oblation (of the Elements); and the Canon begins with the last words of the prayer Super Oblata (the same as the Secreta of Gelasius) said aloud, and followed immediately by Dominus Vobiscum, Sursum Corda, Preface ("It is very meet," etc., as in the English Liturgy, followed by the Proper of the Day), Sanctus, Intercession for the Living, Consecration, and Second Oblation, Commemoration of, and Intercession for, the Departed, Lord's Prayer (with a brief Embolismus), Pax (substituted for the more ancient Kiss of Peace), and Benediction. The actual Communion following the Pax has no mention in the Canon, whose rubrics, it must be noticed, are of more modern date. Nor does the Creed occur in the Ordo, though from the sixth or seventh century its Eucharistic use after the Gospel became common in the Western Church.

7. The Church of Milan retained its own independent Ambrosian Liturgy, in spite of all the efforts of the Roman See, till our own day, varying from the Gregorian in the introduction of a Lesson from the Prophets, Antiphon, or short Anthem, and Benedictus with Alleluia, between Collect and Epistle; Gloria in Excelsis and Benediction before the Gospel; Kyrie and Antiphon after the Gospel; the First Oblation brought in to the Priest by ten aged men and as many women; Hymns and Prefaces in great number, and many parts of the Canon differing considerably from the Roman Missal.

8. The above represent in a general way all the Liturgies of early Christianity in the East and West. All, it will be noted, show both an essential agreement, in doctrinal teaching, and material differences from the modern uses of Rome and Constantinople.

Intercessions for the living and the departed appear in every account from Tertullian down, but neither separated (by placing the latter after the Consecration, as now in the Roman Missal), nor supplemented by Invocations of the Saints until the sixth or seventh century. Both the First Oblation (bringing of the Elements) and the Second (after Consecration), with the doctrine of the Eucharistic Sacrifice, are recognized by Justin Martyr (the latter in his "Dialogue with Trypho"), and by every Liturgy after his day. The Epiclesis, or Invocation of the HOLY SPIRIT, follows the Consecration in all Liturgies of Eastern origin (including the Spanish and Gallican), but not in those of the West. The dismissal of the catechumens (or non-communicants) and actual Communion of the faithful present, are obvious instances of differences between ancient and modern Roman use.

9. To these we add a brief notice of some modern forms of the Liturgy.

(a) The Church of England set forth in 1549 A.D. a translation and revision of her ancient Liturgy (in what is known as the "First Book of Edward VI."), following closely, in most respects, the Gregorian Ordo and Canon; omitting its Invocations of Saints, but retaining its Invocation of the HOLY GHOST, Commemoration of the Saints, Second Oblation, Intercessions for the Departed (restoring these to their ancient place before the Consecration), and Words of Delivery ("the Body of our LORD," etc.); all of which, together with the rubrics for Eucharistic Vestments, dismissal of non-communicants, bringing in of the Elements, and action of Consecration, were left out, or greatly changed three years later, by the "Second Book," under the influence of the German Reformers Bucer and Martyr. Subsequent revisions in 1562, 1604, and 1662 A.D., especially the latter, have restored the Commemoration, Second Oblation (optional, indeed, and after Communion); Words of Delivery (prefixed to those of the Second Book), and rubrics for the bringing in of the Elements and Consecration, adding others for reverent presentation of Alms and covering and consumption of Elements remaining. The LORD'S Prayer and Gloria in Excelsis are placed after Communion (contrary to all ancient use as well as to the Gregorian Canon), and, on the other hand, the ancient vestments appear to be restored by the present rubrics, though this is questioned.

(b) The Liturgy of the Scottish Church, 1718 A.D., superseding one set forth by Archbishop Laud in 1637 A.D., was optional in Scotland with the English Liturgy, has been closely followed in most points by (c) the American Liturgy of 1789 A.D. In both, the Second Oblation and Invocation of the HOLY SPIRIT are restored to their ancient place immediately after Consecration, the American inserting in the Oblation the significant words, "which we now offer unto Thee;" and in some less important details these resemble, more nearly than the English, the First Book of Edward VI. A revision of the American Liturgy, not affecting its doctrinal teaching, is now (1883-86 A.D.) in progress. (d) The Old Catholic Liturgy of 1880 A.D., and (e) the Liturgy of Sweden (Evangelical Lutheran), are translations and revisions of the Roman Missal, differing, however, very widely, the former following the Gregorian Canon even more closely than does the first English Liturgy, with which the Old Catholic service is doctrinally identical; the latter a somewhat bald abridgment, wanting many characteristic features of the ancient Eucharistic services. (Both, with the Roman Liturgy, may be found in the American Church Review, Jan., 1881 A.D., and June, 1883 A.D. See also Dict. of Chr. Antiquities, of whose full and valuable articles there is little more than a condensation, and references there given.)

Lollards. The followers of Wycklif, who took up many of his teachings. Lollardism became a movement about 1380 A.D., and continued on, more as a political movement among the people, till about 1550 A.D. It was to repress Lollardism that the statute "on burning heretics" was passed in the first year of Henry IV.

Long Island, Diocese of, extending from east to west one hundred and twenty miles, with an average width of fifteen miles, embracing an area of 1682 square miles, and including the counties of Kings, Queens, and Suffolk, was set off from the Diocese of New York on the 15th of November, 1868 A.D. The Primary Convention was held in the city of Brooklyn on the 18th and 19th insts. following, when the new Diocese was formally organized, and the Rev. Abram Newkirk Littlejohn, D.D., Rector of the Church of the Holy Trinity, Brooklyn, was elected Bishop. The number of clergy belonging to the Diocese was eighty-five, of whom sixty-nine were entitled to act as deputies; and of organized parishes in union with Convention, fifty-five. There were at this time 9014 communicants, and for the conventional year preceding, 1691 baptisms, 725 confirmations, 503 marriages, 951 burials; Sunday-school teachers, 1230, and scholars, 10,677; and offerings for all purposes, $204,720.62. Dr. Littlejohn was consecrated on the 27th of January, 1869 A.D., the Rt. Rev. Horatio Potter, D.D., of New York, being Consecrator, assisted by the Bishops of New Jersey, Virginia, Western New York, Nebraska and Dakota, Colorado, Pittsburg, Maine, and Oregon and Washington Territories. Bishop Littlejohn was born on the 18th of December, 1824 A.D.; graduated at Union College, 1845 A.D.; admitted to the Diaconate on the 19th of March, 1848 A.D., by Bishop De Lancey; and to the Priesthood on the 12th of June, 1849 A.D., by Bishop Brownell. After officiating for brief periods at St. Ann's Church, Amsterdam, N. Y.; St. Andrew's, Meriden, Conn.; and Christ Church, Springfield, Mass., he became, in June, 1851 A.D., Rector of St. Paul's, New Haven, and served also for seven years as lecturer on Pastoral Theology in the Berkeley Divinity School. In 1860 A.D. he removed to Brooklyn, L. I., having accepted the rectorship of the Church of the Holy Trinity, which he held until his elevation to the Episcopate. In 1874 A.D. he was appointed by the Presiding Bishop to take charge of the American Episcopal Churches on the Continent of Europe. Besides various charges and occasional sermons, he has contributed numerous critiques, essays, and reviews to the current literature of the day, and published the following volumes: "Conclones ad Clerum," 1879-80 A.D.; "Individualism, its Growth and Tendencies;" Sermons delivered before the University of Cambridge, England, in November, 1880 A.D.; "The Priesthood in the latter part of the Nineteenth Century;" lectures on the Bishop-Paddock Foundation, 1884 A.D.

At the end of the first decade of Bishop Littlejohn's active Episcopate the following statistics show the healthful growth of the Diocese. There had been over 20,000 baptisms; confirmations, 12,763; number of communicants, 14,587; Sunday-school teachers, 2033, and scholars, 15,508; Deaconesses admitted, 19; candidates for Orders, 53; Priests ordained, 46; Deacons, 41; Communion alms, $149,167.99; contributions to missions, $303,182.99; education for the ministry, $36,430.99; Parochial, Diocesan, and general purposes, $4,640,032.82; to which should be added several items not appearing in the summary of the parochial reports, viz.: benefactions to the Church Charity Foundation, liquidation of church debts, increase of several Diocesan funds, purchase of the Episcopal residence, $40,000; donations of property held by the trustees of the estate belonging to the Diocese, $100,000, forming an aggregate for the first ten years of over five millions of dollars.

Besides the development of parochial and missionary work, especial attention has been given to the establishment and building up of charitable institutions and church schools. The Church Charity Foundation, with its several buildings, located on Atlantic Avenue, Brooklyn, and covering an area of forty-five city lots, comprises a Home for Aged Indigent Women, Aged Men, and Aged Married Couples; an Orphan House and School, with a Printing Establishment known as the "Orphans' Press," and St. John's Hospital, organized in June, 1871 A.D., with a Memorial Chapel for the accommodation of the several houses, which are under the charge of the Deaconesses of the Diocese and a resident Chaplain,—the whole constituting a property valued at over $300,000, with an endowment fund of $100,000, the income of which, together with the contributions of the churches throughout the Diocese, defrays the current expenses of the beneficiaries. There are also in Brooklyn the Atlantic Avenue Dispensary for the gratuitous treatment of the poor; the Sheltering Arms Nursery, with its Infirmary; St. Phebe's Mission, for special work in the public institutions; and a Deaconesses' House, on Washington Avenue, owned by the Order. In the latter, with its adjoining capacious school-house, is located St. Catherine's Hall, a boarding and day school for girls, under the management of the Sisters of St. John. Several of the city churches also have parochial and industrial schools.

In 1877 A.D. the Diocese accepted the munificent offer of Mrs. A. T. Stewart to erect a Cathedral at Garden City, with an Episcopal residence and Cathedral Schools, in memory of her husband, Alexander T. Stewart; and, accordingly, the corner-stone of the Cathedral of the Incarnation was laid on the 28th of June, 1877 A.D., and on the 19th of September following, St. Paul's School for Boys, and St. Mary's for Girls, were opened. On the 18th of June, 1879 A.D., the corner-stone was laid of the large and permanent building for St. Paul's School, which was finished and occupied in September, 1883 A.D., and is regarded as one of the most complete edifices for educational purposes in this country, having a façade 300 feet in length, with three wings, each 180 feet deep, comprising a chapel, school-rooms, library, and parlors, dining-hall, gymnasium, laboratory, infirmary, dormitories, bath-rooms, kitchens, etc. The Episcopal residence is also an ornate and commodious building, situated in the extensive park surrounding the Cathedral. Seven years were occupied in the erection of the Cathedral, which is Early English in style, and is constructed of Bellville stone elaborately wrought, consisting of nave and aisles, transepts, choir and chancel, baptistery, tower and spire, with a crypt, sacristy, chantry, and mausoleum. The total length is 190 feet; of choir and chancel, 60 feet; width of transepts, which have aisles, 80 feet; of nave 52 feet, and height of spire 221 feet. The organ is one of the largest ever constructed, and consists of six separate portions located in different parts of the edifice, connected by electric wires and played from one key-box, as are also the chime of bells, thirteen in number. The rich and beautiful design, and its solid and substantial materials and workmanship; the delicately chiseled stone and marbles in the baptistery, rood-screen, and mausoleum; the elegant font and altar; the exquisitely carved organ-cases, Episcopal throne and sedilia; the superb pictorial glass, with the admirable proportions and decorations of the structure everywhere, combine to render this an imposing memorial of the founder of Garden City, and a most worthy and appropriate ecclesiastical edifice and official centre for the Bishop of the Diocese. At the time of writing the Diocese numbers: Clergy, 107; parishes and missions, 100 churches; families, 12,514; individuals, 57,773; baptisms, infants, 1804; adults, 242; total, 2046; confirmed, 1142; communicants, 16,327; marriages, 621; burials, 1450; Sunday-schools, teachers, 2008; scholars, 16,041; contributions, $462,434.99. The census of 1880 A.D. gives the population of Kings County as 599,549; of Queens, 90,547; and of Suffolk, 53,926; total, 744,022.

REV. T. S. DROWNE, D.D.

Lord. The word used to translate the Hebrew JEHOVAH. It is used freely with the other title, GOD, Elohim (vide ELOHIM); so that the hypercritical attempt to distinguish between what are called the Elohistic and the Jehovistic documents falls to pieces. LORD as the self-existent One, the source of Life to all others, is the most secret name revealed to us. This LORDSHIP belongs to the FATHER, to the SON, and to the HOLY GHOST by the unity of the Divine principle. As in the SON dwells the fullness of the FATHER, and as the FATHER communicates to the SON of His own nature and giveth to Him to have life in Himself, LORDSHIP must belong to the SON. So since the HOLY GHOST proceeds from the FATHER and is sent by the SON, so to Him too belongs the title of LORD. But in relation to ourselves, the WORD of GOD, the eternal SON, is both LORD and CHRIST. For the FATHER put all power into His Hands, has made Him Judge as well as Redeemer, and because He has taken our nature and has made Atonement for us He is our High-Priest, and so our LORD and our

CHRIST. This LORDSHIP is given to Him in and through His Resurrection. (Vide RESURRECTION.)

Lord's Day. Vide SUNDAY.

Lord's Prayer was given on two separate occasions, first upon the preaching of the Sermon on the Mount, and secondly when His disciples came to Him to ask Him to teach them how to pray (St. Luke xi. 2-4). In the Sermon on the Mount He set it as the model of all. "After this manner therefore pray ye," was the charge then. But as the sum of all prayer it was given privately,— "When ye pray, say." The Church seems to make something of this use in the twofold use of it in the Holy Communion, placing it as the very first prayer, and apparently to the minister only,— "And the Minister standing at the right side of the Table, or where Morning and Evening Prayer are appointed to be said, shall say the LORD's Prayer and the Collect following, the People kneeling." But at the close of the Celebration the People are to repeat with him the LORD's Prayer. It was taught to the catechumens just before baptism as one of the sacred trusts of doctrine. It was used especially in the Liturgies, where it was frequently followed by a special prayer founded upon the last petition. It was incorporated into every public office, and is an integral part of every separate office in the Prayer-Book. It has passed into the constant private devotions of every Christian.

The effort has been made to show that its petitions had been in some form in use before our LORD taught this prayer. It is true that such ideas as are therein used are common to all prayers, but not so compacted and pregnant with multifold meanings. And whenever any apparent parallels have been produced, it has always followed that they are of a date later than the Gospel. There is a slight variation in the petition for daily bread. St. Matthew has "this day," St. Luke has "day by day," but these are proper to the two separate occasions on which they were given.

Lord's Supper. One of the two great Sacraments of the Church, ordained by Christ Himself. (Vide SACRAMENT.) Baptism being the Sacrament of admission into, the LORD's Supper that of continuance in, His Church.

In this article will be considered regarding this Rite, (A) The names by which it has been called, as throwing light upon the meanings attached to it. (B) Its History. (C) Its Nature. (Vide also PRIEST and REAL PRESENCE.)

(A) THE NAMES GIVEN TO THIS SACRAMENT.

(1) The Lord's Supper.—It is so called by St. Paul (1 Cor. xi. 20), doubtless from the fact of its institution during the Paschal Supper, and it is called by this name by several early writers. It appears to have been at first celebrated in connection with the Love-Feast (Agapé), the abuse of which the Apostle in the above passage is condemning. As that gradually was disused and the time of administering the sacrament was changed from evening to early morning, so this name drifted out of frequent use, for it seemed less used, though found in all the early writers. It is one of the names given it in the Prayer-Book.

(2) Eucharist.—This was the most common name for this Sacrament; the giving-of-thanks, or Eucharism, being a prominent feature of the institution of our LORD. St. Paul is supposed to allude to this when he asks, "How shall he that occupieth the room of the unlearned say Amen at Thy giving of thanks?" literally, "at Thy Eucharising" (1 Cor. xiv. 16). It was applied to the Sacrament from the earliest times. Ignatius, Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Origen, Clemens Alexandrinus, all use it. Thus Justin Martyr, 140 A.D., says, after describing the celebration, "And this food-taking is called among us the Eucharist." Clemens writes, "Melchisedec gave bread and wine, consecrated food, as a type of the Eucharist." (Scudamore, Notitia Eucharistica, p. 7.)

(3) Holy Communion.—This is also a Scriptural name. "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the Communion (or partaking) of the blood of CHRIST? The bread which we break, is it not the Communion of the body of CHRIST?" (1 Cor. x. 16.) The context shows that the Apostle also refers to the Communion or fellowship Christians have one with another as members of CHRIST's body, by the joint partaking of this spiritual food: "For we being many are one bread, and one body; for we are all partakers of that one bread." So that the word had a double meaning, of the Communing with CHRIST and through Him with one another; hence is very appropriate. It was not, however, so generally used of the Sacrament as were some other names, being more frequently used to express Church membership. It is the other name used in the Prayer-Book.

(4) The Breaking of the Bread.—It is generally agreed that this Sacrament is intended in Acts ii. 42: "They continued steadfastly in the Apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in the breaking of the bread and the prayers." Also in Acts xx. 7: "And upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread," the Holy Communion is meant. This name, however, never came into very general use.

(5) The Oblation, or Offering.—This name at first was given because of the various offerings of alms, in kind or money, for the poor, and for the support of the ministry, and also of bread and wine for the celebration itself, which were made at the time of the Eucharist; also because of the spiritual oblation in the commemoration of the Sacrifice of CHRIST. Gradually the term came to be used chiefly of this last, and so of the Communion itself, and "to partake of the holy oblation" meant to receive. In our own service the bread and wine placed upon the Holy Table are called oblations, and after the words of consecration are offered to the Divine Majesty, as the memorial the Son has commanded us to make; which in the margin is called The Oblation.

(6) Analogous to this is the term Sacrifice, which from very early days is found used of this Sacrament, though not in the New Testament. It was first used for the material offerings of the alms and of the Bread and Wine, and afterwards of the Commemoration of the Sacrifice of the death of CHRIST. Thus Justin Martyr says, that "the Sacrifices" which Christians offer, as CHRIST commanded, "that is, in the Eucharist of the Bread and of the cup," are pleasing to God as foretold by the Prophet Malachi. "Which sacrifices only," he further says, "Christians have undertaken to make; and in the remembrance also of their food, both dry and liquid, in which also there is a memory of the suffering of the Son of God which he endured for them" (Dial. with Trypho, 117). Irenæus and Tertullian both use it in the same way. But gradually the word came to be used chiefly of the Commemoration of CHRIST's Sacrifice, and by the end of the third century the Eucharist was commonly called "The Sacrifice," but always as a commemoration. Thus St. Chrysostom: "We offer, indeed, but making a remembrance of this death. . . . We offer not another sacrifice, like the High-Priest of old, but always the same,—or rather we perform a commemoration of a sacrifice." (Scudamore, p. 16. The reader is referred to the word PRIEST for the view the Church holds.)

(7) The Mass.—We have left this name for the last, because though now widely used, especially in the Roman Communion, it was the latest used of all, and there is less authority for it than for any of the others. The word is from the Latin missa, and simply means dismissal. It was used by the Deacons to announce the termination of certain portions of the service, and the release of those who were not entitled to remain for the Eucharistic service; the Deacons proclaiming to the catechumens and others, Ite; missa est.—Depart; it is the dismissal. And as this was the signal for the beginning of the Liturgy proper, the name missa came to be applied to the office which followed it. St. Ambrose, 385 A.D., is said to be the first who so used it, but it did not come into general use until the end of the sixth century. (Scudamore, p. 1.) The English Church, on the final revision of the Prayer-Book, rejected it because of many superstitions which had connected themselves with the word. Traces of its former use remain in such words as Christ-mas, Candle-mas, Lam-mas.

Each of the names by which it has been called throws some light upon the history and meaning of this Holy Sacrament, viz. :

the first and fourth tell of its institution, the second, fifth, and sixth of its nature, Eucharistic and commemorative to God and man, the third of the union with CHRIST and through Him with one another, and the seventh of its being for believers only.

(B) THE HISTORY.

It was the night of the Passover, the night in which He was betrayed and given up to be the true Paschal Lamb, that our Blessed LORD instituted this Holy Sacrament. These facts are to be borne in mind when striving to obtain a true idea of its nature and object. We have in the New Testament four accounts of the institution, which are here given in parallel columns:

Matt. xxvi. 26-28.

And as they were eating, Jesus took bread, and blessed it, and brake it, and gave it to the disciples, and said, Take, eat; this is My Body.

And He took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of it;

For this is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins.

Mark xiv. 22-24.

And as they did eat, Jesus took bread, and blessed, and brake it, and gave to them, and said, Take, eat: this is My Body.

And He took the cup, and when He had given thanks, He gave it to them: and they all drank of it.

And He said unto them, This is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many.

Luke xxii. 19, 20.

And He took bread, and gave thanks, and brake it, and gave unto them, saying, This is My Body, which is given for you: this do in remembrance of Me.

Also the cup after supper, saying, This cup is the new testament in my blood, which is shed for you.

1 Cor. xi. 23-29.

The LORD JESUS the same night in which He was betrayed took bread:

And when He had given thanks, He brake it, and said, Take, eat: this is My Body, which is broken for you: this do in remembrance of Me.

After the same manner also He took the cup, when He had supped, saying, This cup is the new testament in my blood: this do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of Me.

For as oft as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do shew the LORD's death till He come.

Wherefore whosoever shall eat this bread, and drink this cup unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the LORD. . .

For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation (or rather condemnation) to himself, not discerning the LORD's body.

Add these following, and we have all the direct references to the Eucharist to be found in the New Testament:

The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the Communion of the blood of CHRIST? The bread which we break, is it not the Communion of the body of CHRIST? (1 Cor. x. 16.)

CHRIST our Passover is sacrificed for us; therefore let us keep the feast. (1 Cor. v. 7.)

We have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle. (Heb. xiii. 10.)

From these words of Holy Scripture we gather the following regarding the Sacrament: (1) Its Institution. It was instituted while our LORD and His disciples were eating the Passover, with materials then upon the table, viz., bread, probably unleavened, and wine, probably mingled with water. That Passover, as all others had been, was a type of Him, and His disciples in future instead of feeding on the lamb, etc., were to feed on that which He then gave them, the bread which was the Communion of the Body of CHRIST, the cup which was the Communion of His blood. This was to be for a remembrance of Him; and was for the remission of sin, for the showing forth His death, and they who received unworthily condemned themselves, because failing to discriminate the LORD's body. Also that this is to be partaken as a feeding on the Peace-offering of the Christian Church. (2) Its Administration. This consisted of the taking of the bread; the blessing and giving thanks; the breaking, the distribution, the command to eat; the calling it His body. The taking the cup; the giving thanks; the giving to drink; the calling it His blood. The command to continue to do all this, in remembrance of Him. It must be noticed that the eating and drinking are just as essential parts of the Institution as the breaking and thanksgiving.

These simple rites have ever since been considered essential to the due administration of the LORD's Supper. And however after-ages in love and devotion, and sometimes perhaps in superstition, may have added to them adornments of music and pomp of ceremonies, these have ever remained the great central and unchanged features of the consecration. It was continued in the first ages in its beautiful simplicity just as CHRIST instituted it. Justin Martyr's account describing it to the Emperor Antoninus Pius, the earliest we have, shows how it was administered about 150 A.D. He says that "on the day called Sunday" they meet together, and instruction in Scripture is given and prayer offered. Then "when our prayer is ended, bread and wine and water are brought, and the president in like manner offers prayers and thanksgivings according to his ability, and the people assent, saying Amen; and there is a distribution to each, and a participation of that over which thanks have been given, and to those who are absent a portion is sent by the Deacons" (Apol., Book I, lxvii.). "This food is called among us Eucharistia." This is not the place to trace the ritual additions which later ages made to the simple rite of CHRIST's institution. They will be found under the head of LITURGIES.

(C) THE NATURE OF THE SACRAMENT.

It is unnecessary to dwell upon the outward visible sign; that has been already sufficiently shown to be, as the Catechism declares, "Bread and wine which the LORD hath commanded to be received." We therefore proceed at once to a consideration of the "inward part, or thing signified." This we are taught is "The Body and Blood of CHRIST, which are spiritually taken and received by the faithful in the LORD's Supper" (the English Catechism has, "verily taken and received"). And we are also taught that the benefits we receive thereby are "The strengthening and refreshing of our souls by the Body and Blood of CHRIST, as our bodies are by the bread and wine." Thus the Church teaches that the grace of the Sacrament, i.e., that which we receive by its means, and of which it is a pledge, is the body and blood of CHRIST, spiritually taken and received, and it is for "the strengthening and refreshing of our souls."

We shall understand this better if we refer to the saying of our LORD to the Jews in Capernaum, when they sought Him after the miracle of the loaves and fishes (St. John vi. 26, etc.). In the discourse to Nicodemus (vide BAPTISMAL REGENERATION), our LORD foretells of entering the new life by the birth of water and of the Spirit, and afterwards appoints Baptism as the Sacrament of this new birth; so here He tells the Jews of the necessity of heavenly food to keep alive and nourish this new life, even as their Fathers were received out of Egypt, baptized "in the cloud and in the sea," and then sustained in the wilderness by miraculous food and drink, viz., the manna, the bread from heaven, and the water from the rock. And when they ask, "LORD, evermore give us this bread," He declares Himself to be the bread of life, and proclaims, "the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world." And when the Jews murmured, "saying, How can this man give us His flesh to eat," He explains not, but declares even more emphatically, "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink His blood, ye have no life in you." "He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life, . . . dwelleth in me, and I in him." These words must have made a deep impression on the disciples; they could not understand them and "said, This is an hard saying; who can hear it?" and though He gives some clue to His deep spiritual meaning by adding, "It is the SPIRIT that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing," showing that His words were to be taken not of that carnal body then with them; still we read that in consequence "many of His disciples went back and walked no more with Him." The strong faith of Peter and his companions retained them in their allegiance to Him as the MESSIAH, but we can well understand that the question must often have been in their minds, if not privately discussed among themselves: "How can this man give us His flesh to eat?" Now, in less than a year comes the last Passover, with the institution we have described. When the LORD gave them the bread broken and the cup filled, saying, "Take, eat; this is my body, which is given for you." "Drink ye all of it; this is my blood which is shed for you," their minds must have gone back to that discourse at Capernaum; to the promise of eternal life through eating and drinking the flesh and blood of the SON of Man, and they would immediately have thought, Here in His mercy the Master gives us the means of doing that which to us seemed impossible; He must mean that by eating this bread and drinking this wine we in some mysterious manner become partakers of Himself.

Of course they could not understand how it was; the Spiritual Body was not yet revealed. But in faith they accepted, and in the discourse recorded by St. John which followed, the LORD told them of His presence with them in the HOLY GHOST, who would teach them all it was needed they should know. And so they came to know and believe, as St. Paul was taught by revelation. The bread which we break is the Communion of the Body of CHRIST. The cup of blessing which we bless is the Communion of the Blood of CHRIST. After ages bringing the wit of man to the attempt to explain divine mysteries, argued about the how and the when, and the nature, still asking and puzzling themselves with the old question, "How can this man give us His flesh to eat?" and so fell into various errors and superstitions in the attempt to explain the inexplicable. The simple childlike faith of the Apostles and earliest Christians was satisfied with the Divine Word, and "not intruding into those things which they had not seen," "thankfully received that His inestimable benefit." It is wise to follow their example, and in the words of one who long years after has inherited their spirit say, "What the word doth make it, that I believe and take it."

But there is yet another point to be considered before we can rightly understand the full nature and purpose of this Sacrament. It was instituted during the Paschal Feast, that was a commemoration of the deliverance from Egypt. The Paschal lamb, by whose blood they were marked as God's people, was then being consumed. When CHRIST said, "Take, eat; this is my Body which is given for you; this do in remembrance of me;" "This is my Blood which is shed for the remission of sins;" they could not fail to perceive the connection between the two. They must have understood that as the lamb and unleavened bread were offered in remembrance of their deliverance from slavery and their union under the Old Covenant, as God's people, so this rite of the New Covenant, this taking, blessing, and eating of the Bread and Wine was to be in place of the former, as a perpetual showing forth of their deliverance through CHRIST from bondage to sin and their union together as CHRIST'S Body. Not that at the time they clearly saw all this, but it must have come to their minds as they reflected upon it, and it was revealed to them afterwards by the HOLY SPIRIT. Even as St. Paul was taught to say, "CHRIST our Passover is sacrificed for us, therefore let us keep the feast;" and St. Peter writes, that we are redeemed "with the precious blood of CHRIST, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot" (1 Pet. i. 19).

There is one more thought that must have presented itself to the minds of the better instructed of the Apostles, viz., the analogy between this new rite and the peace-offering of the Old Covenant. That, as is shown in another place (vide PRIEST), was a thank-offering, and a feeding on that offering, so the great feature of the act of CHRIST, in taking the bread and cup, was the blessing, the giving thanks, and the distributing for feasting. It was of a sacrificial nature. The bread and wine taken in the hands of Him the great HIGH-PRIEST, and by Him blessed, broken, and given for feasting, was to take the place of that sacrifice, and be so continued by His Priests until He should come again. It was to be in reality that which the other was only in type, a lasting, solemn thank-offering to God, and a feeding none the less real, because spiritual, on that offering. Not, again, that we need think that all this occurred at the time clearly to the minds of the Apostles; they came afterwards to see it as the true nature of the feast was revealed to them. To this the Apostle doubtless alludes when he writes, "We have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle" (Heb. xiii. 10).

Thus we find set forth in the LORD'S Supper, under the consecration and offering of the bread and wine, and the reception of them, the twofold meaning of the redemption from sin through the death of CHRIST, and the union with Him by the reception of Himself into our souls, and through Him with God. There is, in the proper sense of the words, a sacrifice and a feeding on the sacrifice as truly as in the Passover and in the thank-offering.

We have not space here to give quotations from the Fathers or from our own divines, and from the Liturgy of our Church in corroboration of what has been said. Such proof will be found under the words PRIEST and REAL PRESENCE. Let one suffice, taken from the Apology of Justin Martyr. We quote from him because he is one of the earliest writers, and because there is no dispute about the authenticity of his book, and also because he cannot be accused of putting forth what are called very high views of Church doctrine. Not being himself a Priest, he taught what was generally received among Christians. Writing of the Communion, he says, "This food is called among us Eucharistia. . . . For not as common bread and common drink do we receive these; but in like manner as JESUS CHRIST our SAVIOUR, having been made flesh by the word of GOD, had both flesh and blood for our salvation, so likewise have we been taught that the food which is blessed by the prayer of His word, and from which our blood and flesh by transmutation are nourished, is the flesh and blood of that JESUS who was made flesh." (1 Apol., lxvi.)

Non-Communicating Attendance. — The Romish Church has made a separation between the two features of the Eucharist, allowing that Christians may assist at the sacrifice, and receive the full benefit of it, for the remission of sins, without partaking of the Consecrated Elements, i.e., Communion. And there has been a disposition shown of late among some of the Anglican Communion to teach the same thing. If what has been said above be correct as to the fulfillment in the LORD'S Supper of the discourse in Capernaum, and as to the analogy between the Passover and the Thank-offerings in the LORD'S Supper,—and they who hold the above views will not be likely to deny this,—then it would seem that such a separation is untenable. The Passover required the eating of the lamb, the Peace-offering also must be eaten. The Scriptures are very plain on this point. So also of the LORD'S Supper: "Take, eat;" "drink ye all of it," said our LORD. "As oft as ye eat this bread and drink this cup ye do show forth the LORD'S death till He Come." The Altar is one whereof we eat. The early Church knew no such doctrine; many passages might be quoted to show this, did space permit; let these suffice. St. Chrysostom, who will not be considered as taking a low view of the Holy Sacrament, reproves those who are present without communicating in strong language. "It was better that they should be absent, for they did but affront Him that invited them, whilst they stayed to sing the Hymn, professing themselves to be of the number of the worthy, whilst they did not recede with the unworthy. How could you stay and not partake of the table? I am unworthy, say you. If so, you are unworthy to communicate in prayers also." The Apostolic Canons, which are very early, command, "If any Bishop, Presbyter, or Deacon, or any other of the clergy, does not communicate when the oblation is offered, let him show cause why he does not." (Bingham.)

COMMUNION IN BOTH KINDS.

There is no dispute that this was the universal custom of the Early Church; following therein the Lord's example, who gave both the Bread and the Cup to all present. It was not until the twelfth century that any mention can be found of the denial of the cup to the Laity. The reason given at first was the danger of spilling any of the consecrated wine. Afterwards, when the doctrine of Transubstantiation was taught, it was withheld as unnecessary, inasmuch as each particle of the consecrated Bread contained the whole Christ, therefore the Blood as well as the Body. This was one of the grievances removed by the Reformation, and the Church rightly orders that the elements in both kinds shall be given to each Communicant. In the Greek Church both are given, but at the same time, the elements being mingled, the bread steeped in the wine, and so together placed with a spoon in the mouth of the recipient. It is defended on the ground of greater reverence in handling the sacred elements. But it is not in accordance with the original institution, and with proper care there is no danger of spilling the consecrated wine.

Rev. E. B. Boggs, D.D.

Louisiana, Diocese of. The history of the Church in the State of Louisiana presents her very largely in those ways that mark her at once as the banner-bearer of Protestantism, and the comprehensive organization of the Catholic Church must be of necessity.

The territory of Louisiana was acquired from France in 1804 A.D., and the transfer of sovereignty meant freedom from the restraint of public worship to the prescriptions of the Roman rite.

The Protestants of New Orleans met for consultation and organization June 2, 1805 A.D., at the boarding-house of Madame Fourage, on Bourbon Street. Among those present were such noted men as Benjamin Morgan, James M. Bradford, Richard Relf, John McDonough, James Brown, and Edward Livingston. On the 16th of June a vote was taken "to determine the religious denomination of the clergyman to be invited," and while forty-five votes were cast for an Episcopalian, only seven were given for a Presbyterian, and one for a Methodist.

For many years a French-speaking congregation of Huguenot extraction was in union with the Diocese.

The second Rector of Christ Church, New Orleans, was a Presbyterian minister when invited to that charge, and was ordained a Deacon two years thereafter.

Unfortunately, in after-years this important position was lost,—what was considered the inflexible rule of uniformity compelled the Bishop to permit the French congregation to drift away to the Presbyterians. The lack of sympathy in a period of distress on the part of more favored Dioceses turned the conflict from one of conquest to a losing struggle for existence.

Organization.—The Church in Louisiana, although planted as early as 1805 A.D., was not fully organized in its Diocesan character until 1841 A.D., or thirty-six years thereafter.

In this interval there was but small growth. Christ Church, New Orleans, was organized, as already stated, in 1805 A.D. Fifteen years later the Rev. William Bowman organized Grace Church, St. Francisville. A parish, St. James' Church, was incorporated at Baton Rouge in 1820 A.D., but the congregation were without a rector until 1839 A.D. In 1838 A.D. St. Paul's Church, New Orleans, was organized. These were the only churches, and they numbered together but one hundred and fifty communicants.

The first attempted Diocesan organization was in 1830 A.D., when a Convention was held for that purpose in New Orleans, under the presidency of the Rt. Rev. Dr. Brownell, Bishop of Connecticut. It was composed of the Rev. Messrs. Hull, Bowman, and Fox, and lay delegates from the churches in New Orleans and St. Francisville.

Before the General Convention met, however, in 1832 A.D., the organization was abandoned, and no application for admission was made. Provision for Episcopal government and services for the churches in Louisiana was, however, taken into consideration by that body, and a Canon enacted which authorized these churches to associate with the Dioceses of Mississippi and Alabama in the election of a Bishop.

A Convention was held under this Canon in New Orleans, March 4 and 5, 1835 A.D., in which the Dioceses of Mississippi and Alabama were properly represented, but Louisiana sent only lay representatives from Christ Church, New Orleans. This Convention organized a "Southwestern Diocese," and elected the Rev. Dr. Francis Lister Hawks Bishop.

The Bishop-elect declined, and no further Convention of this provincial organization was assembled.

Prior to its meeting, however, a Convention had met, January 20, 1835 A.D., composed of all the clergymen resident in Louisiana, and lay delegates from the churches in New Orleans and St. Francisville. This Convention organized a Diocese of Louisiana and made application for recognition to the General Convention. This, however, that body saw proper to refuse on the score, as stated, of the "divided counsels" that prevailed. This reference was undoubtedly to the election by the vestry of Christ Church, New Orleans, of delegates to the Convention that organized the Diocese of Louisiana, and then subsequently of others to that of the Southwestern Diocese, and thus there was a danger in the admission of Louisiana at that time of the presentation to the Church of two Bishops-elect with largely identical jurisdiction, to wit, the State of Louisiana.

Three years after this, April 28, 1838 A.D., another Convention met in New Orleans and organized a Diocese. This was the Primary Convention of the present Diocese. The members of it were the Rev. Dr. Wheaton, Rev. R. H. Ranney, Messrs. Richard Relf, Lucius Campbell Duncan, Thomas Butler, William D. Boyle, and William F. Brand.

The Diocese was admitted to union with the General Convention September 7, 1838 A.D.

The Diocesan Convention of 1839 A.D. placed the Diocese under the Episcopal charge of the Rt. Rev. Dr. Polk, who had a few months previously been consecrated Missionary Bishop of Arkansas.

The Diocese delegated to the General Convention of 1841 A.D. the election of a Diocesan, and that body thus empowered made choice of Bishop Polk.

The Episcopate of Bishop Polk.—The next chapter would sketch the history of twenty years, the term of the Episcopate of the first Bishop. And yet it may not be written in the few words that the limits of this article demand. Let it, then, suffice to summarize some of the results that those twenty fruitful years produced.

The Bishop found in Louisiana in 1841 A.D. four clergymen, of whom one was an instructor of youth, and two hundred and twenty-two communicants. He left a Diocese of forty parishes, six mission stations, and upwards of twenty other congregations under the ministry of his clergy, thirty-one clergymen and eighteen hundred and sixty-nine communicants.

During his Episcopate twenty-eight churches and a number of rectories were built, two thousand eight hundred and eighteen persons were baptized and three thousand one hundred and ninety-four confirmed, upwards of half a million dollars were contributed to Church purposes, and the ratio of communicants to total of population was raised from one in every fourteen hundred and eighty to one in every three hundred and seventy-nine.

The days of prosperity had an end. In 1861 A.D. the clouds of war lowered in all the heavens of the Southland, and ominous sounds alarmed even the dumbest ears. The call that came to the Bishop of Louisiana seemed to him as the very voice of the Chief Shepherd of all summoning him to defend the flock, no longer by pen and voice, but by the strength of his arm,—a commission in the army was tendered him, and he accepted it. Whatever opinion may be held by any one in respect to the propriety of such action, this much justice and a sense of right demand should be made of record, —in the acceptance of that commission Bishop Polk believed as firmly as he did of any other one act of his life that he was performing a solemn duty that he owed to his Diocese and to God.

We would not here extenuate our or his reasonings, but let the curtain drop upon the dreary thoughts as abruptly as the life of the Bishop ended when the cannon-ball rent his breast at Lone Mountain, Georgia, June 14, 1864 A.D.

We must, ere we close this chapter, however, look but once upon the face of the stricken Diocese. All scarred and torn she lay,—the clergy exiled by military order, the temples in many, many instances desecrated or most wantonly destroyed. She lay all cold and almost dead. Five years passed, and no Convention met or could meet. But succor came; kindly and fraternal hands lifted her up; aid came from those who had felt it a duty to crush her, as well as from those whose hearts had throbbed with her in a common cause, and she was bidden to live again.

The Episcopate of the Second Bishop.—The Convention of 1866 A.D. met May 16. The report showed but twenty-two parishes maintaining regular services, twenty clergymen, and 1556 communicants.

This Convention elected the Rev. Joseph Pere Bell Wilmer, D.D., Bishop, and he was consecrated the 7th of the following November.

Bishop Wilmer was the Diocesan for twelve years. During this time twenty-seven churches were built or purchased, five thousand persons were confirmed, twenty-one Deacons and twenty-two Priests were ordained, over nine thousand were baptized. The number of communicants was doubled, and upwards of eight hundred thousand dollars was given to Church purposes.

All this was accomplished with a very inadequate staff of clergy, and among a very poor people. Had the Bishop had his hands held up by a liberal support by the Church, there is little reason to doubt that the growth of the Diocese would have been phenomenal. The good, the wise, the faithful Bishop rested from his labors December 2, 1878 A.D.

The third and Present Episcopate.—The Diocesan Council having chosen the Rev. John Nicholas Galleher, S.T.D., Bishop, he was consecrated February 5, 1880 A.D. The result of his labors and that of his co-laborers may best be told in our concluding chapter, as that is to be of the present state of the Diocese.

A General Summary.—From the organization of the Diocese in 1838 A.D. to the meeting of the last Council, that of 1883 A.D., there have been reported 16,499 baptisms and 10,044 confirmations, and $1,676,711.10 contributed. The ratio of communicants to population was, in 1841 A.D., one to one thousand four hundred and eighty; in 1861 A.D., one to three hundred and seventy-nine; and in 1881 A.D., one to two hundred and sixty-four.

Among the clergy who have labored in Louisiana as Priests have been Bishops Philander Chase, Young, Pearce, Beckwith, Adams, Galleher, Harris, and Thompson; the Rev. Drs. Wheaton, Hawks, Wm. R. Nicholson, Neville, Crane, Fulton, Currie, and Lawson.

Among the laity prominent in her Councils have been many prominent in secular life.—John L. Lobdell, George S. Guion, William M. Goodrich, Dr. Wm. Newton Mercer, Dr. J. P. Davidson, James Saul (now a Priest), James Grimshaw, Henry Johnson, Lucius Campbell Duncan, Greer Brown Duncan, James McConnell, J. K. Dennett, Henry V. Ogden, General L. D. DeRussey, General Braxton Bragg, D. S. Cage, George Williamson, Jules A. Blanc, W. W. Howe, Robert Mott, Joseph P. Horner, Carleton Hunt, and George W. Race.

The Present State of the Diocese.—The Diocese now (1883 A.D.) has forty-three Parishes, seventeen Missions, and twelve Chapel congregations.* There are fifty-one church edifices and sixteen rectories. There is an Orphans' Home under a Sisterhood. The estimated value of church property is $624,250.

There are thirty-four clergymen, one Bishop, thirty Priests, and three Deacons, of whom six are without cure. There are 3946 communicants, and 2911 pupils in the Sunday-schools.

The baptisms for the three years last past have averaged 609; the confirmations, 399; the marriages, 164; the funerals, 309; and the contributions, $79,469.66.

There is but one Diocesan eleemosynary institution, the Children's Home of New Orleans.

The principal of invested funds of the Diocese amounts on account of support of the Episcopate to $18,540; superannuated clergy, $6740; and a small sum for widows and orphans of clergymen.

With the exception of four or five churches in New Orleans, that at Alexandria, and that at Shreveport, the Parishes are small, and most of them very feeble.

Probably in no better way could the condition of the Church in Louisiana be illustrated than by a reference to the average number of communicants, and the average amount of contributions for all purposes, and to clergy having cures in Louisiana and in the country at large respectively. In Louisiana there are on the average 146 communicants to each clergyman, and $2943.11 is contributed; while in the country generally the average is 124 communicants and $7905.92.

The clergy of Louisiana are noted, with very few exceptions, as earnest, faithful, successful men; but their number is altogether inadequate to the work required to be done. The above statistics furnish a hint, and of the unequaled burden that is put on them, and the truth of the assertion that the Diocese is waging a losing fight is clearly proven by the large number of doors of our churches closed, and the still greater number of the suspended and abandoned Missions. Fifteen Parishes vacant, nine Missions suspended, and fully as many abandoned! In the sugar-producing portion of the State the ground is being fairly well held for the Church, but not so in the pineries of the Florida Parishes, or in the territory north of the Red River.

The constant gains of the Church in all those portions of the State where her services are maintained, and the ever-increasing ratio of communicants to population, are eloquent prophecies of the possibilities of the Diocese being some day comprehensive, not only as it once was in respect to Protestantism, but also comprehensive in respect to those others who are now commonly called Catholics.

But of the future those must write whose eloquence is inspiring, and by those others who shall see the effects of the impetus that such cogent reasoning shall bring about.

REV. H. C. DUNCAN.

Low Sunday. The second Sunday after Easter, properly the octave of the first Sunday after Easter, is called Low Sunday, as it was an old custom to hold a second celebration of the solemnities of Easter-day. It was also called the Dominica in albis, for on this day those baptized on Easter-day laid aside their baptismal robes of white.

Luke, St., the beloved physician, the Evangelist and historian of the Apostolic Church. What his personal history was apart from the slight notices in St. Paul's Epistles and the inferences to be drawn from his own writings is wholly unknown. But what he has done for the Church in his Gospel and his book of the Acts is most invaluable. Tradition says he was a native of Antioch. Study of his style has led a recent student of his works to infer that he was employed as ship surgeon on some of the crowded merchantmen of the Levant, from his accurate and yet unprofessional use of nautical terms. He seems to come forward suddenly in the history of St. Paul, in Acts xvi. 10, where he begins to use the pronoun "we"; of course this implies a previous acquaintance with St. Paul. He was (if the use of "we" is a sure indication of it) with the Apostle at Troas, and passed with him into Macedonia. Here he was probably left behind, since onward the record of the remainder of St. Paul's work in this journey is in the third person plural, "they." He rejoined him apparently at Philippi, where he had been left seven years before. Thenceforth he is the Apostle's constant companion. Is he the brother whose praise is in the Gospel throughout all the Churches? If so, he is sent by St. Paul on an errand to Corinth with Titus, because he had already shown his ability in evangelizing work. He was most probably with the Apostle to the end. His skill as physician was doubtless invaluable to the wearied Paul, the aged. This is really all we know of the holy Evangelist. He does not name himself in either of his two works. It is only the Apostle who speaks of him, "Only Luke is with me," "Luke, the beloved physician."

Luke, St., Gospel of. This Gospel is undoubtedly his, if any faith can be put in consentient tradition. It is beyond question that the author of the Acts must be the writer of the Gospel also. The connection between the two books, the Gospel beginning and the Acts continuing the history of what JESUS both began to do and to teach, the similarity of style, the accuracy and simplicity, and purity of diction all prove this. The Gospel is first certainly quoted by Justin Martyr (before 168 A.D.) in the Muratorian Fragment on the Canon (170 A.D.). It was used and mutilated by Marcion (140 A.D.). Later references to it need not be referred to. "St. Luke wrote in Greece for the Hellenic world. In style this Gospel is the purest, in order the most artistic and historical. It forms the first half of a great narrative, which traced the advance of Christianity from Jerusalem to Antioch, to Macedonia, to Achaia, to Ephesus, to Rome. Hence it neither leans to the learnings of the past, nor is it absorbed in the glories of the present, but is written with special reference to the aspirations of the future. It sets forth JESUS to us neither as the Messiah of the Jews only nor as the Universal Ruler, but as the Saviour of sinners. It is a Gospel not national but cosmopolitan, not regal but human. It is the Gospel for the world: it connects Christianity with man. Hence the genealogy of JESUS is traced not only to David and to Abraham, but to Adam and to GOD." (Farrar's St. Luke, Cam. Bible for Schools.) It is the first Christian hymnology, for it contains the Gloria in Excelsis, the Benedictus, the Magnificat, the Nunc Dimittis. It is the Gospel of Thanksgiving, seven times is "glorifying GOD" mentioned. It is the Gospel of Prayer, not only the LORD's Prayer, but six occasions on which He prayed are recorded, and the words in three cases,—in the Garden, when nailed to the Cross, upon the Cross. It is the Gospel of the Good Tidings of pity, and pardon, and grace. It is the Gospel of the outcast, the publican, harlot, prodigal, and Samaritan. It is the Gospel of tolerance. (Condensed from Farrar.) It contains much not found in the other Gospels, as six miracles and eleven parables, besides many slight but notable incidental remarks, and some facts in the history of our LORD's Passion. It is an inspired record of facts, not of theories or tendencies. It was written before the destruction of Jerusalem, and before the Acts also, which probably were composed while St. Luke was with St. Paul in his own hired house in Rome. If any interval lies between the dates of the two writings, then it is probable that the Gospel was written at Cæsarea during St. Paul's imprisonment there (58-60 A.D.), and then the old tradition that it was written for the use of the converts St. Paul made has much truth in it. The Evangelist describes things and places in Judæa which a Gentile could not well know about. And too, the universality of the Gospel would come well from one who was St. Paul's attendant and companion.

Maccabees, Books of. The record of the noble defense which the great-grandsons of Chasmon, of the noble priestly family of Jehoiarib, maintained against the Seleucidæ. It began in a resistance made by Mattathias to the effort of Antiochus Epiphanes to force idolatrous sacrifices upon the Jews. Mattathias slew two men who consented to sacrifice, fled to the mountains, and from thence began a successful guerrilla warfare. The struggle was taken up on a larger scale by his sons, who in this order took the leadership: Judas, his third son, "THE MACCABEE," who so extended his resources and won such important victories that finally he was able to strengthen himself with an alliance with the Romans. He fell in the passes of Eleasa, and Jonathan, the fifth son, took the command. His wary conduct, and skill and diplomacy, gave him the title of Apphæes (wary), but he too fell, but by treachery, and after imprisonment. Simon, the second son, placed himself at the head of the patriot party. He was able by allying himself to Demetrius II. to gain the recognition of the independence of the Jews, which led to his full occupation of Jerusalem. His death was through treachery, but his son, Johannes Hyrcanus, displayed the same genius for government his father possessed, and maintained the kingly power the father had won. They began with a handful of patriots, they left a nation welded together by bitter reverse and by glorious victory. They gave that form and character to the Jewish people that they showed in our LORD's day. Their work in relation to the later form of Jewish polity was as important as the work of Samuel, of Saul, and of David. The Books which are almost our sole record for this noble achievement are, chronologically, the III., II.,

IV., I. But they frequently are imperfect in details and incorrect in formal facts, and the third book is most probably a rhetorical "adaptation" of some fact. It is hardly historical. But despite these drawbacks the books are very valuable for the Jewish history after Malachi. The Books are not canonical, though the first two being in the Vulgate are so received by the Roman Church. But if the test of absolute literal accuracy be applied to them as to the inspired books, they must be rejected.

Macedonians. A heretical party which denied the divinity of the HOLY GHOST. It was propagated by Macedonius, who had been violently placed in the See of Constantinople. Macedonius was a semi-Arian, and so rejected by the Church, but the Emperor Constantine placed him in the office (343 A. D.), but (in 350 A. D.) Macedonius seemed willing to accept the Nicene definition, but started the error of denying the Divine Nature of the HOLY GHOST. It was to meet this heresy that the latter clauses were added to the Nicene Creed, after the words and I believe in the HOLY GHOST, "the LORD and Giver of life, who proceedeth from the FATHER, who with the FATHER and the SON together is worshiped and glorified, who spake by the prophets." They had been already in local use, but were now added to the Creed (381 A. D.). The denial that the HOLY GHOST was of the Divine Substance, and therefore Very GOD, was held with many varying shades of opinion, but however that might be among themselves, the Macedonians, holding to their error, went out of the Church.

Magi. The wise men who appeared at Jerusalem at the birth of our LORD (St. Matt. ii. 1). It was the name given by the Greeks to the priests of the Zoroastrian doctrine, which taught a pure Monotheism. It occurs as a word in the name Rab-mag in the Old Testament, and it was of probably the order of men who bore it that Daniel was made a fellow and afterwards the master (Dan. ii. 2, 13, 48), though the word is not applied to them. They could not have been teachers of directly false doctrine, or Daniel would not have interceded for them, nor would he have consented to become a member of their body. The straightforward simplicity and directness of the narrative in St. Matthew stamps it with the truthfulness that must belong to the inspired narrative. The representatives of the ancient Monotheism of the Gentiles come to do homage to the SON of GOD, born king of the Jews. It may be that there was also a survival among them of the prophecy of Balaam: "There shall come a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall rise out of Israel." A loving study of the symbolism of the threefold gifts these wise men presented finds in the offering of gold the acknowledgment of His Royalty; in that of frankincense, the acknowledgment of His Divine Nature; and in that of myrrh, so often used at funerals, the type of the bitterness of human life, and the acknowledgment that He is as yet born a mortal. They stand forth for the Gentiles in owning Him as their King, and as suddenly vanish as Melchisedec emerges, the Gentile Priest and king before GOD, who as suddenly sinks back into the silence of Scripture. When the Magi made their visit—whether, as the narrative in St. Matthew naturally leads us to believe, immediately after His birth or later—we cannot certainly know.

Magnificat. The Hymn of the Blessed Virgin (St. Luke i. 46) upon the occasion of her visit to her cousin Elizabeth. It is appointed to be sung as the alternate anthem after the Second Lesson at Evening Prayer in the English Prayer-Book, and is allowed as an anthem for our own American Service.

Maine. The first service of the Church of England in what is now the State of Maine was celebrated on St. George's Island in the Kennebec, on Sunday, August 9, 1607 (O.S.), by the Rev. Richard Seymour, Chaplain of the Popham Colony of that year.* In October following, a church was built on the mainland near by; but all ended with the failure of the colony in the following year.

With the Proprietary Government of Sir Ferdinando Gorges in 1636 A. D., at Winter Harbor on the Saco River, came the second Church clergyman, the Rev. Richard Gibson, who fixed his residence at Richmondi Island, off Cape Elizabeth, but officiated also at Saco, and Portsmouth, N. H. A church was built in each of these places, and that on Richmondi Island was supplied with altarpiece and other requisites by the proprietor, Robert Trelawny, of Plymouth, England. At Saco the "minister's rates" amounted to £31 15s. quarterly, or nearly $600 a year, a large sum for the time and place. Mr. Gibson, who is described as "a good scholar,† and highly esteemed as a minister," fell under the censure of Puritan Massachusetts in 1642 A. D., for officiating within her pretended jurisdiction; as did his successor, the Rev. Robert Jordan, who from 1640 A. D. till his death, in 1679 A. D., contended nearly single-handed against the growing power of that colony, officiating at Saco, Scarborough, and Falmouth (now Portland), in all which places the early colonists were Churchmen; and three times at least committed to prison for baptizing and marrying without Puritan license.‡ From his time, under Massachusetts rule, the services of the Church were suspended for eighty years, except that we find a lay-reader at the garrison at Pemaquid in 1683-88 A.D.

In 1756 A.D. the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts sent out their first missionary, the Rev. Mr. MacClenachan, to Fort Richmond on the Kennebec. He remained but two years, and was succeeded in 1760 A.D. by the Rev. Jacob Bailey (of Harvard, 1755 A.D.), who ten years later had a church and parsonage built at Pownalboro', but officiated from the first not only there, but at Sheepscoot, Harpswell, Damariscotta, and Georgetown, until relieved of part of his wide field by the Rev. Millard Wheeler, appointed to Georgetown in 1768 A.D. Churches were built at this place (now Bath) and Kittery, and, it is said, at Gardiner. A number of the inhabitants of Falmouth had meanwhile, in 1764 A.D., organized St. Paul's Church, whose first minister, the Rev. John Niswall (Harvard, 1749 A.D.), received an aid of £20 from the S. P. G. The Revolution drove away all these missionaries, and it was not until 1793 A.D. that services were resumed in Gardiner by the Rev. Joseph Warren, succeeded in 1796 A.D. by the Rev. James Bowers, in 1803 A.D. by the Rev. Samuel Haskell, and in 1817 A.D., after eight years' vacancy, by the Rev. Gideon W. Olney. At Portland, Edward Oxuad was lay-reader for some years; Mr. Warren took charge in 1796 A.D., removing from Gardiner; the Rev. Timothy Hilliard in 1803 A.D., for three years, and the Rev. Petrus S. Ten Broeck in 1819 A.D. Maine was included in the Diocese of Massachusetts at its organization in 1790 A.D., and represented in its Convention in 1791 and 1796 A.D., but had no Episcopal visitation earlier than about 1814 A.D., and no officiating clergyman for some years before 1817 A.D.

In 1820 A.D. the "District of Maine" became a State, and immediate steps were taken by Bishop Griswold to organize the present Diocese, whose first Convention of two clergymen and lay deputies from two Parishes met at Brunswick, May 3, 1820 A.D. Simon Greenleaf, Robert H. Gardiner, and Dr. John Merrill were the leading members of this Convention, and for many years the leading laymen of the Diocese; the two former, with the Rev. Messrs. Olney and Ten Broeck, were the first Standing Committee, and Dr. Merrill the first Secretary. Maine remained a part of the New England Confederation known as "the Eastern Diocese" until Bishop Griswold's death, in 1843 A.D., from which time to 1847 A.D. it was under the jurisdiction of Bishop Henshaw, of Rhode Island. At the organization the State had a population of 298,335, of whom there were probably not one hundred communicants of the Church.

In 1824 A.D. was formed the "Maine Episcopal Missionary Society," which, incorporated in 1835 A.D. and 1875 A.D., has directed all the missionary work of the Diocese to this time. Its first effort was the founding of Trinity Church, Saco, in 1827 A.D., the third Parish in the State; and its first missionary was the late Rev. Dr. E. M. P. Wells, of Boston, "at a stipend not exceeding eight dollars a week." But the first "settled minister" of Saco was the present Bishop of New York, Horatio Potter, 1827-28 A.D. St. Mark's Church, Augusta, and St. John's, Bangor, were organized in 1834 A.D.; St. Paul's, Brunswick, in 1844 A.D.; and St. James', Oldtown, in 1847 A.D.; and these, with St. Paul's (and organized in 1839 A.D. as St. Stephen's), Portland, Christ Church, Gardiner,* and Trinity, Saco, were the seven parishes which, with their seven Priests and a Deacon residing in Massachusetts, met and unanimously elected George Burgess, then Rector of Christ Church, Hartford, Conn., as the first Bishop of Maine.

With his consecration, October 31, 1847 A.D., began a new era for the Diocese. Bishop Burgess was a man of rare intellectual and spiritual gifts; and in energy, patience, prudence, and gentleness singularly adapted to the great work of his Episcopate, the removal of the wall of prejudice with which centuries of Puritanism had hedged round the Church, and the making an opening for its entrance and growth where it had been up to this time utterly unknown. Under his leadership the parishes of the Diocese increased to 19, the clergy to 17, communicants to 1600, missionary offerings to $1571; and throughout the State the Church had become more or less known, and respected wherever it was known. In the small band of able and faithful clergymen who shared his labors were such as Bishops Southgate, Paddock, Armitage, Perry, Niles, and Alexander Burgess, Drs. Gardiner, Goodwin, Haskins, Cotton Smith, D. C. Weston, R. S. and H. R. Howard, and Ballard.

Bishop Burgess died April 23, 1866 A.D., and the Diocese elected as his successor the Rev. Henry Adams Neely, D.D., of New York (b. 1830 A.D.; Hobart College; 1849 A.D.), who was consecrated in Trinity Chapel, January 25, 1867 A.D., and took up his residence at Portland, becoming Rector of St. Luke's Church. In the same year the corner-stone of a Cathedral church was laid (August 15); the nave, aisles, and chancel, of stone, 130 feet by 60, were completed and occupied on Christmas-day, 1868 A.D.; and on St. Luke's day, 1877 A.D., the whole cost of the structure thus far ($125,000) having been paid by the congregation, largely aided by Churchmen in other Dioceses, the Cathedral was consecrated with imposing services, in which nine Bishops and clergymen from twenty-five Dioceses took part. The church, one of the noblest and most substantial in New England, is the property of the Diocese, held by the "Cathedral Chapter," incorporated by the Legislature; forever free, with daily service and weekly communion, and a simple but dignified and impressive ritual; the Bishop being ex-officio Rector and Dean, assisted by resident Canons* elected by the people, and honorary Canons chosen by the Diocese, both on his nomination. It is yearly more and more a centre for all Diocesan work, and a most important instrument in the extension of the Church throughout the State. A substantial Bishop's House, also the property of the Diocese and adjoining the Cathedral, was erected in 1869 A.D., and there is also an Episcopate fund of about $16,000.

* Whose fine old stone church was erected by Robert H. Gardiner in 1820 A.D. Bishop Burgess was rector of this parish during his Episcopate. There was no fund for the support of a Bishop, and his nominal salary from the Diocese ($200) was bequeathed by him, with an additional sum, making $7000 in all, for this purpose.

Bishop Neely's Episcopate has been noted thus far, first, for the extension of the Church in the vast thinly settled northern and eastern parts of the State, by means of missions with a simple organization, but not incorporated as Parishes, being thus wholly under the control of the Diocese. These now constitute nearly one-half of the congregations, and have much more than doubled the places of regular or frequent services. A remarkable infirmity work has been done in Aroostook (a county nearly as large as Massachusetts) by the Rev. W. H. Washburn, who has since built a noble stone church at the great manufacturing centre of Lewiston. Like all poor and frontier Dioceses, Maine suffers from constant changes among its clergy; but one now antedating Bishop Neely's time, Mr. Dalton, of Portland, and three others (Canons Washburn, Leffingwell, and Pyne) of ten years' residence. The Diocese now numbers 26 clergy, 37 Parishes and missions, and about 2200 communicants, having gained in these last twelvefold on the population of the State since 1820 A.D. Growth is and must always be slow; but it has maintained an honorable record under its present Bishop in the zeal, unity, and efficiency of its clergy,† and the earnestness and liberality of many of its laity. For many years a nominally "Low-Church" Diocese, it became strong in Church principles before Bishop Burgess's death, and has grown since in every element of Churchly character.

The second notable feature of Bishop Neely's Episcopate is the successful establishment of an excellent Diocesan school for girls, St. Catharine's Hall, Augusta, in 1868 A.D., which has done a great work already in spreading a knowledge and love of Church teaching and services in many parts of the State. A second Church school with a good property and large promise of efficiency is about beginning in Aroostook County.

REV. C. W. HAYES.

Malachi. The Prophet whose book closes the Canon of the Old Testament. Since his name means "My Messenger," some eminent later commentators have doubted whether there was any man who bore this name, and translate, "The burden of the word of the Lord to Israel by My Messenger" (cf. ch. iii. 1), since there is no mention of his father's name. But this mode of giving only the name occurs also in the case of Obadiah. Some early commentators, as well as the Septuagint translators, have supposed that it was a record by an angel; and some Jewish writers, admitting that Malachi was not a name, but should be translated My Messenger, claimed the work for Ezra. But these assertions are worthless, and arise from pushing the allegorizing of Holy Scripture to extremity. The contents of the book show that it was the work of a prophet whose mission was to aid in the reforms of the second governorship of Nehemiah (Neh. xiii. 15; 29; cf. Mal. ii. 8, and Neh. xiii. 23-27; Mal. ii. 10, and Neh. xiii. 10; Mal. iii. 7-10, the subjects being identical).

It is a short prophecy of only four sections, the first section extending from i. 1 to vs. 5; the second from i. 6 to ii. 9; the third from ii. 10 to vs. 16; the fourth, ii. 17 to end. Its form is peculiar, each section being opened with an assertion of a claim by God through His Prophet and a reply: How have we refused this claim? with the Prophet's answer. It contains one of the most distinct Messianic prophecies in ch. iii. 1, and in ch. iv. 2, and a prophecy of St. John Baptist in ch. iii. 1, and in ch. iv. 5. The book closes with this prophecy of the Forerunner of CHRIST.

Man. The peculiar constitution of man as the only member of the animal creation endowed with religious sense and moral responsibility, his unique and complex relations on the one hand to God and on the other to the lower animals, and the overwhelming importance of the mere fact of his being combine to make the study of all that pertains to him a matter of the most absorbing interest. That he is the head and crown of a regular series of life-possessing and sentient creatures, rising in a steadily developing ascent from the simplest conceivable forms, is clearly evident; but it is equally evident that he is something more, since however nearly he is approached in physical and mental constitution by the higher groups of this series, he exhibits, even in his lowest developments, the evidences of a totally different nature of which they show no trace. The recognition of this fact and its significance is the simple solution of all the difficulties surrounding the subject. Possessing this dual nature, and bearing a double relationship to the life of this world and to another life beyond it, we cannot expect either nature or revelation alone to open to us his whole history, for nature can teach us only that part of it which belongs to nature, and revelation treats only of those facts and truths which nature cannot possibly make known. The scientist who refuses to study revelation must of necessity know man only as a higher animal, while the believer who seeks all his knowledge from the Bible must also reach only partial results. From these mistakes have arisen all the confusion and mutual misunderstanding, deepened by the frequent confounding of Miltonic fancies with Bible teachings and by interpretations of Scriptural statements equally unwarrantable and untenable. A brief examination and summing up of these two lines of investigation is all that can be given here. Science discovers that all vertebrate animals are constructed physically upon the same model, every part being represented and performing an analogous function in each, but better adapted to the needs of the creature as the scale rises, until in man the nearest approach to perfection is reached. Every organ, tissue, function, and appetite has its analogue throughout the series, and these analogies are traceable to a great extent even far into the vegetable kingdom.

The same progressive series is observable in mental constitution, certain instincts being always present, as, e.g., self-preservation, self-nourishment, and reproduction. In the higher anthropoid apes the resemblance to man in these particulars is startling, and yet between the highest of these forms and the lowest development of humanity the differences are so essential that no bone of a chimpanzee could possibly be mistaken for that of a man, while no lower animal has ever articulated language or used fire. Still, the approach is so suggestive that geological researches have been prosecuted with a special view to discovering a missing link between the brute and human forms. This search has at length been undoubtedly rewarded by the recent discovery of fossil human remains at Abbeville and Mentone in France, the bone-caves of England and elsewhere. Flint implements and weapons have also been found belonging, probably, to the quaternary period. But all with this remarkable result, that the man who was contemporary with the mammoth and other long extinct creatures in Europe was even more human in his type than the man of to-day. Thus the skeleton discovered at Mentone exhibits more distinctive human characteristics than the bones of modern man. There were gigantic and diminutive tribes exactly as now, and under similar circumstances. Thus the four-foot skeletons found in France are associated with remains of the reindeer, just as the dwarfish Lapps are to-day. Man then also practiced rude arts and used fire, implements and charred bones being found. This is absolutely all that science has discovered. Man was undoubtedly on earth long before the beginning assigned him by the accepted

Bible chronology, and the earliest man was a higher type, physically and intellectually, than the Bushman or Papuan of to-day. Now let us look at the Scripture record. In the first chapter of Genesis we find a general statement of the fact of the creation by God of the earth and all that live upon it, including man. It is a brief and condensed but complete record, with no hint even as to chronology, or as to the method of creation.

In reference to all the lower animals, "Let the earth bring forth" is the formula. The only fact insisted on is the creation by God. But in the case of man there is a significant difference. The formula is omitted. He is created by special purpose and "in the image of God," and he is created "male and female." He is also invested with controlling power and authority. All this is conjoined and much light cast on it by the above-mentioned scientific discoveries. In the second chapter we are told how something was superadded to his mere animal nature,—i.e., "the breath of life," and he "became a living soul." Then follows a condensed history, to be gathered out of the Scripture narrative, wonderfully according with scientific discovery and historic observation, of his progressive development. Language begins as with the child, by naming objects. The institution of Marriage originates the Family. Man first appears naked, and clothes himself as his mind develops; his first religious ideas are anthropomorphic. Animal sacrifice and the use (apparently) of fire come only with the second generation. So with building. Prayer is mentioned (Seth) still farther on. In the second chapter man eats what the earth naturally produces; in the third chapter he tills the ground; in the fourth chapter he adopts the pastoral life and becomes a rude artificer; in the sixth chapter the deluge develops rude but efficient ideas of navigation, and religion has assumed a very high form; in the ninth chapter man becomes a skilled husbandman, cultivates the vine and discovers the use of wine; in the tenth and eleventh chapters he becomes a hunter, language differentiates and nations begin to organize. Thence on we learn all of his religious life, his immortal nature and destiny. St. Paul (1 Thess. v. 23) alludes to man's tripartite constitution,—"pneuma," life or spirit; "psyche," soul; "soma," body. He is the highest of the animal kingdom, with "soul," the "breath of God," superadded. He is the last and best of the earthly series of living creatures, and as such only can science deal with him. But he is the first and lowest of a heavenly series, and as such we must study him by the light of God's word. But there is more even than this. His lower nature, that of body and spirit, was made from the dust of the earth which "brought forth," at God's command, all his earthly fellow-creatures; but his higher nature is of Divine origin, "the breath of life" breathed into his bodily frame by God Himself. Thus early was his being differentiated from all the lower orders of creation, and later on the Divine character of that higher nature was made complete by its indissoluble union with God in the Incarnation of the CHRIST. No one who believes this has ever questioned its retroactive efficacy. "For as in Adam all die, even so in CHRIST shall all be made alive." So would it be, then, with the inbreathing of the breath of life, if man had existed for a time as a living, but soulless creature.

We have thus briefly seen how the dual revelation of nature and Holy Scripture is at harmony in itself. It is but one Truth of God, the parts of which cannot antagonize each other. The history of man as given in the Bible must be studied with the help of all practicable scientific investigation, and the discoveries of science must be supplemented by the teaching of God's word, and thus alone can be obtained a full, accurate, and complete knowledge of the origin, history, nature, and destiny of man and his status in the scale of God's creation.

REV. ROBERT WILSON, D.D.

Manasseh, Prayer of. In the Apocrypha there is a short composition of fifteen verses called by the name of the evil king of Judah, whose prayer on his repentance is referred to in 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11-13: "Wherefore the LORD brought upon them the captains of the Host of the King of Assyria, which took Manasseh among the thorns, and bound him with fetters, and carried him to Babylon. And when he was in affliction, he besought the LORD his God, and humbled himself greatly before the GOD of his fathers, and prayed unto Him; and He was entreated of him, and heard his supplication, and brought him again to Jerusalem into his kingdom. Then Manasseh knew that the LORD He was God." The prayer in the Apocrypha is of course spurious, though it is itself filled with a touching supplicatory tone. The deep repentance in it implies a knowledge of the true spirit of sorrow that worketh life. It was probably the work of some devout Alexandrian Jew of the same school with the son of Sirach,—though probably living nearer the time of Philo.

Maniple. Properly, a handkerchief. It was hung upon the left arm of the priest, and used to wipe away the perspiration from his face. But it soon began to be enriched with broidery and a fringe which unfitted it for its true purpose and made it a mere ornament.

Manse. The old name for the ecclesiastical residence (mansio). It is still retained in Scotland and in some places in this country as the name for the rectory.

Maranatha. A word added by St. Paul (1 Cor. xvi. 22) to the word Anathema. It means the "LORD COMETH," and makes the preceding word anathema emphatic. The word has been, however, disconnected from the adjoining phrase by some, and made to have the force of a watch-word that St. Paul gave the Corinthians.

Mark, St., the Evangelist. His mother's name was Mary, who had a house in Jerusalem (Acts xii. 12). He was cousin to St. Barnabas, and was probably from the first intimate with St. Peter (Acts xii. 12). The next notice of him is (Acts xii. 25) where he is the companion of SS. Barnabas and Paul, in their return from Jerusalem to Antioch. He was their attendant on their first missionary journey (48 A.D.), was present at the conversion of Paulus Sergius, and went with the Apostles as far as Perga in Pamphylia (Acts xiii. 13), but shrunk from the further perils of their journey. His shrinking, from whatever cause, led afterwards (51 A.D.), to the sharp contention between the two Apostles, and Barnabas took Mark with him to Cyprus, while St. Paul went with Silas on his visit to the Churches of Syria and Cilicia (Acts xv. 39-41). But the Apostle's harsh judgment of him was softened, for we find him mentioned thrice by St. Paul. He was one of the few fellow-workers unto the Kingdom of God who had been a comfort to the Apostle,—and he was now with him in his first imprisonment (61-63 A.D.). He is mentioned twice again by the Apostle, once in his letter to Philemon, and in the Second Epistle to Timothy, where St. Paul says that he was "profitable to him for the ministry" (2 Tim. iv. 11). In the interval between these two notices St. Mark had probably joined St. Peter in his work at Babylon. (Vide ST. PETER.) In 1 Pet. v. 13, St. Peter writes, "The Church which is at Babylon, elected together with you, saluteth you; and so doth Marcus my son." These are the only notices we can gather from Holy Scripture. The tradition of the Church affirms that St. Mark visited Egypt and founded the Church at Alexandria, where he was martyred. All other notices are untrustworthy, and often mutually destructive.

Mark, St., Gospel of. St. Mark's Gospel has been the field for much singular speculation. St. Matthew's and St. Luke's Gospels are, like this, more rigidly narratives. The three have many points, both of facts and in language, in common, while there are also marked dissimilarities. It has, therefore, been claimed that one, and most probably St. Mark's Gospel, was the original, and that the others followed it, and broidered upon it such other facts as they witnessed or were accurately cognizant of. An attempt has been made even to reconstruct the original (?) Gospel, which refutes itself by its absurdity. But a short statement of the contents of this Gospel will best show its real independence. The date is uncertain, but probably not before 63 A.D., and, since it predicts the fall of Jerusalem, not later than 70 A.D. The tradition of the Church and the contents of the Gospel show that it was intended for Roman Gentile converts, for it does not quote the Jewish Law; it explains Syrian and Hebrew words and Jewish usages, and it uses Grecized Latin terms. It would, therefore, be most naturally written in Greek, as the most universally known language. As the kinsman of St. Barnabas, and the son of that Mary to whose house St. Peter went as to an accustomed home, when delivered from prison by the Angel, St. Mark was naturally in the reach of authentic information; but, besides, he seems to have been an eye-witness, not merely the recorder or amanuensis for St. Peter, as has been inferred from the tradition that he was the interpreter for St. Peter. Doubtless some of the vivid descriptions came from the Apostle, but there are phrases used which imply a personal knowledge. The Evangelist strikes at once and boldly the opening chord, "The beginning of the Gospel of JESUS CHRIST, the Son of God." No genealogy, no details of His human birth. The next verse binds the Gospel, as the fulfilled conclusion, to the prophecy of eight full centuries before. It begins then to bring forward repentance, baptism, and daily trial, culminating in the Passion, and then the Immortal life of the Eternal Son of God. It is characteristic of St. Mark that he brings forward the true manliness of our LORD. Not that the other Evangelists do not do it also, but hardly in so prominent a way; for it is true that each presents all the traits of the wonderful Life, but selects naturally those by which he would himself be attracted. Our LORD's love, pity, compassion, wonder, anger, indignation, St. Mark dwells upon in his own emphatic way. So, too, he brings our LORD's person vividly before us in His looking round upon the multitude, His taking little children in His arms, putting His hands upon them and blessing them. He goes before the disciples, and they follow in amazement. His very words, as, for example, Boanerges, Talitha-cumi, Ephphatha, are recorded in special cases. St. Mark, too, notes the awe and the wonder of both multitudes and disciples, and their eagerness to be about their LORD. He is minute in noting time, place, person, and number. His details are those that would come from a person who was on the spot. He mentions the hired servants in Zebedee's employ; the LORD's resting asleep on a pillow in the storm; the green grass whereon the multitude sat; the running of the rich young man; the name of the blind Bartimæus; the place where the two disciples who were sent found the colt tied; the young man in the garden at the arrest. These things, and they might be largely increased, not only show how minute and accurate, but how independent a writer St. Mark was, though he often reproduces the same language that St. Matthew used. That he repeated what others had said is not against his own veracity or real independence. "Repetition is by no means derogatory to the dignity of the HOLY SPIRIT. On the contrary, it is one of the characteristics of inspiration." (Wordsworth, Intro. St. Mark.) The last verses of the Gospel (ch. xvi. 9-19) have been rejected recently by many scholars, chiefly because they are wanting in the Vatican and the Sinaitic MSS. But they are found in three of the four Uncial MSS. (A, C, D), and are quoted without suspicion by Irenæus. Their genuineness is defended by many equally skilled scholars and cannot be reasonably doubted, since the weight of evidence is in their favor.

Marriage. Vide MATRIMONY.

Martinmas. A festival in honor of the famous Martin, Bishop of Tours. He was a native of Pannonia and bred a soldier, but entering the Church, he was made Bishop 374 A.D., and after a very active and munificent Episcopate, distinguished for his zeal in destroying the heathen altars still remaining, he died 400 A.D. His name was held in great reverence in France. The feast was appointed upon the 11th of November. (See the Calendar of the English Prayer-Book.)

Martyr. A witness; then a witness to the Christian faith, and then one who seals his faith with his death. This witness was in a sense official, as every one who bears the Christian name ought to bear witness to the truth of the Faith he professes. It at first did not necessarily imply that death was a part of this act, but soon this distinction was drawn between the Martyr and the Confessor; but the mode or the circumstances of this suffering did not affect the title,—e.g., whether the Martyr suffered in a riot or by form of heathen Law. From this generally admitted rule was derived another claim to the name of Martyr for those who died from the indirect consequences of Persecution. The Church did not at all encourage the headlong zeal of those who would rush into danger, and looked with kindness on those who justly and fairly avoided martyrdom, proving their constancy in other ways. So St. Cyprian retired from Carthage in two Persecutions, for the Church needed him, but at a third Persecution he surrendered himself, and the Church has always commended his conduct. Hence those who sought martyrdom, or who rashly incurred danger, as by breaking idols or by vehement conduct, were refused the name, though they may have suffered bravely. The Church was exceedingly careful that the honor of martyrdom should not be carelessly attributed to those whose conduct was in any way blamable. There were dangers enough without adding this peril, since the Christian religion was legally forbidden.

It may be well to add that in its essential point of bearing witness, Martyrdom can never cease so long as evil exists and there are men to mock, sneer, and flout at things sacred. Not only is Augustine's sentence true, "You will go hence a Martyr if you have overcome all temptations of the devil" (Serm. iv., c. 4), but there is a patient courage, a readiness to bear our witness against evil, and for the truth and the whole truth needed, which is as truly a martyrdom as though it were borne amid bodily tortures, and one which demands a yet finer and more enduring courage.

Martyrology. The List containing the names of the Martyrs, whether of a city or of a Diocese. The earliest traces of such lists are found in allusions to them in Tertullian (De Corona, § 13), in Cyprian (Ep. 39, al. 34). A century later we find a singular Calendar which contains the Dominical and Nundinal letters, a cycle for Easter, and, among other matter of a pagan and secular character, a List of the funeral days of the Popes of the past century, and a List of the funeral days of the Martyrs. Its date is 364 A.D. The study of the various Martyrologies (which differed in the several localities to which they belonged) is of considerable interest and value for determining dates of lesser importance. The more valuable Martyrologies were The Syriac, which was dated as early as 412 A.D.; The Hieronymian, attributed to St. Jerome, and certainly earlier than 596 A.D., but most probably founded upon other and widely differing materials; The Lesser Roman Martyrology, which probably belonged to about 700 A.D., and was found in Ravenna 850 A.D. Later works than these Martyrologies are not so trustworthy (and in fact these have many interpolations), but become more numerous as the calendars of the Churches were changed or reformed. Besides, there are several metrical Martyrologies in imitation of the Greek menologies. The English Church while it has noble martyrs has no Martyrology. Bede's Calendar is the basis, with many modifications, of what scanty remains of Black-letter Saints' days the Reformers chose to retain of the fuller and not always authentic festivals of the Pre-reformation period.

Mary. A name borne by five women in the New Testament,—i.e., Mary (the wife of) Cleophas, Mary Magdalene, Mary the mother of Mark, Mary a helper of St. Paul (Rom. xvi. 6), and the Blessed Virgin Mary, or as she is called in the Prayer-Book, St. Mary the Virgin. The name is the same as the Hebrew Miriam. The only authentic notices of her are those in the New Testament, all beside is purely legendary. She appears suddenly without any previous hint about her in the Gospels. Whether she was a cousin of her husband Joseph, and her genealogy that given by St. Luke, as has been conjectured with but little ground for credence, cannot be proven. We know that she was of the tribe of Judah, and that she was a cousin of Elizabeth, the mother of St. John the Baptist, and was a resident at Nazareth, when she was the betrothed of St. Joseph.

It was in the year 5 B.C. (according to undoubted correction of the current date) that the Angel Gabriel appeared before her, and with a salutation akin to the salutation given to holy women before, but which had a far deeper meaning for the whole human race, he announced to her the glorious grace reserved for her,—to become the Mother of the MESSIAH. Her humble reverent acceptance, "Behold the hand-maiden of the LORD, be it unto me according to thy word," is a key to her whole character. She visited her cousin Elizabeth soon after, and upon that occasion uttered the beautiful hymn—the Magnificat—which, whether uttered without premeditation or precomposed, shows an intimate knowledge of the sacred writings of the Old Testament, for some of its phrases, and its tone certainly, are drawn from the older historical books, and in form, rhythm, and phrase it is founded upon the Psalms. Suspected of unchastity, but defended by the Vision to St. Joseph, she is taken by her husband to Bethlehem, the seat of the House of David, when he went up to be taxed. There she bore, in the stable of an inn, the SAVIOUR of the world and laid Him in a manger. The visit of the shepherds; the circumcision; adoration of the Wise men; the Presentation of the Holy Infant in the Temple; the touching poverty of her offering for her Son the LORD of the world; the flight into Egypt,—all these bring her forward, and yet so modestly and simply.

She next appears as sorrowfully looking for her Son and finding Him in the Temple. When our LORD's ministry begins she is almost wholly withdrawn. She is with Him at the marriage in Cana. More than eighteen months after, she with His brethren seek to see Him, to persuade Him to relax His ministerial work, when He gave the reply to the messenger, "Who is my mother, and who are my brethren? And He stretched forth His hand towards His disciples and said, Behold my mother and my brethren! For whosoever shall do the will of my FATHER which is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother." She is at the foot of the cross suffering the fullest fulfilment of the aged Simeon's words, "And a sword shall pass through thine own soul also." There is something sublime in the words, "Woman, behold thy Son!" when He gave her into the care of His beloved disciple. St. Ambrose considers that He lovingly put away from Himself all human ties when He was about to complete our Redemption. He needed no aid for the redemption of all, He received the love of His mother, but He sought no help of man. Nothing is told us of her hopes, fears, faith, and sorrow, and joy. She is simply counted among the women who were with the Apostles after the Ascension in that upper room. And so she disappears from the sacred history. It is in thorough accord with the lofty aim of the sacred narrative. Her work, for which all rise up to call her blessed, was to bear for us in the Flesh truly man of body and soul subsisting, the eternal SON of GOD. When this was accomplished and her care and love must not interfere with His work, she is gently put aside by our Lord with words implying slight reproof whenever she endeavors to come forward. "Woman, what have I to do with thee?" and, "Who is my mother, and who are my brethren?" have the tone of a separation in purpose and in work from His past life at Nazareth. Her perpetual virginity, a devout suggestion, can be urged on no historical grounds, however much we may hold it. The early Church was singularly silent about her, and treated her name as it did those of the holiest of the older Saints of the Old Testament, commemorating her as it did them in the Holy Communion. So, too, we find in one of the beautiful prefaces of the Mozarabic Liturgy a singularly beautiful contrast between the Virgin as the Mother of our Lord's human nature and the glorious work in us of our Mother the Church; one which draws sharply the distinction, while it gives her all due honor. The worship now paid her by the Roman Church is not earlier than the sixth century. Earlier, worship was offered by the Collyridian heretics.

Maryland, Diocese of. Maryland, one of the thirteen original States of the Union, lies south of Pennsylvania, from which it is separated by Mason and Dixon's Line, so famous in American politics. Its total area is about twelve thousand square miles, of which about two thousand three hundred are covered by water. The most notable geographical feature (which has had its decided influence on the diocesan, as well as on the political, history of Maryland) is the Chesapeake Bay, the largest inlet in the United States, which divides the entire State into two portions, known as the Eastern and Western Shores. These two divisions are unequal in extent, and very dissimilar in their physical characteristics. The Eastern Shore is the smaller and is very level, while large parts of the other side of the bay are hilly and mountainous. Maryland is now divided into twenty-three counties and the corporation of Baltimore City. Of these counties, nine, viz.: Cecil, Kent, Queen Anne, Talbot, Caroline, Dorchester, Wicomico, Somerset, and Worcester, lie east of the Chesapeake Bay, and in the year 1868 A.D. were organized into a new Diocese, by the name of the Diocese of Easton. The Western Shore, together with the District of Columbia, is now known as the Diocese of Maryland. The population of the Diocese, including, of course, the District of Columbia, is estimated at about 755,502; the total population of the State, without the District, was, in 1880 A.D., 934,943, and of these no less than 210,250 were colored people.

The charter of Maryland was granted by King Charles I., on June 20, 1632, to Cecilus Calvert, the second Lord Baltimore, and the colony was named in honor of Queen Henrietta Maria. In the following year Lord Baltimore dispatched a company under command of his brother, Leonard Calvert, to colonize the new territory; they landed at St. Mary's on the 27th of March, 1634 A.D.

Before this, however, in 1629 A.D., under the authority of Virginia, which colony claimed the territory under a previous grant, a trading station had been established on Kent Island in the Chesapeake by William Claiborne, or Clayborn, whose name figures frequently in early contests and disturbances, until he was finally expelled by the followers of Lord Baltimore. Among Claiborne's associates and settlers was a clergyman of the English Church, the Rev. Richard James, who deserves mention as the first Christian minister who set foot on the territory of Maryland. Passing by the ecclesiastical history of the colonial period, we can barely mention that after the revolution of 1688 A.D. the Church of England was "established" in Maryland, and disabilities were imposed upon Roman Catholics and dissenters. The counties were divided into parishes, with metes and bounds after the English custom, and under names which remain to this day and attest the history of their formation. In 1779 A.D. the Legislature passed an act to establish Vestries, and vested in them, as trustees, all the property that had belonged to their respective parishes while they were part of the "Church of England." This elaborate act, as somewhat modified in 1798 A.D. and subsequent years, is still in force in the Dioceses of Maryland and Easton, and it puts the relations between Church and State and the tenure of religious property on a somewhat different footing from that which prevails in most other States and Dioceses of the Union.

The Diocese of Maryland, as distinguished from the Church of the colonial period, dates from the year 1783 A.D. On the 13th of August in that year a Convention was held at Annapolis, in which was adopted an important document entitled "A Declaration of certain fundamental Rights and Liberties of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Maryland." "This," says Bishop Whittingham in the margin of his copy of Dr. Hawks's Narrative, "is, so far as I can discover, the first time that title is used." The Declaration furnishes conclusive evidence, says Dr. Hawks, that the Church of Maryland, like that of Virginia, claimed to have a distinct, independent existence, without reference to any connection with the Church in any other colony. The most serious need was that of a Bishop, for the Declaration of Rights had declared that an Episcopal ordination and commission were necessary to the valid administration of the Sacraments and the "due exercise of the ministerial functions in the said Church." This need was supplied by the consecration, on the 17th of September, 1792 A.D., in Trinity Church, New York, of the Rev. Thomas John Clagett, D.D., who had been chosen unanimously by both orders of clergy and laity to be Bishop of Maryland. All the four American Bishops, Seabury, Provoost, White, and Madison, united in this first consecration in America. Bishop Provoost, of New York, contrary to the wish of Maryland, insisted upon acting as Presiding Bishop on the occasion in place of Bishop Seabury, who by seniority of consecration should rightfully have officiated in that capacity.

Bishop Claggett, 1792-1816 A.D.—The Diocese, which had before been without a head, prospered under its new Bishop, though there was unfortunately considerable strife between the so-called Evangelical, or Low-Church party, and those who were called High-Churchmen. This culminated in 1814 A.D., when the Rev. James Kemp, D.D., was elected Suffragan Bishop of Maryland,—the Eastern Shore being assigned as his special jurisdiction. The leader of the Evangelical party, the Rev. G. J. Dashiell, Rector of St. Peter's, Baltimore, caused Bishop Claggett and the Church no little trouble by his turbulent conduct. Chagrined, as Dr. Hawks thinks, that the choice of the Diocese for Bishop had not fallen upon himself in place of Dr. Kemp, he finally seceded from the Church and attempted to establish a sect and schism of his own. After having greatly disturbed the peace of the Diocese, he was at length deposed from the sacred ministry by Bishop Claggett.

Bishop Kemp, 1816-1827 A.D.—Upon the death of Bishop Claggett in 1816 A.D., Bishop Kemp succeeded to the full Episcopate. His character was amiable without being weak, and his administration was earnest and vigorous. He lived down the ill feeling which party spirit had aroused at the time of his consecration, and died, much beloved and lamented, from the upsetting of a stage-coach in the year 1827 A.D.

Bishop Stone, 1830-1838 A.D.—It is painful to record that for nearly three years after the death of Bishop Kemp, Maryland was again the scene of discord and strife, so violent that the Diocese obtained an unenviable notoriety in the Church at large. At length the Convention united in electing the Rev. William Murray Stone, D.D., a man of amiable temper, and not very closely allied to either of the parties which still divided the Diocese. After a quiet and peaceful Episcopate of eight years he died on the 26th of February, 1838 A.D.

Bishop Whittingham, 1840-1879 A.D.—Again there was serious difficulty in choosing a Bishop. Neither the Rev. Dr. W. E. Wyatt nor the Rev. Dr. John Johns, each of whom had a nearly equal following, could obtain a constitutional majority (which in Maryland was, and still is, two-thirds of each order). The Rev. Dr. Eastburn, the Rt. Rev. Bishop Kemper, and the Rev. Dr. Dorr were each successively elected, and each declined to accept the office. Finally the Rev. Dr. William Rollinson Whittingham, Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the General Theological Seminary in New York, was elected, and consecrated in St. Paul's Church, Baltimore, on the 17th of September, 1840 A.D. The Convention Journal of 1841 A.D. gives the following statistics, which furnish some idea of the condition of the Diocese at the beginning of Bishop Whittingham's Episcopate: Clergy, 75; parishes, 58; separate congregations, 20; places of worship, 106; communicants, 3881; baptisms, 1293; confirmed, 337; contributions, $15,402.07. In 1837 A.D., the last Convention at which Bishop Stone was present, the confirmations were reported 67, and the contributions $6837.63. Bishop Whittingham was well known as one of the most learned and vigorous of American Bishops, and during his long and stirring Episcopate the Church made much progress and Maryland became a strong Diocese. Many new churches were built in Baltimore and Washington, and also in the rural districts. The College of St. James, under the Rev. Dr. Kerfort, and other schools of learning were founded, and did good service in the cause of education. In 1868 A.D., the year in which the Diocese was divided, and the counties of the Eastern Shore organized as the Diocese of Easton, Maryland contained 162 clergy, and 139 parishes and congregations. The communicants were 12,269; contributions (not including salaries of clergymen), $145,348. In 1870 A.D., the Bishop's increasing infirmities caused him to apply for an assistant Bishop, and the Rev. William Pinkney, D.D., was elected by a large majority on the second ballot. The election was notable as indicating an entire subsidence of the old party contentions. Dr. Pinkney was consecrated in the city of Washington on October 6, 1870 A.D. Bishop Whittingham's health becoming more and more feeble, the visitation of the parishes devolved almost entirely upon the assistant Bishop, who became very dear both to clergy and laity. But the labors of Bishop Whittingham in his study, and in all business which did not require locomotion, were still, as always, most assiduous. In 1879 A.D. he transmitted to the Convention from his sick-chamber a copy of his official journal, which showed that, ill as he had been, he had given to his Diocese from five to fifteen hours of work per diem. Bishop Whittingham died in Orange, N. J., on the 17th of October, 1879 A.D., having bequeathed to his Diocese his most valuable property, the large theological library which he had been all his life accumulating. He was buried from St. Mark's Church, Orange, of which in early life he had been rector, his funeral being attended by a large concourse of Bishops, clergy, and laity.

Bishop Pinkney, 1879-1883 A.D.—Under Bishop Pinkney the progress of the Diocese continued, and the Bishop was, as he had always been, indefatigable in his labors. With characteristic generosity he requested the family of Bishop Whittingham to continue to occupy the Episcopal residence in Baltimore, and with his approbation the Bishop's daughter was made Librarian and custodian of the literary treasures which it had been her father's joy and pride to collect. In 1883 A.D., the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of the Diocese was celebrated in Baltimore, the Diocese of Easton joining with Maryland in brotherly commemoration of an event in which they were equally interested, and in which, one hundred years ago, their ancestors had had so large and so distinguished a share. The various proceedings were published in a pamphlet, which is an interesting memorial of the occasion. Shortly after participating in this joyous celebration Bishop Pinkney died suddenly, on the 4th of July, 1883 A.D., while holding a visitation in Sherwood Parish, Baltimore County. The feelings of the bereaved Diocese are well expressed on the last page of the Centennial Pamphlet, above mentioned, which was passing through the press when the Bishop suddenly ended his earthly career. "The loving heart which ever warmed to others, but never spared itself, grew still while the voice of its last earnest message was yet lingering in our ears. Zealous and brave, and true to the high trust committed to him, he died as such soldiers of the Great Captain ever wish to die,—at the front, and in the very act of duty."

Masorah. The Masorah is the arrangement and proper preservation of the text of Holy Scripture by Jewish Doctors, which they gathered from tradition, both the oral and that in the Talmud. It was busied with the verses, words, and letters of the sacred text. The Masoretic Doctors of the school at Tiberias were the great masters of this department of Biblical research, and, which was their most generally useful invention, probably arranged the vowel points and pauses, which later developed into the system now in use. But the Masorah, "The Tradition," was the result of their and others' labors. Not merely the verses, words, and letters were noted, but they recorded the various readings,—the K'ri, what should be read for the Chetheb, also the actual word in the text; and words interpolated. Their minute records of such apparently trifling details were of use in settling the value of various readings, though of little real use, as amid the multiplicity of various families of manuscripts the text would vary, and the number of letters or words or verses would be uncertain,—e. g., the Bomberg Bible, 1518 A.D., contains 1171, and the Plantin, 1566 A.D., only 793 K'ris, while Elias Levita could reckon but 848, after twenty years' study of the Masorah. Nearly every Hebrew Bible contains not only the different readings at the foot of the page, but also some Masoretic technical notes and remarks at the end of the volume.

Mass. The ordinary name for the Communion Service or Liturgy of the Latin Churches. It is a corruption of the words of dismissal: "Ite, missa est." The name appears also in the First Book of King Edward VI. in the heading over the Communion Service: "The Supper of the LORD and the Holy Communion commonly called the Mass." But this was dropped, and it is no proper term for the Liturgy of the English Church. It is divided into two principal parts, the Ordinary of the Mass and the Canon of the Mass, which latter begins with the intercessions preceding the words of Consecration.

Mass, Sacrifice of. Vide SACRIFICE.

Massachusetts, The Diocese of. The popular impression is that the Pilgrims at Plymouth and the Puritans of the Massachusetts Bay Colony were the first to celebrate the worship of God on the New England shores. The truth is that over forty years before the Pilgrims landed the voice of a clergyman of the Church of England had been heard along the shores of Maine and the Provinces, celebrating the rites of religion with the voyagers of Frobisher's expedition, which he accompanied as chaplain, in 1577 A.D.

In 1605 A.D. an English expedition, in search of a Northwest passage, sailed up the Penobscot River, in Maine, and planted a cross on its banks.

In 1607 A.D. a settlement was made on the coast of Maine by a company made up principally of members of the Church of England, who brought with them a Church clergyman, the Rev. Richard Seymour. The colony, in that year, built fifty houses and a church, and observed with great regularity the ordinances of religion according to the usages of the mother-Church. It was not a successful colony, however, and was finally abandoned on account of the severity of the climate and their inexperience of the conditions of the new land. This settlement is usually known as "Popham's Colony," after the name of its first president. The royal letters of instruction directed that the religion of the Church of England should be established, and it is certain that thirteen years before the coming of the Pilgrims to Plymouth the hallowed ritual of the Church was heard on the shores of Atkins' Bay.

The settlement at Saco, in Maine, was the first permanent English colony in this region in which the rites of the English Church were celebrated.

In 1636 A.D. William Gorges came out as Governor of the territory out of which the present State of Maine has been formed. The patent of this territory established the Church of England as the religion of the colony, and gave the right of nominating clergymen to the patentee.

The first regularly settled clergyman was the Rev. Richard Gibson, who came in 1637 A.D., and spent about seven years in Saco. He extended his labors to the settlers at Richmond Island, the Isle of Shoals, and Portsmouth. He was a good scholar, a popular speaker, and highly esteemed.

The Rev. Robert Jordan was one of the earliest of the Church clergymen, serving as an itinerant whenever he had opportunity. He sometimes held the position of judge in the Province, but never laid aside his ministerial character. He died at New Castle, in Maine, in 1679 A.D., being sixty-eight years old.

In 1641 A.D. a report was made to Governor Winthrop, of Massachusetts, that the people of Saco, in Maine, "were much addicted to Episcopacy." In fact, a large proportion of the settlers in Maine were Church people. What would have been the result had not these early settlements been disturbed by the strong hand of the rising power of the Massachusetts colony we can only conjecture. The territory of Maine passed by purchase into the possession of Massachusetts in 1677 A.D., and thenceforth the religious teachers encouraged in the Province were Puritans. Notwithstanding all that was done to crush out Episcopacy it continued, and some existing parishes trace their history back to those trying days.

It was a difficult matter to plant the Church in any place over which the Puritan held rule. In fact, he had come here to avoid the Church, and to set up one of his own. He was unwilling to tolerate any rival, and especially to permit the English Church to gain any foothold.

The first English Church clergyman to settle in the bounds of Massachusetts was the Rev. William Blackstone, who established himself on the promontory on which Boston was subsequently built. He came here before the Puritans, and shortly after the Pilgrims reached Plymouth. He was a man of means, and managed a large farm, on which he built a substantial house and other buildings. The Puritans went first to Dorchester and to Charlestown, and were in these places a year before they concluded to move to the edge of the bay, where they founded Boston. They had numerous interviews of an unsatisfactory character with Blackstone, but they finally bought his buildings and lands, and he gladly moved away to Rhode Island. It is not known that he ever publicly officiated here, except to a congregation made up of his family and servants.

The Church clergyman who appears next in the annals of Massachusetts is the Rev. William Morrell, who came with Gorges in 1623 A.D., having a commission from the English Church to exercise a kind of superintendence over the parishes which might be established in New England.

Morrell collected some information, but was regarded as an intruder, and finally went back to England baffled and discouraged.

"Thus," as one says, "the Church of England found herself shorn of her strength at the very moment when a door seemed opened for her extension in the New World. Her children, whom she had thrust out, stood with scowling brows and sturdy arms ready to repel her from the shores which they had made their refuge."

It must not be thought, however, that there were no friends of the old Church among the Puritan colonists, for in Salem there were at least three whose good deeds make them worthy of special honor. They were Francis Higginson, John and Samuel Brown. It was expected that they would stand high in the colony, but their love for the old Church brought them into sorrows. They were denounced as ringleaders of a faction, and were sent off home. When Charles II. was restored to the throne of England an order was issued "that such as desired to use the Common Prayer should do so, without incurring any penalty, reproach, or disadvantage."

In 1688 A.D. the Rev. Robert Ratcliffe came over, and held services in the town-house in Boston. He struggled against many difficulties for two years, but before he returned to England he secured the erection of a place of worship where King's Chapel was subsequently built.

About this time there was considerable earnestness in forming parishes. The work was greatly aided by the Missionary Society formed in England in 1649 A.D., whose scope was enlarged in 1661 A.D., and which in 1701 A.D. was incorporated as "The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts." They sent out chaplains, missionaries, and schoolmasters for the conversion of the Indians and for the welfare of the white settlers.

There were not many favorable openings for the agents of this Society, but they did their work with courage and vigor, and were rewarded in the growth of parishes, mission stations, and schools. The wonder grows as we look at these efforts that opposition could be so bitter, and that their courage to meet it was so great. In no section of the country did the Church find so hard a field as in Massachusetts.

Some of the early proposals to secure the Episcopate were met here by ridicule and invective. A Bishop was to many of the Puritans the symbol of all that was hateful. Caricatures are preserved to this day which show how antagonistic was the popular feeling towards Episcopacy, especially as the colonial troubles grew. The two causes which led to this feeling were their inherited hatred of the Church of England, and their fear that the introduction of Episcopacy would overturn what was really the State religion of Massachusetts, and which continued until as late as 1830 A.D. It was indeed only in this year that Congregationalism ceased to be the religion established by law in this State.

The history of some of the old parishes in this State is full of interest, particularly in such parishes as Marblehead, Newburyport, King's Chapel, and others, but they cannot be given here.

The position of the Massachusetts clergy during the events leading up to the Revolution and during that long period was particularly trying. They had never been in much favor here, and when the Revolution was inaugurated they were almost all subjected to severe penalties or to popular censure, which cost them friends and positions. Some of them, however, cast themselves into the movement for breaking loose from England, others tried to maintain a neutral position, but many relinquished their parishes and moved away or were driven away.

We can hardly understand the peculiar hardships of many of the most kindly spirits who lived in those times. Loyal to the Church of England, loving peace, deprecating the wrongs visited upon this country, hoping redress by means other than armed revolt, they waited in agony some settlement of the difficulties, and when war actually came, found themselves treated as enemies and scorned by the people in general. Some of them waiting until they saw no hope of England's doing justice to her colonies, and still others looking ahead with the forecast of patriots, joined in the movement. It was a dreary period for the Church here for many years.

When the independence of this country was established, a meeting of the clergy of Massachusetts was held in Boston, in 1784 A.D., at which resolutions were passed embodying the principles deemed proper to be made prominent in organizing the Church in this country.

In 1789 A.D. the clergy of Massachusetts met again, and concluded to elect a Bishop of their own. Accordingly, on the 4th of June, 1789 A.D., they elected Edward Bass, of Newburyport, Bishop of Massachusetts and New Hampshire; but there were difficulties in the way of his consecration, mainly the unwillingness of some to have Bishop Seabury, who had been consecrated by the Scotch Bishops, take part in the perpetuation of the Episcopate in America.

The consecration of Bishop Seabury was declared valid by our General Convention, but in the mean time Dr. Bass resigned his election. In 1796 A.D. he was re-elected, and on the 7th of May, 1797 A.D., was consecrated in Philadelphia. In May, 1798 A.D., he met the Massachusetts Convention in old Trinity Church, Boston, and presided over its deliberations as its Bishop. It was a small body then. There were only five clerical and seven lay deputies present. The clergy were Drs. Walker and Parker, the Rev. Messrs. Montague, Harris, and Bur-

Trinity and Christ Churches were the only two parishes in Boston in 1797 A.D. King's Chapel had been appropriated by the Unitarians shortly after the Revolution.

Bishop Bass continued to perform the duties of Rector of St. Paul's Church, Newburyport, after he became Bishop, the demands for Episcopal services not being very great in that time of the Church's weakness. He was a courteous, dignified gentleman, amiable and benevolent; his religious character was serious, practical, and stable. He discharged his duties with great fidelity. He died September 13, 1803 A.D. Massachusetts has had five Bishops,—Bass, Parker, Griswold, Eastburn, and Paddock.

In May, 1810 A.D., a Convention of the clergy and representatives of the New England States, except Connecticut, was held in Boston to form a union under the title of The Eastern Diocese.

The territory was a large one, but the Church was weak. In 1811 A.D. there were in all this territory only twenty-two parishes and sixteen officiating clergymen. Of these parishes only a few had any numerical or financial strength; in fact, but three, Trinity, Boston; St. John's, Providence; and Trinity, Newport, could be called strong parishes. At this Convention in 1810 A.D. the Rev. A. V. Griswold, of Bristol, R. I., was elected Bishop. He was consecrated in May, 1811 A.D., in New York.

He was born April 22, 1766 A.D., and died February 15, 1843 A.D., being seventy-seven years old, and having been a Bishop for thirty-two years. Part of the time he served as Rector of St. Peter's Church, Salem. The thirty-two years of his Episcopate witnessed marvelous growth of the Church in New England, so much so that one by one the associated Dioceses became strong enough to have a Bishop each for itself, and five Bishops were selected to take charge of the work which was originally placed in one man's hands.

Bishop Griswold's increasing infirmities compelled him to ask for an assistant, and Dr. Manton Eastburn, a native of England, but a resident of this country from childhood, and at the time of his election rector of the Church of the Ascension, New York, was elected in 1842 A.D., and was consecrated in December of that year. Bishop Griswold died the February following, and Bishop Eastburn became Bishop. The Diocese increased at first slowly, but yet surely, in strength and in numbers. The clergy were active, energetic, filled with a missionary zeal, and faithfully sowed the sacred seed of Church doctrine which is now yielding a most abundant harvest. The Bishop repeatedly recorded in his several reports, both to the Diocese and to the General Convention, a description of the peculiar difficulties under which the Church toiled.

"Planted amidst untractable elements,— by the side of institutions which are, on system, impatient of all distinctive claims,—and obliged either to use, or to oppose, traits of character which, though venerable and pious, are not of her own producing, our Church yet holds her difficult progress;" and later, "We wait for the salvation of the Lord, and have the most decided tokens that we shall not wait in vain." Later statistics show that this confident faith was fully justified.

In 1843 A.D., when the Bishop had fairly taken possession of his See, the clergy numbered 52; in 1872 A.D. they were 121; in 1883 A.D. they were 168. In 1843 A.D. there were 4118 communicants; in 1872 A.D. there were 11,706; in 1883 A.D. there were 18,582. In 1843 A.D. the contributions were $22,847; in 1872 A.D. they amounted to $330,381.67; in 1883 A.D. they reached $518,665.86. The Bishop, after thirty years of earnest and faithful toil throughout a large and rapidly increasing Diocese, passed to his rest September 12, 1872 A.D.

His successor, the Rt. Rev. Benjamin H. Paddock, S.T.D., a native of Norwich, Conn., born February 29, 1828 A.D., was elected by the Annual Convention May 6, and was consecrated the following 17th of September, 1873 A.D. The Diocese had emerged from its earlier difficulties and had now become a power in that Commonwealth which had once made it almost a crime to belong to her Communion.

Its great size, numerous parishes, and rapidly widening work, which would require all the energies and tax the strength of any man, receive from him earnest, watchful, fostering care. This is well shown by the carefully-drawn and wisely-planned Canon on Deaconesses and Sisterhoods, which was offered by him and passed the House of Bishops in 1880 A.D. It was too late in the session to obtain the passage of it in the House of Deputies, and being laid over to the last General Convention, the consideration of it was necessarily deferred there from the pressure of other business. A comparison of the statistics given above shows how the Diocese has grown under his Episcopal oversight.

The following statistics are taken from the Convention Journal of 1883 A.D. They are made up from the Parochial Reports, and inasmuch as some six or more parishes failed to report, and a number of others made defective reports, it is safe to assume that the correct totals are really larger than are here given.

REV. G. W. SHINN.

Master. A title or designation for the heads of various Guilds, Orders, Institutions, Colleges, or Hospitals.

Matins. The ancient name for the day-break service of the reformation offices of the English Church. This Matin service, together with that of Prime and Tierce, was compressed into our present Morning Prayer. In it are remnants of the very ancient Gallican system of daily prayer, which contains elements which are probably Eastern in their origin. Indeed, of our services it may be said that there are embedded in them in versicle, rubric, or prayer, phrases or ritual directions which belong to a very early Eastern system of daily services.

Matrimony (Latin, matrimonium), or marriage, signifies the nuptial state, that is, the relation of husband and wife, a relation which imposes obligations and creates rights, which are regulated by divine, and also, as to many details, by human law. "Marriage" (says Hugh Davey Evans, in his work on "The Christian Doctrine of Marriage") "is a civil contract, and as such subject to the jurisdiction of the State and the law of the land; but it is also a divine institution, and as such, not under their authority. God Himself instituted the appropriation of one woman to one man, and subjected it to certain laws, which the State ought to enforce, but which she may at her peril refuse to enforce. If she refuse, there are no means of compelling her, for she has no human superior; but the divine laws are not less binding. The State ought to enforce the divine laws, because they would promote the temporal welfare of her citizens; but if she be of a different opinion, it only remains that Christians should obey them, and endure whatever inconveniences may arise from their not being enforced upon others. In this country the State declines to enforce them, and it is more necessary that Christian men and women should be familiar with them" (p. 91). In this article marriage will be treated chiefly as a divine institution, subject to the regulation of the Church, which is guided in this, as in all matters, by what she believes to be the "Word of God." The best account of the character and objects of Christian marriage is to be found in the Service of the English Church. The passage is worthy of being quoted here, because it was unaccountably omitted by the American revisers of the Prayer-Book in 1789 A.D. In the face of the admitted looseness of doctrine and practice prevalent in our country in regard to marriage, it can hardly be maintained that we have gained anything by the omission of this plain-spoken, admirable exhortation. In the English Church, every married couple and the assembled congregation are solemnly informed that holy matrimony "is an honorable estate, instituted of God in the time of man's innocency, signifying unto us the mystical union that is betwixt CHRIST and His Church; which holy estate CHRIST adorned and beautified with His presence, and first miracle that He wrought in Cana of Galilee; and is commended of Saint Paul to be honorable among all men; and therefore is not by any to be enterprised nor taken in hand, unadvisedly, lightly, or wantonly to satisfy man's carnal lusts and appetites, like brute beasts that have no understanding; but reverently, discreetly, advisedly, soberly, and in the fear of God; duly considering the causes for which Matrimony was ordained.

"First, It was ordained for the procreation of children, to be brought up in the fear and nurture of the LORD, and to praise His Holy Name.

"Secondly, It was ordained for a remedy against sin, and to avoid fornication; that such persons as have not the gift of continency might marry, and keep themselves undefiled members of CHRIST's body.

"Thirdly, It was ordained for the mutual society, help, and comfort, that the one ought to have of the other, both in prosperity and adversity."

The persons to be married are then charged both in the English service and in our own, that "if either of them know any impediment why they may not lawfully be joined together in matrimony, they should confess it for if any persons are joined together otherwise than as God's Word doth allow, their marriage is not lawful."

This is a plain intimation, in the very service itself, that whenever, as in this country the State refuses to be guided and bound in its legislation by God's Word, Christian men and women cannot be content with simply obeying the State. In other words, the State may and does allow some marriages to be contracted which the Church deems unlawful, and permits others to be dissolved for causes which the Church cannot allow to be valid. Difficult questions and troublesome cases of conscience may arise, but collisions between Church and State in this country are not very likely to occur. The State may permit what the Church forbids, but members of the Church are not forced by the State to avail themselves of the permission which is given. A correct understanding of the relations of Church and State, and of the duties that Christian men and women owe to both of those divine institutions, lies at the bottom of this whole question. The subject has been so lucidly expounded by Hugh Davey Evans, in his elaborate "Treatise on the Christian Doctrine of Marriage," that the reader will pardon an extended quotation from that learned author.

"When a question arises whether the law of the land conflicts with the law of God, it cannot be decided by the law of the land, which is of inferior authority to the law of God. The law of God, which is the higher law, must be the rule, and conscience the judge to apply that rule. Every one who is called upon to act upon the question must decide it for himself, as every one who is called to act upon any question must decide it for himself. The private man must decide it according to his conscience. The officer of the Church who is called to advise, direct, or judge the conduct of the private Christian must decide according to his private conscience, unless the Church has furnished him with a rule. The Church herself, in her legislative capacity, must be governed by what may be called her aggregate or public conscience.

"If the two laws do not conflict, every one, including the authorities of the Church, must obey both. If one permit what the other forbids, men should respect the prohibition. If one command what the other forbids, we must obey God rather than man. Suppose a man should apply to be received into the communion of the Church who had married after a civil divorce which was contrary to God's law. How ought the rector of the parish to act? Public opinion would perhaps say that the twice-married man should be received, because he had done nothing not allowed by the law of the land. But the true question is, Has he done an act contrary to the law of God? The law of the land, which is, at best, an interpretation of the law of God, made by temporal rulers for temporal purposes, has nothing to do with spiritual questions" (pp. 33, 34).

"With respect to marriages which the law of the land allows, but which the law of God forbids, no one ought to enter into them or to continue in them. The parties to them have not been joined by God, and man ought to put them asunder. In some cases the civil courts undertake to dissolve marriages which were originally valid, for causes for which the law of God does not allow them to be dissolved. No Christian can consider a marriage which was once valid as dissolved by any power whatever, except only in the case in which our LORD has permitted such dissolution. No Christian can intermarry with any one who has been released from a valid marriage for a reason which was scripturally insufficient—for any cause 'saving the cause of fornication'—without being guilty of adultery. By following these few rules a private Christian may avoid being mixed up with the unchristian laws which have been adopted in America. He can thus keep a conscience void of offense in this matter before God and man.

"But the clergy may sometimes meet with embarrassing cases. They will come in one of two forms. A clergyman may be called on to solemnize a marriage which the law of the land allows, and the law of God forbids. There is no reason for believing that such a marriage can receive the Divine blessing, or possess the sanctity and unity of marriage. A clergyman should refuse to solemnize such a marriage, at whatever cost or risk to himself. Happily, an American clergyman can incur no danger from the State; for there is no law of the land which requires him to solemnize any marriage whatever. The only danger is that of giving offense to the public and to his parishioners. This is sometimes an important consideration; but we ought to obey God rather than men. At other times the question may present itself in the shape of a case of lay discipline, when a person who is living in a sinful marriage desires to be admitted to the Holy Communion. In the Primitive Church, such a person would have been rejected until he or she separated from his or her partner in guilt. Whether a modern clergyman is called upon to revive this discipline by his own authority and upon his own responsibility is a grave and difficult question which every clergyman must decide for himself, with the aid and counsel of his Bishop. It may be observed that the power of rejecting or suspending a communicant is very much limited by the first rubric of the Communion service. It seems to require that the evil life for which a communicant may be suspended or rejected should be such as to give offense to the congregation" (pp. 249, 250).

What remains to be said may be arranged under three heads. I. Duties of husbands and wives. II. The "impediments" which the Church service refers to, and which make the marriage unlawful. III. Divorce.

I. Duties of Husbands and Wives.—What is usually called the marriage vow is the promise which the parties mutually make to each other. It is a promise of the most solemn character, witnessed before God and the congregation. Both husband and wife promise, each to the other, that the contract shall be life-long and indissoluble, each using the solemn words, "till death us do part." "The parties by this vow engage their personal fidelity, expressly and specifically; they engage likewise to consult and promote each other's happiness; the wife, moreover, promises obedience to her husband. Nature may have made and left the sexes of the human species nearly equal in their faculties, and perfectly so in their rights; but to guard against those competitions which equality, or a contested superiority, is almost sure to produce, the Christian Scriptures enjoin upon the wife that obedience which she here promises, and in terms so peremptory and absolute that it seems to extend to everything not criminal, or not entirely inconsistent with the woman's happiness. 'Let the wife,' says St. Paul, 'be subject to her own husband in everything.' 'The ornament of a meek and quiet spirit,' says the Apostle Peter, speaking of the duty of wives, 'is, in the sight of God, of great price.' No words ever expressed the true merit of the female character so well as these." The above quotation is from Paley, who adds, that "the marriage vow is violated, 1, by adultery; 2, by any behavior which, knowingly, renders the life of the other miserable; as desertion, neglect, prodigality, drunkenness, peevishness, penuriousness, jealousy, or any levity of conduct which administers occasion of jealousy."

II. Impediments to Marriage.—The consent of the parties and the blessing of God are the formative elements of Christian marriage. "But where no consent has been given, or where the marriage is in direct violation of a divine law, and the absence of the consent and the unlawfulness can be shown by provable facts, man may separate those whom God hath not joined. . . . There are, then, some things which make an outward marriage unlawful and void. They are called impediments to marriage, and are of two classes. The first are facts which prove that there has been no consent. The others are facts which prove that the marriage is of a class not allowed 'by God's Word.'" (H. D. E., ch. xiii. § 2.) The subject is intricate, and the cases of conscience that arise are sometimes perplexing. Perhaps no recent writer has treated the matter from a Christian stand-point more elaborately and learnedly than Dr. Evans, and to his treatise and other works of the kind the reader is referred for more extended discussion. Both the State and the Church have erred in creating impediments which are not really such. The State may forbid certain persons to intermarry, and the law would bind the consciences of her citizens. But if a really valid marriage took place, the State could not make it void, except so far as it relates to the civil effects of marriage. The Church, however, during the Middle Ages erred far more grievously than the State, by creating many frivolous canonical impediments. Among these was the rule which made marriage between a godparent and his or her god-child unlawful. Still more curious and unreasonable was the prohibition of marriage between persons who had been sponsors for the same person, and who were regarded as spiritual brothers and sisters. The evils resulting were remedied to some extent by a system of dispensations, which at the same time served to increase the revenue and the power of the Popes. The practical consequence was that the Divine law that marriage cannot be dissolved was virtually made of none effect, and while divorce was not allowed, many valid marriages were annulled when money and other influences were brought to bear.

The Roman casuists distinguish two kinds of impediments, impedimenta impeditia, and impedimenta dirimentia. Under the first class are included impediments which render the marriage illicit, aut impediunt usum, until the impediment be removed. Such, for example, according to their rules, would be a marriage at a forbidden time, as in Advent, or in Lent. In the other class are comprised impediments which render the marriage absolutely null and void. These latter only require any particular mention, and by impediments, in the probable sense of the marriage service, must therefore be understood not considerations which might make a marriage undesirable or improper, but facts which, when proved, would justify the so-called marriage being pronounced by a court as null and void ab initio.

Of these impediments it is sufficient to mention here the following: (1) Existing marriage of either party. (2) Bodily or mental impotence. (3) Tender age, below the period allowed by law, which makes consent doubtful or impossible. (4) Being within the forbidden degrees of consanguinity and affinity. The last head involves many difficult questions, one of the most troublesome of which is the lawfulness of marriage with a deceased wife's sister. All that can be said in this place on the subject is, that such marriages are contrary to the inherited traditions of the English Church, and the general sentiment of English-speaking people. This is plainly shown by the very word sister-in-law, which means that a woman who is not really a man's sister is his sister in law, and therefore, like his own sister by blood, is to be regarded and treated as a woman whom he cannot marry. The term which embodies this tradition is still used in America, although in this country a wife's sister is not the husband's sister in law, because according to the law of most or all of our States, he may marry her. The General Convention has not positively decided the question for Churchmen, though the House of Bishops, in 1808 A.D., declared that in their opinion The Table of Degrees, appended to the English Prayer-Book, was binding in this Church. The subject is fully discussed, with his usual learning, by the author so often quoted in this article (ch. xiv., on the Doctrine of Incest). Dr. Evans approves the decision of the House of Bishops, and considers such marriages unlawful. It must, however, in fairness be added, that every part of this vexed question is involved in doubt and difficulty. The meaning of the text (Levit. xviii. 18), and the bearing of verse 16 on this subject, are disputed by Hebrew scholars and eminent commentators, and whether or not the whole body of the Levitical prohibitions in regard to marriage forms part of the moral law, so as to be binding upon Christians, is a further question of no little intricacy. Notwithstanding Dr. Evans's learned, painstaking, and apparently impartial support of the traditional doctrine, candor requires the admission that the prevailing sentiment of American Churchmen and scholars is favorable to marriage with a deceased wife's sister, while the opposition of English divines and of English society to the validity of such a union (beginning with Archbishop Whateley in 1851 A.D.) is perceptibly weakening, and, as the recent debates in Parliament have disclosed, is less and less based upon any Scriptural prohibition. It is proper to append, for reference, the table of which mention has been made.

"A TABLE OF KINDRED AND AFFINITY,"

Wherein whosoever are related are forbidden in Scripture and our laws to marry together.

"A man may not marry his grandmother, grandfather's wife, wife's grandmother, father's sister, mother's sister, father's brother's wife, mother's brother's wife, wife's father's sister, wife's mother's sister, mother, step-mother, wife's mother, daughter, wife's daughter, son's wife, sister, wife's sister, brother's wife, son's daughter, daughter's daughter, son's son's wife, daughter's son's wife, wife's son's daughter, wife's daughter's daughter, brother's daughter, sister's daughter, brother's son's wife, sister's son's wife, wife's brother's daughter, wife's sister's daughter.

"A woman may not marry with her grandfather, grandmother's husband, husband's grandfather, father's brother, mother's brother, father's sister's husband, mother's sister's husband, husband's father's brother, husband's mother's brother, father, step-father, husband's father, son, husband's son, daughter's husband, brother, husband's brother, sister's husband, son's son, daughter's son, son's daughter's husband, daughter's daughter's husband, husband's son's son, husband's daughter's son, brother's son, sister's son, brother's daughter's husband, sister's daughter's husband, husband's brother's son, husband's sister's son." (Divorce, p. 18.)

III. Divorce.—By divorce is properly understood a dissolution of the marriage bond, so that one or both of the parties may lawfully contract a second marriage. Under certain circumstances it may be advisable or necessary that married persons should live apart, and that such separation should be protected by law. The practice is to call such legal separations divorces a mensa et toro (from bed and board), while the dissolution of the bond itself is called divorce a vinculo matrimonii. It is only this latter species of divorce that calls for any discussion.

Marriage, as has been said, is a life-long union between one man and one woman. Each promises to take the other "till death us do part, according to God's holy ordinance," and over the union are pronounced the solemn words of our SAVIOUR, "Those whom God hath joined together, let no man put asunder." Indissolubleness, therefore, is the rule of Christian marriage. The rule, however, is subject to one exception, stated by our LORD Himself in these words: "Whosoever shall put away his wife, except it be for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery; and whoso marrieth her which is put away, doth commit adultery" (St. Matt. xix. 9).

The parallel passages in the Gospel are St. Matt. v. 32; St. Mark x. 11; St. Luke xvi. 18. The latter verse is as follows: "Whosoever putteth away his wife, and marrieth another, committeth adultery; and whosoever marrieth her that is put away from her husband committeth adultery."

In this passage in St. Luke, and also in St. Mark, the exception mentioned by St. Matthew is omitted, and an absolute prohibition to marry a divorced woman under any circumstances seems to be laid down. It is well known that there are not to be found in the whole New Testament any texts whose interpretation has been more earnestly disputed, even from early times, than these which touch upon divorce. It may be well to quote the cautious and modest opinion of Hugo Grotius, one of the greatest of modern expositors. He concludes his long and elaborate note on St. Matt. v. 32, with the following words: "Sed hæc, quæ de divortii dixi, eo dixi animo, ut piis et eruditissimis occasionem darei rei diligentius excutiendæ. Nihil definio, nihil certi pronuntio. Valeat in dubio ea sententia quæ quam maxime sanctam et inconcussam vult esse matrimonii fidem; ne temere rumpamus vinculum a Deo institutum." That is to say, "What I have said about divorce, I have said with the view of leading good and learned men to examine more carefully into the subject. I give no definite, positive opinion. I pronounce nothing as absolutely certain. In a doubtful case of conscience, it is best that that opinion should prevail which regards the marriage troth, as far as it is possible, as a thing holy and inviolable; lest, in our rashness, we should break a bond instituted by God Himself." In a work like the present nothing can be done but to state fairly the conflicting opinions and authorities, and then to add the Canons and regulations which the Church has provided for the guidance of her clergy and laity.

(1) The doctrine of the Church of Rome is that divorce a vinculo matrimonii is never, under any circumstances, lawful. That Church, therefore, holds that the exception mentioned by St. Matthew refers to divorce a mensa et toro, which gives no permission to either party to contract a second marriage while a husband or wife is still living. "Hic est perpetuus ecclesiæ usus, sensus et praxis," says Cornelius a Lapide (Comment. on St. Matt., v. 32). This teaching, seemingly strict, became in practice very lax by reason of the doctrine of impediments already mentioned, of which her casuists mention no less than fifteen, some of which are of the most frivolous character. (See Alphonsus de Ligorio, Homo Apostolicus, Tract xviii., § 60, De Impedimentis Dirimentibus, tom. ii. p. 229, Paris, 1834.)

The same doctrine of absolute indissolubility has been held by a large body of learned English divines, among whom may be mentioned Bishop Andrewes, Keble, Canon Liddon.

Canon Liddon also maintains the opinion of the eminent Dr. Dollinger, that the word rendered fornication in St. Matt. v. 32, and xix. 9, does not mean adultery, but that our Lord was referring to Deut. xxii. 13-21, and was speaking of ante-nuptial sins, which, as implying fraud on the part of the woman, freed the husband without, however, giving the guilty woman liberty to marry again. He further holds that our Lord meant this teaching (though found in the Sermon on the Mount) to apply to the Jews only. (See Liddon's University Sermons, 2d series, Sermon xvi., "Christ and Human Law.")

(2) Bishop Wordsworth, of Lincoln, Alford, and the majority of modern commentators (not Roman Catholic) hold that our Lord's exception, recorded in two places in St. Matthew, must be understood in St. Mark and St. Luke also; and that the effect of the exception is to permit the innocent party to remarry. A wife divorced for adultery, they hold, cannot marry again according to the Gospels. This interpretation makes the bond—vinculum—binding upon one partner and not upon the other.

(3) Dr. Hugh Davey Evans, whose examination of this difficult question is more elaborate and exhaustive than any other part of his treatise, holds that the adultery of the wife is the one exception made by our blessed Lord Himself, to the rule of the indissolubleness of marriage, and that when a legitimate divorce has been obtained, both parties are absolutely at liberty, and may marry.

Whether the privilege allowed to the husband in the saving clause extends to the wife—i.e., whether a marriage can be divorced for the adultery of the husband—Dr. Evans considers a doubtful and difficult question. "English divines," he says, "have generally taken the negative side of the question; in this country their view is sometimes spoken of as absurd. It may be erroneous, but it is not absurd. It may not be easy to show that it is erroneous" (p. 240). . . . "Upon the whole it may be said that the one text on the subject (St. Mark x. 11, 12) is plain against a woman putting away her husband and being married to another. The exception is not plain. It is therefore safest for all Christians to act as though divorce for the adultery of the husband were not lawful" (p. 243).

With regard to the great question whether the exception, "saving for the cause of fornication," found in St. Matthew, is to be understood and read into St. Mark and St. Luke, the conclusion which Hugh Davey Evans arrives at, and the reasons for it, cannot be more concisely expressed than in the words of Archbishop Manners Sutton, of Canterbury, in the British House of Lords, in 1820 A.D. The Archbishop said, "I admit that the passages in Matthew are not in Mark, nor in Luke; but in Matthew the exception is given, and Mark and Luke have the general institution without the exception. Now, I conceive that the passages in which the exception is omitted ought to be measured by the passage in which it is expressed; for it is impossible to believe that that was not intended which was expressed, though that which was not actually expressed might yet be intended." (Quoted by H. D. E., p. 193, from Jebb "On Adultery and Divorce," pp. 111, 112.)

The opinion of Hugh Davey Evans (which has been severely condemned, though never yet refuted) receives confirmation of no little value from one of the latest and best known of English Commentaries (Bishop Ellicott's New Testament Commentary for English Readers). The author of the Commentary on the first three Gospels in that work, who is the well-known Dean of Wells, Dr. Plumptre, writes as follows on St. Matt. v. 32:

"Whosoever shall marry her that is divorced." The Greek is less definite, and may be rendered either 'a woman who has been put away,' or better, 'her when she has been put away.' Those who take the former construction, infer from it the absolute unlawfulness of marriage with a divorced woman under any circumstances whatever; some holding that the husband is under the same restrictions, i.e., that the vinculum matrimonii is absolutely indissoluble; while others teach that in the excepted case, both the husband and the wife gain the right to contract a second marriage. The Romish Church, in theory, takes the former view, the Greek and most Reformed Churches the latter; while some codes of law, like that now recognized in England, go back to the looser interpretation of Deut. xxiv. 1, and allow the divorce a vinculo for many lesser causes than incontinence. Of these contending views, that which is intermediate between the two extremes seems to be most in harmony with the true meaning of our LORD's words. The words 'put away' would necessarily convey to His Jewish hearers the idea of an entire dissolution of the marriage union, leaving both parties free to contract a fresh marriage; and if it were not so, then the case in which He specially permits that dissolution would stand on the same level as the others. The injured husband would still be bound to the wife who had broken the vow which was of the essence of the marriage-contract. But if he was free to marry again, then the guilt of adultery could not possibly attach to her subsequent marriage with another. The context, therefore, requires us to restrict that guilt to the case of a wife divorced for other reasons. The injured husband would still be bound to the unfaithful wife. This, then, seems the true law of divorce for the Church of CHRIST as such to recognize. The question how far national legislation may permit divorce for other causes, such as cruelty or desertion, seems to stand on a different footing, and must be discussed on different grounds. In proportion as the 'hardness of heart,' which made the wider license the least of two evils, prevails now, it may be not only expedient, but right and necessary, though it implies a standard of morals lower than the law of CHRIST, to meet it, as it was met of old, by a like reluctant permission."

It is not, of course, denied that the Church or the State has the right to inflict a penalty upon the guilty party, and this penalty might take the form of a prohibition to marry again. This view of the case may have influenced the General Convention, as we know it did influence some members of it, in passing the present Canon (see below), which permits marriage only to the innocent party in such a divorce. The real question is the more difficult one, whether, if such a marriage were contracted irregularly, and contrary to the Church's prohibition, the Church would have the right to declare such marriage void. Dr. Evans, following the most widely accepted interpretation of our LORD's words in St. Matthew, maintains that the effect of the exception is to make such a marriage valid. He argues that the Church, in permitting the innocent party to marry, must thereby logically hold that the marriage has been dissolved; otherwise marrying the woman would not be "adultery," and the innocent man who remarried would also become an adulterer, because he would still have a wife living,—an adulterous wife, it is true,—but still his wife, unless the vinculum matrimonii has been dissolved.

In the face of this diversity of opinion among such noted Biblical scholars, the following propositions will hardly be disputed:

(1) That any one contemplating a second marriage with a divorced wife or husband, while the other partner is still living, has a difficult question of conscience to decide, and is treading upon dangerous ground, in which the lax laws of the State are no sufficient guide to those "who profess and call themselves Christians."

(2) That no clergyman can be forced to solemnize any marriage which he honestly believes to be forbidden by "God's Word," even if he feels bound to take the strictest and narrowest of the above interpretations.

(3) That no clergyman, on the other hand, is justified in questions of discipline and admission to the Sacraments of the Church, in going beyond the precise directions which the Church, whereof he is a minister, has chosen to give him in the premises.

(4) That it is the duty of the Church to give by Canon explicit directions, so far as may be necessary, to her Bishops and other clergy, in a matter which so deeply concerns morality and religion.

The only rule which the Protestant Episcopal Church has given upon the matter will be found in the Canon passed by the General Convention of 1877 A.D., which is added here for convenience of reference, as well as to complete such treatment of this difficult topic as seemed suitable for a work like the present one.

"CANON XIII.

"OF MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

"Marriage, except as God's Word doth allow, not lawful. (Digest, Title ii.)

"SECTION 1. If any persons be joined together otherwise than as God's Word does allow, their marriage is not lawful.

"No Minister shall unite in marriage those divorced, save for the cause of adultery.

"SEC. 2. No Minister, knowingly, after due inquiry, shall solemnize the marriage of any person who has a divorced husband or wife still living, if such husband or wife has been put away for any cause arising after marriage; but this Canon shall not be held to apply to the innocent party in a divorce for the cause of adultery, or to parties once divorced seeking to be united again.

"The Sacraments to be withheld from persons married otherwise than as God's Word doth allow, save to a penitent person in danger of death.

"SEC. 3. If any Minister of this Church shall have reasonable cause to doubt whether a person desirous of being admitted to Holy Baptism, or to Confirmation, or to the Holy Communion, has been married otherwise than as the Word of God and discipline of this Church allow, such Minister, before receiving such person to these ordinances, shall refer the case to the Bishop for his godly judgment thereupon. Provided, however, That no Minister shall, in any case, refuse the Sacraments to a penitent person in imminent danger of death.

"Questions to be referred to the Bishop.

"SEC. 4. Questions touching the facts of any case arising under Section 2 of this Canon shall be referred to the Bishop of the Diocese or Missionary Jurisdiction in which the same may occur; or, if there be no Bishop of such Diocese or Missionary Jurisdiction, then to some Bishop to be designated by the Standing Committee; and the Bishop to whom such questions have been so referred shall thereupon make inquiry in such manner as he shall deem expedient, and shall deliver his judgment in the premises.

"The Penalties under this Canon limited.

"SEC. 5. This Canon, so far as it affixes penalties, does not apply to cases occurring before it takes effect, according to Canon iv., Title iv."

REV. H. HARRISON.

Matthew, St. The Apostle and Evangelist, also called Levi, the son of Alphaeus. Of the details of his life we are wholly ignorant. He must have had some property, as he gave a feast at his own house on the occasion of his call. He was a publican, a person who either farmed the public taxes, or an inferior officer who attended to the collection of them. Probably St. Matthew was of this order, since he was sitting at the receipt of custom when our Lord was passing by and called him. His prompt obedience shows that he had already a devout character, and was looking for the Hope of Israel, and further, that he, too, had heard of Jesus with the spiritual ear. The feast which he gave led to the lessons on humility which our Lord gave, while He practically illustrated them. These St. Matthew never forgot, for in his Gospel he gives himself the hated name of "the publican," a name the other two Evangelists never apply to him. What became of him after our Lord's Ascension, where he wrote his Gospel, and what were the special circumstances that led him to do this work, we cannot now know. The sublime reticence of Holy Scripture, the Divine parsimony that wastes no words, records no needless facts, but teaches us that God's servants only need to be remembered by their Master when and as He wills. He is commemorated upon the 21st of September.

Matthew, St., Gospel of. The witness of all Christian antiquity is unvarying in attributing this Gospel to the Apostle and Evangelist. We cannot ascertain the precise date when the Gospel was written, but we can reach an approximate date. It was the first written, and could only have been written within a few years after the Ascension. It was written for Jewish converts. Since general tradition states that the Apostles were in Jerusalem, as a centre of work for some years, preaching at the Passover to the multitudes who gathered there, the Gospel may well have been written for the use of those who were converted there and who needed such a record for their instruction. Be that as it may, the Gospel is distinctively Hebrew in cast. It is national, retrospective, and through those very facts which might make it seem narrow, its intensity makes it most universal. It quotes prophecy freely. It appeals to the fulfillment of history in CHRIST. It speaks most sharply of the sins of the Jews and their rulers. It refers to the Law, as in the Sermon on the Mount. It traces our LORD's descent through David to Abraham. It brings out the spiritual turn to the intensely Jewish hope of a restored kingdom,—a heavenly kingdom. He brings out this at many points of the narrative, in the parables he records, in the declarations of our LORD at His Passion. In these we see the earnest, hopeful Jew, whose national longings found their truest realization in the spiritual kingdom of His Master, and the eye-witness who writes in sober honesty those things of which he was personally cognizant. Whether he wrote in Hebrew (Aramaic) or in Greek is a question which may be probably answered in the affirmative, but cannot now be settled. At any rate the Greek must be attributed to him, and must be equally authentic as any Hebrew form of it could possibly be. He preserves for us two miracles,—healing of two blind men and the tribute money,—ten parables, nine discourses, and some fourteen incidents—these last chiefly in connection with our LORD's Passion—which are not recorded by the other three Evangelists. The contents of this Gospel may be classified in seven parts: I. The birth and childhood of Jesus the King of Israel. II. The founding of the kingdom, beginning with the heralding by His forerunner and His first victory in the temptation. III. The works and signs of the kingdom, in His declaration of its fundamental Laws, in His royal power shown in miracles, in His teaching about His kingdom. IV. Preparations for the final conflict, by the confession of St. Peter, by predicting His Passion, by His parables. V. The triumphs of the King, His entry into Jerusalem. VI. His final warfare, in His Passion and death. VII. The perfected victory, in His Resurrection.

Though St. Matthew does not follow strictly the chronological order in his Gospel, yet he does not violate the proper sequence of the main events, and there is an internal coherence of thought and a grouping together of facts which have a subtle interconnection, which is of more importance to us than the historical order, where it has been broken. To St. Matthew's purpose it was essential to set forth the Son of God as the looked-for MESSIAH, the King of both the historical and the spiritual Israel, and as the perfect Man.

Matthias, St. The Apostle who was elected to take the place of the traitor Judas. It is a probable conjecture that he was one of the seventy disciples. "Different opinions have prevailed as to the manner of the election of Matthias; the most natural construction of the words of Scripture seems to be this. After the address of St. Peter the whole assembled body of the brethren, amounting in number to about one hundred and twenty, proceeded to nominate two, namely, Joseph surnamed Barsabas and Matthias, who answered the requirements of the Apostle; the subsequent selection between the two was referred in prayer to Him who, knowing the hearts of men, knew which of them was the fitter to be His witness and Apostle. The brethren then, under the heavenly guidance which they had invoked, proceeded to give forth their lots, probably each by writing the name of one of the candidates on a tablet and casting it into an urn. The urn was then shaken, and the name that first came out decided the election." (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, sub voc., p. 1839.) It was a solemn act of referring the decision to God alone.

The Apostle is commemorated upon the 25th of February.

Maunday-Thursaday. Thursaday in Holy Week. It derives its name from the antiphon sung at the service, "Mandatum novum do vobis ut diligatis invicem" (St. John xiii. 34).—"A new commandment give I unto you, That ye should love one another." But this day, long before it received this name of Maunday, had many important services celebrated upon it. On it the catechumens who were ready for baptism were taught the Creed. On it penitents who had passed their probation were publicly absolved and restored. On it the chrism, the consecrated oil for anointing the newly baptized, was consecrated. On it, at least in the African Church, the Holy Communion was celebrated at night. It was excepted from the general rule which was enforced early after persecution ceased. But this practice was looked upon with disfavor and it gradually fell into disuse. As a day of preparation for the fast of Good-Friday, and in view of our LORD's acts upon this day, it has always held a very important position in the holy services of Passion-week.

Mediation. Vide MEDIATOR.

Mediator. Bishop Butler in his Analogy draws attention to the fact that living creatures are brought into the world and preserved by the instrumentality of others as mediators, and hence to the fact that a "Mediator between God and man" is accordant with nature (1 Tim. ii. 5). He also speaks of the bad consequences of our follies being prevented by the assistance of others, as being analogous to the act of God in giving His only-begotten Son for wicked men (St. John iii. 16), and of CHRIST being the author of eternal salvation to the obedient, after His suffering (Heb. v. 8, 9). We see a human mediator in Moses, refraining from his food in a long fast because of the sin of the people (Deut. ix. 18), in his prayer for Aaron (v. 20), and for his people (v. 26). The Jewish writer Philo describes the Word as "an intercessor for mortal man to the immortal God, and an ambassador from the King to His subjects." The sacrifice of CHRIST is intended to deliver man both from the power and the punishment of sin. Abraham, as a relative mediator, pleading for Sodom (Gen. xviii. 28-32), points to CHRIST as the absolute Mediator. Noah with his family in the ark, and Lot with his household, spared from Sodom, may represent CHRIST as the SAVIOUR of His Church. The Jews called the MESSIAH the Middle One, as standing between God and man. Job longed for a daysman, that is, an arbitrator on the day of trial (Job ix. 33). This umpire who lays his hand on the GOD-HEAD and on manhood is found in JESUS CHRIST. Heathen mythology groped after this truth; Christianity declares it in giving the only Name whereby we may be saved (Acts iv. 12), and by which we may come unto the FATHER (St. John xiv. 6). Those who were enemies of God are reconciled by CHRIST's death (Col. i. 21, 22). CHRIST by obeying the law of God and satisfying justice brought His people into the favor of God (Eph. ii. 18). As Man, He was related to the sinner, and in human nature could make the reconciliation and obey the law (Gal. iv. 4; Rom. v. 19). As Man, CHRIST could shed His blood for man (Heb. ii. 10, 15, and vii. 8-5). As Man, He became a sympathizing High-Priest (Heb. ii. 17, 18, and iv. 15). The Mediator must be holy and without spot (Heb. vii. 26, and ix. 14, and 1 John iii. v.). He must be God to perform a work which men and angels could not do. As God-man we hope in CHRIST. His Manhood brings Him near to our affections. "Mercy and truth are met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other" (Ps. lxxxv. 10). CHRIST is the only Mediator (1 Tim. ii. 5), to the exclusion of saints and angels. He is Mediator for Jews and Gentiles, and of saints in the Old and New Testaments (Eph. ii. 11-22). He is the Propitiation for the sins of "the whole world" (1 John ii. 2). "He is a suitable, constant, willing, and prevalent Mediator; and His mediation always succeeds, and is infallible." "He is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them" (Heb. vii. 25). May all thus come to Him and find eternal salvation. He who rejects the king's son slights the king.

REV. S. F. HOTCHKIN.

Means of Grace. Since "Grace" has as its root idea the free gift out of good will, the means of grace are all those instruments for our growth in holiness which God of His love has given to each of us to use. From the Sacraments, in their place, down to the ordinary and usual Christian graces of a daily holy life, every part and act has its place under the collective title of the means of grace. In whatever channel He conveys graces to us, and in whatever degree He intrusts us with a share of that holiness without which no man can see God, so far we receive and use the means of grace. The Sacraments do ordinarily convey grace to us, in the limited sense we now use that word, and they are essential to our salvation because they are "the means." But, since our LORD by His ascension has given gifts to men, we may, nay, must, include all the instruments whereby He choose to convey both the results of His atonement and strength for our spiritual growth. Every gift of spiritual grace is a proof that He knows that His grace is sufficient for us. In this would be included, as indeed St. Paul does (Eph. iv. 7-16), the Apostolic office and the assisting officers. The peace and harmony of the Church, the steadfastness in the Faith, the growth in nearness to our LORD, to whom all grace was given without measure, and who divides through the HOLY GHOST severally to every man as He wills. In this sense the largeness of that thanksgiving for our redemption and for the means of grace and for the hope of glory come out prominently. It is in no narrow application to merely the Sacraments, principal means as they are, but in a breadth, fullness of appreciation of the fact that she is the appointed visible conveyer of these gifts, and the guide of the soul to Him who can bestow abundantly the more secret and special graces we each need according to our station. The Church uses this wonderfully pregnant phrase, "for the means of grace," in the prayer of thanksgiving she gives her children.

Menaia. These are the office-books of the Greek Church, which contain the variable parts of the offices for fixed festivals.

Mendicancy. A danger in the dispensation of Church charities is the encouragement of those who would idly live on the charity of others,—a danger which needs to be guarded against, and which has led to various organizations and methods by which such impostors may be detected and rejected. While this can never be wholly checked, and much must be given to underserving objects,—and let us remember that so our LORD must have bestowed His gracious aid,—yet the principle of requiring every applicant for aid to do something in return, and if possible to fairly earn it, is the best way, both of bestowing charity and of detecting those who would live upon others' bounty. To this end, Guilds and Brotherhoods in the Church or Parish could very well aid in organizing work and in distributing it properly and equitably. But the danger is greater in large cities than in small towns or villages. Still, the duty of giving involves the duty also of giving, or rather of distributing, the alms, relief, or aid to those who really deserve it, and therefore of administering the alms with Christian justice and charity; and so some recognized arrangement, even if informal, should exist in every parish, by which the rector could be aided in distinguishing the deserving poor from the mere mendicant.

Mercy. The act of GOD towards the sinner, whereby He offers His forgiveness and forbearance and the atonement of His SON. His mercy, is also a term gathering into one the facts of His love as well as His forbearance, His gracious gifts of life and abundant love and protection, as well as His forgiveness. "His tender mercies are over all His works," includes all creation. "God who is rich in mercy, for His great love, wherewith He hath loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with CHRIST," declares His life-giving love and mercy towards us. Therefore practically our LORD teaches, "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy."

Messiah. Vide TITLES of our LORD.

Metaphors. A form of expression that spiritualizes what is tangible, as, "Ye are the salt of the earth," is a metaphor, a substitution of one expression for another. Metaphors of this sort are frequent. "I am the light of the world," and, "I am the bread which came down from heaven," are metaphors our LORD uses, descriptive of Himself, so "I am the Good Shepherd," I am the Vine," "I am the Door." St. Paul uses such metaphors with great effect.

Metropolitan. The Bishop of the See in the metropolis of a Province. The title indicating a rank in the Episcopate is first found in the Nicene Canons. The Metropolitan was the Chief Bishop in the Province, holding the See of the capital of the Province, and so is identical with the Archbishop. A Metropolitan was not to have less than three Bishops under him. It is his duty to ordain the Bishops of his Province, to convocate Provincial Councils, to exercise a general disciplinary power over the Bishops; and clergy within the Province can appeal to him against their Bishops if aggrieved.

Micah (Who as JEHOVAH?), the Morasthite, stands the sixth in the order of the Minor Prophets as they are arranged in our Bibles. He was cotemporary with Hosea and Amos and Isaiah (Jer. xxvi. 18; Micah i. 1). His prophecies may be grouped into three sections. The first, which is in the first two chapters, recites in splendid language the coming of JEHOVAH to judge His people and His sore chastisements, but it closes the promise of restoration with a verse which the Fathers often applied to the Resurrection: "The Breaker is come up before them: they have broken up, and have passed through the gate, and are gone out by it: and their King shall pass before them, and the LORD on the head of them;" the second section begins with the third and ends with the close of the fifth chapter. Again the judgments and chastisements of the LORD are foretold, but now they are tempered with the promise of the ingathering of the heathen and of the birth of the "King of the Jews" (Matt. ii. 1-6). The last two chapters form the third portion. They are filled with God's visitation for the sins of the people, and yet in the midst of threatening, mercy and love and forgiveness are promised. Its last verse is taken up as fulfilled triumphantly in the birth of CHRIST. "Thou wilt perform the truth to Jacob and the mercy to Abraham which Thou hast sworn unto our fathers from the days of old," was incorporated by Zacharias into his hymn upon the birth of his son, St. John. The love of his people and his grief at what will befall them, his energetic warnings of the sins of Judah and of Israel, and above all his clear prophecies upon our LORD, which the chief priests and the scribes themselves quoted, make him one of the most notable of the Minor Prophets.

Michael, St. The name of one of the Archangels. In Daniel (x. and xii. 1) he is called a chief prince of the people. In Jude he is called the Archangel. He is the warrior prince of the heavenly host; the prince warring for the people of GOD; the caster out of Satan and his angels from heaven, yet not arrogating any power to himself. When contending with the devil he disputed about the body of Moses, durst not bring against him a railing accusation, but said, "The LORD rebuke thee" (compare the passage in Zechariah (iii. 1), where the "Angel of JEHOVAH" said unto Satan, "JEHOVAH rebuke thee, O Satan"). The Rabbins invented many tales about the Archangel, which, however, are but capricious inventions built on perhaps single words in Holy Scripture, and frequently not even on so slight a foundation. God's use, in His purposes, of angelic ministrations in their wondrous orders is commemorated in the festival of St. Michael and all angels on September 29.

Michigan. As Michigan was originally a part of the French province of Canada, there were no English settlers before the conquest of 1765 A.D. Even after that date English inhabitants were few, and many of them married into French families. Church of England services were held in the British garrison, but so far as certain knowledge extends, only one regular chaplain visited Detroit during the British rule. "It appears that the Rev. Chaplain Turring, of the Fifty-third Regiment, performed the marriage ceremony for Dr. George Christian Anthon in 1770 A.D., the father of the distinguished brothers, Henry, John, and Charles."

The commanding officer and the surgeon acted as chaplains when there was no clergyman. During the British occupation, which ended in 1796 A.D., the services were mostly by lay-readers, who were officers. Towards the end of the Revolutionary war the excellent David Zeisberger and other Moravian clergy established a colony about twenty-five miles from Detroit, near Mount Clemens, "and Zeisberger officiated occasionally at Detroit. They left Michigan in 1785 A.D. Thereafter there was no resident Episcopal clergyman for a long time, but Rev. Richard Pollard, an English missionary of the venerable Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, came to Western Canada, and frequently officiated in Detroit. Lay-reading seems to have been conducted with some regularity, chiefly by Dr. Wm. McDowell Scott, up to the war of 1812 A.D. In 1821 A.D., Rev. Alanson W. Welton, who had been a missionary in Western New York under Bishop Hobart, came to Detroit as a teacher, and officiated for a time. He died within a year of his arrival. At this time Michigan included Wisconsin, Iowa, and Minnesota."

Through the instrumentality of Bishop Hobart, the Church Missionary Society appointed Rev. Richard F. Cadle to the work in Detroit. He was a man of learning and piety and meekness, and of a conciliating temper. He at once drew to him the sympathies of "the feeble band of Churchmen." He was twelve days in going from New York to Detroit. He found three or four communicants and about forty persons inclined towards the Church. A small stone building, used as an Indian council-house, and for the courts and public meetings, was the place of service, being cleaned up on Saturday nights. Here was the germ of the Church in Michigan from which so many strong parishes have sprung. Now there are six Dioceses in the Territory then known as Michigan. Mr. Cadle's first missionary report was made in July, 1824 A.D. In December of that year the three communicants had increased to nine. In November of this year St. Paul's Parish was organized, and Mr. Cadle was chosen rector; the salary was one hundred and fifty dollars,—the Missionary Board added the same sum. In 1826 A.D. the worshipers had grown in numbers to sixty, and the communicants to twenty. In 1827 A.D. there is a notice of a Sunday-school with three teachers and twenty pupils. It was determined to build a church, and aid was asked from the East. A brick building, forty by sixty feet, "was, after much tribulation, completed." The building was afterwards improved in 1834 A.D., under the supervision of Judge Elliott, and an addition was made to it, and a tower built. Bishop Hobart, in 1827 A.D., laid the corner-stone and confirmed a large class. The next year he consecrated the building.

The history of one such parish is the history of many. The early missionaries in Michigan lacked the aids to travel which now abound. St. Andrew's, Ann Arbor, was incorporated in 1824 A.D. by Rev. Mr. Cadle. The point is now important as the seat of a University. St. John's, Troy, was incorporated in 1829 A.D. by Mr. Cadle, also the Church in Green Bay, Wisconsin, where he had an Indian Mission. We cannot leave this pioneer missionary without a further notice. He toiled faithfully to the last. He died in 1858 A.D., while rector of St. Luke's Church, Seaford, Delaware, having worked on in illness. Bishop Lee styles him "the beloved and venerated Cadle," and "an earnest minister of CHRIST."

St. Luke's, Ypsilanti, was incorporated in 1830 A.D., by Rev. Silas C. Freeman; Trinity, Monroe, in 1831 A.D., by Rev. Richard Bury; and St. Peter's, Tecumseh, in 1832 A.D., by Rev. Silas C. Freeman.

On September 10, 1832 A.D., delegates met at Detroit from Detroit, Monroe, Dexter, Ypsilanti, Tecumseh, and Troy, and organized a Diocese. Michigan Territory then extended from the Canada line to the Mississippi River. Rev. Richard Bury, rector of St. Paul's, Detroit, was one of the leaders in this action. He lived long to see the fruit of his work. At the time of this Convention, Bishop P. Chase lived in the southern part of Michigan Territory, and "at and near Green Bay were Rev. Mr. Cadle, Rev. Daniel L. Brown, and Rev. Eleazer Williams. Mr. Cadle endeavored to get delegates sent by his vestry, but the time was too short to convene them before the steamer left." Mr. Bury was a delegate to the General Convention, and was instrumental in securing the admission of the Diocese of Michigan. The Constitution provided, at that time, only for State Conventions. As Michigan was a Territory, one committee disagreed as to its admission, a second viewed the matter more favorably. Of this subject Judge Campbell gives the following explanation: "The treaty being within the articles of compact contained in the ordinance of 1787 A.D. (passed before the adoption of the United States Constitution) was considered by jurists as having an absolute right to become a State on attaining a certain amount of population, and the analogy was therefore closer than it might have been otherwise to a State of the Union."

A Standing Committee was elected. The Rev. Mr. Bury, Rev. Silas C. Freeman, and Rev. John O'Brien were the clerical members; and Messrs. Henry Whiting, Elon Farnsworth, Henry M. Campbell, Charles C. Trowbridge, and Seneca Allen the lay members. Mr. Trowbridge, the last survivor, was re-elected every year until 1883 A.D., when he died.

The Diocese the year after its formation placed itself under the spiritual jurisdiction of Bishop McIlvaine, of Ohio, and in May 1834 A.D., he made visitations in Detroit

Tecumseh, and Monroe, "confirming the churches." Sickness prevented him from visiting Green Bay (now in Wisconsin), as he had intended. He presided in the Convention at Monroe, and urged the Diocese to choose a Bishop. In the next year the Convention at Tecumseh elected Rev. Dr. H. J. Whitehouse, of Rochester, N. Y. (afterward Bishop of Illinois). He declined to accept the election. At the election there were but six Presbyters in the Diocese, the minimum number for such a purpose; one afterward withdrew; but the General Convention, by a Canon, authorized the House of Bishops, in such an emergency, to elect a Bishop upon the request of a Diocese. In 1836 A.D., by this arrangement, Rev. Samuel A. McCoskry, D.D., was consecrated as Bishop. The election of Bishop McCoskry was Bishop White's last official act. It was understood that the Bishop could be supported only by being rector of St. Paul's, Detroit, but neither parish nor Diocese nominated or suggested who should be Bishop.

The new Bishop entered on his work at a period when fearful financial difficulties were about to afflict the country at large. Speculation had affected even the wise men and professional and business leaders. Western land ventures were rife, and New York and New England were interested in them. The Michigan people felt wealthy, but it was a paper wealth, and would soon flee away. St. Paul's Parish relied on annual subscriptions. The Bishop arrived in 1836 A.D. He brought with him two missionaries, Rev. Samuel Marks and Rev. Henry F. White-side. The Bishop, accompanied by Mr. Trowbridge, a lay member of the Standing Committee, and warden of St. Paul's, Detroit, visited the populated part of his Diocese, "traveling about five hundred miles, over horrid roads, passing several weeks, preaching every day or evening, in the small school-houses, reading prayers by the light of a tallow dip, sometimes held by a village magnate."

An Episcopal Fund was begun, founded on profits of uncertain ventures.

In 1837 A.D. the revulsion came. Failures were incessant throughout the whole country. Specie payments were suspended; distress followed and continued till 1844 A.D. It was feared that the clergy would be forced to give up their work, but their "courage and devotion" endured the test, and the noble men remained, though it was nearly ten years before there was any considerable addition to the number of the clergy. All Church enterprises languished. An effort to establish a Diocesan paper failed.

The Episcopal Fund, valued at $8000 in 1838 A.D., came to nothing.

A charter was, at a later period, obtained by Rev. Dr. F. H. Cuming for a Church college to be located at Grand Rapids, and to be called St. Mark's. In 1850 A.D. it was opened under the presidency of Rev.

Charles C. Taylor, and one hundred and ninety pupils attended, but the effort was abandoned. There were other similar attempts and similar failures.

In 1874 A.D. the division of the Diocese was effected, and the once feeble Church became two bands.

The indefatigable labors of the clergy resulted in gradual Church growth. The communicants increased one-third, the Sunday-schools four-tenths.

In 1878 A.D., Bishop McCoskry resigned his jurisdiction.

In 1879 A.D., Rev. Dr. Samuel Smith Harris, Rector of St. James' Church, Chicago, was elected Bishop. His acceptance was received with joy, and his work has been successful. Among the foreign population pouring into his Diocese "he has found a goodly portion who are attached to this household of faith." New churches and chapels have been consecrated, and others are being erected; from the older parishes the stigma of Church debt has been removed; everything betokens thorough work." The Episcopal Fund has been increased from $32,000 to $86,500, "besides the Episcopal residence, valued at $20,000. Three years were allotted to the committee in which to obtain this increase. It was perfected in six weeks."

Diocesan Missions early engaged the attention of the Diocese. In 1850 A.D. the system of annual pledges from parishes and individuals was adopted. The collections for Diocesan Missions under this system, "from 1851 to 1874 A.D. inclusive, the year of the division, amounted to $64,103.82; from 1874 to 1883 A.D. inclusive, $31,217.47; for Domestic and Foreign Missions, 1857 to 1874 A.D., $37,157.84; 1875 to 1883 A.D. inclusive, $28,766.78."

From 1861 to 1883 A.D. inclusive, "the contributions for church building, aid to feeble churches, alms for the poor, help to aged and infirm clergymen, St. Luke's Hospital and Church Home, Society for the Increase of the Ministry, Indian and Freedmen's Missions, excluding missions and parish expenses, were $1,930,771.02." The clergy in 1883 A.D. numbered 66, lay-readers 25, communicants 8472, Sunday-school teachers and officers 943, scholars 8249; value of church property, $1,230,000; total number of church sittings, 23,000, about one-half of which are free. There are completed edifices at seventy-nine points, with appended chapels to several of them. There are twenty-three rectories."

"The revenue from the Episcopal Funds is supplemented by annual assessments upon the parishes to make up the yearly expenses of the Diocese. Annual collections are made for the Fund for the Relief of Aged and Infirm Clergymen, and the Widows of Deceased Clergymen. This fund, in the old Diocese, is now $7000, and is constantly increasing."

The principal Diocesan institution is the Church Association, a corporation including leading laymen of different parishes. It holds and executes trusts, titles to land, for church sites and bequests. It had excellent legal aid in its formation, and has received grants of land, and been nominated trustee in wills. "It has been instrumental in building several churches and chapels." "It acts from love to souls. No salaries or fees are paid to any of its officers."

St. Luke's Hospital and Church Home, Detroit, is supported by the Detroit parishes. It is not a Diocesan institution. It can accommodate forty patients and aged infirm people; but large additions are in contemplation in the near future. It owns ten acres of ground. "A chapel on the grounds in memory of Mrs. Catherine W. S. Trowbridge, was consecrated on the 27th of February, 1881 A.D." Mr. Trowbridge closes the sketch, from which these details are drawn, in these words: "Summing up the facts here briefly related, and looking back to July, 1824 A.D., when the meek Cadle gave the bread of life to three or four communicants; to the little flock of forty hearers, some of whom probably were curious to know 'what this babbler would say;' to the dirty little Indian council-house; to the salary of one hundred and fifty dollars; to 1827 A.D., and the Sunday-school of three teachers and twenty pupils, ought not the members of this branch of CHRIST's earthly kingdom to bow with humble gratitude, and to show forth their thankfulness by renewed efforts to extend that kingdom?" The faithful layman who wrote these words, and the devoted clergyman whom he describes, rest together in the Paradise of God, and rejoice together that they were permitted to work for CHRIST in the wilds of Michigan.

The sketch of Michigan owes its value to the pamphlet history of the Diocese, prepared by the late Hon. C. C. Trowbridge for the Michigan Pioneer Collection, vol. iii., with annotations kindly furnished by Judge Campbell.

REV. S. F. HOTCHKIN.

Militant. The Church as the army of CHRIST here on earth is called the Church Militant. Its true mission is to be aggressive, or rather progressive in fulfilling the work committed to it. Its members must not only war against the world, the flesh, and the devil for their own spiritual life, but they must contend earnestly for the faith once committed to the saints, speaking the truth in love, pushing on all organized labor, aiding in sustaining Mission work, whenever possible sharing in the active work, as in Vestries, in Guilds, Brotherhoods, Sunday-schools, and other such works. Each member of the Church is able to take his place in the ranks as a faithful soldier, and is vowed to do all this faithfully, without fear, without shame. But as a body the Church must be Militant or it is dead. It must use the whole armor of God, and every weapon of holy warfare which the Captain has furnished that he may fulfill

His commission. To keep this important fact ever before us is a chief use of the bidding sentence at the head of that Prayer in the Communion Service.

Millennium. The thousand years' reign of CHRIST upon the earth (Rev. xx. 6, 7). The views and interpretations upon this most difficult prophecy are as various and numerous as there are commentators to pen them. It is an intricate and obscure passage, and while it is revealed for a purpose, it will be for the greater confirmation of the Faithful in the time of future trial than for any present use, but it will be ever a subject of deepest interest, as all prophecy must be, and especially that which relates to the future of the Christian religion. In the special interpretation of the prophecy we find that there are two schools, the one accepting literally the Presence of our LORD, however obscured, the other giving it a mystical interpretation. The first class of interpreters also receive literally the preceding "first resurrection." The second class apply this to the spiritual resurrection (St. John v. 24, 25).

Vagaries which sprang up in the Church from the introduction of Judaic notions, led to a misapplication of the passage in the Revelation, and so to a depreciation of the book itself, and for a while it was undeservedly classed among the doubtful books. But when the grotesque notions of the Chiliasts lost their influence in the Church the Revelation was restored to its true place in the as yet undefined Canon. (Vide CANON OF SCRIPTURE.) These gross views passed into the doctrinal schemes of several heretical bodies, as the Montanists or Marcionites, but a far more refined and intellectual view was current among some of the Fathers of the earlier Church. Still, it did not come prominently forward in public instruction, though there were always many earnest men who held and often urged a realistic explanation, without countenancing any of the whimsical deductions formerly attached to it. But the Anabaptists (1530 A.D.) by their vile and abominable excesses prevented any cool discussions upon the doctrine. They produced such a reaction that the Augustan Confession contained an Anathema against it. It, however, appears in the Catechism Edward VI. (Liturgies, Parker Society) published in 1553 A.D. The doctrine was put forward a few years ago in this country and gained at one time a large adherence, since its propagators set a time for its fulfillment, which date is now past. But it is fading away, and those who hold it do so rather as adhering to the organization than from the cause which first gathered them together, the certainty of a fixed date for its fulfillment. The late Dean Alford, in his Commentary, records his deliberate acceptance of a literal fulfillment. "If the first resurrection is spiritual then so is the second; . . . but if the second be literal then so is the first, which in common with the whole Primitive Church, and many of the best modern expositors, I do maintain and receive as an article of faith and hope." (Note to Rev. xx. 4-6.)

Minnesota, History of the Protestant Episcopal Church in. The territory included in the Diocese of Minnesota originally formed a part of the missionary jurisdiction of the Rt. Rev. Jackson Kemper, D.D., Missionary Bishop of the Northwest. In the year 1859 A.D. the present Bishop, the Rt. Rev. Henry Benjamin Whipple, D.D., was elected and entered upon the duties of his office.

The first clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Minnesota of whom we have any record was the Rev. E. G. Gear, D.D., who was appointed Chaplain at Fort Snelling in 1839 A.D. He also established the services of the Episcopal Church in St. Paul at an early day.

In 1850 A.D. the Rev. Messrs. J. Lloyd Breck, Timothy Wilcoxson, and J. Austen Merrick established an Associate Mission at St. Paul for missionary and educational work. The Mission opened a school and had in training one candidate for the ministry. The clergy held services in the different settlements of the Territory, extending their labors as far as La Crosse in Wisconsin.

Soon after their arrival the corner-stone of Christ Church, St. Paul, was laid, and before the close of the year another church edifice was begun at the Falls of St. Anthony. The Mission had in view theological training, church building, the endowment of the Episcopate, the purchase of land for parish glebes, and mission buildings wherever needed. The same year the lands now held in trust by the corporation organized in 1857 A.D., and known as the Minnesota Church Foundation, were purchased. The present value of this property is $50,000.

The record of the first year's work shows 50 baptisms and 8000 miles traveled by the clergy, mostly on foot. Bishop Kemper visited 14 stations in charge of the Mission and consecrated Christ Church, St. Paul. Thirteen persons were confirmed at this visitation. The number of communicants in St. Paul in 1852 A.D. was 26. Offerings the first year, $600. At the close of the year 1852 A.D. there were three churches,—one at St. Paul, and one at St. Anthony Falls and Stillwater.

In the year 1852 A.D., application having been made by the Chippewas for a teacher, a mission was established by Dr. Breck at Gull Lake, which was also greatly aided by the Rev. Solon W. Manney, who had lately been appointed Chaplain at Fort Ripley. A church was soon built, and the Indians began to adopt the habits of civilized life. In 1853 A.D. another mission was begun at Leech Lake. In 1854 A.D. over 30 Indians had been received into the Christian fold. Three Indians and one white youth were in training for the ministry. The work continued to prosper until the middle of 1857 A.D., when the Indians at Leech Lake, in consequence of the sale of whisky, became hostile, and the missionaries were obliged to flee for safety. For a time the work was abandoned. More than 100 Indians had been baptized and 22 prepared for confirmation, 400 were working during some part of the year, and an offering had been made by them for theological training at Nashota, Wis., of $59.90. Dr. Breck had received application for a teacher from seven different stations.

The discouraging aspect of the Indian field turned the attention of Dr. Breck to the educational work, for which more especially he had come to Minnesota. His associate, however, the Rev. E. Steele Peake, and Enmegahbowh resumed the work under great discouragements. After his consecration in 1859 A.D., Bishop Whipple became warmly interested in the welfare of the Indians. By his untiring efforts the work revived. At present (1883 A.D.) there are 1500 Indians at White Earth living as civilized men; a beautiful church has been erected this year with 600 sittings, and over 200 communicants in charge of two Indian clergymen. There are two Indian churches at White Rice River, two at Red Lake, one at Leech Lake, in charge of native pastors, with from 20 to 60 communicants each. There is a hospital with 20 beds in charge of a government physician. The entire work is under the superintendence of Rev. J. A. Gilfillan.

In 1856 A.D. the Rev. D. B. Knickerbacker, D.D., began to hold services in Minneapolis, in Gethsemane, the mother-parish of the city. By his labors, aided by the generous gifts and co-operation of the laity, the Church has rapidly increased in numbers. In 1883 A.D. there were nine church edifices.

In 1857 A.D., Messrs. Breck and Manney selected Faribault as the location of a school, which was opened the following year by Dr. Breck and the Rev. D. P. Sanford, D.D. Three candidates for the ministry and three postulants were connected with the Mission. This was a continuation of the Associate Mission founded by Dr. Breck at St. Paul in 1850 A.D., and included the mission to the Chippewas. It was supported by contributions through the correspondence of Dr. Breck.

In 1857 A.D. a Primary Convention was held in St. Paul, at which a Constitution and Canons were adopted. Fifteen clergy besides Bishop Kemper were present.

At the First Annual Convention, in 1858 A.D., the number of clergy belonging to the Diocese was 22. There were 12 parishes, besides mission stations. This year St. Paul's Parish began to worship in their new church. This parish was founded by Rev. A. B. Paterson, D.D., and has been distinguished for its large charities.

In 1859 A.D. the Rev. H. B. Whipple was elected Bishop of the Diocese, and consecrated at Richmond, Va., October 13, following. In the spring of 1860 A.D. he decided to make Faribault the Episcopal residence, where Drs. Breck and Manney were in charge of the work of the Associate Mission.

The following decade saw a large growth in Church work in the rural districts. In 1867 A.D. there were 37 clergy, 17 candidates for holy orders, 1720 communicants, and 396 confirmations. A large number of stations were cared for. The parishes in St. Paul, Minneapolis, and Red Wing were centres of wide influence. The latter, under the charge of Rev. E. R. Welles, D.D., the present Bishop of Wisconsin, had one Deacon besides lay-helpers, a parish school, and several stations in the country, where regular services were maintained by the Rector and his assistants.

In the year 1860 A.D. a Mission was begun by the Rev. S. D. Hinman at the Red Wood Agency, among the Sioux, which prospered until the outbreak in 1862 A.D. Numbers of the Christian Indians were loyal to the whites. This Mission was removed in 1867 A.D. to the missionary jurisdiction of Nebraska.

In the second decade of Bishop Whipple's Episcopate the schools at Faribault reached their present flourishing condition. By his efforts Shattuck School, named in honor of Dr. George C. Shattuck, of Boston, the Seabury Divinity School, and St. Mary's Hall have been provided with commodious buildings. The Divinity School has 8 professors, 25 students, 56 Alumni, and a library of 5000 volumes. Shattuck School, a military school for boys, is the outgrowth of the Parish School opened by Dr. Breck in 1858 A.D. It has accommodations for one hundred and twelve boarding pupils, with nine teachers. The present Rector, Rev. James Dobbin, succeeded Dr. Breck on his retiring from the Mission in 1867 A.D. St. Mary's Hall, a boarding-school for young ladies, was opened by the Bishop in 1866 A.D. It has accommodations for one hundred boarders. The first principal was Miss S. P. Darlington. The Cathedral at Faribault has seven hundred sittings, and is held in trust by the Bishop. Seabury Mission, incorporated in 1860 A.D., is under the care of the Bishop, and is occupied by the schools and parish for divine service.

Other schools under the auspices of the Protestant Episcopal Church are the Bishop Whipple School at Moorhead, founded by the Rev. T. E. Dickey in 1882 A.D., with accommodations for ninety boarders, and St. Catherine's School, for young ladies, at St. Paul, of which Rev. E. S. Thomas is Rector.

Eleemosynary institutions are located as follows: St. Barnabas' Hospital at Minneapolis, with accommodations for fifty patients; the Sheltering Arms, an orphanage, with accommodations for fifty children, also in Minneapolis; there is a hospital in St. Paul, and also one at Duluth, with fifty beds.

REV. GEORGE C. TANNER.

Miracles. The Almighty, in His dealings with men, has usually chosen to act through certain agencies, and upon certain principles which He has laid down. When these have been inadequate to produce special desired results, He has brought in, for the occasion, some power or agency, unexerted, and, in His ordinary government of us, needless, and yet perfectly in harmony with all previously ordained laws. A miracle is not a violation of nature; it is a special exercise of power above and beyond nature. If God controls the world at all. He can, as in the whole history of the Jewish nation, bring in any number of agencies otherwise unknown to His creatures, whenever He judges best. But revelation does not demand of us belief of Divine interposition in every strange circumstance. Misunderstanding of Scripture has resulted from magnifying into miracles many events only a little out of the order of daily occurrence. But it is weak to underrate miracles because of such mistaken zeal; because we cannot comprehend them; or because they are not accomplished under those laws which, on account of their regularity, we claim to understand. What we call the laws of nature are, for us, only our deductions from our observations of the regularity with which the God of nature continues His unwearying support of what He has made. And until we know all of those laws, and comprehend them fully, we cannot assume that that which occurs occasionally is any contradiction of what occurs every day. The Supreme Maker has a right to exert special powers, at times, in His own world; and why should He not alter what we call the course of nature, or intensify the power which He usually exerts, as well as retain His power always in equal measure? And as He rules the moral as well as the physical world, and cares more for its moral good than for its mere physical order, it is certain that the laws of nature may well yield occasionally, at His will, to laws governing the moral world. So far from there being anything contradictory in this, with a God so accurate and beneficent, extraordinary Divine interpositions are only what a reasonable mind might expect; and none should be so credulous as to suppose that the vast universe could go on without the intervention of its all-wise Creator, or be so foolish as to attempt to explain miracles, so as to make them comprehensible by such limited capacities as ours, or correspondent with ordinary laws; for this virtually disposes of the miracle altogether. Miracles have been accorded to us to solve all doubts respecting the authority of the Bible. They prove its inspiration. "As the existence of power is demonstrated by its operations, so the possession of supernatural knowledge is proved by supernatural works, or miracles."

Dr. Kitto distinguishes the Old Testament miracles as of three classes: 1. Miracles of Fact, events different from the ordinary course of nature, as dividing the sea, raising the dead, and causing the shadow to go back. 2. Miracles of Time, or Prophecy-Miracles, events foretold as to occur at a particular time, and which did accordingly occur. 3. Miracles of Circumstance, or the application of ordinary circumstances to bring about ends so special and determinate as to manifest Divine interposition. In the Old Testament we may recognize as miracles all those wonders wherein the circumstances clearly indicate that a miracle was necessary,—i.e., when natural agencies, through which God generally chooses to act, were inadequate to produce His special required end. Many were wrought to typify the miraculous advent of the promised REDEEMER, or some circumstance connected with it. The magicians of Egypt wrought "enchantments," but with the bold design of retarding truth; and these bore the same relation to miracles as does the counterfeit to the coin. Their only value is to prove the fact that there were real miracles, which otherwise they could not have attempted to counterfeit.

In the New Testament we are distinctly told that CHRIST wrought miracles and gave His disciples power to do so. Their design was both to mark Divine interposition in the affairs of men, and, among extraordinary difficulties, to establish the all-essential claims of the world's REDEEMER. Possessing requisite characters to indicate their truth, we accept them as manifesting Him as indeed the long prophesied MESSIAH. The six criteria of Horne (Introduction, ch. iv. sec. 2) to test a miracle apply to His. These, condensed, are: 1. A fact given as miraculous should have an important design worthy of its author. 2. It must be instantaneously and publicly performed. 3. It must be such that men can judge of it. 4. It must be independent of second causes. 5. Memorials and observances must be performed in memory of it. 6. These must have been instituted at the time when it took place, and never have been interrupted. The miracles of CHRIST and of those whom He empowered combined all these criteria, and were all wrought with one kind, noble design. Unlike the imitations of Simon Magus, to deceive, or those of pagan pretenders, merely to astonish or uphold superstition, they were all to urge a helpful and elevating doctrine. Each was "in small, and upon one side or another, a partial and transient realization of the great work for which He came, that in the end He might accomplish it perfectly and forever." Each was part of His redemptive work, not a "gratuitous and barren wonder," but at once an illustration and argument to receive that spiritual benefit of which the outward kind act was but a figure. Leprosy was the type of sin, and His miraculous cure of it taught CHRIST's power and readiness to cleanse from sin. Restored eyesight enforced the need of help from Him who "lighteth every man that cometh into the world," if they would see God. Raising from the dead taught a great spiritual and bodily redemption. And so each miracle was both a temporal mercy and an illustration of spiritual succor.

Even the Jews of His time, or the heathen, never denied the reality of CHRIST's miracles. Jews, in malignity, attributed them to the supernatural power of the evil one, and reproached Him with inability to save Himself although confessing that He had power to save others. And the heathen attributed them to magic, but freely admitted their reality. But, no matter to what cause all might assign them, their consent to their reality was the involuntary confession of enemies of their supernatural origin.

The crowning miracle of all was CHRIST's Resurrection. Upon the truth of that depends the whole Christian faith, with all its hopes and promises. The Christian who questions miracles casts a doubt upon this miracle; and if he have a flaw in his faith in this, he surrenders all hope of rescue from the condition of condemnation into which his natural birth brought him. "If CHRIST be not raised, . . . ye are yet in your sins" (1 Cor. xv. 17). And the reason is, that CHRIST founded everything upon this. Upon no prediction did he lay such stress. Disciples and enemies alike were told to look for it. It was as if He had said, "I am the long-promised Divine MESSIAH. I will pay the price of men's sins with my life and save them; and, if I am what I claim to be, then look, upon the third day after my death, and you will see that I have done what I say that I can and will do, and will raise myself from death; and this will be to you my overwhelming proof of the truth of all that I have promised, for only God could work such a miracle, and if I am God, then it must be beyond all question that everything that I have told you that I would do for you can only be truth." So apprehensive were His enemies lest men be persuaded that He would accomplish this most important and conclusive miracle, which would be indeed the utter conquest over them, that they used every possible means to prevent it, and even prepared a falsehood beforehand to hinder men from giving credit to it when it should take place.

And so necessary was this miracle for the salvation of men, that ten times did JESUS supply evidence of its achievement, five hundred persons at one time seeing Him, of whom the greater number were alive to corroborate the accounts of it when published to the world, or deny or question it, had it not taken place.

And this Resurrection-miracle bears the six tests proposed to prove all miracles: 1. Its important design—our eternal happiness and the praise of the Eternal Trinity—is worthy of its merciful and loving Author. 2. It was instantaneously performed, and was publicly proved. 3. Men—even a doubting Apostle and enemies—had ample opportunities to judge of it; and confessed, or dared not attempt to controvert it. 4. It was wholly independent of second causes, as He had power not only to lay down His life, but proved His own power to take it again (St. John x. 18). 5. Memorials and observances of it have been continued to the present day. 6. And these were instituted at the very time, Easter becoming early an important day in the Church, which has continued to regard the day as “the queen of festivals,” the Resurrection being the corner-stone of the whole edifice, nations and generations hanging, as for life, upon that as their one hope of their own resurrection; their only hope of rescue from death eternal; their one, only hope that soul and body may be redeemed in heaven.

If any is tempted from his steadfast faith in miracles by the subtle, plausible, stealthy propensity of the day to explain away God's power and His gracious will to interpose kindly in men's affairs for their good, or would endeavor to drag these supernatural works within the little circle of weak human comprehension, let him remember that he belittles time to his peril. For, if there be an ALMIGHTY, He can work miracles; if He be “Love,” He will work them readily for those whom He loves; if He has devised an all-wise plan for saving men, and gives proof to convince and win them, even such as the Resurrection of the Son of God, telling us that this is part, and the consummating part, of that plan, and as the first-fruits, the pledge of our eternal garnering, then woe to him who, Pharisee-like, is willing enough to be saved by a greater than his own human strength, but regards himself superior to all that is amazing in the amazing scheme, and keeps himself down within the government of mere nature's laws, laws under which he was only born in sin and weakness, and which can do nothing to deliver him from death. Evil, brought into the world by a supernatural seducer, has been met by an infinite supernatural Power, and miraculously conquered.

And, beyond the advantage to us, God may have many unknown designs for other portions of His great universe, in the marvellous wonders which He has performed, and is daily performing.

Mission. The sending forth to preach the Gospel. As our LORD at the first sent forth the Apostles and the seventy, and distinctly declared that His sending gave them power, and then after His resurrection gave them their commission as based on His own (“As my Father hath sent Me, even so send I you”), the mission or the authority to preach, properly given, is essential to the validity of a ministry. It involves the right as well as the power. Power (or ability) to exercise Priestly duties and functions is inherent in the office, but the field in which this power is to be wielded constitutes mission. Our LORD sent the Apostles into all the world, but they parted the field between themselves at first on the broadest lines, as when St. Peter and St. Paul divided their jurisdictions into preaching, the one to the Circumcision, the other to the Uncircumcision. And then St. Paul exercised his Apostolic authority by sending Titus to Crete, Timothy to Ephesus, and others of his companions on separate missionary expeditions, as Crescens to Galatia. When our present diocesan system was developed (Vide DIOCESE), mission meant jurisdiction over and in only that Diocese, and any Bishop who intruded became thereby, and so far, guilty of schismatical acts, for he had no mission therein. In a certain sense as depending upon Church enactment, mission is an ecclesiastical arrangement, but it really is much more than that, for it is based upon the Divine Law of order and harmonious working in the Church; “for God is not the author of confusion, but of peace, as in all Churches of the Saints” (1 Cor. xiv. 33). For this reason no Bishop can be consecrated as Bishop at large, as it were. He must have a field assigned him, and that field he must retain till wholly disabled or removed. Therefore the resignation of a Bishop must be reluctantly accepted, and only for good cause. From this it follows that mission cannot be conferred at will, but according to the fundamental law of the Church, and in consonance with Ecclesiastical and Canon law. A consecration or an ordination, therefore, which does not include also a mission, must be irregular, though it may be in itself a valid consecration. But it is conferring a power and granting a commission without also granting the jurisdiction in which to use it, and therefore it contains an element of discord and so of schism.

The recognition of this principle is contained clearly in five several places in the Gospels: (a) The appointed chief of the nation had a right to ask of St. John Baptist, “Who art thou? Art thou Elias? Art thou that prophet?” and in reply he gave his mission, “I am the Voice of one crying in the wilderness." His mission had been determined for him by the HOLY GHOST speaking by Isaiah. (b) Nicodemus acknowledged CHRIST's mission: "Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God, for no man can do these miracles that thou doest except God be with him." (c) The chief Priests had a right to ask Him, "By what authority doest thou these things, and who gave Thee this authority?" only they forfeited the right to a reply by the spirit in which they asked it. (d) Our LORD twice enforces this, first, "Ye have not chosen Me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you that ye should go and bring forth fruit;" (e) and, secondly, after the Resurrection it was formally conferred: "As My FATHER hath sent Me, even so send I you." The Apostles recognized it by sending SS. Peter and John on a special mission to Samaria, and in the cases of SS. Paul and Barnabas.

With reverence be it said, but Holy Scripture shows to us these principles of mission and jurisdiction in the eternal counsels of the TRINITY. Our LORD is the Apostle, sent with a special mission and a universal jurisdiction. The HOLY GHOST is sent by our LORD, and is the ever-present Apostle, conferring Apostolic grace and mission upon His visible agents, and so for us having a special jurisdiction in the work of our salvation.

Missionary. One sent upon a mission; a clergyman who is doing the work of an Evangelist in preaching the Gospel to men, whether in missionary work at home or abroad.

Missions. The Church has never forgotten her missionary character, but has at all times, with varying zeal and energy, carried on her work. From the first she has been mindful of her LORD's command, and has gone out into all lands, so that now there are few places on the face of the earth where the Gospel either has not been preached or whither efforts are not in preparation to carry it. The following very compressed outline of her work from the earliest time can give but a faint idea of what has been done.

From Jerusalem her work was borne to Samaria, and then the centre of missionary activity was transferred to Antioch. From this point the fervid zeal of St. Paul carried the Gospel into Asia Minor, and over into Macedonia, Thessaly, and Greece. The Gospel was preached and the Church established from Babylon on the Euphrates to Spain by the time of his martyrdom, and by that time, or very soon after, Africa, Gaul, and Britain had been pressed by the feet of Apostolic missionaries, or rather of Christians who made this a necessary duty, for as yet there were no organized missionary efforts in the modern sense of the word, and indeed persecution would seriously interfere with the success of any such combined efforts. But even before peace came to the Church we find that Pantænus had been sent on a mission to India. Origen had done some mission work in Arabia. Frumentius was doing good work in Abyssinia. But soon after the Council of Nicea, Ulphilas, himself a Goth, set himself to work among his countrymen, translating the Gospels into their tongue, so that his praise is literally in the Gospels. Eusebius of Vercelli, 370 A.D., made his Cathedral the centre of a wide mission work. But to St. Chrysostom is due the honor of organizing such work by starting a training school for Gothic missionaries, and, when in exile, soliciting funds for mission work. The example was not immediately followed, but the monastic institutions which were becoming popular were to become, after a season, centres of missionary work. The wars with the barbaric invaders destroyed very much of the power to conduct mission work, and only here and there was it kept up. From the islet of Lerins (410 A.D.), in the roadstead of Toulon, the work went forth into southern Gaul. But the distractions of the succeeding age hindered again the work. It was taken up by strange hands. From the almost forgotten isle of Britain and Ireland there went forth men who had been providentially trained for the task. St. Patrick had established Christianity in Ireland and had given it an impulse which lasted for ages after. This zeal had produced many monks and ascetics, such as Columba, the Apostle to the Scots and Picts, Aidan, the Apostle to the Northumbrian Saxons, Columbanus, the Apostle to the Burgundians, Gallus to the Swiss, Killian to the Thuringians, Virgilius to the Carinthians, and many more, who flung themselves into the struggle with inspired zeal and faith. But during the greater part of this era the Saxons were conquering England, and they at the first received the light of the Gospel, not from the British Christians they had cooped up in Wales, but from Augustine, the monk sent by Gregory the Great. His chief work, and that of his Latin followers, was to break the way, for nearly all the permanent work was accomplished by the Celtic and Welsh missionaries working from the north and west. The two lines of authority met in the gentle St. Chad. But the Anglo-Saxons were themselves ready to plunge into the strife as soon as they had received the faith. Christianity, though dominant, had not fairly exterminated paganism out of England before Wilfrid of York, wrecked on Friesland coasts, began to teach the men on the sea-coast. This was taken up by Willibrod. The brothers Hewald sealed their mission to the continental Saxons with their blood. Swithbert and a goodly company toiled on the shores of the German Ocean and the Baltic, while soon after Winfrith, or Boniface, led the way for the conversion of the Germans. With only the barest necessities, a staff, a scrip, and a leathern bottle, a case for his service books and vessels, ready to build a booth and sleep on the ground under it, the Celtic monk laid the foundations of an enduring work, for it was built upon Faith. Rigid in discipline, self-denying, and eager to proclaim his message, he made a deep impression on the heathen, who listened to him under their forest oaks. His chapel was rudely built, and his hut was a poor protection. To him succeeded the Benedictine monk, who changed the active guerrilla mode of warfare into the well-planned system of centrally placed monasteries. A grant of wild waste wood or fell from the overlord was the first step, and from that, as the monks proved worthy by their earnestness, gifts, aid, additional members flowed in, till the monasteries became centres of education, and sometimes were turned into influential Sees. As rapidly as possible a native clergy was gathered and trained. It was the generosity of Charlemagne and of his sons that laid most securely the power of these already established centres. It was a long toil, but the laborers were ready to bear the burden and heat of the day. As yet (826 A.D.) the Northman had not been reached. Ebbo, the versatile Archbishop of Rheims, planned a mission to the Swedes, which fell to the lot of Ansgar to execute. His work was nearly lost, when the Danish King Canute, of England, sent missionaries thither. And later, Olaf the king, himself a convert, established Christianity there. The Peninsula owes its Faith to Englishmen. There came a pause in aggressive work, which was not broken, save by a few futile efforts of single enthusiasts among the Moors of Africa and the Saracens of the East, till the discovery of America. In the carrying the witness of Christianity to the Indians of this country the Roman Church took the lead, organizing missions, erecting sees, establishing churches; but its work has been ever a shifting one, wherever the Spaniard or the Frenchman did not also establish a state. Most noted were the French missions in Canada, and adown the Mississippi River. The ruthless conduct of the Spaniards in Mexico and South America forced a Christianity upon the southern Indian, which he can hardly understand to this day. These efforts led to the establishment and proper equipment of the Congregation of the Propaganda at Rome. While the work of the first missions in this country was germinating, the romantic mission of the famous St. Francis Xavier (1542-1551 A.D.) in India, Ceylon, and Japan was executed. The establishment of the English Church here will be found recounted in the sketch of the American Church. After the Revolution and the gift of the Episcopate to the Churchmen in these United States, Mr. Pitt consented to erect a See in Nova Scotia, and Dr. Inglis was consecrated to it in 1787 A.D. Six years later Quebec was made a Bishopric, and since that time the missionary efforts of the Church of England have never relaxed. To Dr. Bray's efforts, after his residence as Commissary for the Bishop of London in this country, are due two of the English organizations, the Christian Knowledge Society and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. By the aid of these and of their offshoot, the Church Missionary Society, the English missions have deepened and widened, till now the world is girded round with more than an hundred and twenty Bishoprics, which owe their mission to the Mother-Church of England, and all have been established within a century.

Missions of the American Church. The planting of the Church in America and its maintenance for nearly two centuries, feebly and grudgingly as the work was done, was genuine missionary work. The Church here was a mission of the Church of England. After the establishment of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in 1704 A.D., the Church acted more understandingly in her missionary character, and, outside of Maryland and Virginia, the clergy were supported by that society. The Revolutionary war deprived them of this source of revenue, and from that time down to, say 1820 A.D., the American Church was engaged in the struggle for existence. That question once settled, in the face of a bitter and persistent opposition, another came up for its answer, —whether the Church which had been adapted to England was adapted to America, whether this Church of Bishops and Liturgy, which suited the cultivated few, could adapt itself to the new forms of rude and fast Western life, and whether it had the heart in it to go down and out to meet the wants of the poor, the ignorant, the degraded of this and of other lands. And this is the question which has been getting its answer from that time. The earliest action of the Church on the subject of missions of which we have notice was taken at the General Convention of 1792 A.D., when the Church counted some two hundred clergy. At that time a joint committee was appointed "for preparing a plan of supporting missionaries to preach the Gospel on the frontiers of the United States," who reported an "Act" accordingly, in which it was recommended that every minister preach a sermon and take a collection on the first Sunday in September of each year for this purpose. But in 1811 A.D. the effort to obtain funds for the support of a Missionary Bishop had proved so far a failure. At the Convention of 1820 A.D. the formation of a Missionary Society of the Church was attempted, but in such a way that the scheme came to naught." It was not till 1821 A.D. that the Constitution of the Missionary Society of the Church was perfected.

In the address prepared by Bishop White after the organization of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society in 1821 A.D., he appeals to the good work done in this country by the Church of England through the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. "We stand in a relation to our brethren in the new States not unlike to that which before the Revolution the Episcopal population in the Atlantic provinces stood to their parent Church in England. Then she extended her fostering care to her sons, and organized a society in which the prelates took the lead, without whose aid all traces of our Apostolic Church in many of the provinces would have been lost. The time is come for us to repay the benefit, not to them, but to those who migrated from us, as our fathers did from the land of their nativity." Bishop Griswold, in 1815 A.D., had already called the attention of the Church to the duty of those who "professed a purer faith and a more ardent zeal for the Gospel of CHRIST, not to deserve the reproach of indifference to missionary labors."

Two missionary societies had been already formed in Philadelphia, one in 1812 A.D., for work within the borders of Pennsylvania, and the other (1816 A.D.) for work beyond the borders. In 1820 A.D. this last society issued a report, which was credited to the Rev. Messrs. Kemper, Muhlenberg, and Boyd, in which they urge the formation of a general missionary society of the American Episcopal Church, to labor in the two fields of Foreign and Domestic Missions. And at the General Convention of 1820 A.D. an effort was made, which failed through mismanagement, to form such a society. In 1821 A.D., however, the Committee adopted "the Constitution of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church," composed of the Bishops and Deputies of General Convention, represented by a Board of Directors, and working by an Executive Committee of eight. An address was prepared by Bishop White, the president, which has been already quoted, which also sets forth the claims of the Foreign Missionary work. It dwells upon the successful efforts made in early times to preach the Gospel to the heathen, and also more recently in Asia and Africa and among the savage inhabitants of our Western wilderness. "There has lately appeared in various countries a zeal for missionary labors beyond anything of the same spirit since the age of the first preaching of the Gospel." At their meeting in 1822 A.D. the Executive Committee report the formation of eleven auxiliary societies, of which eight were Female Auxiliary Missionary Societies, and of the whole eleven, eight were in Pennsylvania. Others were formed in other Dioceses in the following years, so that in 1826 A.D. there were thirty-two auxiliaries reported. It is to be noticed by the way that the limits of the two fields were not defined as they are at present, for at that time by "Foreign" missions were meant all missions to the heathen, including the aborigines of our own country, whereas now the "Domestic" field covers all our country, and includes these and other heathen in its limits. These were in the eyes of our fathers those in whom they "took a more immediate interest," and the mission at Green Bay is named in the report of 1826 A.D. as one of peculiar promise. Before the next General Convention, owing to wild mismanagement, that mission had proved a mortifying failure. In 1827 A.D. the Board resolved that they would always feel themselves bound to give a preference to domestic demands, but that at the same time they welcomed benefactions for foreign missions, and especially on the western coast of Africa, and among the aborigines. In 1828 A.D., on motion of Bishop Hobart, it was "resolved, that the Bishops and the ecclesiastical authorities be requested to recommend to the clergy and congregations to make an annual collection in favor of this society."

In 1829 A.D., Dr. Wainwright told them that "Domestic and Foreign Missions, though they may be distinct in name, yet the cause itself is one and indivisible. That which makes them Foreign and Domestic is the difference of our civil relations, but what has the Gospel of CHRIST to do with boundaries of kingdoms?" "As we are a Church professing primitive faith and Apostolic discipline, let us also exhibit primitive zeal and Apostolic devotion. He has promised to be with us 'to the end of the world,'—provided we preach the Gospel to every creature."

In 1830 A.D., while the Board of Directors were not assured of the expediency of extending their foreign operations, they listened with deep interest to Bishop Brownell's report of his journey in the West, and were "deeply impressed with the wants of the immense population which is filling up the Valley of the Mississippi and which make a powerful appeal to the sympathy and beneficence of the Church." "Up to this moment," says a writer in 1829 A.D., "we have but one small infant station among the heathen, and that chiefly for the purposes of education, and not a single foreign missionary on any distant shore." In the Green Bay Mission the Rev. Eleazer Williams had been employed as Missionary to the Oneidas at Fox River, and later the Rev. Richard Cadle had been appointed Missionary and Superintendent. The Rev. Mr. Oson, appointed to Liberia, died before he was able to sail for Africa. The Rev. Lot Jones, appointed to Buenos Ayres, was delayed, and "made other arrangements." When this pamphlet was written Messrs. Robertson and Hill had not sailed for their field of labor.

In 1833 A.D. the Board were greatly encouraged with the prospect, and recommended the appointment of twenty additional missionaries in the domestic field, and of two to Africa as soon as suitable persons could be found.

In 1835 A.D. the Board was reorganized, to include henceforth the Bishops and thirty elected members, working through two committees, for Domestic and Foreign Missions respectively. In connection with this rearrangement the committees, of which Bishop Doane was chairman, in their report lay down certain general principles for the future direction of the Board, that the missionary field is always to be regarded as one,—THE WORLD,—the terms Domestic and Foreign being understood as terms of locality, adopted for convenience. The appeal of the Church is made expressly to all baptized persons as such, and on the ground of their baptismal vows, and to each parish as a missionary association.

It has been said already that up to at least 1820 A.D. the Church was engaged in the struggle for existence. It was not till this action of 1835 A.D. that she formally took action in her missionary capacity, but it would be grossly unjust to ignore the fact that every new Diocese "organized" and admitted into Convention—and in 1830 A.D. there were twenty such organizations—meant a distinct advance of the Church into new fields and of the same kind, with the addition of Missionary Bishoprics in later times. In one respect the later times have the advantage,—the Missionary Bishop goes out with encouragement and an assured living. The Bishop of a new Diocese depended on his rectorship for his living, or perhaps on his farm or his school. Bishop Chase, at the end of his first five years in Illinois, declared that neither as Bishop, Rector, nor Missionary had he received but twenty dollars.

The work of missions,—that is, the work of preaching the Gospel and making disciples of all nations,—as to any Church of any nation, naturally divides itself into two parts, which may for convenience be very well designated by the terms "Domestic" and "Foreign," meaning those people who are near and those who are farther off. At first, as has been noticed, the Church's "Foreign missions" included missions to the aborigines of our own country, but after a few years the more convenient distinction became common between those who were within and those without the limits of the United States. Taking this last division as accurate, and looking out from the ground which was occupied by the Church in America in 1821 A.D. or in 1833 A.D., here is a very large field included under the term Domestic. Here is a territory of more than twice the extent of the Roman Empire at its period of greatest extent, inhabited and being rapidly filled up with portions of all the nations of Europe, having in its southern portions several millions of the African race, on its western coast a large number of Chinese, and in its western portion the remnants of the aborigines, and each portion bringing with it its own form of religion or of unbelief. In this wilderness of nations and tongues and languages and creeds and sects and unbeliefs the Voice that cries before the coming LORD would seem to have a mission and a work to do without going very far from home. And the Church which occupies such a field to the extent of preaching the Gospel, even to a very limited extent, has its hands full. If to preach the Gospel of CHRIST means something more than to kindle an unregulated blaze, and if the Church of CHRIST is something more than a cold form, even the embodied Gospel, and if to preach the Gospel and to extend the Church are one and the same thing, then the special mission of this Church of ours is set for her as plainly as was the mission of the Church of the Roman Empire when the flood of the barbarians poured over it. The indications of Providence may point and lead to this or that special distant "foreign" field, but it is not necessary for us to fly to the ends of the earth for a field. Until we have made a strong "beginning at Jerusalem," to seek a foreign field is to pass by our wounded neighbor.

The work of "Domestic Missions" comprises work not only among all varieties of a foreign population speaking all the languages of Europe, but also among the Indians, among the negroes, and among the Chinese of our Western coast. And all this must be understood as included when we speak of our "Domestic Missions." Some of our Western Bishops include in their jurisdiction Indian missions, others Chinese missions, one lives among the Mormons, and all the Southern Bishops are engaged in African missions, while in many Eastern Dioceses services are held in the different languages of Europe.

The missionary work of the Church in the United States, even if there were no other reasons for standing by it, has proved its worthiness by its fruits. The missionaries have been the pioneers of the Church, the Missionary Jurisdictions have developed into Dioceses, and the whole Church has reason to be grateful and proud of the work which they have done. But neither that work nor its fruits, nor its needs and claims, can be understood by any one who does not understand very distinctly that the work of the Church in the new parts of our country is a purely missionary work, as the work in Africa or China. In the new West it is a rare thing to find Churchmen where there is no church,—a seeming paradox which is easily explained. Any Churchman moving into a new country with a choice of locations before him, inquires, the very first thing, where there is a church, and selects accordingly. The missionary and the church must go first, therefore, and must be planted and sustained independently, until other Churchmen come in, and until he has had time to extend his influence and gather in the people. To ask or expect a missionary to be supported at the outset of his work by the restless, shifting people of our new Territories, and people, besides, to whom, even if they have time for any attention to religion, the Church is a novelty, is as absurd as it would be to expect the natives of Africa to do the same thing. It is to impose a task on those who are working not for themselves, but as the agents of the whole Church, which is as much ours as theirs, and when they fail the failure is ours, who have not held up their hands.

In one respect our Episcopal system compels us to follow the dictates of sound wisdom. We choose good strong men as Bishops of the new jurisdictions, they understand that they are to be chief missionaries, and we give them, if not a liberal, at least a sufficient salary. Every missionary jurisdiction is sure of having one strong and settled missionary, and he gives the Church a position at once in the eyes of the people which the ordinary starveling dependent missionary could only secure for it by long years of labor and sacrifice, if he ever did. And neither they nor the Church lose anything in the eyes of the people by the fact that such men devote time and talents to the traveling and preaching and teaching and other labors which occupy the time and abilities of a Missionary Bishop, or by the fact that they are decently supported.

The story of the missions of the Church is in fact best told by a list of names and dates. They belong together, "Domestic" and "Foreign." And it is only to be understood when we read it, not as a list of Bishops, but as a list of chief missionaries, of men who were taken from prominent and honorable positions in the Church and sent out to preach in school-houses, and teach schools, and travel from place to place among scattered families, and do work that when it is told of seems very petty drudgery for such men to be engaged in. But such is all missionary work.

Besides these Bishops and the clergy working under them, it must be remembered that in a number of the Dioceses are missionaries at work, and by them and the Bishops much purely missionary work is done. It would not be possible, for instance, to pass over the work which has been done among the Indians by Bishops and clergy of the Church, and yet when we have named Hobart and Williams, Breck and Whipple and Hare, we have done all that our space and the line which we have indicated for ourselves permits.

From this list and from the reports of General Convention and other, it appears that though efforts were made previously to send out Missionary Bishops, it was not till 1835 A.D. that one was actually sent. At that most important Convention the leading spirit was Bishop Doane, and it was largely owing to him that the new Constitution of the Board was established, based on the principle that every baptized person was by the fact of his baptism a member of the missionary organization, and pledging the Church as a Missionary Church. Two Missionary Bishops were elected, but Dr. Hawks was not consecrated. The man who was made Bishop was a host in himself, and the field of "the Northwest" was not too large for him,—a man of tact and energy, pure, loving, and holy, a true saint and apostle of the Church. In the mean time, besides the election of Bishops Freeman for Arkansas and Kip for California, a number of "Dioceses" had been organized, which were little more than missionary jurisdictions, and in 1859 A.D., by the election of Bishop Talbot for Nebraska and the Northwest, and Bishop Lay for Arkansas and the Southwest, it might be said with some truth that the "Episcopate of the American Church was at length co-extensive with the boundaries of the United States." As an evidence that the hand of God had been with the Church, and that the Church was at least and at last recognizing her duty and her right to occupy the whole land, the occasion was one to justify the "Gloria in Excelsis" with which the Convention received the announcement. It falls strictly into line under this subject to notice the action of the General Convention of 1865 A.D. in accepting the resolutions of the Committee of Missions, "that there never was a time when the demand for missionary effort was so great, and calling upon the ecclesiastical authorities to institute a system of itineracy, and urging the appointment of lay-readers, and the maintenance of family worship and home instruction in the Catechism and offices of the Church by those who are cut off from stated worship." In 1865 A.D. the Secretaries of the two Houses were selected on the spot for Colorado and Nebraska and Dakota. Bishop Randall died in 1873 A.D. Bishop Clarkson lived to make Nebraska an independent Diocese, while he resigned and handed over Dakota to two successors. In 1867 A.D., Bishop Tuttle was elected to Montana, Idaho, and Utah, which jurisdiction was divided in 1880 A.D., and Montana given to Bishop Brewer, while Bishop Tuttle's work goes nobly on in the midst of "the ignorance and error of the odious heresy of Mormonism."

In 1868 A.D., Bishop Morris was elected to Oregon and Washington, which latter Territory he handed over in 1880 A.D. to Bishop Paddock. Other changes are indicated by the list-divisions which are multiplications in Texas and California, as well as in those that have been named, and which indicate a much greater growth in actual numbers and influence, so that there are some six Bishops at work within what was included in Bishop Talbot's jurisdiction of "the Northwest" in 1859 A.D. It would require a larger number to include the successors of Bishop Kemper in his field of "the Northwest" in 1835 A.D. A very important action was taken at the Convention of 1877 A.D., in amending and enlarging the Constitution of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, so that the General Convention is made for the time being the Board of Missions, representing the whole Church, every member of which is a member of the Missionary Society, and meeting during the session of the General Convention, so that the General Convention is henceforth the great missionary meeting of the Church. The consequence of this action was seen in the Conventions of 1880 and 1883 A.D., when the subject of Missions was beyond all others the subject of the occasion, and in 1880 A.D. three new Missionary Bishops were elected, and one in 1883 A.D.

The interest in Domestic Missions for the last twenty years has been largely owing to the zeal and tact of one man, the Rev. Alvi T. Twing, D.D., who, after having acted for several years as "General Agent" of the Board, from 1866 to 1882 A.D., the year of his death, was "Secretary" of the Board. The change is manifest by a comparison of the receipts. In 1863 A.D. the gross receipts for Domestic Missions were $37,458, in 1882 A.D. $228,375. When he became Secretary there were but four Missionary Bishops and ninety-nine Missionaries in the Domestic field. At the date of his death the corps had increased to thirteen Missionary Bishops and three hundred and forty-six clergymen.

The growth of both the country and the Church is well set forth in Bishop Morris's address in 1863 A.D. "Chicago with half a million of people occupies the site of what was in 1812 A.D. an abandoned military post, and Illinois has a population of three millions, and contains the Sees of three Bishops and the cures of a hundred and forty clergymen. When the Bishop of Nebraska was ordained in 1847 A.D., Nebraska was an unknown region. When the Bishop of Colorado was ordained in 1857 A.D., Colorado was the home of the buffalo. When the Bishop of California was ordained in 1855 A.D., San Francisco was a small trading-post. The year that the Bishop of Oregon was ordained Oregon and Washington passed by treaty into the hands of the United States. Where in 1856 A.D. there was not a white settler, now four Bishops and over fifty clergymen are laboring." The country has grown enormously, and the Church has also extended her work in proportion. There is nothing to boast of in such a retrospect, but enough to show us that, in her special field of the United States at least, this Church of ours has not altogether neglected her duty as a Missionary Church.

In 1829 A.D. the resolution was adopted to add to the missionary stations "some suitable place or places in Greece." The world was filled with the story of the noble struggle of the Greeks for independence, and this country was wild with sympathy for them. The Rev. Mr. Robertson first went out to Greece, and at his second departure in 1830 A.D., the Rev. John H. Hill accompanied him. As these were the first "foreign missionaries" who were ever sent out by the American Church, it will accord with our purpose to trace at this point a brief outline of the history of their mission.

The party consisted of the two missionaries, their wives, and Mr. Solomon Bingham. Their "instructions" indicate "their schools and their press" as the effective agencies through which they are to conciliate the favor of the people, and while they are to do nothing which may cause the impression that they are endeavoring "to establish another Church," but instead to make known the many points of agreement between the two sister Churches, and avoid making even errors "matters of direct attack or sweeping censure," to direct their attention to the education of the people in the truths of the Gospel, and their restoration to its holy simplicity and glorious purity. The missionaries were men competent to carry out these singularly wise instructions. They established themselves as soon as possible in Athens. Mr. Robertson took charge especially of the printing and publishing work, while Mr. Hill devoted himself to the work of education. The fruits of their persevering and self-sacrificing labors among the priesthood and the people generally were abundant, but no part of their work has been in apparent results equal to the girls' school which Mrs. Hill took in hand, aided by her sister, Miss Mulligan, and succeeded by Miss Muir. In the words of a Greek, that school has been "a central university shedding forth the light of education through the whole of free Greece, and beyond its borders." When, in 1882 A.D., the venerable missionary died at the age of ninety-one, his funeral was attended by great numbers and with all honor.

In 1835 A.D. the Rev. George Benton, then a student in the General Theological Seminary, offered himself for the mission work, and in 1836 A.D. was sent to Crete, where he established two schools, which were kept in successful operation till 1844 A.D., when the mission was abandoned and he returned to the United States.

The first who offered himself for the Foreign missionary work of the Church was the Rev. Joseph R. Andrews of the Eastern Diocese, who went out, in 1820 A.D., "as a missionary and agent of the Colonization Society" to Liberia, but died the next year. The Executive Committee in 1828 A.D. made mention of the "unanimous voice of the General Convention of 1826 A.D., that measures should be taken for establishing missions at Liberia and at Buenos Ayres," and report that they had since then nominated Mr. Jacob Oson, a man of color, a missionary for Africa, so soon as he should obtain holy orders, and also that Mr. Oson had been recently ordained by Bishop Brownell, and was ready to sail for Liberia as soon as a passage could be procured for him. But the message that the vessel was about to sail found Mr. Oson on his death-bed. The same report of 1829 A.D. which announces Mr. Oson's death mentions an "African Mission School which had been established the previous year at Hartford, Conn., to prepare young men of color for usefulness in the Colony of Liberia," and the Convention repeated their former action of "advising the sending of a missionary to Liberia."

It was not, however, till 1836 A.D. that the first white missionaries landed, viz., the Rev. Messrs. Savage, Payne, and Minor. In 1841 A.D., Dr. Vaughan was elected Bishop at Cape Palmas, but declined. In 1844 A.D. the Rev. Alexander Glennis was elected, but declined. In 1850 A.D. the Rev. John Payne was elected, and consecrated in 1851 A.D. After his resignation, in 1872 A.D., the Rev. Jacob Auer was made Bishop, and after his death the Rev. Clifton Penick, who resigned his jurisdiction at the Convention of 1883 A.D. on the ground of ill health. At that time there were reported in the African Mission thirty-four stations, twelve clergymen (of whom one is white and eight Liberians and three natives), five foreign ladies, four lay-readers, two business agents, and sixteen catechists and teachers. The report for 1881-82 A.D. gives as the "average attendance upon public worship 1036; baptisms, adults, 30, infants, 53; confirmations, 46; and communicants, 567." The reports of the Bishop and missionaries tell us of the special difficulties in the African climate and the African character, which encompass the steps of the missionary in Africa, and which account for the slow progress of the Church.

The mission to China owes its beginning to the devotion of Augustus Foster Lyde, a youth who died in 1834 A.D. at the age of twenty-one. "It was in his heart to preach the Gospel to the Chinese, and for this service he had offered himself to God and the Church, but it pleased his Heavenly FATHER to call him early home." So reads the slab in St. Peter's Church-yard in Philadelphia. In 1835 A.D. the necessary funds were obtained, and the Rev. Messrs. Hanson and Lockwood sailed for China. The beginning of teaching Chinese children was made in Java, and the missionaries "moved up the coast until they reached Shanghai, in 1845 A.D., where the station and missionary jurisdiction was founded. Bishop Boone was consecrated in 1844 A.D. and died in 1864 A.D. From that time to 1877 A.D. the China Mission was included in the jurisdiction of Bishop Williams. In 1877 A.D., Bishop Schereschewsky was consecrated, but was compelled by ill health to resign in 1883 A.D. The purpose of Bishop Boone was to establish schools of a high order for both boys and girls, in which he was ably seconded by the clergy and teachers, both foreign and native, but the work was interrupted by the American civil war, in the midst of which Bishop Boone died. Mr. Schereschewsky went out to China in 1859 A.D., and at Pekin undertook and accomplished the work—aided of course by others, but himself the principal—of translating the Prayer-Book and the whole Scriptures into the mandarin dialect. "The greatness of this work in itself, and the toil and study which it required, are beyond our ability to understand. The importance of it is beyond our arithmetic to compute." His efforts were mainly directed to carry on and enlarge the scheme of Bishop Boone, by establishing a Missionary College which should give native young men the highest education and train up a native ministry. It is a large and noble undertaking to establish an agency for reaching such a people. China is destined to play a great part in the world. The question is whether it shall play that part as a heathen or a Christian nation. There are at this time in China seventeen clergymen, three missionary physicians, eleven foreign teachers, one trained nurse, and fifty-nine catechists, teachers, and Bible-readers. The number of communicants is two hundred and sixty-seven, of whom all but twenty are natives. Besides the station at Shanghai, the principal missionary stations are the Wu-Chang and Hankow Stations, six hundred miles up the Yang-tze-Kiang.

Both in China and in Japan one very important branch of the missionary work is the work of the medical missionaries. The physicians of China and Japan are ignorant of anatomy and physiology, and know comparatively little of the nature of disease. The field for the educated Christian physician is a very wide one, and the reports show how much is being done. The cases of all kinds treated at the different points in China and Japan during one year, by the four missionary physicians and their assistants, numbered many thousand. The mission to Japan dates from 1859 A.D., and is an offshoot of the China Mission. Since the persecution of Christians, which culminated in the dreadful massacre of 1636 A.D., when it was said that more than two hundred thousand were put to death, the Christian religion had been proscribed, and no Christian permitted to set foot within the Empire. But the opening of the two ports in 1854 A.D. made it possible to build churches and teach Christian doctrine. And in 1859 A.D. the Rev. John Liggins, of the China Mission, and the Rev. Channing Moore Williams were appointed missionaries to Japan. The return of those who had been associated with him left Mr. Williams for some time alone, and in 1865 A.D., when he was made Bishop to succeed Bishop Boone as Missionary Bishop to China and Japan, he for a time resided in China. But in 1869 A.D. he returned to Japan, where the persecution of native converts still continued, and which did not cease until 1872 A.D. That year and the following year several additions were made to the missionary force, the school at Osaka numbered some fifty pupils, and the little chapel was enlarged. In 1874 A.D. the Bishop removed to Tokio, and twenty converts were baptized and confirmed. The year 1876 A.D. was marked by a serious disaster, the burning of the mission chapel and school-room and the Bishop's house in a great fire which destroyed some ten thousand houses. In 1877 A.D. the first native of Japan was ordained,—Mr. Isaac K. Yokoyama. In 1878 A.D. the Divinity Training School at Tokio contained thirteen students, and encouraging reports are made of the other schools at Osaka and Tokio. But in 1880 A.D., Mr. Yokoyama was deposed at his own request, and the same year the Bishop's house was again consumed in a great fire. The schools, however, continued to do good work. In 1882 A.D. there were seven chapels in Tokio. In 1883 A.D. there were, besides the Bishop (who since 1877 A.D. had been relieved of the Chinese Mission by the appointment of Bishop Schereschewsky), eight clergymen, one missionary physician, nine foreign lay-workers, and twenty-five catechists, preachers, lay-readers, and Bible-readers. The number of native communicants is eighty-four. The population of Japan is estimated at some thirty-five millions, intelligent and impressionable, who have cast off their old religion, and are in danger of drifting into atheism, and who cannot understand how there can be different and hostile kinds of Christianity. Between such a mass and the less than a corporal's guard of missionaries the disproportion is very great, and it is not to be wondered at that the devoted few have not accomplished more.

The mission in Haiti was undertaken in 1861 A.D. Mr. James Theodore Holly, a young man of African descent, who had visited Haiti in 1855 A.D., as the agent of the Foreign Committee, sailed in 1861 A.D. with a missionary colony numbering one hundred and eleven persons, chiefly from Connecticut. The colony was greatly weakened by removal and death, but the Rev. Mr. Holly remained. In 1863 A.D., Bishop Lee visited the island, and administered the rite of confirmation. In 1866 A.D., Bishop Burgess made a visitation, and ordained one Deacon and one Priest, and administered confirmation. He died suddenly on the return voyage, and the church which he promised was sent as a memorial of him. In 1873 A.D., Bishop Coxe made a visitation to the churches on the island, and acting on his advice and report, Mr. Holly was elected and consecrated Bishop of the Haitian Church in 1874 A.D. There are reported at present "in the Haitian Church," besides the Bishop, twelve clergymen, twenty-seven lay-readers, catechists, and teachers, and four hundred and one communicants.

The Mexican Mission must be mentioned, but it can only be mentioned with sorrow and shame. Bishop Riley was consecrated in 1879 A.D., and requested to resign in 1883 A.D. There are reported eleven clergymen, three foreign lay-workers, forty-one native workers, fourteen hundred and eighty communicants. It is believed that in the mission schools, and perhaps elsewhere, good work has been done. It is a pity that our summary of missions, bald as it is, must close with such an instance of incompetence and failure, for even this summary is enough to show us that missionary work has been and is, even under all disadvantages of weakness and error, the very opposite of failure.

But while there is enough to encourage every Christian man in the story of missionary work, there is another side to the picture. Our advances have been late and slow. We have missed a thousand opportunities. The real work has been done by a few. If it had been done earlier, or if there had been more hands at work, how much more might have been done! Why has it not been done? Our missionaries have been very few, and they have been miserably supported. As a rule, among our Domestic Missionaries, the Bishops have been the only ones who have had a decent living support. The income which would fairly support one has been divided among three or four, and with the natural consequences. The excuse for this course is the lack of means. There is a feeling that the work ought to be done, and at whatever cost. But at such cost it is doubtful whether it is not too costly. Certainly we have no right to demand such sacrifices. If men are willing to go as our representatives into the mission field, the least that we can do is to insure them a decent support, and not to look on them as beggars when they ask us for money to build churches in which they have no more interest than we have. This is a matter which is coming more and more before the laity, and which depends on them. If they can be roused up and will give the money, then the more missionaries the better, and the higher salaries they can have the better,—there is no danger of their getting too much. But there are those who have had experience in the field who believe that it would be better policy, as it would certainly be the more honorable course towards our missionaries, to send out only one-third of the number and give that third a reasonable support. Said one, "Nobody will believe what our missionaries endure until one of them starves to death." Our Church in the West has been planted by such laborers, and the story is not an honorable one for the laity of the Church. Before we congratulate ourselves on the "rapid growth of the Church" let each one ask himself, What has been my part in the work? What will be my sentence in the day when the LORD shall say, "I was an hungred"? Are we among those who "did it to Him," or among those who "did it not"? For with money and means the growth would be more rapid, and the cost would be distributed and not all laid on the few, whom we selfish idlers blame because they have not done more.

REV. L. W. GIBSON.

Mississippi. "On the 17th of May, 1826 A.D., clergy and lay delegates met in Trinity Church, Natchez, for the purpose of organizing a Diocese of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the State of Mississippi. The Rev. James Pilmore preached the opening sermon. The Rev. Albert A. Muller was chosen President. Besides these clergymen there were present the Rev. James A. Fox and the Rev. John W. Cloud. The Rev. Adam Cloud, residing in the State, did not attend. Delegates, eleven in number and representing four Parishes,—those at Natchez, Woodville, Port Gibson, and Christ Church, Jefferson County,—were present, one of them being the Hon. Joshua G. Clarke, the Chancellor of the State. The Convention formally acceded to the Constitution and Canons of the Church in the United States. A Constitution and Canons were adopted. The Committee on the State of the Church reported the details of individual parochial work in the various Parishes. A committee was appointed to correspond with the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society 'on subjects concerning the present state of the Church in this Diocese.' The clergy were earnestly requested to visit the Parishes destitute of ministers. Two hundred and fifty copies of the journal were ordered to be printed. Diocesan officers and delegates to the General Convention were appointed. Thus was inaugurated the Diocese of Mississippi."

The Diocese was for a time in charge of the Rt. Rev. Leonidas Polk, D.D., as Missionary Bishop. He and the Rt. Rev. James Hervey Otey, D.D., Bishop of Tennessee, were Provisional Bishops. The Rt. Rev. William Mercer Green, D.D., LL.D., was consecrated as Bishop of Mississippi in St. Andrew's Church, Jackson, February 24, 1850 A.D., by Bishops Otey, Polk, Cobbs, and Freeman. Bishop Green was "born in Wilmington, N. C., May 2, 1798 A.D. Graduated at the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, 1818 A.D. Ordered Deacon April 29, 1821 A.D. Ordained Priest April 20, 1823 A.D. Rector of St. John's, Williamsboro', N. C., four years. Then became Rector of St. Matthew's, Hillsboro', where he remained until 1837 A.D., when he was made Professor of Belles-Lettres and Rhetoric in the University, Chapel Hill, which position he occupied until his elevation to the Episcopate. Received degree of D.D. from University of Pennsylvania, 1845 A.D."

"The forty-second Annual Convention met in St. Peter's Church, Oxford, on the 28th of April, 1869 A.D. The Bishop's address reported more ordinations to the Diaconate and Priesthood than for several previous years, and noticed that there were now eleven candidates for holy orders, several of them men of age and experience. The name 'Convention' was changed to 'Council.' The establishment of Convocations was approved, and serious consideration was given to the revival of the Primitive Diaconate."

"The forty-third Annual Council met in St. Andrew's Parish, Jackson, on the 27th and 29th of April, 1870 A.D. The Parish of the Holy Trinity, Vicksburg, was admitted into union. The Bishop in his address reported the ordination of three to the Diaconate, and the same number to the Priesthood. One church had been consecrated and five parishes organized. There were eleven candidates for Orders. The number of clergy was twenty-eight. The University of the South, the system of Convocations, the Church Calendar newspaper, the Society for the Increase of the Ministry, and the Domestic Missionary Committee received the commendation of the Bishop. The Treasurer of the Episcopal Fund reported the fund as amounting to $8271.64, and advised the sale of the Church property for the purpose of discharging the diocesan indebtedness, and the provision of a permanent residence for the Bishop of the Diocese. A resolution reported by the Committee on the State of the Church, advising the election of an assistant Bishop, was, after discussion, laid on the table."

"The clergy, through the senior Presbyter, the Rev. James A. Fox, presented the Bishop with 'a pastoral staff' as an emblem of his office, and as a token of their affection and confidence. The Committee on the State of the Church reported 'the Church in this Diocese largely on the increase, true, not only of 'outward material growth, but of a deep, spiritual interest.' Bishop Green, in his report to the General Convention of 1874 A.D., speaks of the poverty of his Diocese and the depression of the Church in outward things at least, as corresponding with that of the country. Promising fields were uncared for, as fit laborers could not be supported, hence useful clergy had removed from long established Parishes. Notwithstanding the ordinations, the clergy list was below that of former periods." "Notwithstanding this, it is believed that there are signs of increased fervor and spirituality, and an increased devotion of the substance to the LORD, which, when He shall send us again prosperity, will exhibit the glad fruit of many good works." In several Parishes there had been efforts made to recover the hold of the Church on the African race. "In St. Andrew's, Jackson, a very large colored Sunday-school has been for some years successfully kept up, superintended, and great part instructed by the zealous wife of the rector. In the Church of the Good Shepherd, Terry, the school under the care of Miss Wharton has had eminent success. At Dry Grove a colored candidate for orders has been educated, and is now at work as a Deacon, while a large school is instructed by the candidates for orders at that place. A number of other Sunday-schools are maintained at no little self-sacrifice by loving members of the Church living at points distant from organized parishes. The efficiency of these is somewhat impaired by the inability to supply them with books and other aids to instruction."

To assist in providing clergy a Mission Training School had been organized at Dry Grove. There were six candidates and postulants residing there, while two Priests and the colored Deacon named above were "laboring in their stations as the first fruits of this enterprise." Experience had shown the necessity of "a home training" for at least a part of the candidates for orders. Lay co-operation was "receiving much attention." In St. Andrew's, Jackson, a Guild of young men had labored earnestly and successfully in the public institutions of the State capital, and the Daughters of St. Andrew had "devoted themselves with equally blessed results to 'Woman's Work.'" The Bishop closes his report thus: "May our weary and painful passage through the wilderness bring us, in God's good time, to the joyful feast of fat things, when the ransomed of the LORD shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads, when they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away." In the report of the Committee on the State of the Church to the General Convention of 1883 A.D., by the Rev. Dr. George M. Hills, Chairman, the following well-merited tribute occurs: "Perhaps the most touching incident in the sessions of this body was the appearance in the House of Deputies, on the 15th day of its deliberations, of the Rt. Rev. Dr. William Mercer Green, the venerable Bishop of Mississippi, 'whose praise is in all the Churches,' who came to say 'farewell,' and to tell us with deep emotion, that he was the sole survivor, clerical or lay, of the General Convention of 1823 A.D., just sixty years ago, and that when he took Holy Orders there were but nine Bishops in the United States of America." In 1883 A.D. the Rev. Hugh Miller Thompson, D.D., was consecrated as Assistant Bishop in Trinity Church, New Orleans. He was born in County Londonderry, Ireland, and graduated at Nashotah, where he served in after-years as Professor of Ecclesiastical History. He was at one time rector of St. James' Church, Chicago, and also of Christ Church, New York. At the time of his election he was rector of Trinity Church, New Orleans. He is the author of "First Principles," "Copy," and of various tracts and pamphlets. Bishop Adams, having resigned the jurisdiction of New Mexico, is Rector of Holy Trinity Church, Vicksburg. He is one of the examining chaplains, being associated with Rev. Drs. Sansom and Harris, and Rev. Alex. Marks. Statistics from "Living Church Annual" of 1884 A.D.: Clergy, 27; parishes and missions, 65; baptisms, 262; confirmations, 180; communicants, 2401; Sunday-school teachers, 262; scholars, 2047; contributions, $33,890.49.

Missouri, History of the Diocese of. The earliest settlers of the State came largely from Kentucky and Tennessee, where the most of them had for a time lived; they or their ancestors having previously emigrated from Virginia and Maryland. It was from these States that most of the earlier Church people came, and the first ministrations were secured. The first parish west of the Mississippi River was established in St. Louis by the Rev. John Ward, of Lexington, Ky., in the autumn of 1819 A.D. The first regular service was held on October 24, in a one-story frame building, occasionally used as a court-house and a dancing-hall. Six persons composed the congregation. This was the first public service by a clergyman of the Episcopal Church west of the Mississippi, of which we have any record. Christ Church, St. Louis, was organized November 1, 1819 A.D. There were long intervals during which no services were held, and the first building was not completed for use until November 10, 1829 A.D., and consecrated May 25, 1884 A.D., by Bishop Smith, of Kentucky. He also at the same time administered the first confirmation.

So soon as Bishop Kemper was, in September, 1835 A.D., consecrated Missionary Bishop of the Northwest, he was called to the rectorship of Christ Church. At his coming began the growth of the Church in the State outside of St. Louis. The time at his disposal for explorations in the State, and for the establishing of churches, was restricted, from the fact that for nearly five years he held the rectorship of Christ Church, St. Louis, the only organized parish at the time of his coming; and that his duties included Indiana, and subsequently, as the country filled up, Wisconsin, Iowa, Kansas, and Minnesota.

The settlements were mainly along the rivers, and here the first parishes were formed. The Bishop soon saw that one of the great needs for his work was a better supply of clergymen. In 1836 A.D. he started the plan of Kemper College, and in twenty working days secured in the East $20,000 for the project. One hundred and twenty-five acres were bought within five miles of the city limits of St. Louis, buildings were erected, and very soon a considerable number of boys and young men were gathered, from among whom several clergymen were afterwards ordained.

In the latter part of 1836 A.D. and the beginning of 1837 A.D. services were begun at St. Charles, Boonville, and Fayette, on or near the Missouri River, and at Palmyra, near the Mississippi River. Shortly after this, in 1840 A.D., the parish at Jefferson City, the capital of the State, was organized. It was not until 1844 A.D. that the work was carried farther up the Missouri River, and services held in Brunswick, Lexington, and Independence. At this time the Indians were yet in the newly-acquired Platte Purchase in the western part of the State, and Independence was within fourteen miles of the Indian Territory.

In the mean time, on the 16th of November, 1840 A.D., the Diocese of Missouri was organized, there being at that time eight clergymen in the Diocese, and four parishes represented. The Diocese placed itself under the Episcopal supervision of Bishop Kemper, and was received into union with the General Convention in 1841 A.D. Bishop Kemper found very great difficulty in keeping the missions that he had established supplied with ministers. He could persuade but few to come west of the Mississippi River, and many of those who came seemed to be ill adapted to the hard conditions of the work, and did not remain long. In 1835 A.D., when he first came West, the Bishop wrote to his friend, Bishop Chase, of Illinois, in view of the possibilities, that he was afraid he had come too late to that fair inheritance of the Lord. In 1843 A.D. he says that, while he does not despair, a number of places in which work had started had to be abandoned because of the lack of ministers, and the impossibility of inducing them to go beyond the Mississippi.

In 1843 A.D., Bishop Kemper resigned his jurisdiction in Missouri and removed to Wisconsin. The Diocese in Convention, September 23, 1843 A.D., nominated to the General Convention the Rev. Cicero S. Hawks, Rector of Trinity Church, Buffalo, N. Y., as Bishop, he having also been elected Rector of Christ Church, St. Louis. There were at that time but seven clergymen in the Diocese, of whom two had no parochial charge, and there were but three parishes represented in Convention, two clergymen engaged in duty outside of St. Louis. The only support to which the Bishop could look was that which he would receive as Rector of Christ Church. Mr. Hawks was at this time only thirty-one years of age. He assumed the rectorship of Christ Church January 1, 1844 A.D., and was consecrated to the Episcopate in New York on the 20th of October following.

The young Bishop found on his accession to office that all of the churches were in debt, his own parish church owing $17,000, and that Kemper College was in desperate straits with a debt of $16,000 incurred in the erection of buildings. The Bishop went East in the summer of 1845 A.D., to endeavor to secure means with which to save the property, but in vain, and in November, 1845 A.D., a property belonging to the Church, which Bishop Kemper had secured with the most anxious effort, and intended to be the best monument of his Episcopate, was sold for a debt of $16,000. It is now within the city, and is worth nearly half a million dollars. This was one of the greatest calamities which the Church in the West has ever received, and Bishop Kemper to the end of his life could never speak of its loss without tears in his eyes.

The Bishop's opportunities for more general work throughout the Diocese were restricted by his rectorship in St. Louis, which he held until February 1, 1854 A.D., when the parish pledged itself to contribute a sufficient sum annually for five years to secure him a salary of $2500. The Church's work was extended farther up the Missouri River, to Weston and St. Joseph; but it was not until 1857 A.D. that the first services were held in Kansas City, which is now the second city in the Diocese, with seventy-five thousand inhabitants. One of the missionaries writing in 1843 A.D., declares his belief that Missouri had then proved the hardest soil in the United States to plant the Church upon. He finds the reason of this in the adverse antecedents of the most of those who had come to the State, and the relative absence of the English element, which in many places forms a nucleus for the Church. He thinks, therefore, that the whole of that generation must pass away before Church institutions could make much impression on the popular mind.

At first, outside of the travel by steamboat, the Bishop had to take long journeys on land by stage-coach and otherwise in his vast Diocese.

The growth of the Diocese, which had been steady, received a severe shock during the period of the civil war. Being one of the border States, it was successively overrun by both of the opposing armies. Outside of St. Louis religious services for three or four years were almost entirely suspended; and for some time after the people could do little for religion because of the impoverishment and desolation caused by the war. Immigration, however, soon began to pour into the State, and its rate of increase has since been very great.

In 1867 A.D., Bishop Hawks began to show signs of the disease which, on the 19th of April of the next year, caused his death. At this time there were 24 clergymen and 32 parishes in the Diocese, 18 church buildings, and about 2100 communicants reported.

At the Convention, May 29, 1868 A.D., the Rt. Rev. D. S. Tuttle, D.D., Missionary Bishop of Montana and Utah, was elected Bishop of the Diocese. He declined the duty, and at an adjourned Convention, September 3, 1868 A.D., the Rev. Charles F. Robertson, D.D., Rector of St. James' Church, Batavia, Western New York, was elected. He was born in New York City in 1835 A.D., and was thus in his thirty-fourth year. He was consecrated October 25, 1868 A.D., in Grace Church, New York, and took up his abode soon after in the Episcopal residence, which had just been purchased.

The growth of the State and of the Diocese has of late years been rapid. There are now (1888 A.D.) 62 clergymen and 5385 communicants reported in the Diocese. There are 73 churches, 12 chapels, and 12 rectories. The estimated value of the church property is $1,154,375, on which there is indebtedness only to the amount of $39,500. The amount raised during the last year for Church purposes was $132,662.36, and for the past three years $362,742.77.

In 1846 A.D. the institution that subsequently became St. Paul's College, Palmyra, was begun under the care of the Rev. Dr. Corby. It prospered very greatly until the time of the civil war, when it became involved in debt and was sold. It was purchased by the Diocese again in 1869 A.D., but did not attain the numbers which it previously had, and suspended its operations in 1882 A.D.; its location, in the changes of population and communication, not being any longer sufficiently central.

In 1867 A.D. St. James' Academy, Macon City, was established by the Rev. E. Talbot. It has secured a fine property, and has now six teachers and over one hundred pupils.

In 1871 A.D. the Sisterhood of the Good Shepherd transferred its work from Baltimore to St. Louis, and at first took charge of the internal management of the Orphans' Home and St. Luke's Hospital. Two years after, however, they relinquished the former duty, in order to begin a school for girls, which has had each year increasing numbers and good results.

In 1848 A.D. the Orphans' Home was established in St. Louis, at first as a part of the work of St. John's Church. Shortly after it came under the care of all the St. Louis parishes. The present building was erected in 1873 A.D., at a cost of $40,000, exclusive of the land. During the last year it has taken care of 108 children, with an income of $6239.80. It has an endowment amounting to $37,360.

In 1866 A.D. St. Luke's Hospital was established in St. Louis. Its building, on the corner of Washington Avenue and Twenty-third Street, was finished in 1882 A.D., at a cost of $43,000, exclusive of the cost of the land. It gave its care last year to 350 patients, beside its dispensary work, and had an income, beside the amount derived from patients, of $5729.32. Its internal care is in the hands of the Sisterhood of the Good Shepherd.

In 1882 A.D. All-Saints' Hospital, Kansas City, was organized, and its building begun.

The Diocese has in it 67,380 square miles, and, according to the census of 1880 A.D., a population of 2,168,804 inhabitants. It is as large in area as the five New York and five of the New England Dioceses, and has a larger population than any other Diocese. There is a likelihood of its being divided within a few years.

Monarchia. It is the statement of the true interrelation of the Three Persons in the Unity of the Blessed TRINITY. The self-existent nature of GOD demands our faith in His UNITY. But He has also revealed to us the Trinity in this Unity. (Vide TRINITY.) But since by Eternal Generation for the SON and by Eternal Procession for the HOLY GHOST there is a subordination in authority and in order, there comes out the monarchia of the FATHER as the Fount or Source in the TRINITY. The SON is subordinate to the FATHER, but not in His nature, being GOD of GOD, for He is GOD and LORD equally with the FATHER, and therefore very GOD of very GOD. So, too, the HOLY GHOST proceedeth from the FATHER, and is sent by the SON, showing a coequality in origin and rank, but a subordination relatively in the work of the Ever-Blessed TRINITY.

Montana. The House of Bishops, in special session, on October 4, 1866 A.D., in rearranging the missionary field in the Northwest, constituted the Territories of Montana, Utah, and Idaho the jurisdiction of a Missionary Bishop. Previously, Montana and Idaho had been attached to the missionary jurisdiction of Colorado, and Utah to that of Nevada. The Bishop of the new missionary jurisdiction was designated the Missionary Bishop of Montana, with jurisdiction in Utah and Idaho. On October 5 the Rev. D. S. Tuttle was accordingly elected Missionary Bishop of Montana. For fourteen years this arrangement continued, until, on the 9th of October, 1880 A.D., the House of Bishops divided the Missionary District of Montana, Idaho, and Utah into two Missionary Districts, Utah and Idaho to constitute one, and Montana the other. The missionary jurisdiction (or District) of Montana consists of the Territory of Montana. Its area is nearly 146,000 (145,776) square miles, divided by natural landmarks into three sections, Eastern, Middle, and Western. The Eastern section is the Valley of the Yellowstone River; the Middle, the Valley of the Upper Missouri and its tributaries; the Western, on the Pacific side of the Rocky Mountains, the valley of the head-waters of Clark's Fork of the Columbia River. The Territory is traversed by the main range of the Rocky Mountains, running irregularly from southwest to northwest, and by numerous subordinate ranges. It is thus cut up into many comparatively small valleys, isolated in differing degrees by intervening mountains. It is crossed from east to west by the Northern Pacific Railway, while the Utah and Northern Branch of the Union Pacific enters at the southwest and runs northeasterly to a junction with the Northern Pacific.

The population of Montana in 1880 A.D. was 39,157; it is now (January, 1884 A.D.) nearly double. It is attractive to immigrants by reason of two prominent industries, mining and agriculture. The many mountain ranges by which it is cut up abound in the precious metals, while the numerous valleys are very fertile, well watered, and fitted for the growth of the cereals especially.

Its history as connected with the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States perhaps begins with Christmas, 1865 A.D., when lay-services were begun at Virginia City, in the southwestern part of the Territory, and continued for a few weeks. These services were conducted by Professor T. J. Dimsdale, an Englishman residing in the place, and were the first services according to the Book of Common Prayer in the present District of Montana. But its ecclesiastical history proper begins with the action of the House of Bishops in 1866 A.D. Being before that time attached to Colorado, one thousand miles away, it was necessarily outside the sphere of that Church's active work. Bishop Tuttle was consecrated May, 1867 A.D., and reached Montana in July of the same year, accompanied by the Rev. E. N. Goddard. An organization had been made at Virginia City the March preceding, under the name of St. Paul's Church. In August a mission was organized in Helena, now the capital of the Territory, when the Bishop returned to Virginia City and assumed pastoral charge, Mr. Goddard remaining in charge of St. Peter's Mission, Helena. The Bishop purchased at Virginia City an unfinished building, begun by the Methodists, remodeled and completed it, and it was opened for services on the Sunday after Ascension, May 24, 1868 A.D. For several years it was the only church building we had in Montana. The third mission organized was St. James', Deer Lodge, of which the Rev. W. H. Stoy was the first minister. In 1876 A.D. another organization was effected at Bozeman; a building erected by the Good Templars was purchased and refitted for Church uses during 1876-77 A.D., which was named St. James' Church, the second of our churches in the Territory. In 1877 A.D. the Mission of St. James, Deer Lodge, began the erection of a stone church, and the Mission of the Holy Spirit was organized at Missoula, the Rev. Geo. Stewart taking charge of it. In 1878 A.D. the church at Deer Lodge was completed and consecrated, and St. Peter's Church, Helena, of stone was begun, being completed the year following. In 1879 A.D. resident ministers were placed at Butte and Fort Benton. St. Paul's Church, Fort Benton, of brick, was built during the years 1880-81 A.D.; St. John's, Butte, a stone edifice, in 1881 A.D.; St. James', Dillon, of wood, 1881-82 A.D.; St. Paul's Chapel, Miles City, of wood, in 1883 A.D.; and the church of the Holy Spirit, Missoula, of brick, is now (1884 A.D.) in process of erection. Numerous outlying missions attached to the larger ones have been established from time to time, and worked according to the available force. There is one Parish, organized as such, St. Peter's, Helena; the parochial organization having been effected in 1880 A.D. All other stations are missions, the minister and other officers being appointed by the Bishop. Clergy in the District: Bishop, 1; Priests, 9; Deacons, 2 (one not at work); Church buildings, 8; Rectories, 3; Communicants (August 1, 1883 A.D.), 686.

REV. E. GREGORY PROUT.

Moral Philosophy is the Philosophy of Moral Action. In it we treat more of rational and accountable beings.

We shall get our best idea of moral action by first considering the nature of physical or natural action.

Throughout nature there is a regularity, a conformity, and a certainty of action that we do not find in human conduct. Mere matter is inert, while in man there is a power of spontaneity, or a freedom of choice and origination of action.

The inertia of matter we express in the following principles or laws: (1) Any mass or particle of matter being in a state of rest or of inactivity cannot, of itself, change from that state; but in order to a change from it, the matter, whether particle or mass, must be acted on by something else to set in motion or put it into a state of activity. (2) The second law is, that whenever any piece of matter is in motion, or action, it cannot, of itself, change the intensity or rate of action,—but it must keep on forever, unless it is acted upon by something else besides, and outside of itself. Thus, if a stone is lying on the ground before me, it will lie there forever unless something acts upon it to move it, whereas a human being can start and move on at will or as he chooses to do. And if I pick up the stone and throw it into the air, it moves on until the attraction of the earth brings it down. If, however, there were nothing else acting upon it except the impulse which I gave it, it would move on in a straight line forever. But when a man is in motion, he can walk on or stop as he pleases. He can also slacken his pace or move on faster, start off in a run or turn and go in the opposite direction as he chooses.

This is enough to show that man is, in part of his activity at least, totally different from mere inanimate or lifeless matter. And this part of man forms so large an element in his constitution, as to make it necessary that Moral Philosophy should be a science totally distinct from Natural Philosophy.

There are, indeed, those who deny this difference and hold, that as the material objects around us by the forces of nature, so man is moved by his "emotions;" always acting in accordance with the strongest motive. But the difficulty arises, How will we decide which motive is the strongest? Do we say, "by the result"? this is begging the whole question. You say a man is moved by the strongest motives, and then we decide that a certain motive is the strongest because he is moved by it or acts in accordance with it.

A very simple illustration will show the fallacy of this argument. Suppose there is something on the floor that ought not to be there, and is offensive to me. This fact produces in me a motive to pick it up and toss it out of the window; I stoop to do so, supposing it to be very light,—to weigh perhaps an ounce or so,—but it is much heavier than I had supposed, and does not come with the first effort I make; I increase the effort, and continue to do so until I accomplish my object. But meanwhile the object has become no more offensive than it was before, and consequently the motive has grown no stronger. But I have increased the effort. Now this is just what no inanimate object, no piece of mere matter, can do. And it shows, too, the essential difference between the forces which act in nature and upon mere matter and the motives by which man is supposed to be actuated.

Motives, like the forces in nature, are of two kinds in reference to their influence upon our actions. The one class act suddenly and on the impulses of the moment, and the other act with less intensity at any given moment; but they continue to act for a long time, perhaps forever. And on this difference we find an illustration and an explanation of some of the most important phenomena and laws of moral action.

We have a good illustration of this difference in the forces of nature in the case of a stone thrown upwards into the air. The hand that throws it is the stronger force for the moment, for if it were not the stone would not go up. But gravity is a continuous force and acts always, and will prove itself the stronger in the end; so that however fast the stone may move at first, it will soon come back to the earth.

Now this illustrates the difference between the two classes of human motives upon which so much of our experience in life, and so many of the principles of moral philosophy, and, we may add, so many of the precepts of Christianity depend. All the appetites, or "lusts of the flesh," are of the impulsive kind. Many of the affections, such as anger, hate, etc., are also of this kind; they are strong at first, and in many cases they are exhausted by indulgence,—exhausted for the moment at least. No man is hungry after he has "eaten enough." But the higher principles of morality, those of conscience and religion, are of the other kind. They seldom or never become "passions," they are not apt to be so strong for the moment as the appetites and passions. And herein is temptation and the danger of temptation. We yield and sin and forever after suffer remorse, shame, and self-reproach for the act.

I have thus pointed out one great difference between us and the object in nature constituting the difference between natural and moral philosophy. This, however, is but the beginning and starting-point of other and broader differences.

(1) Man suffers in consequence of his actions as the object in nature cannot. If a piece of matter is dropped it may be broken and spoiled, but it suffers no pain. But if a man falls and breaks a limb he is disabled for a time and suffers great pain in consequence. And so with every wrong action that man performs, or can perform. He is liable to pain of some kind as a consequence of his act.

(2) The second great difference is that man can understand the laws of nature, and, to some extent, foresee the consequence of his acts, and vary his actions accordingly. Here comes in the exercise of his moral freedom or power of device. Philosophers have speculated a great deal about the nature of this power, and some of them have denied the reality of its existence. But no one of them has ever acted as though he did not believe in its reality. Of themselves they forecast the consequences of their acts, and avoid, as far as they can, those that will produce undesirable results, and in reference to others they blame them for what they consider wrong-doing, or though they fully believed that they were capable of choosing and doing differently.

(3) The third point of difference is more important, though it cannot exist without the other two: it is the power which man has, by the formation of habits, himself to change his own character. In fact, every act we perform does something towards making us either better or worse. As we know very well, a strong man may corrupt and debase his nature by sensual indulgence, and produce and develop in himself appetites and passions that had no previous existence, which, however, may become so strong as to be nearly if not quite uncontrollable. Perhaps the most frequent case of this kind is the appetite for intoxicating drinks, which is the cause of ruin to so many young persons. But in the other direction every good act performed is one step towards a habit of performing such acts,—the habit may be persevered in until it comes to be an instinct, a sort of second nature. I am inclined to think that this is what Holy Scripture refers to when it speaks of the laws of God being in the hearts of men (Jer. xxxi. 31, 32; Heb. viii. 10).

Now it is the business of the writer on Moral Philosophy to describe the various classes of motives and the rules of action that man ought to follow, with the consequences to himself of his keeping or violating these rules. The best that can come as a result is the eradication of evil passions, propensities, and appetites, and the formation of a character conformed to the highest ideal we can form; and the worst that can come is the complete enslavement of the man, soul and body, to the appetites of the lower or animal nature, making man in that respect worse than the beasts, for with them lust and ferocity are passing emotions, and not, as with debased man, a perpetual state or condition. Moral Philosophy can, of course, look for no help to man outside of himself in the transformation of his nature for the better. The help must all come from within, from conviction and force of will. Or, if there is anything in addition to this, it is the influence of friends and external surroundings. It is the characteristic excellence of Christianity that it offers Divine aid,—a supernatural help. The belief in the existence of God, of a righteous moral government in this world, and of a state of final rewards and punishments in the world to come, is of itself a great stimulus and a powerful influence. But Christianity proffers something more. And I think we may regard it as one of the items of proof of the truth and supernatural origin of Christianity, that it has never failed to accomplish what it thus promises when its precepts are complied with.

The rules of morality are derived from these subjects of consideration: (1) In the first place, man's actions and the motives or feelings he indulges always have an effect on himself. Not only do they make or mar his happiness, they do something for him by way of changing his character and his inward self. They make him either better or worse. Voluntary actions become by repetition habits, and habits are of the nature of instincts,—a kind of second or acquired nature. Hence any motive indulged, or any action performed which tends to debase a man or make him worse, is wrong and contrary to the principles of morality, no matter how much pleasure the act may bring him. Morality regards moral excellencies as far superior to mere enjoyment,—any enjoyment, or any kind or form of happiness which can come from any act or form of indulgence that tends to degrade him in the scale of moral excellencies.

(2) In the second place, man is a social being. He is born into society,—the society of parents and friends at least,—and he must live in society as long as he lives. But society is made up of human beings like himself, and of persons who have the same right to whatever belongs to humanity in general as he has; their influence on him is very great for good or for evil. And this influence upon each in promoting the happiness and higher moral or spiritual welfare on both is very great. Sometimes their entire happiness is dependent on him. Hence he can have no right to act towards them in such a way as to make them unhappy, unless and except as they have done wrong or are in the wrong to such an extent that he cannot enjoy or pursue his natural rights without constraining their wishes. It then becomes a question of casuistry how far one is bound in duty to forego his rights and pleasures out of regard to the happiness and welfare or wishes of others.

And here Christianity comes in with a light which mere reason and morality could never supply, although they may approve it. It not only teaches us in the golden rule to love others as we love ourselves, and to do to others all things that we would have them do unto us, but it teaches that in yielding to others so far as we can without doing wrong to ourselves we are doing the very best thing we can do for ourselves in a spiritual point of view: we are losing our life that we may gain it. It teaches that every sacrifice we can make, without violating some principle of faith or of duty, for the sake of peace and the happiness of others will turn finally to our gain.

(3) We must not only consider what man is and what are the several relations and circumstances by which he is surrounded. We must also consider what he ought to be. We must have our ideal standard at which each one should be among, and with which we must compare him. This ideal standard for man is, in the estimation of moral philosophy, the highest good at which he can aim or which he can hope to realize. Not only is it a character of moral excellence, but it is supposed to imply in its possession the highest happiness that man can have. If it does not include all forms of enjoyment, it does imply so much enjoyment of other and higher kinds that the want of the lower pleasures will not be felt. On the contrary, it will be regarded as a blessedness not to wish for them.

Many questions of duty and the right or wrong of actions can be determined only by reference to the standard, what the perfect man will not do, and will not wish to do, the imperfect man ought not to be willing to do. Moral philosophy, then, tries to discover and develop the rules of right and wrong action merely from the light of nature, from such objects and sources as each one may see, consult, and study for himself. These are moral law. It sets before us also higher motives to action, but law is a rule which we must strive to conform to by force of conviction and will. The appetites are often at variance with the laws of duty, and urge us with all their force in their own direction. When we resist them we do it by will force, a force of our own, in which we are unaided, and can look for no aid outside of ourselves, so far as mere moral philosophy can teach us, and so far as can be certainly known by any mere light of nature and without a revelation from God. This is also true of all forms of heathen and natural religion. They teach a sort of belief in God and prayer, but it is for material deliverance, seldom or never to overcome sinful passions. Nor do they attempt to reveal the help sinful man needs. What St. Paul says privately of the Jewish law holds good with mere moral law. "What the Law could not do in that it was weak through the flesh, God, sending His own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh that the righteousness of the Law might be fulfilled in us," and did accomplish, or has enabled us, "who walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit," to accomplish in the communion and fellowship of His Church.

REV. PROF. W. D. WILSON, D.D.

Mortal Sin. The early Fathers, Tertullian, Cyprian, and after them Augustine and others, made a distinction between mortal and venial sin. While all sin is deadly to the soul, some sins are, to use St. Augustine's phrase, fatal "by reason of their number" (cf. Ps. xl. 12), others are so grievous that they kill the soul, as the sin against the HOLY GHOST. All sin is of its own nature fatal to spiritual life, but there must be distinctions in degree, distinctions which lie in the fact of our complex relations to God, to our neighbor, to ourselves. It is evident that an angry word may not have the same guilt attached to it, nor the same consequences, as an angry blow, and this too may not have the same consequences as a fatal stab, though the angry word may be in intimate connection with the fatal stab. Those sins which are prohibited by positive enactment must be considered more heinous than those fretting carelessnesses which indeed eat into the soul life as moths fretting a garment, but which are incident to our daily life. Idolatry in any form, the gross idolatry of the heathen, or the subtle idolatry of self-murder, adultery, lying, theft, covetousness, pollution of the Lord's day, the dishonor of parents, the hatred of one's brother, all are deadly sins. "Venial sin is a transgression against the end of some divine law through inadvertence or carelessness or indulgence." The mortal sins are usually reckoned seven in number,—Pride, Envy, Sloth, Luxury, Covetousness, Anger, Gluttony; but it is evident that these are general terms for many fatal forms of sin that may be traced to their sources, as covetousness, which may show itself not only in an open coveting, but in withholding alms from God's messengers for them, in a pitiless temper, in discontent. So anger may hold murder (St. Matt. v. 21, 22). So our Lord sanctions this form of classifying sins (cf. 1 John iii. 14-17). All sin is hateful to God and must be hateful to us (Ps. cxxxix. 21-24). It is liable to His penalties each in its degree, and so must receive forgiveness only by His mercy. But some require direct and avowed confession. Others are of infirmity and are unwittingly done, and since we know them not, for these a general acknowledgment and a prayer for better self-knowledge, and a deeper love, and more watchfulness is needful, and a supplication for renewed grace.

Mortification. Positive teaching upon it is in Holy Scripture, but the word "to mortify" occurs only twice in our translation (Rom. viii. 13; Col. iii. 5). It is a strong word, setting forth the death unto sin and the life unto righteousness which forms the Christian's struggle. A practice of mortification must form some part of every Christian life. It is a part of that self-mastery which is beyond mere self-control or temperance, and it must take a very prominent place in the inner CHRIST life of the soul. It is the crucifixion to the world that we must make of self. But the very force of the term has always imported into it ascetic ideas, and the general conception of ordinary acts of mortification includes extraordinary practices. It does imply earnest self-examination, a strict carrying out of any rule of self-discipline without shrinking from publicity if that should follow. It does mean true fasting and prayer, and a putting aside of everything but the proper necessities of life. Such a mortification is within the reach of any one who would, for the love of CHRIST and for his own soul's sake, mortify the lusts which reign in our "members which are upon the earth." Were it practiced more generally it would give strength, and teach a sympathy with others who do not have force of will enough to withstand the general laxness of spiritual training so common.

Mortuaries. Payments, whether by gift by way of fee or by custom made, in behalf of a dead person for recompense of personal tithes omitted during his lifetime. It seems to have been originally an oblation made at a person's death, at first voluntary, then often by will.

Moses. Of all those who were in their life or office types of CHRIST, no one is more remarkable than Moses, the Lawgiver, the Leader, to whom it was given to receive charge of a tribe and to discipline it into a nation. A faithful servant, a patient, thoughtful, provident ruler, modest, self-sacrificing, bearing his people's burden with utter trust in God, none of mortal men can compare with him before the coming of his Master. The youngest of the three children of Amram, the grandson of Levi, he was a goodly child, a proper child, a child fair to God (Acts vii. 20, margin), so that his mother made every effort to conceal him, and successfully so for three months; then when he could no longer be hidden, she made the ark of bulrushes and laid him in it and hid him in the flags on the river-brink. The touching story of Pharaoh's daughter finding him is told with such lovely simplicity. The cry of the babe stirred her pity, and by the same feeling she committed it to its mother to nurse for her. The adopted son of Pharaoh's daughter, he was trained in all the learning of the Egyptians, and was mighty in words and deeds. His subsequent ability as an organizer and administrator shows that he had received a training fitting him for the office he was afterwards to fill. No Egyptian training, however, destroyed his love for his own people. "Moses, when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; esteeming the reproach of CHRIST greater riches than the treasures of Egypt" (Heb. xi. 24-26). It was this love for his oppressed people that led him to slay the Egyptian maltreating a Hebrew, and that afterwards made him a peace-maker among them. Their rejection of his appeal, and their accusing him of the homicide, showed him his danger, and he fled to Arabia, there for forty years to be a silent, patient shepherd. There he married Zipporah, the daughter of Jethro, the Priest of Midian, who had hospitably received him. It has been conjectured, but it is little more than conjecture, that during the latter part of his sojourn Moses was concerting a joint uprising of the Hebrews and of the recently expelled shepherd tribes of Arabs. But the narrative that Moses has left is too meagre to lend any proof or disproof of such a conjecture. At the close of the forty years he was commissioned to his future work by the Voice speaking from the Burning Bush, despite his plea to be released from it. His diffidence led to putting his brother forward as chief speaker, but the final authority remained with him. So close the two periods of his trial and training. Meek, ready to withdraw from view, he is yet equal to the vast burden laid upon him, for he knew in whom he trusted. Henceforth he belongs to the spiritual history of the world. He is commissioned with power to work signs and wonders. The shepherd's rod becomes mightier than the imperial sceptre. His word effects wonders no other human speech has ever wrought. He stands before the Pharaoh,—the scattered dust becomes lice when smitten by Aaron's rod; the ashes scattered by Moses and Aaron become boils. He spake the word for JEHOVAH, and all manner of flies and frogs appeared over the land. Moses stands forth the wonderful man of God.

It is not necessary to dwell upon the history of the Ten Plagues; but these remarks may not be amiss. The first three wonders were imitated, evidently by sleight of hand, by the magicians, nor was it impossible to do so on a very small scale, while those which Moses wrought affected the whole land. But when the plague of lice smote them they confessed that this (the third plague) was of God. Then natural phenomena, supernaturally used and combined, marked the next six plagues. They were miraculous because of their vastness, their completeness, their falling in rapid succession, out of all dependence upon seasons, upon the whole land, the field of Zoan,—i.e., the Delta,—while yet the land of Goshen was exempted. The last final terrible stroke fell from the scourge of the LORD Himself. They were warnings, disciplines, and then judgments upon Pharaoh and his people. At last Moses led the people out,—a hurried, anxious multitude, guarded by the six hundred thousand men at arms, who were apparently in a state of efficient discipline. So far in Moses' career we have seen a developed ability, patriotism, and a modest, retiring character that yet showed courage and constancy, and through it all unshaken faith. But he was to be yet more sorely tried. His faith obeyed the command to go down the banks of the Red Sea, and there his rod wrought God's deliverance. But now his patience, his ability as an organizer, his love for a stiff-necked, undisciplined multitude, his constant intercession, his untiring toil, all were to be developed in the wanderings in the wilderness. No less courage was needed then than before in this man of eighty, who was to spend the next forty years in disciplining a congeries of tribes into a nation fit to take possession of the land God would give them. He needed all the converse, all the revelations, all the directions he received, and yet he nearly sank under the burden. Their idolatries, their rebellious temper, their disobedience, must have sorely grieved him, yet he never swerved in his love, not when God offered to replace them with his own family. And in this connection it may be noted that his sons Gershom and Eliezer scarcely appear in the sacred history at all. As general, he displayed a capacity for strategy in the two chief campaigns against Sihon and Og. So for forty years he led them, divinely guided and supported, yet himself nobly equipped by capacity and education for the office. One other point in his character. He has been called the meekest man. If patient endurance shows it he truly was so. But he also showed a hasty temper under much provocation, but this meekness was more truly a sympathy for others, and an appreciation of their feelings and a desire to aid and to plead for them. But his hasty words deprived him of the right to enter the promised land. The details of the wanderings in the wilderness can find no place here, for we must use the history mainly to show how he as the faithful servant in the house was a type of the Son, and he is of that house. In patience, forbearance, love for his people, and his self-restraint, his abandoning all for their sakes, Moses becomes a type of our LORD, who became of none effect for us.

Again, Moses, though a full-born Israelite, is an alien trained by a stranger, and an out-cast from his people. So in this he is a type of our LORD, trained in this world at the carpenter's work-bench, and when he would come to them, rejected by His people. Again, Moses, as Leader and Lawgiver, is more directly the type of our LORD in His ascended work as the Captain of our salvation. As Leader he brings the people to the border of the Promised land, and leaves them there to enter in, being refused himself for their sakes, and in this the type would seem to fail. Yet in a deeper sense was he the type of CHRIST in all that constitutes a Leader. Every quality he displayed or developed, even to minute matters, contains a reference to our LORD,—His foresight, His organization, His gracious love, as Lawgiver. Moses' Law was largely one of ritual, yet it was the shadow of good things to come, and so a revelation of what was the direction of God's will. In many matters of internal economy it was what Christian States are now beginning to recognize as truest law. Its basis, the Decalogue, was re-enacted, developed, and sanctified by our LORD Himself in His Sermon on the Mount, and was presupposed by the Apostles as binding upon all men. Our LORD's new commandment lay concealed in the old commandment if men would but see it. For love is the fulfilling of the Law. But in the highest office Moses held, as Prophet, was he specially the type of CHRIST. His actual predictions were but few, and the chiefest was that on the destruction of Jerusalem. But so it was with our LORD; He exercised the predictive part of the Prophetic office only in the like subject, transferring its terrors as a type to the still greater terrors of the Day of Judgment. It was in action, in the whole round of his life, that he was like his LORD, at that distance which separates the servant from the master, in his life he exercised the highest predictive office. And again, as the messenger bearing the revelation of the loftiest title of God, JEHOVAH, I AM THAT I AM, he did not so much teach an utterly new fact as bring forward and establish it forever, making it the corner-stone of Jewish polity. So our LORD, declaring the Doctrine of the TRINITY, more indeed by the consequence of His teaching than by any direct assertion, forever made it the last and chiefest revelation, and built upon it the whole superstructure of Christianity. Yet as in the name of Moses' mother, Jochebed, lay the holy name JAH, and so showed it was not unknown to the tribes of Israel, so in the Old Testament lies embedded this doctrine of our LORD, which he brought forward, not as new, but as now to be chiefly taught. As Prophet, Leader, Lawgiver, as the creator of a nation, the founder of a theocracy, Moses is the type of our LORD, in some single points perhaps more brilliantly surpassed by others, but in the grandeur of his life, his faith, his work, the foremost man who has ever lived. And our LORD ever refers to him as the highest authority preceding Himself. Moses gave the Law and prepared the way for the Gospel.

Movable Feasts. Those which depend upon Easter for the time of their celebration. The calendar in the Prayer-Book contains rules for finding Easter-day, but generally it lays down this rule: "Easter-Day, on which the rest depend, is always the first Sunday after the Full Moon, which happens upon or next after the Twenty-first Day of March; and if the Full Moon happen upon a Sunday, Easter-Day is the Sunday after."

"Advent-Sunday is always the nearest Sunday to the Feast of St. Andrew, whether before or after."

Music. The harp and the organ were invented by Jubal long before the Flood, and since then mankind has never been without musical instruments. It would seem from Gen. xxi. 27, that family celebrations were gladdened "with songs, with tabret, and with harp." The religious use of music is first mentioned after the destruction of Pharaoh and his host in the Red Sea, when Moses and the children of Israel sang unto the LORD that glorious song, which is mentioned again in Rev. xv. 3: "the song of Moses the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb."

Not only did Moses and the men of Israel lead in this glorious song, but Miriam and all the women answered them, with timbrels and with dances, repeating the triumphant chorus probably many times over. There is no hint that this was now first invented or devised, but the mention of it looks rather like an outburst of that with which they were all familiar. We have, then, vocal and instrumental music, the men choir and the women choir, the recitative and the great chorus, all in full use already. When, under David and Solomon, the ritual of the Temple received its most splendid development, it seems to have exceeded anything else recorded in history in that line. Of the 38,000 Levites, 4000 were appointed to praise God with the instruments which David made; and it would seem that he wrote them certain tunes or chants, as well as the words of psalms, both of which were used for ages after. There was a further division among the singers, for greater variety and skill, and that the service should not be too burdensome; for there were no less than twenty-four different courses, each containing twelve men; and under these 288 the rest were trained, the great Festivals, it is probable, bringing all the 4000 together. The three great families of the Levites all had part in this remarkable organization,—Heman representing the Kohathites, Asaph the Gershonites, and Ethan (or Jeduthun) the Merarites. The glory and beauty of this musical service seems to have been preserved and perpetuated through all the subsequent corruption of the Nation, and was famous through all the countries round about. Even in their captivity, those who had led them away captive required them to “sing one of the songs of Zion.” At the restoration, the musical service and the courses of the singers were lovingly restored, and were maintained—with few and brief interruptions—until the destruction of the city by Titus.

When we look at the Psalms, we find that almost every one of them has its proper musical inscription, showing that they were intended from the first to be sung, and with instrumental accompaniment besides. When we look a little further, we find that this wonderful system of music was, with singular tenacity, maintained on the Temple site for more than a thousand years. We see how intensely the nation was attached to a musical inheritance, the like of which no other nation ever had. We know that the Psalter at least—to say nothing of other parts of Divine Service—has been sung in all ages, over all Christendom, as it was among the Jews. We know that the Jewish Church and the Christian Church overlapped one another for forty years, the Christians in Jerusalem during all that time frequenting the Temple service, and continuing undiminished their familiarity with the Temple music. We find a peculiar kind of music—Chanting—everywhere used for the Psalter; and all ecclesiastical tradition tells us that it was derived from the East. Under these circumstances, the idea that the Temple music suddenly disappeared,—became absolutely unknown; and that an entirely new system of music was with equal suddenness invented by nobody knows whom, and nobody knows where; and that this new style should have had vitality enough to endure to our own day: this is inherently absurd. The only rational idea is, that the music traditionally derived from the East, and which has been as tenacious of its existence since as well as before, must be, in its main features at least, the old Temple music. In the East, antiphonal chanting was already established, under St. Ignatius of Antioch, within twenty years after the death of St. John. In the West, the ancient chant was domiciled at Milan by the great St. Ambrose in the fifth century. The purity of his modes was restored by St. Gregory the Great, Bishop of Rome, in the seventh century; and his arrangement has been so permanent that the name “Gregorian” is attached to that entire style of music to this day. From time to time it has become grievously corrupted by ignorance, vanity, and bad taste. These caprices of musicians had so overloaded the sacred words at the time of the Reformation, that the Council of Trent actually had it under consideration to exclude music entirely from Divine Service. An exquisitely simple and dignified Mass by Palæstrina, which was composed for the purpose, and performed before the Council, alone prevented the entire banishment of music. No Liturgy has ever been set forth with any authorized music, other than the Gregorian; and after all its periods of corruption, it has had, like religion itself, its seasons of revival and a return to primitive purity. It is now more zealously cultivated, both in the Anglican and in the Roman Communion, than at any other time for the past five hundred years: having come up afresh in the great Catholic Revival of our own day.

It is not easy to give any idea of the variety and richness and religious depth of Gregorian music to those who have been educated only in the mechanical shallowness of modern music. This modern music has only two modes, major and minor. The striking difference in character between these two is due to the fact that the two semitones occur in different places of the scale. In the major mode (ascending) the semitones occur between the third and fourth, and between the seventh and eighth notes of the scale; in the minor mode, between the second and third, and between the fifth and sixth notes of the scale. But these are the only two varieties. No matter what the key may be, major is major, and minor is minor: these are the only two modes. Moreover, these two modes know but one dominant, and that is a fifth above the tonic. Now, in the Church Modes, of which there are eight (some would make them fourteen), there are no two of them in which the semitones occur in the same places of the scale; or if any two scales are alike in that, the mode of harmonizing them makes them entirely different. The impression produced upon the ordinary mind is, that in Church music the major and minor seem to be mingled together in perpetually changing proportions and relations. There are four of these modes called “authentic,” and four “plagal.” To get the scale of the four authentic, the easiest way is to go to a piano-forte or organ, and use only the white keys, omitting the black altogether. Then the scale of an octave from D to D will give the scale of the Dorian mode; that from E to E, the Phrygian; that from F to F, the Lydian; that from G to G, the Mixolydian. All these have as their tonic the note on which their scale begins and ends. The four plagal modes are related to these four in the following way: For the scale of the Hypodorian, begin one-fourth below the tonic of the Dorian, and close with the octave above the note on which you start, that is to say, from A to A; but this is to be harmonized so that the final chord is that of D,—the same as the Dorian. The other three plagal modes—the Hypophrygian, Hypolydian, and Hypomixolydian—are formed in precisely the same manner from their corresponding authentic modes.

The famous Gregorian Tones are eight in number, and are founded on these eight modes. The root principle of these glorious old Chants is, that the recitative note shall be the same note in each half of the Chant; and it must be taken at such a pitch as shall be easily sustained by all manner of voices in unison, say not lower than F natural nor higher than B flat. The Tonus Peregrinus (irregular) is the only one where there is a different note for the recitative, and there the difference is only one tone. In the strictest notation, no one of the Gregorian tones extends its melody beyond a range of six consecutive notes of the scale. Within these narrow limits every voice can join, without straining, or fatigue, or danger of flattening; and when a whole congregation has been trained to take their part, the majestic deep river of unison rolls onward with resistless strength, the organ accompaniment to this canto firmo varying with every verse, yet never for an instant confusing the solid power of the melody. Besides the variety of harmonic relations inseparable from the eight different modes, there is a further variety in the fact that the Gregorians have not—like the Anglican Chants—a fixed length and uniform rhythm. Sometimes there is one note, with one accent, in the mediation, sometimes more; and the cadences are even more varied than the mediations. Moreover, they may be used with the intonation (each Tone having its own characteristic intonation), or without it. And still further, each Tone has a festal form, as well as a ferial form. And nearly all the Tones have a great variety of endings, some complete, some incomplete: the former ending on the tonic of the Mode, the latter having some other final note in the melody. The Modes are also used for Hymn melodies and Anthems, as well as for Chants, though commonly with rather more freedom. Nor is Gregorian music ever written in strict time, like modern music. It has only three different notes, one of which is long, another short, and the third may be called medium: but their length is relative only, and not an exact double. The words used therewith regulate the actual length, so that the flexibility of Gregorian music is like the flexibility of the skin upon the living body. The spirit of Gregorian music is very strongly infused into the earlier German chorales, and the earlier Cathedral Music of the Church of England, but becomes less perceptible as we approach modern days. The English Cathedrals have kept up, with wonderful tenacity, through degenerate days, the grand old traditions of the Choral service. Anciently, the entire service was musically rendered, the Scriptures having their own peculiar intonation and inflections (as with the Jews when reading the Hebrew Scriptures); and the conversational or ordinary tone being excluded altogether. The Cantus Scripturarum, however, is now generally disused.

The chanting of the Psalms has always been maintained in Cathedrals and in many parish churches, and is becoming daily more and more common. Anthems (both word and thing having been developed, by free changes, from the old Antiphon) have always been popular, and are authorized by the declaration of the House of Bishops in 1814 A.D., that "Anthems taken from Scripture, and judiciously arranged, may, according to the known allowance of this Church, be sung in congregations, at the discretion of their respective Ministers." Metrical hymns, however, are the most easily learned, and therefore the most popular kind of music in most of our congregations. Unfortunately, they are too largely, both in words and music, deficient in churchliness of tone, though there is a gradual and very perceptible improvement slowly going on among us. The choral service, and surpliced choirs of male voices, are spreading from year to year, with general acceptance wherever they are tried.

There are three parts of Church music, taking that term in its fullest sense: 1, that of the congregation; 2, that of the trained choir; 3, that of instruments. As to the first, it must be confessed that general Church practice has rather discouraged the singing of the entire congregation, and the most ancient Canon (Laodicea, xv.) on the subject provides expressly that "No others shall sing in the church, save only the canonical singers, who go up into the Ambo and sing from a book." But where musical education is becoming daily more general, there will be an increasing number of those who are able, and ought to be willing, to join in the simpler kinds of music. It should always be insisted on that some part of what is sung should be simple enough for all to join in. The Venite and Psalter (sung to Gregorians, in unison), and the Hymns, should be of this description, and also the versicles and responses, the Litany, and the Amens, to the prayers. But where there is a trained choir, a considerable portion of the music should be left to them. They have a right—as they spend so much of time, trouble, and musical skill in preparing for their public service—to offer to the LORD of their best: and their best will necessarily be too elaborate to permit the joining of those who do not practice at all. As to instrumental music, the support of the organ is very valuable, in preventing the flattening of the singers, as well as in adding dignity, majesty, and power to the general effect. It is becoming more common, also, to reinforce the organ with one or more orchestral instruments, especially on high festivals.

At the beginning of this century and for some time after, it was taken for granted that furnishing the music in church was a wholly secular business, not needing that those who took part in it should be members of the Church. The organ-gallery was commonly as far as possible from the chancel, high up above the body of the congregation, and with curtains drawn in front, behind which the choir might do as they pleased until the time came for them to sing. The abuses growing out of this state of things became intolerable. The other theory is now recognized as the true one, which makes those who lead the worship of the sanctuary to be a part of the ministry, and therefore clothes them in cassocks and surplices, gives them seats in the chancel (or as near it as may be), has them enter and depart with the clergy, and inducts them into office with an appropriate special service, training them to that devoutness and reverence which ought to characterize such holy work. Of course none but baptized members of the Church should be admitted to this honorable service, and as many as are competent should be confirmed and communicants also. The boy choir has several great advantages. It is composed of those who are yet "under authority," and there is far less likelihood of factious friction developing "unpleasantnesses" in the choir. There is constant change in the personnel, as the boys' voices cannot last many years before "breaking." This is troublesome, but it has its compensations. It prevents the settling down of dear old barnacles in the choir, who have served for so many years that nobody can think of hurting their feelings by telling them that they ought to retire. It is continually sending forth youths who have been well trained in Church music, and drawing in fresh subjects for the same training, thus steadily adding to the numbers of those who are able to serve acceptably, whether in the choir or out of it. And last, not least, it is a valuable means of interesting the hearts of the young in the sacred beauty of God's House, to such a degree that not a few of them eventually study for holy Orders. Moreover, such choirs are always more numerous than quartette choirs, and as each boy has his own circle of relatives and friends who take a deep interest in seeing him surpliced and hearing him sing, it furnishes a permanent element of attraction to the public services of the Church. It is no wonder, then, that, with some local exceptions from accidental causes, the establishment of boy choirs, surpliced, has been almost uniformly successful, and is steadily and rapidly increasing in all parts of the Church. And, with them, there always comes a more solid, substantial, and Churchly tone in the music of the Sanctuary.

Mystery. Something into which one must be initiated. Some fact, principle, or doctrine, whether of the world, of nature, of intellect, or of religion, that is not yet understood, but can be, either by a future combination of what we now know, or by direct revelation. So our LORD, "to you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven" (St. Matt. xiii. 11). Again, the mysteries of GOD are those things which the ministers of GOD have as stewards for Him to give to His people (1 Cor. iv. 2). The Gospel is a mystery now revealed. The change that shall come upon our mortal bodies is a mystery (1 Cor. xv. 51). The whole revelation of CHRIST is a mystery of Godliness (1 Tim. iii. 16). In Greek theology the term has always been used as the equivalent of the Latin Sacramentum. But both terms were in the earlier theology used with far more width of application than a later and more rigidly formulated theology would admit. They were used, as in the New Testament, to stand for anything relating to GOD, and to the Church, and to our Life which can be, though it may not yet be, within the scope of our knowledge. So the mystery of the Incarnation, not wholly explained yet, is far better understood than it could have been by the Jews, who only could have held it through revelation as a fact yet to be,—still, a mystery to be put within the range of our powers. Not perhaps here shall we be able to understand all mysteries; but we will hereafter, when we shall know even as we are known. Mysteries are an exercise of our faith, and we can accept and act upon them as we do accept and act upon as great mysteries in their kind in the world of physical nature, or in the sphere of human nature. They need give us no more trouble; but the mysteries of our Christian faith demand an equal obedience and faithful use.

Nag's Head Consecration Story. Matthew Parker, who in the reign of Queen Elizabeth succeeded Cardinal Pole as Archbishop of Canterbury, was duly consecrated in the chapel at Lambeth, December 17, 1559 A.D. All the official documents, civil as well as ecclesiastical, relating to this consecration are on record. Forty-five years afterwards, viz., in 1604 A.D., a noted and unscrupulous controversialist, who, by order of James I., had been banished from England, Christopher Holywood, a Jesuit, published at Antwerp, in a violent book of his, the story of a mock consecration of Parker and other Bishops at the Nag's Head tavern, Cheapside, London. This story, utterly without foundation, but intended to cast discredit upon the line of succession through Parker and his coadjutors, was eagerly seized upon by Romish polemical writers, and repeated by them with various additions. Its first appearance in print nearly half a century after it was said to have occurred, when, had it had the slightest element of truth about it, it must have been known long before by the enemies of the Church of England, and would have been as gladly used by them then as it was subsequently, has not tended to its acceptance at the present day. Indeed, all fair-minded and intelligent writers of the Roman Obedience have long since abandoned this weak and vindictive invention of Holywood's. A very thorough sifting of the story will be found in Haddan's Apostolical Succession in the Church of England, and in the third volume of Archbishop Bramhall's Works, Oxford, 1844 A.D. REV. T. C. YARNALL, D.D.

Nahum. Nahum the Elkoshite is the seventh in order of the Minor Prophets. The epithet Elkoshite is thought to indicate the place of the prophet's birth or residence rather than his descent, and for many centuries it was believed that he was a native of Elkosh, a village said to be in Galilee; but in modern times another tradition represents Nahum as a native of Alkush, near Mosul, on the Tigris, where a tomb is pointed out to this day as his. Very little authority is to be attached to either tradition, or to the statement that he was of the tribe of Simeon; but it is considered probable from expressions used by the prophet, that he was familiar with the scenery of Palestine, and most likely a resident of Judah, when his prophecy was delivered; yet Ewald argues for the same reasons that Nahum must have been an eye-witness of the destruction of Nineveh. Nearly as much uncertainty exists about the prophet's date as about his birth and residence. The date 713 B.C. is given in our Bibles, and with this the best critics agree, though some incline to an earlier one, while others would place Nahum nearly a hundred years later. The prevailing opinion is that he was a younger contemporary of Isaiah, and possibly of Hosea and Micah. The Book of the Vision of Nahum the Elkoshite, is the Burden of Nineveh, and is wholly a prophecy of the destruction of that city. The three chapters into which it is divided form a continuous whole, in which, in lofty and poetical language, the prophet unfolds the woe denounced upon the chief city and mistress of the world. So literally was this prophecy fulfilled that for twenty centuries the very site of Nineveh was disputed, and only within the present generation has it been determined by discoveries which illustrate in the most remarkable manner the predictions of Nahum and his fellow-prophets. (Vide Nineveh in Smith's Dict. of Bible.) The elevated style and poetical beauty of Nahum are evident to any reader; and the opinion of Bishop Lowth, though spoken of the original, will readily be accepted by those who know the translation only: "None of the Minor Prophets seem to equal Nahum in boldness, ardor, and sublimity. His prophecy forms a regular and perfect poem; the exordium is not merely magnificent, it is truly majestic; the preparation for the destruction of Nineveh, and the description of its downfall and desolation, are expressed in the most vivid colors, and are bold and luminous in the highest degree." Nahum signifies Consolation.

Name. The name; Christian name. The name is the most necessary of all words in a language. Adam received his name from God, and he in turn, in token of Lordship, named all living things. It was the great and glorious name of JEHOVAH which was the subject of the most important revelation before the Incarnation, and it was the revelation of the names FATHER, SON, and HOLY GHOST which was a part of His Gospel. We have these names pronounced upon us at our baptism, and are named thenceforth Christians, and we have our names written in the Lamb's Book of Life. The name, then, which we bear is a most solemn reminder of our duty and our vows, which bind us to God and give us a brotherhood in CHRIST and a fellowship with the Saints. It is a badge or token to be highly esteemed, since we share the name of Him whose name is above every name, and at which every knee should bow.

Narthex. The long, narrow vestibule which ran across the front of the church.

The term also included the outer porch, as well as the inner vestibule. It had two doors, and in it were placed those who were under discipline and the energumens. Near, but beyond it, in the body of the church, the mixed congregation of the hearers and the heathen were placed, while the faithful alone sat or stood farther within, and occupied the nave proper.

Natural Religion. Whatever subordinate ideas may be attached to the conception of Religion, yet, whether primal, natural, or based on revelation, religion includes the acknowledgment of some supreme power and of our relation to it as owing a duty and service in return for life and continuance, and is the debt of worship by some outward acts of reverence and prayer. A religion to be such must assume the existence of a God, so we are here precluded from discussing whether the intuitions of our nature afford sufficient grounds for such a belief. It is enough for us to claim such a knowledge, no matter how crude or debasing, if it is distinctly a knowledge of a Power outside the limits of our own human capacities. The Fetich of the Negro, the Good Spirit of the Indian, are the base of their ideas of God as much as our better knowledge from Revelation, and it is so far a religion. But does natural religion simply become the sum of those concepts which are left after we have carefully removed, if it be possible for us to do so, all that Revelation has imported into our knowledge? or is it not rather the sum of those and conceptions of the human mind which increase as observation, experience, and religious emotions expand and react till at last their sum shapes itself almost, if not quite, into a system of religion? This last appears to be the natural course which the religious ideas within the range of mere human capacity would take.

There is, then, but developed in varying degrees, a natural religion. It is based upon the longings that belong to human nature. It seizes hold of any conception of a power that can give its helplessness aid. It acknowledges a dependence. It offers a payment of duty, obedience, worship. This may be but slightly understood, but it is understood and yielded. Besides this, there appears another conception, itself a speculation, but subtly bound up in the first. It is that as the man owes a service to God, why should God so treat him? Why should his soul perish, or where does God bestow it after death? There can be no clearer proof of the immortality of the soul than there can be of the existence of God. But as the conception of true religion develops, so does the belief of immortality and future happiness of the soul develop. They are both parts of that natural religion which is implanted in our nature. What natural religion cannot do is, it cannot show to us the Resurrection. That is a distinct Revelation. It is on the truest instincts of such natural religion, and not in any conflict with them, that God's revelation bases itself and claims our assent. But natural religion is not strong enough to put any restraints upon our passions. It is not able to give sufficient motives for self-control. It cannot supply the objective aims of religion vividly enough; and its chief appeal is to the weaker side of a merely human moral law, based upon an undefined good,—undefined, that is, as sharply as the conscience recognizes it when presented through Revelation. For any man thus to rest only upon natural religion, though carried up to Theistic or Deistic notion, when he has the light of Revelation, is a mere subterfuge,—a paltering with his conscience in the endeavor to avoid the responsibilities of the greater knowledge Revelation gives us. In a Christian land we may appeal to the dictates of natural religion, but as a proof that even in our human nature God has not left us without proofs of what is more clearly known to be His will, and to show that our Faith is in consonance with and glorifies the rudimentary ideas, which are really simply indications of our natural capacity for all the gifts He has given us in His Son. We have avoided complicating this statement with other subordinate ideas, or with any analysis of Fetichism Polytheistic notions, or with a nature-worship which has been carried out by some nations (as the Sabæans) into a system of some perfectness. But for us here in this Christian country, natural religion should hold the same relation to our spiritual life that our elemental childish ideas on any secular subject hold to our better and ripper knowledge. A subject of inquiry as helping us better to comprehend the working of our minds.

Nature. That which exists, whether it be self-existent, as in the Divine Nature, or derivative and dependent, as in all else which has being, whether visible to us or not. But existence implies some kind of organization, and organization implies Law; for that chaos which can be conceived by us must be made up of nature, and it would be hard to conceive of the ultimate particles of matter without some organization, though the congeries of such matter might have no cohesion. This being true, we then can conceive of all nature whatever as governed by law and the expression of law.

Nature, Divine. Vide God.

Nature, Laws of. The modes by which the complex parts and elements of Nature work together, each having the modes of its existence, and so co-ordinated and so limited that they work together harmoniously, or whenever they clash there is a compensation offered in some way. It is not in the limits of this work to dwell upon these laws, but to rather point out the power that is given to man to use directly or to combine for his purposes the several laws of Nature. We are constantly doing this with each extension of our knowledge of the working of, and results effected by, these laws. All arts and sciences, the conveniences of life, these all depend upon our combining with more or less skill the elemental laws of Nature which we have discovered, and whenever we more perfectly understand the extent and the limits of each of these laws we apply them to new uses, and attain new and wonderful results with them. But it is well to point out, that man to effect his ends has to combine several of these natural laws, and to limit the one by the other, but the Divine wisdom in many ways reverses this; each one of His Laws is made to have multiform applications, and to effect His purposes with a simplicity and an ease that we do not perceive as we ought, living as we do in the midst of their operation. So silent, so sure, so perfect is their work, and their compensations in large results so complete, that men have been deceived and have said that Law was God, and we had no need of a Personal God, that the Universe was self-restoring. We can but see His will behind ordering all things in a perfect constitution thoroughly harmonious with His own Perfections.

Nave. Vide ARCHITECTURE.

Navicula. A ship or ark; a vessel which was used to pour out the frankincense into the censer. It was used in Bishop Andrews' Chapel and in Queen Elizabeth's.

Nazarenes. A name which Christians once bore because of their LORD. They were of the "sect of the Nazarenes" (Acts xxiv. 25). But it was later the name for a sect of heretics who took up a mixture of both Christian and Jewish tenets. They used circumcision and kept the Sabbath, and observed the Mosaic Law, but also received Baptism and observed the Christian Law. They could be traced back apparently to those Christians who retired from Jerusalem when the last siege was threatened, and who probably kept up observances which were elsewhere abandoned as soon as the Jewish nationality was destroyed. Possibly against the traditions they kept up were directed the Canons against the Judaizers in the Apostolic Canons. They kept up their organization for four hundred years or more.

Nebraska and Dakota, Missionary Jurisdiction of. The missionary jurisdiction of Nebraska and Dakota was erected by the House of Bishops in 1865 A.D.

The Rev. Robert Harper Clarkson, D.D., Rector of St. James' Church, Chicago, was elected the first Bishop of the jurisdiction by the General Convention of 1865 A.D. He was consecrated on the 15th day of November in the church of which he was Rector, in the city of Chicago, by Bishop Hopkins, who was then the Presiding Bishop of the Church.

These two Territories, Nebraska and Dakota, had previously been part of the great missionary jurisdiction of Bishop Talbot, which embraced nearly all of the country west of the Missouri River to the Rocky Mountains. Nebraska is twice the size of the State of New York, and Dakota is double the size of Nebraska. When Bishop Clarkson entered upon his work there were seven clergy connected with the jurisdiction and four small churches, located at Nebraska City, Omaha, Decatur, and Nemaha City. The white population of the entire jurisdiction was at this time (1865 A.D.) above 90,000, nearly seven-eighths of which was in the Territory of Nebraska. There were then above 30,600 Indians in the jurisdiction, chiefly in the Territory of Dakota. Missions were established among these Indians in 1866 A.D.

The Bishop took up his residence first at Nebraska City, and commenced a Boys' School (Talbot Hall) there in 1866 A.D., which has since grown into Nebraska College, now under the charge of the Rev. Dr. McNamara.

In 1867 A.D. the Bishop removed his residence to Omaha, and about this time the present Brownell Hall building for the Diocesan Girls' School was erected in that town. The Institution had been organized a few years previously by Bishop Talbot, and was located in the country, three miles from Omaha. This excellent Institution, which has been doing a noble work in the education and teaching of young women for nearly twenty years, needs very much at this time (1884 A.D.) new and larger buildings. The Bishop is endeavoring now to raise a fund of $15,000 for the purpose, and he feels sure that the same amount of money cannot be more judiciously expended for Church work anywhere in the country.

Very soon after Bishop Clarkson commenced his duties in Nebraska and Dakota, the tide of population began to flow into these new Territories. New and large towns sprung up with great rapidity throughout the jurisdiction. The population at this time (1884 A.D.) cannot be less than 600,000 in Nebraska and 300,000 in Dakota. In 1868 A.D. Nebraska became a State, and was erected into a Diocese, and admitted into union with the General Convention.

Among the first efforts of the new Diocese was the commencement of an Episcopal Fund. An assessment for this purpose was made upon every parish and mission, and collected and invested every year. Other means were also taken to increase the fund, which was carefully managed, until now it amounts to $36,000.

Bishop Clarkson was chosen unanimously the Diocesan of the new Diocese of Nebraska in 1870 A.D., and accepted the same, retaining his charge of Dakota as Missionary Bishop. He declined to accept the salary offered to him by the Diocese of Nebraska as long as he remained Missionary Bishop, but allowed the amount to be added every year to the permanent Episcopal Fund of the Diocese.

In 1871 A.D. the missionary jurisdiction of Niobrara was erected out of that of Nebraska and Dakota, it being chiefly that portion which contained the Indian missions; and in 1872 A.D., Bishop Hare was called to the oversight of this new jurisdiction.

In 1883 A.D. the missionary jurisdiction of North Dakota was erected out of Dakota, and the Rev. W. D. Walker consecrated as Bishop of the same. And at the same time the boundaries of the jurisdiction of Nebraska were enlarged, and the name changed to South Dakota. So that there are now (in 1884 A.D.) three jurisdictions in the original one assigned to Bishop Clarkson in 1865 A.D., with 3 Bishops, 60 churches, 60 clergy, and about 4500 communicants in them all.

In 1872 A.D. the Bishop of Nebraska commenced to collect funds in the city of Omaha for the erection of a Cathedral church in that city. In the spring of 1880 A.D. the corner-stone of the Cathedral was laid in the presence of six Bishops and thirty clergy and a very large concourse of people. The work went slowly onward as fast as the money could be procured for the purpose, no debt being allowed to be incurred in the erection of the edifice.

On the 15th day of November, 1883 A.D., being the eighteenth anniversary of the consecration of the Bishop, the fine Cathedral was consecrated to the worship of ALMIGHTY GOD. The Rt. Rev. Dr. Garrett, the Bishop of Northern Texas, preached the sermon on the occasion, and the Lord Bishop of Toronto, the Rt. Rev. Dr. Sweatman, and the Rt. Rev. Bishop Burgess, of Quincy, were present and participated in the services of the consecration. The Cathedral is entirely finished except the tower and the chapter-house, and it cost as it stands, with its furniture and appointments, above $70,000, the larger part of which was contributed by the Churchmen and citizens of Omaha.

A noticeable feature of the Cathedral is its wealth of memorials. Every window and every article of furniture and adornment is a memorial gift.

In connection with the Cathedral, and adjoining it, is an Episcopal residence built in 1881 A.D., and a large and beautiful Childs' Hospital and Home built in 1883 A.D.

Through the efforts of the Rev. Dr. Oliver a valuable property has been secured in Nebraska City, named Thoenberger Hall, originally designed for a Divinity school.

It is now used for primary educational purposes. There is an endowment for a Theological Professorship, which is now utilized for the support of a General Diocesan Missionary.

A legacy of $5000 left to the Diocese by the late Mrs. Clarissa Cooke has been funded, and the interest is used every year, at the discretion of the Bishop, to aid struggling parishes in erecting churches. A church is built by the aid of this legacy every year.

A legacy of $10,000 left to the Diocese by Mrs. Fiske, of Ithaca, New York, was added to the Episcopal Fund. It is the settled purpose of the Bishop and the trustees of the property of the Diocese to fund all legacies and use only the interest of the same.

Legacies are still needed for the endowment of the Diocesan schools. No Church schools can be considered as permanently established without at least a partial endowment.

At the General Convention of 1883 A.D. the Bishop of Nebraska resigned his charge of Dakota, on the ground that Dakota needed a Bishop of its own, and that Nebraska alone was more than enough for any one Bishop properly to look after and care for.

In doing so the Bishop used this language: "I am happy to be able to report that Nebraska is able henceforth to support her own Bishop. She has now 36 clergy, 35 churches, and 2200 communicants, two excellent institutions of learning, a hospital, a Cathedral, a Bishop's residence, a moderate Episcopal endowment, and, what is better than all, a body of as earnest, united, and faithful clergy as ever a Bishop was blessed with."

Statistics.—Clergy, 36; parishes and missions, 118; families, 1230; individuals, 4920; baptisms, 286; adults, 80; total, 366; confirmed, 187; communicants, 2200; marriages, 84; burials, 122; Sunday-schools, teachers, 177; scholars, 1793; contributions, $34,682.69.

RT. REV. R. H. CLARKSON, D.D., Bishop of Nebraska.

Necessity. (Ne and cesso, that which cannot cease.) "I have one thing to observe of the several kinds of necessity, that the idea of some sort of firm connection runs through them all; and that is the proper, general import of the name necessity. Connection of mental or verbal propositions, or of their respective parts, makes up the idea of logical necessity; connection of end and means makes up the idea of moral necessity; connection of causes and effects is physical necessity; and connection of existence and essence is metaphysical necessity." (Waterland, Works, vol. iv. p. 432, in Krauth's Fleming's Vocab. of Philos.)

Nehemiah. The son of Halaiah, and chosen to be one of the cup-bearers before King Artaxerxes, who was divinely appointed to administer the judicial authority in the restored nation. He found such favor in the sight of the King that he had his prayer for leave to go to Jerusalem granted, and received authority to procure all that was needful for the rebuilding of both the Temple and the walls of the Holy City. He set about this on the fourth day after his arrival, and the work was speedily pushed on amid many difficulties and much opposition from Sanballat the Samaritan. He finished the building and aided in organizing the internal administration of the city, put down usury and its consequence,—slavery,—acted with Ezra in breaking up marriages with those without the people, and displayed a great administrative and military capacity. His book is useful in giving invaluable details of the places in Jerusalem, and of the circuit of the walls, and it contains the first record of a written compact and covenant.

A part of it has been supposed to be an interpolation by another hand, principally of genealogies, letters, and documents. But while this may be true of the genealogies, since Ezra arranged the Canon, it may well be that Nehemiah had placed them there himself as documents relative to the whole plan of restoration.

Nehemiah was a patriot, willing to sacrifice everything to the restoration of his people; disinterested, self-denying, with much political sagacity, and of so lofty a character that he was able to convince so suspicious a King as Artaxerxes of his perfect integrity and trustworthiness. He had, as indeed was a necessary part of one in his position, considerable skill in organizing and in obtaining the hearty co-operation of those with whom he was joined in his work of restoration.

Neology. The later deistical Theology which sprang up in Germany about ninety years ago. It was richer and in many respects higher than the Deism of the English Infidel school, from which it really was derived, and it also stood on a higher plane, in so far as it accepted somewhat more of the Scriptures. Though the neologians were at variance among themselves how far they should receive the Scripture, they rejected at will whatever was at variance with their own theories, and kept whatever suited them with but little regard to the true nexus of the sacred text. A lower time-bound view of the worth and work of religion and of morals seems to have pervaded their writings. Whatever was utilitarian, that they retained; whatever did not comport with their ideas of such utility they rejected. Upon such principles the most arbitrary canons of criticism were announced and ruthlessly applied to the Gospels and Epistles. To the neologic school we owe the fierce controversy about St. John's Gospel and the destructive criticism applied to St. Paul's Epistles, and the theories about the prophet Isaiah and the attacks upon the Book of Daniel. Indirectly they have done much service, in helping to clear away much untenable matter that had gathered about the several books of the Bible, and in bringing forward defenders of the Book and in giving a great impetus to its study; but it is rather the good that comes out of evil than the good that flows from another holy act. Their researches have brought out a vast amount of critical material which will be hereafter very useful. But they have succeeded in shipwrecking the faith of many.

Neophyte. A new convert; a person newly baptized. St. Paul uses it in limiting the class of persons from whom a Bishop should be selected,—"not a novice." The margin reads, "not newly come to the faith." But the full sense is "one newly planted." The limitation was perfectly correct. For one newly brought into the Faith needs the training of growing up into the holiness of the Faith and a familiarity with the facts of the Faith which one newly planted can scarcely claim.

Nevada was erected into a Missionary Jurisdiction at the General Convention of 1868 A.D.

The present jurisdiction embraced also at the date of its erection, and till 1874 A.D., the Territory of Arizona, when it was separated. (Vide NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.) The first services of the Church in Nevada were held by the Rev. Mr. Smeathman, of California, in the months from August to October, 1861 A.D., while officiating for the Territorial Legislature of Nevada as its Secretary in its sessions in Virginia City, and again from October to December 31 at Carson, to which place the Legislature was removed. From this beginning, twenty-three years ago, the work has gone on slowly but surely. In 1863 A.D. the present Bishop went out immediately upon his ordination, and took charge of St. John's, Gold Hill. After nearly two years' work he returned East, but was recalled in 1867 A.D. to St. Paul's, Virginia City, elected Missionary Bishop of Nevada by the General Convention in 1868 A.D., and consecrated to his office in St. George's Church, New York (October 18, 1869 A.D.). The history of the Diocese is very largely the record of his personal efforts. With one clergyman to aid him, he bravely began his work. Arizona could not be attended to at first without too much loss of valuable time, so he concentrated his work upon Nevada. With one clergyman and with one hundred and sixty-nine communicants, scarce a fourth of which were males, he entered upon the toilsome Episcopal duty, which, from the very conditions of the Territory and the mode in which it was settled, was very discouraging. Mining towns are proverbially uncertain. A community gathered in a few months by the thousands over some rich deposit may upon the sudden failure of the mine as suddenly disappear, scattered forever. Work done for such towns will bear fruit in individual lives, but cannot be proven to be effective when measured by statistics. A floating, restless, adventurous population, ever seeking new scenes, careless of spiritual things, desecrating in utter heedlessness what should be held most sacred, needs constant, redoubled work, an itinerating ministry which can follow from place to place with the least possible sacrifice of material, and with the greatest amount of adaptation to existing conditions. It was amidst such discouragements that the Bishop began his work. The clergy were increased to five by 1871 A.D. The communicants were one hundred and ninety-four, and over $14,000 had been contributed. In 1874 A.D. the report showed eight clergy at work at nine parishes and two mission stations, and an aggregate of two hundred and sixty-nine communicants. The total of the contributions for the three years was $43,000. It was at this time that the Bishop planned his girls' school at Reno which, by help from Eastern funds, was gotten to work in 1876 A.D. It had to incur a debt of about $8000, which has been steadily reduced, and is nearly, if not now quite, extinguished. The reports from year to year show great fluctuation, and the uncertainty of the work is shown by the fact that with all the immigration into the Territory, yet the confirmations (about six hundred) are nearly the whole number of the communicants, six hundred and eighty-six. The contributions rose at one triennial report to over $73,000, and then fell off to $33,000 at the last report.

Bishop Whitaker's retrospect (Spirit of Missions, November-December 1880 A.D.) of ten years' work is so pertinent that it is necessary to quote it here:

"In the good providence of God, I am permitted to see the end of ten years of missionary work in Nevada.

"They have been years of almost unremitting labor, much of which has been attended with manifold discouragements and apparently meagre results. The continual change which is taking place in the population of our towns, and the almost universal disregard of Sunday as a day of rest and worship have everywhere combined to retard the progress which it should seem the Church ought to have made during this time. If the people of Nevada were attached to the places in which they live, instead of constantly planning for a removal, it would be much easier for them to become identified with Church work; and if they could be persuaded to relax their labors for one day of the week, a much larger attendance upon Sunday services could be easily secured. Whether this will ever be, in this generation, is very doubtful. It is certain that but little progress has been made in this direction in the last ten years.

"Still, with all these discouragements there has been much which should call forth my devoutest gratitude to God; much which leads me to believe that this work has not been done in vain.

"Personally, I have had almost everything to be thankful for. No one could receive kinder or more considerate treatment from any people than I have uniformly received from the people of this State. I feel identified with them, and am entirely content to labor with and for them so long as God gives me strength to labor in His service.

"And contrasting the present condition of the Church in Nevada with what it was ten years ago, there are to be found evidences not only of much work performed by the Clergy, but also of liberal giving by the people, and of substantial growth in all the elements of Church strength.

"When I entered upon the performance of my duties as Missionary Bishop there was but one clergyman belonging to the Jurisdiction; now there are seven. There were then three churches; now there are ten. There were then two rectories; now there are eight. There were then one hundred communicants; there are now three hundred and forty. There were then thirty Sunday-school teachers and three hundred and twenty scholars; there are now ninety-three teachers and one thousand two hundred and forty-two scholars.

"During this time there have been one thousand one hundred and ninety-nine infants baptized, and one hundred and forty-five adults. Three hundred and sixty-eight persons have been confirmed; five hundred and eighty-nine marriages have been solemnized. The number of burials has been one thousand one hundred and twenty-nine.

"The total value of Church property in Nevada ten years ago was $36,400; it is now $125,000. In making up this valuation I have deducted $10,000 from the actual cost, on account of depreciation in the actual value. But were all the Church property to be destroyed it could not be restored to its present condition for less than $125,000."

The report to the past General Convention showed that the condition of the Diocese, while not gaining very materially, certainly held its own, and was deepening and strengthening what it had gained in the past. Six clergy have the care of fourteen parishes and chapels; the number of communicants is three hundred and two; the amount contributed for the year ending July, 1883 A.D., $9659.15.

It shows the fluctuation and uncertainty of permanent parochial work in a mining population like that in Nevada to note that the communicants are but three hundred and two, and yet a total of over seven hundred had been confirmed in the ten years of past work.

New Creation. In Holy Scripture we meet constantly an assertion of a new creation, a new heavens, a new earth, a new order, the old to pass away, all things to become new (Is. lxv. 17; lxvi. 22; 1 Pet. iii. 10; Rev. xxi. 1, 5; 2 Cor. v. 17). And in these places it is evident that a material change in nature is taught as to take place, a renovation of the physical nature around us. There is a renewal, a restoration, a new creation of our spiritual life in the psychical nature, but this is to be also a material restoration. St. Paul points to the connection of the two natures in, "For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the first-fruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body" (Rom. viii. 22, 23). Then there is a plain prophecy that there will be a new creation of this earth, and it is to be symmetrical with the new creation of our souls, for he who is baptized is in CHRIST JESUS, and he who is in CHRIST JESUS is a new creature, and he who is a new creature here is renewed by the HOLY GHOST, and transformed (the same word in St. Luke is "transfigured"), and passes from glory to glory. The object is clear. It is to present us in His Church holy, spotless, unrebukable, that His Bride may be in His universe, "That He might present it to Himself a glorious Church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish" (Eph. v. 27). And in this we must have a share, therefore we are not to be unclothed, but clothed upon. We, as inheritors, will be changed and redeemed and sanctified. We are to live on a sinless earth. We may not speculate further as to the conditions of our existence. Whether the Paradisaic state, as sketched for us in Genesis, will be restored, or whether lifted to heavenly places, seated in our LORD'S Throne, made kings and priests unto GOD and His FATHER we shall be endowed with faculties glorified; or whether our rank in the scale of created beings there will not be beyond all Angelic essences. It is rash to intrude into the unseen. It is safe merely to say, how these things shall be we do not know; when, in His good time; where, as He may please; but this we do know, that all things in that New Creation will be far more glorious than mortal eye now can look upon, mortal ear can now hear, mortal heart can now understand.

New Hampshire, Diocese of. I. The history of the Church in New Hampshire begins with that of the colony itself, the first settlers (1623 A.D.) being Churchmen. By 1638 A.D. a church and parsonage had been built in Portsmouth (then Passataquack), fifty acres of land given as endowment, and the Rev. Richard Gibson, a missionary in Maine, called as rector. In 1642 A.D., however, when New Hampshire had fallen under the authority of Massachusetts, Mr. Gibson was banished by the Puritan authorities of Boston, having confessed the only offenses charged against him, that he had "defamed the government,"—i.e., protested against their usurpation,—and had performed marriages and baptisms at the Isles of Shoals. A Puritan congregation voted themselves the Church property, and for the next ninety years the Church had here no history. In 1732 A.D. a parish was organized, and Queen's Chapel begun. It took nearly three years to finish a small building, and two years of tedious correspondence (partly with officers of the S. P. G. in London) to secure a rector, the Rev. Arthur Browne. Of six hundred families in Portsmouth in 1741 A.D. less than sixty conformed to the Church, but all the Churchmen in New Hampshire were his parishioners, and he administered the charge with faithful diligence from 1736 A.D. till his death in 1773 A.D. He was helped in the itinerancy by his son Marmaduke (1755–62 A.D.) and by the Rev. Moses Badger (1767–74 A.D.), the latter reporting the number of souls under his care in 1768 A.D. as eleven hundred and thirty-two, "which at his first coming did not exceed seven hundred and forty."

A second parish was organized in 1773 A.D. at Claremont, settled by Churchmen from Connecticut. The building then begun still stands as Union Church, West Claremont. The Rev. Ranna Cossit was the first rector (1773–85 A.D.).

The storm of the Revolution fell heavily upon the two parishes. Mr. Cossit narrowly escaped death at the hands of an armed mob in 1774 A.D., and was for several years a prisoner within the town limits. A British officer writing in 1778 A.D. says, "Rev. Dr. Wheelock (President of Dartmouth College, in New Hampshire), in conjunction with Deacon Bayley, Mr. Morey, and Mr. Hurd, all justices of the peace, put an end to the Church of England in this State as early as 1775 A.D." In April of that year Portsmouth had called the Rev. Matthew Byles from Boston. He could not go. In October, 1776 A.D., it was still "utterly impracticable," and he wrote to the S. P. G., "if government should not be re-established, I am well convinced that no Episcopal Church will be tolerated in New England."

Nevertheless, the war-clouds broke, and the Church was seen to be stronger than before. In Claremont, twenty-seven families became forty-three. The S. P. G. here in 1781 A.D. that "the Episcopal congregations in Massachusetts and New Hampshire have greatly increased, even where they have had no ministry." In Claremont, again, thirty families of the Congregational Society conformed to the Church in a body in 1790 A.D. We hear much of hurt done to the Church by its tory clergy, but there are two sides even to that story. A letter to the S. P. G. in 1778 A.D. shows that even "rebels" could respect a clergy sensitively faithful to their peculiar obligations. "The Church in Portsmouth is in a ruinous condition, the windows broken and many of the pews shattered. There are several good families which belong to the Church still. A clergyman who was supposed to have abjured the king offered to preach there. The warden, who was a rebel general and commissary of the province, refused him, saying the doors of the church should never be opened till they could have somebody else to enter and officiate besides those perjured villains, who had broken their oaths of allegiance and their promises at ordination." Again, the S. P. G. report of 1782–83 A.D. speaks of "the clergy themselves increasing in esteem for their steady conduct, in diligently attending to the duties of their calling, and preaching the Gospel, unmixed with the politics of the day."

The war over, the need of organization began to be much felt. Valuable property was at stake, over forty thousand acres of land having been reserved for the endowment of future parishes and of the S. P. G. in the lay-out of towns by the elder Governor Wentworth. A small company met accordingly at Hanover, in August, 1785 A.D., and signed the following Declaration: "We, Whose Names are hereafter subscribed, Do meet and form ourselves into an appiscopal Body in order for a church with full power and authority to act as such." Unfortunately, this bold assertion had no effect. It may be added here that the larger part of the land endowment was ultimately lost. A small amount has gone to help the Diocesan missionary work, and something to the support of the Bishop, but most of that which was recovered fell into the hands of two of the least needy parishes, being now partly represented by specially heavy assessments paid by those parishes for Diocesan expenses.

In 1789 A.D. New Hampshire was represented at a meeting of six clergymen in Salem, Mass., when Dr. (afterwards Bishop) Bass was elected Bishop of the two States, application being made to the General Convention for his consecration, 1789 A.D. Deputies of New Hampshire and Massachusetts signed the Constitution, October 2, when the matter seems to have dropped.

Meanwhile, Portsmouth, for thirteen years without clerical services, had obtained a rector, the Rev. John C. Ogden (1786-93 A.D.), and a third parish had been formed, at Holderness, in the centre of the State. Here again the Church was first in the field. Judge Livermore, the chief proprietor, was a Churchman, and the Rev. Robert Fowle, who held that charge for more than fifty-eight years (1789-1847 A.D.), shepherded the flock without a rival till 1814 A.D. A fourth parish sprang into being in 1793 A.D. in Cornish, near Claremont. Cornish contained no Churchmen, apparently, till Philander Chase, a student in Dartmouth College, became one, and the carrying over of nearly a whole township to Episcopacy may probably be ascribed to the sole influence of the future Missionary Bishop. The meeting-house built by the town was voted an Episcopal Church, and Mr. Ogden ministered for a time as rector, though living in Hartland, Vermont, and supplying five towns with regular services, and ten or twelve others occasionally. In 1795 A.D. Cornish voted to purchase a Bible and a copy of Bishop Seabury's Sermons, being evidently reduced to lay-reading, but the end of the century finds four parishes and three clergymen in the State.

II. The Diocesan history proper begins with the meeting (in Concord, August 25, 1802 A.D.) of the first Convention, the rectors of Portsmouth, Claremont, and Holderness, and two Lay Delegates each from Portsmouth, Holderness, and Cornish. The Rev. Joseph Willard, of Portsmouth, presiding, and the three clergymen being made a Committee to draw up a Constitution, reported one the same day, which was signed by all present except the Rev. Daniel Barber, of Claremont. That remarkable man, able, ambitious, unwise, had already, a year before, accomplished the organization of another Convention, of the Churches in the Connecticut Valley (Western New Hampshire and Eastern Vermont), and having obtained from the General Convention a dispensation allowing such a union of parts of two States, he would not give up his scheme. He had brought to this Convention a proposal from the Valley Convention looking to a union of all New Hampshire and Vermont in one Diocese, but the Concord gathering declared themselves not authorized to act on such a business, and Claremont held quite aloof till the General Convention of 1808 A.D., at the earnest request of the Convention of New Hampshire, rescinded the harmful dispensation. The Valley Convention met no more after 1808 A.D., and Mr. Barber appeared in the New Hampshire Convention of 1809 A.D.

Meanwhile, the Diocese had been wholly without Episcopal care. Bishop Bass was invited to take charge of it in 1803 A.D., but died within a few weeks. In 1810 A.D. the Convention declines to take part in the election of a Bishop for Massachusetts, but promises to receive the person chosen, and accedes to the Constitution of the Eastern Diocese. In 1812 A.D., Bishop Griswold presided in the Convention for the first time, and began the first Episcopal visitation of this region. For thirty years the Church in New Hampshire enjoyed his superintendence, and made slow but fairly steady gains in numbers and in popular respect. Hopkinton had been added to the number of parishes in 1803 A.D., and Plainfield in 1804 A.D., and to these were now joined Drewsville, Charlestown, Concord, Dover, and Manchester, besides the building of a church in the prosperous village of Claremont, far from the old church in the "west part." Parochial reports began to be made in 1810 A.D. The number of communicants reported in that year was 151; in 1820 A.D., 198; in 1840 A.D., 394.

III. The need of a separate Bishop had been suggested occasionally, but even after the death of Bishop Griswold the feeble, scattered churches of New Hampshire hesitated to undertake such a responsibility. At a special Convention, October 4, 1843 A.D., the motion to elect barely prevailed. But that point settled, the Convention was unanimous in the choice of the Rev. Carlton Chase, of Bellows Falls, Vermont. He was consecrated in October, 1844 A.D., and served the Diocese faithfully and wisely to his death, in January, 1870 A.D. He had to be rector of Trinity Church Claremont, till June, 1863 A.D., and when the Diocese did assume his support, his salary was $900, ill paid. But he left 23 parishes instead of 12, 21 clergymen for 11, and about 1850 communicants for 500. Far greater was his work of making the Church respected in a community full of bitter prejudice. Of such work, sinking strong foundations through a quicksand till they reach a solid bed, Bishop Chase and his clergy did very much which cannot now be reckoned, but which makes possible the work of to-day.

St. Paul's School, Concord, also deserves honorable mention here. It gathers most of its pupils from other States; but its high success has won honor for the Church which it represents, and in this way and by many gifts and helps, it has been a powerful promoter of the Church's good in New Hampshire. It was begun in 1856 A.D. Located near St. Paul's School, due to its rector, and greatly helped by it, the Diocesan Orphans' Home is another blessing of this period.

In May, 1870 A.D., the Convention elected as successor to Bishop Chase the Rev. Wm. W. Niles, Professor of Latin in Trinity College, Hartford, and he was consecrated at Concord, September 21.

In twelve years since the Diocese has grown to have 22 parishes and 13 mission stations, including (most properly) the chapel of St. Paul's School. In 1882 A.D. the number of clergy (besides the Bishop) was 31, communicants, 2062, this, a gain in a nearly stationary population. The contributions for all purposes, which in 1870 A.D. were under $10,000, were nearly $25,000 in 1882 A.D.

The "Holderness School for Boys" was opened in 1879 A.D. as a Diocesan school in the old mansion of the Livermores, and the venerable church now serves as its chapel. Destroyed by fire in March, 1882 A.D., the historic homestead has given place to new buildings specially adapted to the school work. The number of pupils is about 50, and the school has prospered every way beyond hope. The charges—$200 a year for New Hampshire boys and $250 for all others—suggest what is aimed at, a school thoroughly good yet cheap. A committee is already considering the possibility of a similar school for girls.

Another Orphanage, the "Chase Home for Children," was founded in 1879 A.D. in Portsmouth, and has now eighteen children in residence.

This is a day of small things, but the future seems bright. A greatly loved and honored Bishop, a zealous, active, brotherly clergy, a population slow to receive new truth, but serious and tenacious withal when they do receive it, make up in part our promise for the coming years, while old systems are failing and leaving an unfilled gap.

Statistics.—Clergy, 33; parishes and missions, 34; families, 1605; individuals, 8025; baptisms, infants, 131; adults, 48; total, 179; confirmed, 140; communicants, 2173; marriages, 71; burials, 126; Sunday-schools, teachers, 163; scholars, 1177; contributions, $52,133.13.

REV. L. WATERMAN.

New Jersey, Diocese of. New Jersey, in its early colonial days, was chiefly under Presbyterian and Quaker influence; and its people were so nearly cut off from the ministrations of the Church of England, that Bray, in his memorials, describes them as being "wholly left to themselves, without priest or altar."

But in the reign of Queen Anne the proprietary government was resigned to the sovereign; and the Good Queen was a "nursing mother" to the Church, generously bestowing money grants and gifts of books, Communion silver and bells. In 1701 A.D. the two Jerseys contained about 15,000 inhabitants, of which not above 600 frequented the Church, nor hardly more than 200 communicants.

George Keith, a convert from Quakerism, and John Talbot, were among the first and the most efficient missionaries of the venerable Society for the Propagation of the Gospel (1702 A.D.). Talbot became Rector of St. Mary's, Burlington, but continued to make extensive circuits. Dr. Hawks said of him, "the society never had, at least in our view, a more honest, fearless, and laborious missionary." In 1722 A.D. he received Episcopal orders at the hands of non-juring Bishops in England, and was thereupon dismissed from the society's service. It is not known that he ever performed Episcopal acts. His death took place November 30, 1727 A.D., at Burlington, and it is believed that he was buried under the old church. Keith returned to England in 1704 A.D. Vaughan and Chandler at Elizabethtown, and Beach at New Brunswick, were leading Presbyters, and these two towns, with Burlington and Shrewsbury, were strong Church centres before the Revolution.

Several ecclesiastical movements, of national importance, had their beginnings within the borders of New Jersey. The first memorial from American Churchmen, petitioning the English Archbishops and Bishops to send a Bishop to America, was signed in Burlington, November 2, 1705 A.D., the petitioners being fourteen clergymen of New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania.

Of the four colonial Bishoprics proposed by the S. P. G., two for the islands, and two for the Continent of America, one was to have its See at Williamsburg, Va., another at Burlington. Mr. Talbot wrote, in 1709 A.D., "I have got possession of the best house in America for a Bishop's seat." The house and land were long held for this purpose, but ultimately conveyed to the parish church of St. Mary's.

A more successful measure was begun eighty years later, and is thus described in Bishop White's Memoirs: "The first step towards the forming of a collective body of the Episcopal Church in the United States was taken through the medium of the Rev. Abraham Beach, at a meeting of a few clergymen of New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania at New Brunswick, N. J., on the 13th and 14th of May, 1784 A.D. The first day was chiefly taken up with discussing principles of ecclesiastical union. The next morning (in consequence of new information received), it was agreed that nothing should be urged further on the subject at present. But before the clergy parted it was determined to procure a larger meeting on the 5th of the ensuing October, in New York, to confer and agree on some general principles of a union of the Episcopal Church throughout the States."

The Diocese was organized—so far as it could be without a Bishop—in 1785 A.D., the first session of its Convention being held in Christ Church, New Brunswick, July 6 of that year; when four clergymen and six laymen were elected to represent the Diocese at the General Convention, in Philadelphia, the following September. These delegates were empowered "to accede, on the part of this Convention, to the fundamental principles published by the Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church held in New York on the 6th and 7th of October, 1784 A.D., and to adopt such measures as the said General Convention may deem necessary for the utility of the said Church, not repugnant to the aforesaid principles."

But its adhesion was not without discrimination. The next year it unanimously approved the political alterations in the Prayer-Book, made by the General Convention, as well as the address to the Archbishops and Bishops; and a Diocesan Committee was appointed to correspond with the English Bishops. But the "further alterations" proposed and the proposed Constitution were not approved. Again, in 1787 A.D., it voted approval of the Old Liturgy.

Some other of its early acts are worthy of notice. In 1786 A.D. it was resolved to vote by congregations; clergy and laity to deliberate together, but to vote separately, a concurrence being necessary to give validity to any measure. Every clergyman, of whatever order, duly settled in a congregation, should be a member of Convention ex officio: when a Bishop should be regularly settled, he should be President ex officio. In 1787 A.D. it resolved that no one should be a Church officer, or delegate to General or State Convention, who does not openly declare himself a member of the Church, and profess belief that the Ordinal and the three-fold ministry, as used in this Church, are most agreeable to the Word of God. In 1790 A.D. it appointed a Standing Committee, five clergymen and five laymen, "for the recommendation of Candidates for Holy Orders;" and for a number of years following this appears to be the only duty devolved upon the Standing Committee, that continued to be elected annually, with variations as to the numbers and constitution of its membership. In this year, 1790 A.D., it declared "the Convention and Church in this State bound by the proceedings of the General Convention in establishing the Constitution, Canons, and Prayer-Book." In 1794 A.D. it made Baptism and "good character" necessary to office. It also directed its Treasurer to pay to the Treasurer of the General Convention certain contributions "for supporting missionaries on the frontiers" of the United States. In 1795 A.D. it resolved, that this Convention agree to vest the House of Bishops with a full negative on the proceedings of the House of Deputies in the General Convention.

Bishops of the neighboring Dioceses, generally Bishop White and Bishop Hobart, performed Episcopal acts in New Jersey, as they were requested by the Standing Committee, until the consecration of Bishop Croes in 1815 A.D.

In August, 1796 A.D., the Rev. Uzal Ogden, D.D., Rector of Trinity Church, Newark, was elected Bishop, but the General Convention hesitated to confirm the election, on the ground of alleged irregularity. A special Convention, in October, 1799 A.D., resolved that the election had been "orderly," and addressed the several Standing Committees a circular asking their ratification. It was never given, and New Jersey probably had no reason to regret the denial. For, on May 9, 1805 A.D., its Standing Committee, as authorized by a special Convention in the December preceding, "and with the aid and consent of the Rt. Rev. Dr. Moore, Bishop of New York, unanimously resolved to suspend the Rev. Dr. Ogden from the exercise of any ministerial duties within this State, and he is hereby suspended accordingly." The retired Rector declared his withdrawal from the Protestant Episcopal Church, and his purpose to be Rector still, by virtue of his English orders and allegiance.

There have been four Diocesan Bishops hitherto, as follows: John Croes, consecrated November 19, 1815 A.D., died July 30, 1832 A.D.; George Washington Doane, consecrated October 31, 1832 A.D., died April 27, 1859 A.D.; William Henry Odenheimer, consecrated October 13, 1859 A.D., elected to the new Diocese of Northern New Jersey November 12, 1874 A.D., died August 14, 1879 A.D.; John Scarborough, consecrated February 2, 1875 A.D.

Bishop Croes was also Rector of Christ Church, New Brunswick, and there resided throughout his Episcopate.

Bishop Doane making Burlington his "temporary residence," and having actually accepted "an invitation from the Rector, wardens, and vestry of Trinity Church, Newark, to establish himself in that place," on terms of great generosity, leaving him "free from parochial responsibility," the death of Dr. Wharton, Rector of St. Mary's Church, and the peculiar circumstances of the parish, presented a conflicting duty. The result was that he remained permanently at Burlington, discharging the duties of Rector of St. Mary's during all his Episcopate. He occupied the old parsonage until the erection of his own house, "Riverside," which, by his deed of gift, became the property of the Diocese at his death.

Bishop Odenheimer lived at Riverside until his removal to the Northern Diocese, and by a gracious Providence it was again made his home during the year of great physical suffering with which his life closed.

Bishop Scarborough removed the See to Trenton, and in 1878 A.D. a property in that city was presented by Samuel K. Wilson, Esq., to the Diocese, and deeded to the Trustees of the Episcopal Fund to be the Episcopal residence.

Bishop Doane founded two Church schools, for girls and boys respectively, St. Mary's Hall, in 1837 A.D., Burlington College, in 1846 A.D., placing them upon the Delaware, on the right and on the left of Riverside. Of these schools the Bishop of New Jersey is ex-officio president. Both are under one Board, the Trustees of Burlington College, which has a charter from the State. The Hall for nearly fifty years has sent forth annually a class of well-instructed Churchwomen, whose influence for good became, long since, a proverb in the Church and in the country. The success of this first venture induced many to follow the example, till nearly every Diocese has its Hall, and St. Mary's is the acknowledged and revered mother of Church schools for girls the land over.

Burlington College, between 1850 and 1860 A.D., graduated in Arts ten classes. After that date, there being no endowment, it was found necessary to suspend the College classes, and for the next sixteen years it was carried on in its Preparatory Department. Since 1879 A.D. it has been leased by the Trustees to the Rev. Messrs. Reilly, who have there the older boys of St. John's Academy, Haddonfield. St. Agnes' Hall is a Church school for girls, under the same management, at Haddonfield.

Financial embarrassment and failure have been the penalty paid by several American Bishops, who, in advance of their age, with excess of zeal or lack of worldly prudence, heroically founded Christian schools. Bishop Doane's case was not to be an exception. Two sentences of his own will almost tell the story: "A perfect confidence that continued success would insure ultimate relief encouraged exertion, and made trials tolerable, for the work's sake, which no personal interest would have sustained one week." "The provision was made, and the children were collected. And he, who with God's blessing had accomplished these things, after two most dangerous attacks of illness, which confined him for nearly five months, having exhausted, in his enterprise for Christian education, his means and his credit, was left with two most prosperous institutions, whose annual receipts were not less than $70,000, and with an unmanageable debt."

In March, 1849 A.D., the Bishop "made an assignment of all his property for the benefit of all his creditors," and committed the business department of the schools to committees of trusted friends. Financial aid was now generously contributed in all parts of the Diocese, and there was no more pecuniary embarrassment. But the troubles were not over. Nearly three years elapsed, and then four laymen preferred charges of dishonesty, with numerous specifications; and three Bishops were induced to make a presentment of the Bishop of New Jersey for trial by his peers. The Diocesan Convention vindicated their Bishop, and claimed the primary right of presentment, and when the Court of Bishops met, in October, 1852 A.D., asked that Court to dismiss the case, pledging the readiness of the Diocese "to investigate any charges against its Bishop that may be presented from any responsible source." On the eighth day of the session, it was "Ordered, that this Court, relying upon the said pledge, do not now proceed to any further action in the premises." A second presentment was made notwithstanding, and a second Court summoned, in September, 1853 A.D. To a committee of this Court the Bishop respondent, while asserting perfect integrity of purpose, acknowledged "That, in the course of all these transactions, human infirmity may have led him into many errors he deeply feels." "After prolonged consideration, and the utmost delicacy towards every one concerned, the Court came to the unanimous decision to dismiss the case. The decision has brought peace to a whole Diocese, and, we may add, peace to the Church." (Extract from Rep. of Comm. to Dioc. Conv., May, 1854 A.D.)

The missionary work of the Diocese is carried on, under the Bishop, by the two Conventions of Burlington and New Brunswick, each Convocation having a Dean, Secretary, Treasurer, and Executive Committee.

The Convention elects a Registrar, to conserve its store of printed documents. The Bishop, with the concurrence of the Standing Committee, appoints a Chancellor of the Diocese, who is the legal adviser of the Bishop and Standing Committee. He has a seat and voice in the Convention, but no vote. In each Convocation three examining Chaplains are appointed, yearly, by the Bishop.

The Diocesan Institutions are The Corporation for the Relief of Widows and Orphans of Deceased Clergymen, The Christian Knowledge Society, and The Trustees of the Episcopal Fund, empowered to hold property in trust for any ecclesiastical, charitable, or educational objects, under the control of the Convention or other Diocesan authority. There are also a Fund for Aged and Infirm Clergymen, The Conover Fund, and The Bishop's Trust Fund, wherewith "to meet emergencies, and to confer benefits in a quiet way upon those who would not ask alms of the Church." The New Jersey Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary and Board of Missions reported last year an aggregate amount, in money and work, of $15,845.

The Episcopal Infant School for Orphans and Half Orphans of the Diocese, at South Amboy, founded and endowed by Mr. John Stevens, trains girls for service, and finds them homes in Christian families.

A great deficiency in the Diocese is the want of parish schools. Burlington, Princeton, and South Amboy alone report them.

The Choir Guild, composed of the men and boy choirs of the Diocese, was formed in 1880 A.D., to introduce a higher standard of Church music, and greater uniformity in its selection and rendering. It includes now six choirs and one hundred and fifty singers.

The following statistics will show the growth of the Diocese during the last six decades: 1823 A.D., 18 clergy, 25 churches, 740 communicants; 1832 A.D., 18 clergy, 900 communicants; 1843 A.D., 48 clergy, 45 parishes, 2150 communicants; 1853 A.D., 67 clergy, 64 parishes, 3570 communicants; 1863 A.D., 106 clergy, 107 parishes, 6376 communicants; 1873 A.D., 142 clergy, 124 parishes, 11,310 communicants. (In 1874 the Diocese was divided, the seven northern counties being erected into the new Diocese of Northern New Jersey, with rather more than one-half the ecclesiastical strength of the entire State.) 1883 A.D., 97 clergy, 115 congregations, and 8381 communicants; candidates and postulants for Holy Orders, 14; lay-readers, 41.

All debts on church property, whether parochial or diocesan, are extinguished with two or three exceptions.

The sea-side churches form a remarkable feature of the Diocese. From the mother-church at Shrewsbury to Cape May more than twenty churches and chapels line the Atlantic coast; some of them open only during "the season," but the larger number—and more each year—assuming the form of regular parishes.

New Mexico and Arizona, the Missionary Jurisdiction of, was created at the General Convention of 1874 A.D., the Bishop of Colorado being relieved from the oversight of New Mexico, and Arizona being separated from Nevada.

The Rev. Wm. F. Adams, Rector of St. Paul's Church, New Orleans, Louisiana, was elected first Bishop of the new Jurisdiction. He was consecrated in his Parish church, January, 17, 1875 A.D., by the Bishop of Mississippi, the Rt. Rev. Wm. M. Green, D.D., LL.D., assisted by Bishop Wilmer, of Louisiana, and Bishop Beckwith, of Georgia.

On Saturday, February 6, 1875 A.D., Bishop Adams, accompanied by the Rev. Henry Forrester, reached Santa Fé, New Mexico's ancient capital, after a stage-ride of seventy-six hours from Pueblo, Colorado. He was very ill the next night from the fatigue of the journey, and for several days thereafter was confined to his room; being unable to officiate in the Church services till Friday, the 12th inst.

On the 1st day of March the Bishop started on a visitation of Southern New Mexico and Arizona. He was accompanied as far as Albuquerque by Mr. Forrester, and there, on the 4th of the same month, the Hon. Hezekiah S. Johnson, Judge of the Second Judicial District of New Mexico, was ordained to the restricted Diaconate. Very few Americans were then in Albuquerque, and the Judge himself had a Mexican wife. The service was held in a room of the Exchange Hotel, and the congregation consisted of only nine persons. This ordination gave the new Jurisdiction all the orders of the ministry,—one Bishop, one Priest, and one Deacon. There was another Priest somewhere in Arizona, but he was on his way out of the country, and therefore could not be counted. The new Deacon died in May, 1876 A.D., having been able to render but little service.

Bishop Adams continued his journey by stage to Southern New Mexico, stopping at Fort Selden, Las Cruces, Mesilla, and, finally, Silver City. From the last he started by buckboard to Tucson, Arizona, two hundred miles distant, but became ill on the road and had to stop. He then returned to Silver City, and from there to Mesilla, and was then called to his family, which was still in New Orleans, on account of the serious illness of two of his children. He went through Texas, staging several days and nights before reaching a railroad, and arrived at home utterly exhausted. He had a very severe attack of the illness that had twice prostrated him in New Mexico, and his physicians positively forbade his return until his strength should be entirely restored.

Under these circumstances Mr. Forrester, who had removed his family to Santa Fé, and was temporarily in charge of the Parish there, took up the general missionary work, acting, as far as possible, as the Bishop's representative. In the autumn of 1875 A.D. he visited Las Vegas, Cimarron, Socorro, the Magdalena mines, Las Cruces, Mesilla, Silver City, Georgetown, the Mimbres Reduction Works, and Forts Craig, Selden, and Bayard. At Mesilla, which was then the principal place in Southern New Mexico, a large house, containing sufficient room for a residence and also a chapel, was secured for the Church at a very low price. The property was paid for by the Rev. Dr.

James Saul, of Philadelphia, and was deeded to him and the Rev. Dr. Twing, as Trustees for the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

In the spring of 1876 A.D. nearly all the points in Southern New Mexico were visited again, the missionary residing still at Santa Fé, and officiating there when not traveling. At this time there was no railroad in the Jurisdiction, traveling being done by stage, or by buckboard, or by private conveyance. It took three days and nights to go from Santa Fé to Mesilla, stopping only long enough to change horses and get meals. Bishop Adams, having finally come to the conclusion that he was permanently incapacitated for the work in his jurisdiction, sent his resignation to the Presiding Bishop in the summer of 1876 A.D. As soon as this became known in New Mexico, a petition was framed requesting the House of Bishops to send out another Bishop as soon as possible. This petition was signed by a number of the most prominent gentlemen in the Territory, including the Secretary of State and the Commanding Officer of the Military District. It was presented to the Bishops at their meeting in Philadelphia in October of the same year. They preferred, however, not to accept the resignation of Bishop Adams at this time, and action was deferred for another year. In the mean time, Mr. Forrester continued to reside at Santa Fé and to do the general missionary work as circumstances required and opportunity was afforded.

In the spring of 1877 A.D., by the help of friends in the East, the chapel at Mesilla was neatly furnished. A school had been started, at the earnest request of the people, in the autumn of 1876 A.D., but it was never self-supporting, and was finally abandoned. The mission, in the absence of the missionary in charge, was placed under the care of Mr. George D. Bowman, lay-reader, who has continued, and still continues, to render most faithful and acceptable service.

A school was opened at Santa Fé also, and succeeded very well. When the Congregationalists introduced their system of Academies into the Territory, beginning at Santa Fé, it was deemed best to suspend the Church school, that a combined effort might be made to secure the advantages offered by them.

At the General Convention of 1877 A.D., Bishop Adams's resignation was accepted by the House of Bishops, and the Rev. D. B. Knickerbacker, who afterwards became Bishop of Indiana, was elected to fill the vacancy. After the adjournment of the Convention Dr. Knickerbacker declined to be consecrated, so the Episcopate was left vacant, and, under the Canons, the oversight of it fell to the Presiding Bishop. In calling a meeting of the Bishops for August, 1878 A.D., to consider the case of the Bishop of Michigan, the Presiding Bishop included, as part of the business to come before them, the election of a Bishop for New Mexico and Arizona. It was found, however, that there was a canonical obstacle in the way of action at this time, and so the Jurisdiction was placed by the Presiding Bishop under the care of Bishop Spalding, of Colorado, who consented to take it until the next General Convention.

The Rev. J. A. M. La Tourrette, Chaplain U.S.A., having come to Fort Union, New Mexico, was now transferred to the Jurisdiction, and Bishop Spalding appointed the first Standing Committee as follows: The Rev. J. A. M. La Tourrette, President; the Rev. H. Forrester, Secretary; Col. J. P. Willard, U.S.A., and Mr. George D. Bowman.

In 1879 A.D., as the A. T. & S. F. R. R. came southward from Colorado and approached Las Vegas, New Mexico, services were begun there, and Bishop Spalding visited the place in August. While there, he secured lots for Church purposes, and on the 9th of the following November the Bishop made a second visit, and opened St. Paul's Chapel for divine service. The same month the missionary moved from Santa Fé to Las Vegas, making his residence there temporarily. In December the Rev. D. A. Sanford was sent by Bishop Spalding to assist in the work, and regular services were thereafter held at Albuquerque, where there had been several visits made during the preceding six months. Occasional services were held at Santa Fé also, and Mesilla was still visited as opportunity offered.

In May, 1880 A.D., the Primary Convocation of the Jurisdiction was held at Albuquerque, under the presidency of Bishop Spalding. The members were Bishop Spalding, the Revs. J. A. M. La Tourrette, H. Forrester, and D. A. Sanford, and, from Santa Fé, Mr. L. Bradford Prince; from Mesilla, Mr. W. H. Cobb; from Las Vegas, Mr. Chas. Wheelock; and from Albuquerque, Messrs. W. C. Hazledine, W. K. P. Wilson, and R. C. Vose.

The officers of the Jurisdiction were appointed or elected as follows: Standing Committee, Rev. J. A. M. La Tourrette, President; Rev. H. Forrester, Secretary; Hon. W. C. Hazledine, Mr. H. C. Baldwin. Chancellor, Hon. L. Bradford Prince. Treasurer, Mr. W. W. Griffin. Registrar, Rev. H. Forrester. Examining Chaplains, Rev. J. A. M. La Tourrette, Rev. H. Forrester. Delegates to General Convention, Rev. H. Forrester, Col. J. P. Willard, U.S.A.; Alternates, Rev. J. A. M. La Tourrette, Hon. W. C. Hazledine. The Officers and Committees of the Convocation were: Secretary, Rev. H. Forrester; Treasurer, Mr. W. K. P. Wilson; Committee on Constitution, Order of Proceedings, and Rules of Order, the Bishop exercising Jurisdiction, Rev. J. A. M. La Tourrette, Rev. H. Forrester, Hon. L. B. Prince, Hon. W. C. Hazledine; Committee on Common Fund for Church Work, Rev. H. Forrester, Rev. J. A. M. La Tourrette, Hon. W. C. Hazledine, Mr. W. T. Guyer.

At the second Convention, held under the presidency of the new Bishop, at Santa Fé, in July, 1881 A.D., the latter Committee reported, affirming the Common Treasury system to be the true Christian system, and urging that its underlying principle should by all means be preserved. It also recommended a plan to be used in the Jurisdiction providing for this end. The resolutions offered by the Committee were unanimously adopted, and thus the Missionary Jurisdiction of New Mexico and Arizona was the first Episcopal jurisdiction in the United States to declare, by its representative body, its acceptance of the financial system of the Primitive Church.

At the General Convention of 1880 A.D., the Rev. George K. Dunlop, Rector of Grace Church, Kirkwood, Mo., was elected to the vacant Episcopate. He was consecrated November 21 of the same year, in Christ Church, St. Louis, the Bishop of Minnesota being Consecrator, assisted by the Bishops of Missouri, Iowa, Quincy, and Springfield. The new Bishop reached Las Vegas, on his first visitation, December 2 following, and from there went on to Santa Fé, Albuquerque, and Mesilla. He took up his residence, with his family, at Santa Fé, March 31, 1881 A.D. After building a handsome stone church there, he moved to Las Vegas, where he still resides.

The progress of Church work during Bishop Dunlop's administration has been very encouraging. Churches have been built at Albuquerque, Tombstone, and Santa Fé, and rectories at Las Vegas and Tombstone. The value of Church property has increased from five thousand to forty thousand dollars. Confirmations have about doubled every succeeding year, and the increase in the number of Communicants has been in much higher ratio. The country is rapidly filling up with Americans, and the Church is leading all other religious bodies in the principal towns.

REV. H. FORRESTER.

New York, Diocese of. The first Convention of the Diocese of New York was held Wednesday, June 22, 1785 A.D. Up to the time New Amsterdam was ceded by the Dutch, its original owners, at the treaty of Breda, to the English, there was no service of any kind held in the English language. The change of ownership which took place transferred at once the garrison chapel to the English, and they forthwith introduced the services of their Church. Within these narrow walls it was limited for many years, until in 1696 A.D. a considerable number of the inhabitants met together and determined to have the worship of the Church of England settled among them. The result was the organization of the parish of Trinity Church, and the election of the Rev. Dr. Vesey as its first Rector. The new parish found zealous supporters in Governor Fletcher,* by whom it was endowed temporarily, and in Lord Cornbury, his successor, who assigned it the freehold of a neighboring property, known as the King's Farm. The influence of the Church of England began now to increase in many towns, but especially in New York City. This was in a great measure owing to the Rev. Mr. Vesey, who by his conduct completely won the affections of the people. Outside of the city the Church was greatly indebted to the fostering care of the venerable Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. In 1702 A.D. the Rev. Mr. Barton became the missionary of the Society in Westchester, "a small town upon the sea-coast," a few miles above New York, and made occasional journeys to New Rochelle, East Chester, Rye, Mamaroneck, and Bedford. The chief obstacle, however, in the way of the Church's progress was the lack of the Episcopate. All her spiritual children who where born here were growing up without the valued benefit of confirmation. Not one edifice for public worship had been consecrated. Our clergy and our parishes were destitute of that superintendence which is the very life of our Church government. Every candidate upon our shores who would be admitted to holy orders was compelled to seek ordination in the far-distant mother-country. A great gulf lay between,—an ocean of three thousand miles. No less than a fifth part of our young men who were destined for the LORD's service in the sanctuary—being exposed to various "perils in the sea"—paid with their lives the cost of the severe ecclesiastical requisition of the Church of England. Roman Catholics in North America had a Bishop, Francis Laval, as early as 1659 A.D., and the Moravians had four Bishops previous to the year 1750 A.D., but for the Church of England here there was not provided one spiritual Father to take "the oversight thereof." Queen Anne, in 1714 A.D., was propitious to the design, and but for her death it would soon have been accomplished. The first George also appeared favorable, but a dangerous rebellion concentrated all his thoughts and feelings on another object, and then "it was not time to attend to the subject of American Bishops." Thus the matter dragged slowly along until our national liberty gave it a new form.

It was several years after our civil independence when the plan of a General American Church, with an independent American Episcopate, was formed. Incipient measures for the organization of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States were first adopted by the Church in Pennsylvania. The earliest general meeting called expressly to consider this subject was at New York, in October, 1784 A.D., when clerical and lay deputies from the States of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland first took counsel together concerning the peculiar exigencies of the Church. A more numerous Convention of the deputies from several States, held at Philadelphia in September of the next year (1785 A.D.), prepared an address to the Archbishops and Bishops of the Church of England, requesting them to confer Episcopal consecration on such persons as might be recommended by the Church in the United States. The consent of the Archbishops and Bishops was obtained in 1786 A.D. Without delay the Rev. Dr. White, Bishop-elect of Pennsylvania, and the Rev. Dr. Provoost, Bishop-elect of New York, who had been chosen at the second Annual Convention of the Diocese, set sail for England. On their arrival they were consecrated in the chapel of the Archiepiscopal palace at Lambeth by the Archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by the Archbishop of York, the Bishop of Bath and Wells, and the Bishop of Peterboro', on Sunday, February 4, 1787 A.D. The new prelates soon set sail from England, and after a "very tedious and boisterous passage," during which Dr. Provoost was "so ill that it was feared he would not live," they reached New York, April 8, 1787 A.D., on Easter-Sunday.

The Diocese of New York could now rejoice in its first Bishop. The result was seen at once in the impetus given to the Church's growth. It is true the new Diocesan was not a man of magnetic character or a very ardent worker, but the Church in New York at last had found its proper head, and, in spite of adverse circumstances, continued to increase in power and public favor. Bishop Provoost remained for fourteen years in charge of the Diocese. At last, overwhelmed by the heart-rending loss of his wife in August, 1799 A.D., by the heart-rending death of his youngest and favorite son in the July following, and by many painful domestic and embarrassing official cares, he resigned the rectorship of Trinity Church in September, 1800 A.D., and his Episcopal jurisdiction at a meeting of the Convention in the year 1801 A.D. He was succeeded by the Rev. Dr. Benjamin Moore, who was chosen in December, 1800 A.D., Rector of Trinity Church, and Bishop of New York on the day after the first Bishop's resignation of the crosier. He was consecrated at Trenton, N. J., September 11, 1801 A.D. The Rt. Rev. Dr. White officiated as Presiding Bishop, and Bishops Clagget and Jarvis aided him in the performance of the primitive solemnity.

Of the second Bishop of New York it can be said, "He rose to public confidence and respect, and to general esteem solely by the force of talents and worth. His love for the Church was the paramount principle that animated him. He entered on her service in the time of trouble. Steady in his principles, yet mild and prudent in advocating them, he never sacrificed consistency,—he never provoked resentment. In proportion as adversity pressed upon the Church was the firmness of the affection with which he clung to her. And he lived until he saw her, in no inconsiderable degree, by his counsel and exertions, raised from the dust and putting on the garments of glory and beauty. It was this affection for the Church which animated his Episcopal labors; which led him to leave that family whom he so tenderly loved, and that retirement which was so dear to him, and where he found while he conferred enjoyment, and to seek in remote parts of the Diocese for the sheep of CHRIST's fold." In 1811 A.D., his health having become greatly impaired, he suggested to the Convention the propriety and the necessity of an Assistant Bishop, and the request meeting with unanimous approval, the Rev. John Henry Hobart, one of the assistant ministers of Trinity Church, was elected upon the first ballot. The consecration of the Bishop-elect took place in Trinity Church, May 29, Bishop White officiating as Presiding Bishop, with Bishops Provoost and Jarvis as his assistants in the ceremonial. This was the turning-point in the history of the American Church. The war of the Revolution had made her unpopular with the multitude, who looked with disfavor upon her because of her British origin. Bare toleration was only accorded her, for no one, up to this time, had thought of claiming honor for her because of her Apostolic descent. In this state Bishop Hobart found matters, but their continuance in this state he would not endure. Trained in a Presbyterian college, he was a Churchman in the fullest conviction of his reason. He early declared his own principles to run up in brief into these two: "We are saved from the guilt and dominion of sin by the Divine merits and grace of a Crucified REDEEMER, and that the merits and grace of this REDEEMER are applied to the soul of the believer by humble and devout participation in the ordinances of the Church administered by a priesthood who derive their authority by regular transmission from the CHRIST, the Divine Head of the Church and the source of all the power in it."

As was to be expected, the enunciation and the enforcement of such sound views was followed by a marked increase of Church life. The Church began to be honored, because men for the first time found out that she was worthy of honor. Bishop Hobart, on the death of Bishop Moore, in 1812 A.D., became Diocesan of New York. From this time on his labors became more incessant to build up the Church of CHRIST in her ministry, in her ordinances, and her most holy faith; this was the great object which awakened his solicitude and called forth his incessant and untiring efforts. For several years before he was compelled to intermit his activities he recorded in his anniversary addresses seldom less than thirty and sometimes more than forty visitations of parishes widely separated. Added to this onerous toil were the charges which he delivered to the clergy of his Diocese, the various publications which he prepared for the press, the educational and beneficent institutions which he organized and watched over with unflagging interest. As was to be expected, his efforts were too exhaustive to be endured even by his vigorous frame. His health declined, and while making a visitation at Auburn he died, September 12, 1830 A.D., being fifty-five years of age. At a Convention of the Diocese held in the same month, the Rev. Benjamin Tredwell Onderdonk, one of the assistant ministers of Trinity Church, was elected as his successor. His consecration took place November 26, 1830 A.D. In 1838 A.D. the Diocese had attained such vast proportions that it became evident that one Bishop could not properly attend to it, and the result was the formation of the Western Diocese, Bishop Onderdonk retaining the eastern portion. Charges affecting the moral character of the Bishop having been made, he was tried in December, 1844 A.D., by the House of Bishops acting as a court; and after a long and searching investigation the court decided (eight voting for deposition and nine for suspension) that he be suspended from the office and functions of the ministry (January 3, 1845 A.D.). The Bishop never acknowledged himself to be guilty of the offenses imputed to him, and urgent efforts were made by his friends for the removal of the suspension.

After much delay the General Convention passed a Canon allowing a provisional Bishop to be chosen. The choice fell upon Jonathan Mayhew Wainwright, an assistant minister of Trinity Church, who was consecrated November 10, 1852 A.D. The arduous duties of the Episcopate, greatly enhanced by the long period the Diocese had been without an acting head, proved to be too great for the new Diocesan. He died in New York, September 21, 1854 A.D. At the next Convention Horatio Potter, Rector of St. Peter's Church, Albany, was elected to the vacant Episcopate, and consecrated November 22, 1854 A.D. During Bishop Potter's long and wise administration the Church in New York has seen its most prosperous years. Parishes have multiplied; the number of the clergy has increased sixty- and a hundred-fold; educational institutions, hospitals, orphan asylums have been established; vast sums of money for foreign and domestic missions and other charitable purposes have been contributed. In 1868 A.D. the Church had become so unwieldy from its vast growth that the new Dioceses of Albany and Long Island were set off. In 1883 A.D., the health of Bishop Potter having become impaired, the Convention at his request consented to the election of an assistant Bishop, and Henry Codman Potter, a nephew of the Diocesan, and Rector of Grace Church, New York, was chosen with singular unanimity to fill the place. The assistant Bishop-elect was consecrated in Grace Church, October 20, 1883 A.D., in the presence of a vast assemblage of the clergy and laity, by the venerable Presiding Bishop, Dr. Smith, of Kentucky, assisted by over forty of his brethren of the Episcopate. The Diocese of New York of 1785 A.D. is now divided into five Dioceses, having in the aggregate 5 Bishops, 621 clergy, and 130,000 communicants.

REV. E. GUILBERT.

Niobrara. (Vide SOUTH DAKOTA.) The Rev. William Hobart Hare, D.D., was consecrated in 1873 A.D. as a Bishop having special charge of work among the Indians. Bishop Hare, in his report of 1880 A.D., states that he had traveled during his spring and summer visitations 2000 miles in his wagon, besides not a little stage-coaching. He found most of the Indian tribes friendly, and a number had presented themselves for confirmation. In the seven and a half years of his mission there had been 4 boarding-schools established, in which 115 children were cared for, and 10 new congregations gathered "among the wilder and remoter tribes." Eleven mission residences and 10 churches had been built and paid for. The Bishop considers the Indians like other people in character, and thinks that they have been treated too much in a special way "as a strange people." The report announces the death of the faithful missionary, the Rev. E. J. K. Lessell, who had been a pioneer in the Black Hills. The Bishop gratefully acknowledges the aid of the female missionaries, as well as the wives of the clergy in his field, and the ladies' associations who had sent aid for the work. There had been 120 confirmations in Niobrara.

In the Santee Mission, Rev. W. W. Fowler and his wife had taken six lads into their house to be taught English and trained in Christian life, and to assist on the Mission farm. The Yankton Mission had been under the care of the veteran missionary, Rev. Jos. W. Cook. Sister Julia had done a merciful work in the homes of the people in this mission as a Deaconess, and in Emmanuel House, under her charge, in which "were persons recovering from severe surgical operations, and sick women and children who could not be cared for in their own miserable homes." In the Yanktonnais Mission a number of the Indians, led by the Lay-reader and two or three Christian Indians, had formed themselves into a Co-operative Farmers' Association, to encourage each other in farming and building houses. Most of them had been heathen, but at the Bishop's visitation they enrolled themselves as catechumens. When the Bishop, the evening before their admission, gave an outline of the Christian religion and the duties of civilized life, he asked with regard to each duty, "Will you try to do it?" their earnest answers (writes the Bishop), 'How' (or yes) were only less impressive than the scene when we closed our interview by all standing up and repeating, they after me, the Apostles' Creed." After Baptism and Confirmation the Bishop "celebrated with the native congregation in the Eucharist the death of Him who gathers together in one the children of God who are scattered abroad."

The Lower Brule Mission had been faithfully and patiently conducted by the native Presbyter, Rev. Luke C. Walker, and his assistants. The Cheyenne Agency Mission was under the charge of the Rev. H. Swift, the tribes being under the "admirable management of Captain Schwan, U.S.A., Acting Agent." The people had progressed, and the Church had grown. The Indians were inclined to settle on farms, and Mr. Swift had planted himself on the Missouri River, where the conditions were favorable to farm life. A church and parsonage had been built near by, and paid for by friends in Connecticut. One of the chiefs here wrote the Bishop, "Let all our friends hear these words. We long for life. Help us more and more." Upper Brule Mission was under Rev. W. J. Cleveland. A number of white men who had married among the Sioux were identified with this Mission, and helpful in it. The congregation was large and the worship hearty; they took pride in their church building, and gave liberally towards its embellishment. In the Ogalala, or Pine Ridge Mission, likewise under Mr. Cleveland, Mrs. J. J. Astor had given a church, which was soon to be completed. The Bishop urges the need of constant Christian care over Indians giving up their wild life and striving after civilization. The work of the Church in this case must be tireless and incessant.

Most of the clergy have now learned the language of the Indians, and the Prayer-Book, a Hymn-Book, the King's Highway, and the Calvary Catechism have been translated into their tongue by them, while others have given the natives the Bible in the vernacular. "No words can express too emphatically the blessing these versions have been." "The secret of any success the Missionaries in Niobrara have had lies largely in the fact that they have taken up their homes among the people, and made them hear in their own tongues wherein they were born the wonderful works of God." Still, the Bishop has thought it best to press the study of the English language in the schools. He has striven to break down "the middle wall of partition" between whites and Indians.

In the District of Niobrara in 1883 A.D. the Bishop baptized 26 adults and 15 infants, and confirmed 117 persons. Then he visited the Chapel of the Redeemer in a farming population, where in a heavy rain 70 assembled from their scattered houses and 36 "participated in the celebration of the Holy Communion." Of the Rev. Mr. Cook's work in the Yankton Mission the Bishop says, "This Mission was begun in the year 1869 A.D. by Rev. Paul Mazakute. In 1870 A.D. the Rev. J. W. Cook took charge. He has seen the whole people pass from tent to log house life, and has presented 293 persons for confirmation." There is a central church, which serves as the Bishop's church, and two chapels, each fifteen miles distant. Mrs. Fox, assisted by Angelique Gayton, had done an excellent work in Emmanuel House, though a sacred duty of paramount importance had called her away, causing a suspension in the special work until a successor could be secured. The Yanktonnais (Crow Creek) Mission is under Rev. H. Burt. Springfield Mission is supervised by W. J. Wicks, Catechist and Lay-reader. Hope School is located there. In the Black Hills Mission, Deadwood, there has been a vacancy since the death of Rev. Dr. Pennell, in May, 1882 A.D. In his Boarding-School work, Bishop Hare has followed "the plan of having small schools (none exceeding 36 scholars), that family life, as contrasted with that of an institution, may be preserved, and that the personal contact of the officers with each individual scholar may be frequent and familiar." These schools are at four different points, that the "centres of heat and light may be distributed as much as possible." For Hope School, Springfield, he has secured a superb site and subscriptions of $4000. In reviewing the Mission's history the Bishop finds much cheer. The "fantastic gear of the savage" and "the hideous orgies of heathen dances" have given place to "25 congregations of decently dressed worshippers, aggregating an average attendance of 1160 Indians, who gather every Sunday and offer in prayers and spiritual songs their homage to Almighty God, as revealed in His love and holiness in His beloved Son." Churches and chapels dot the wilderness, with comfortable parsonages at their side. During the three years preceding the report of 1883 A.D. there had been 864 infants and 468 adults baptized. During the preceding ten years nearly 900 had been confirmed. In the Boarding-Schools 132 children improve under Christian teaching. The native clergy are faithful, and the candidates promising. "When the King comes in to see His guests, He finds 796 ready to sit down at His table."

REV. S. F. HOTCHKIN.

Noah, whose name signifies "rest," was the tenth from Adam in the line of Seth. At his birth, his father Lamech, in choosing a name, and expressing a hope for the child, uttered (possibly unconsciously) a prophecy of his future office and function. "And he called his name Noah, saying, This same shall comfort us concerning our work and toil of our hands, because of the ground which the Lord hath cursed" (Gen. v. 29). "Clearly there is an almost prophetic feeling in the name which he gives his son, and hence some Christian writers have seen in the language a prophecy of the MESSIAH, and have supposed that as Eve was mistaken on the birth of Cain, so Lamech in like manner was deceived in his hope of Noah. But there is no reason to infer from the language of the narrative that the hopes of either were of so definite a nature." When Noah was about five hundred years old the wickedness of man had become such that the LORD resolved upon the destruction of the human race, still allowing a respite of one hundred and twenty years for repentance. It must have been during this interval that Noah became a "preacher of righteousness," if in no other way, by his upright conduct, whereby he found grace in the eyes of the LORD, and by his obedience to the command to build an ark and prepare for the threatened flood. The very interesting questions called up by the name of Noah, relative to the wickedness of the antediluvians, the building of the ark, the extent of the flood, etc., are here passed over in silence, it being intended only to say so much as will show how Noah was a type of CHRIST, and his whole story a great prophetic foretelling of salvation of the world from a flood of sin by CHRIST and in the Church of CHRIST. We may see this in his name, which means rest; in his office of a preacher of righteousness; and in his preparation of an ark of salvation for his sons who believed him; all these clearly foreshadow Him who has prepared a rest which remaineth for the people of God; whose Gospel is preached as the word of life to them that receive it; and whose Church is the sole ark and refuge of safety from the flood of sin which threatens to overwhelm the soul of man in eternal death.

Nocturns. Services held anciently during the night. The night was divided into three parts and an office recited at each, while lauds was recited at dawn. But finally the three nocturn services were said together with lauds at a single office. The Psalter was divided so as to form certain portions, the first of fourteen, the second of three, and the third of three Psalms, and then when the nocturns were dropped the Psalms, with their nocturn titles, passed into the matin office. So it is also a name for a portion of the Psalter.

Nominalism (nomen, a name) is the doctrine that general notions, such as the notion of a tree, have no realities corresponding to them, and have no existence but as names or words. The doctrine directly opposed to it is Realism. "The Nominalists were called Terminists about the time of the Reformation." "The Terminists, among whom I was, are so called because they speak of a thing in its own proper words, and do not apply them after a strange sort. They are also called Occamists, from Ockham, their founder. He was an able and a sensible man." (Luther's Table-Talk, Krauth's Fleming's Vocab. of Philos.; see also Cousin's Hist. Mod. Philos. on Nominalism and Realism.)

Nomination. In the English Church it is the naming of a clerk to the Patron, who has the right to present to the Bishop the name of the clergyman to whom he would present the living. The right to nominate and to present may be in one person, or each may be vested in separate persons; and if either person misuse his right, the right is forfeited to the Queen. But in our own Church all this is done away. Not but that the right to nominate exists, and is constantly exercised in connection with the right to present, though neither right bears such a title. A clergyman is usually nominated by some one to the Vestry, and they elect, and often without reference to the Bishop, whose consent is assumed (or the need of such consent is disregarded or overlooked); they present to the accepting clergyman, who accepts with perhaps as little reference to the Ordinary. It is an informality which should not be allowed, and to correct which was evidently the purpose of the Office of Institution. The Vestry is the presenting body, and rightly so, but it also arrogates to itself the right of induction, which (if the Institution office is of obligation) can belong only to the Bishop.

Nonconformity. The refusal to conform to the rites, ceremonies, or tenets of the National Church. In every era of her history as parted into National Churches there have been Nonconformists. Nor is it necessary to suppose that they really held in all cases unorthodox or heretical doctrines. A Nonconformist is one who does not yield that conformity to the observances and ritual of the Church of his nationality; but he may be very orthodox in his creed. The modern idea of nonconformity begins with the Puritan troubles in Queen Elizabeth's times. Nonconformists passed easily into Separatists (can. ix. of 1603 A.D.), and this became their title till it was replaced by the more recent name Dissenter. (Vide DISSENTER.) It was because the Church and State were identical in interest, and in fact the theory of both the parties, that Nonconformity was dangerous to the State, as the Rebellion of 1640 A.D. proved. There was then no conception that there could be any severance between Church and State. That is an idea of modern times, and practically carried out in this country. Here there can be no such thing as Dissent in the sense in which it is used in England. Nonconformity here is upon a wholly different footing, and can only be thought of as existing for those who do not admit the claims of the Church upon them, and is therefore merely a relative term between two separate organizations. The same objection lies against the use of the term Dissenter. The Church is here in the position of dissent (and very rightly) towards the religious bodies around her, as well as they towards her. It is only upon the deeper and surer ground of a (willing or unwilling) schism from her organization and of revolt from her rightful claims that here we can apply the terms of Nonconformity, or Separation, or Dissent to those who may be as zealous as ourselves. The position of religious bodies in this country renders the union on important matters hereafter much easier than elsewhere. The real division has ever lain in the totally different conception of the nature and Divine authority of the Church. When there is unity on this, a broad Catholic Conformity will be more than possible.

Nones. A word used in the English Calendar, derived from the ancient Roman Kalendars. The nones were the fifth day of each month (except March, May, July, October, when the nones fell on the seventh day). They were so called as they were the ninth day before the Ides, on which time, in the older lunar months, the full moon appeared. So the nones fell on the completion of the first quarter and the ides on the second quarter.

Non-jurors. Those who in the revolution of 1688 A.D. refused the oath of allegiance to William and Mary. The oaths were tendered to be taken by the 1st of August upon pain of suspension, and deprivation was to follow if the refusal to take them was persisted in.

Archbishop Sancroft and eight Bishops refused. But two of them died before being suspended, and one other before deprivation was enforced. About four hundred clergy followed their example and were deprived of their benefices. The non-jurors acted conscientiously upon the well-known principles of passive obedience, though but a few years before, in the conflict between King James II. and the Church, seven of the Bishops, and Ken the chiefest of them, preferred imprisonment to yielding to the King. But that was yet only a passive resistance. It was a civil question indeed, and they were deprived uncanonically and by force of the civil power. They were in a troubled position indeed, and under all the circumstances bore themselves very nobly. Still, they acted in one important matter in a way that has been condemned. Three had died, Ken and Frampton stood aloof, but Archbishop Sancroft decided that it was right to consecrate a new Bishop to preserve the Apostolical succession, since in the confusions of the moment it seemed to them very doubtful if King William would continue the present connection of the Church and the State, and Presbyterianism might obtain political and ecclesiastical ascendancy. He died, however, before the consecration of Dr. Hickey, which took place under his sanction 1693 A.D. Other consecrations followed, but beyond this first step their act becomes indefensible, since afterwards the Church's future was established beyond doubt. One of the last of those consecrated by the non-jurors to keep up their line, Taylor (consecrated 1721 A.D.), visited this country afterwards. But the non-jurors were in every respect men of great ability. The studies of Bret and Nelson in the history and the uses of our Prayer-Book are of the highest value. Dodwell, Collier, and Carte in history, Kettlewell, Spinkes, Law, and Nelson in devotional theology, Lawrence, Law, and Leslie in controversial theology, are mighty names even yet, and their influence was and is very great. The schism, for such it became, slowly died out, and at last, in 1799 A.D., the last non-juring Bishop quietly renounced his schism and was received into communion in the English National Church.

Norman. Vide ARCHITECTURE.

North Carolina, Diocese of. This Diocese, as at present constituted, embraces the entire State of North Carolina, with its 52,286 square miles. The civil divisions of the State are into ninety-six counties; the total population, including a few Indians, is 1,399,750 by the census of 1880 A.D.

The ecclesiastical divisions of the Diocese are into six Missionary Convocations, viz.: of Edenton, of Newbern, of Wilmington, of Raleigh, of Charlotte, and of Morganton. The Convocations at present organized and in operation are those of Edenton, of Raleigh, of Charlotte, and of Morganton. The other subdivisions of the Diocese are Parishes and Mission Stations, the latter being entirely under the Bishop's control, and being entitled to one delegate in the Convention, but not to a vote.

History of the Church in North Carolina.—The first services of the Church in the territory now constituting the United States were on the coast of North Carolina. Raleigh's first expedition landed at Roanoke Island in July, 1584 A.D. August 13, 1587 A.D., Manteo, an Indian chief, was baptized at Roanoke Island, the first Indian convert; and a few days after, Virginia Dare, the first white child born in America of English parents. In Harriot's Narrative, 1586 A.D., we have an interesting account of the efforts of that distinguished scientist to convey to the minds of the aborigines some knowledge of the facts and doctrines of the Christian religion.

No permanent settlement, however, was effected until about 1662 A.D., and for many years after that date the Province was destitute of religious services. In 1701 A.D. the Assembly passed an act for the support of the Church, but it came to nothing. About 1702 A.D. a church was built, probably near where the town of Edenton now stands. In the same year Dr. Bray, Commissary of the Bishop of London, sent the first minister of the Church into the Province, Daniel Brett (who officiated only a few months), and with him a small collection of books, which were kept at Bath, and constituted the first public library in North Carolina.

In 1704 A.D. the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts sent its first missionary, the Rev. Mr. Blair, and others from time to time, until in 1770 A.D.

there seem to have been eighteen ministers regularly settled in as many parishes, mostly east of Hillsboro; Salisbury being the only place farther west which had a minister. The western counties were settled chiefly by Presbyterians, with a good many German Lutherans, and a flourishing colony of Moravians about Salem. But the Church never had any really healthy existence during this period. It suffered the disadvantages of a State connection without enjoying the supposed compensating benefits. The laws in its favor could not be enforced where its adherents were not a majority of the freeholders, and when enforced they were insufficient to effect their purpose, while they served to check individual effort. But the annals of this period are not altogether barren. The names of Clement Hall, Thomas Burgess, Nathaniel Blount, and other faithful missionaries are preserved in honor for their works' sake. And the true remedy for the low condition of Church life was plain to some of the prominent laymen. Governor Dobbs writes once and again to the Society urging the absolute necessity of sending Bishops to America, and Governor Tryon, in a letter of July 31, 1765 A.D., presses upon the Society the importance of a larger number of ministers, saying that a majority of the whole population remained attached to the Church, although almost entirely deprived of her ministrations. It was probably owing to the efforts of Governor Tryon that the number of ministers in the Province rose from five in 1765 A.D. to eighteen in 1770 A.D.

The results of the Revolution seemed altogether disastrous to the Church. Most of her congregations were deprived of their ministers, and a very bitter popular prejudice arose against her. Her churches and chapels were deserted, her property fell into the hands of others, who in some instances still retain it, and her voice was hardly heard in the land.

In 1790 A.D., at the suggestion of Bishop White, an effort was made to revive the Church in North Carolina. Meetings of clergy and laity were held in Tarboro' in June and November, 1790 A.D., in November, 1793 A.D., and in May, 1794 A.D. At this last meeting six clergymen (including one in Lutheran orders) and a small number of prominent laymen were present. A Constitution was adopted, Deputies to the General Convention and a Standing Committee were appointed, and the Rev. Charles Pettigrew was chosen Bishop. Mr. Pettigrew set out to attend the General Convention of 1795 A.D., but was providentially prevented from accomplishing his journey, and seems never to have felt able to undertake the work afterwards. Thus this attempt to organize the Church failed. The Colonial Church was an infant which never learned to walk alone, and by 1800 A.D. seemed to be dead beyond hope of resurrection.

In November, 1816 A.D., the Rev. Bethel

Judd, of Connecticut, and the Rev. Adam Empe, of New York, traveling for their health, met in the city of Wilmington. Finding a church and a congregation, they began to officiate regularly. In January, 1817 A.D., the Rev. Jehu Curtis Clay became Rector of the Church in Newbern. On Easter-Monday, 1817 A.D., Mr. Judd organized a Church in Fayetteville. These three clergymen, with delegates from their several parishes, and with one layman also from the Church in Edenton, met in Newbern, April 2, 1817 A.D., and organized the Diocese of North Carolina, requesting Bishop Moore, of Virginia, to take Episcopal oversight thereof. He consented to do so, and in 1819, 1820, 1821, and 1822 A.D. made brief visitations to the chief places in the Diocese and presided in the Annual Conventions.

In 1823 A.D. the clergy numbered seven, and the communicants four hundred and eighty. The Convention resolved to elect a Bishop. It was felt that a man must be found who should be able to assert with boldness, and to maintain with power, the true position and doctrines of the Church, then but little appreciated among many of her professed children. Providence had provided such a man. In the very month in which the Diocese was organized, April, 1817 A.D., a Virginia planter, forty-five years of age, John Stark Ravenscroft, had been ordained Deacon by Bishop Moore. Six years later, when the Church in North Carolina came to choose a Bishop, the youngest of her Priests, William M. Green, at present Bishop of Mississippi, rose in the Convention, and told his brethren what he had seen of the work of this laborer, who, although called so late into the vineyard, seemed by his zeal and strength to be "earning more than his penny." Mr. Ravenscroft was personally known to no other member of the Convention, but he was elected unanimously by both orders on the first ballot, April 12, 1823 A.D. He was consecrated May 22 following. He found in the Diocese only seven clergymen (one of whom soon after withdrew from the Church), and a few weak and scattered congregations. As he is said to have expressed his work, "he could only assert the true position and claims of the Church, and strike dismay to the hearts of her adversaries." But the world instinctively knows greatness, and he became at once a power in the State. He fed his flock with a faithful and true heart, and ruled them prudently with all his power until his death, March 5, 1830 A.D., and he left an impression upon his Diocese which time has not effaced.

The Rev. Levi Silliman Ives was chosen Bishop of North Carolina by an all but unanimous vote, May 21, 1831 A.D., and was consecrated September 22 following. He found in the Diocese, clergy, fifteen; communicants, eight hundred and nine. The history of his active and, in its earlier stages, most effective Episcopate cannot be properly summarized in the space at command. His successor found forty clergy and over two thousand communicants in the Diocese. Besides inspiring his clergy with self-denying missionary zeal, and setting them an example of earnest missionary work, he struggled nobly to establish permanent institutions for religious and secular instruction. The Episcopal School at Raleigh, Trinity School, and the School at Valle Crucis failed, but the necessities of the Church to-day emphasize the wisdom of those attempts. St. Mary's School is founded on the failure of the Episcopal School, although the Church has entirely lost the beautiful property and the large sums of money invested in it.

It was very largely by reason of practices and teachings said to prevail in the school at Valle Crucis that suspicions of the Bishop's faithfulness to the Church began to be widely entertained throughout the Diocese, as is noticed in the report of the Committee on the State of the Church to the Convention of 1849 A.D. After several years of doubt and distress to the Diocese, and of painful vacillation on the part of the Bishop, he obtained leave of absence, and six months' salary in advance, in September, 1852 A.D., for the ostensible purpose of traveling for his own and his wife's health. He went abroad soon after, and on the 22d of the following December addressed a letter from Rome to the Convention of the Diocese, announcing his abandonment of the Church and his intended submission to the Pope of Rome.

May 28, 1853 A.D., the Rev. Thomas Atkinson, D.D., Rector of Grace Church, Baltimore, was chosen Bishop, and was consecrated October 18 following. His administration secured at once the perfect confidence of his people, and prevented any of those disastrous consequences which might have been feared from the defection of his predecessor.

The civil war which broke out in 1861 A.D. necessitated the organization of the Church in the Confederate States, with its General and Diocesan Councils; and all the energies of the Church in North Carolina were called out to supply the spiritual wants of her people at home and in the field. Prayer-Books and Testaments were imported from England; Catechisms and Tracts were printed at home; and a fund was begun for the establishment of a Diocesan Divinity and Training School. Some of the ablest and most zealous of the clergy became Chaplains of regiments, and many of those who retained charge of their parishes followed the example of the Bishop in giving part of their time and attention to the soldiers, in camp or in the hospitals.

It was in the wreck which followed the overthrow of the Confederacy in 1865 A.D. that the character of Bishop Atkinson appeared in its true greatness. His wisdom, firmness, and simple devotion to duty, guided by an enlightened appreciation of true Church principles, were of lasting service to the Church at large. It is now admitted that the presence of Bishop Atkinson with his full delegation of clergy and laity (this being the only Southern Diocese so represented) at the General Council of 1865 A.D., and especially the wisdom and firmness with which he met the delicate issues of that critical time, made the immediate and perfectly harmonious reunion of the Northern and Southern Dioceses possible. Their presence secured from their Northern brethren not only perfect fairness, which might have been expected in any case, but the most delicate courtesy in all the proceedings relative to the separation and to the terms of reunion, and so made it morally impossible for the Southern Dioceses to refuse to return.

Another most important question Bishop Atkinson and his Diocese settled at once by taking the true churchly position in the face of much popular prejudice. There has never been any distinction made in the Conventions since 1865 A.D. between white and colored ministers or members of the Church. All meet in the Councils of the Church on common ground. In the interest of the colored people, and especially to supply them with competent teachers of their own race, St. Augustine's Normal School and Collegiate Institute was founded in 1867 A.D., chiefly by the efforts of the Rev. J. Brinton Smith, its first principal. To this has been added a Theological department, for the education of colored candidates for orders.

The Ravenscroft Associate Mission and Training School, at Asheville, was founded by Bishop Atkinson for the evangelizing of the mountain regions, and for the training of candidates for orders of this Diocese.

Soon after the war the Bishop began to find the care of so extensive a Diocese too much for one man; and from 1867 to 1873 A.D. he advocated the division of the Diocese at the earliest practicable moment. In the latter year, May 30, the Rev. Theodore Benedict Lyman, D.D., of San Francisco, was elected Assistant Bishop, and was consecrated December 11 following. Bishop Atkinson died January 4, 1881 A.D., and Bishop Lyman became Bishop of the Diocese.

The movement for division, begun by Bishop Atkinson in 1867 A.D., was never allowed to drop altogether. It was renewed from time to time, and at the last Convention, May, 1883 A.D., was carried by a very large majority of both orders. By the action of the General Convention, a new Diocese was erected in the eastern part of the State, comprising the counties of Hertford, Bertie, Martin, Pitt, Green, Wayne, Sampson, Cumberland, and Robeson, with all that portion of the State lying between the said counties and the Atlantic Ocean. The new Diocese has taken the name of East Carolina, and has elected Rev. A. A. Watson, D.D., to be its first Bishop.

REV. J. B. CHESHIRE, JR.

North Dakota. This new jurisdiction, formed by the General Convention of 1883, comprises the portion of Dakota Territory north of the 46th parallel. Its population in 1880 was 100,000, but emigration is flowing into Dakota with wonderful rapidity. The jurisdiction contains 50,000 square miles. It had been under the care of Bishop Clarkson, of Nebraska. The Rev. Wm. D. Walker having been elected as Missionary Bishop, was consecrated in Calvary Church, New York, December 20, 1883. He was "born in New York City in 1840. Graduated from Trinity School and Columbia College, New York. Ordered Deacon in 1862. He was at once appointed minister in charge of Calvary Chapel, New York, and this charge he retained up to his elevation to the Episcopate."

Statistics.—Baptized, 117; confirmations, 85; Sunday-school scholars, 600; total of contributions, $15,386.10.

The fifteenth Annual Convocation will meet at the call of the Bishop.

North Side. Some years ago the position of the celebrant in the Holy Communion was seriously debated, the determination of it depending upon the meaning of the term in the rubric,—“Standing at the north side of the Table.” In ordinary terms the meaning would be clearly that side of the table standing at which the Priest faces south when celebrating. But the term in the rubric was really taken from the older rubrics of the Latin service-books in the English use; there it clearly means the northern side of that edge next the congregation, and not the northern end of the Holy Table. It is really a matter of rubrical conformity and obedience. And the principle of interpretation chosen should be as naturally the meaning that belonged to the words, which were transferred from the older use into the English Prayer-Book.

Northern California, Missionary Jurisdiction. Bishop Kip in 1871 A.D., and again in 1873 A.D., urged upon his clergy the need of relief from the increasing burdens of his growing Diocese, which was of too great an extent for his powers. The suggestion was acted upon, and the Convention seriously took up the consideration of the division of the Diocese, and in two successive Conventions received reports upon it, which took finally this shape at the Convention of 1874 A.D.

“This proposed Missionary Diocese contains twenty-five (25) counties, or all the territory north of the southern boundaries of Sonoma, Napa, Sacramento, Amador, El Dorado Counties. This section is remarkable for its varied characteristics and solid capacity for the sustenance of a dense population. The Sacramento Valley is noted for its immense crops of wheat, barley, oats, fruits, and vegetables. The timber is without practical limit. The gold, silver, and quicksilver mines of California are chiefly in this northern section of the State, and, in the opinions of scientific men, their richest points have not yet been touched. At no very distant day the fisheries of Northern California will realize vast sums of money.” It was anticipated that a large population would soon fill up this section. In the imagination of the Committee there existed “the healthy germ of a magnificent Diocese.” They spoke to the General Convention of nine self-sustaining parishes, 600 communicants, and 17 Presbyters; of the offerings for that year being $20,000 (twenty thousand dollars), and of a population of 210,000 people. They also assured the General Convention that 20 missionary stations could be started at once, and they closed their petition thus: “In the name of the neglected souls for whom CHRIST died, and for the sake of the millions who will soon be pressing to these shores, we beg,” etc. With such a presentation and plea, with such a prospect for the Church, there was nothing left for the House of Bishops to do but accede to the pleading of the Diocese of California, and accordingly on the 28th day of October, the House of Bishops then in session in New York City, the General Convention elected for Bishop of Northern California, the Rev. John Henry Ducachet Wingfield, D.D., LL.D., Rector of St. Paul's Church, Petersburg, Va. On the 29th of October the nomination was unanimously confirmed.

The Rev. Dr. Wingfield was consecrated on the 2d of December, 1874 A.D., in St. Paul's Church, Petersburg, Va.

In 1870 A.D. the jurisdiction covered a territory of 52,000 square miles, with an accredited population of 214,000. The census of 1875 A.D. estimated that there were 2464 Indians and 24,980 Chinese. Thus the Diocese was inaugurated without anything being guaranteed towards the support of the Bishop. And what the Committee would understand by “only a temporary charge,” when it asked the General Church for this division, we cannot conjecture. There is but one town of any size, Sacramento, which has a population of 25,000, and which, however, finds a difficulty in supporting the parish. It was so when the division was made. The report of the Committee certainly leaves a false impression with one who is unacquainted with the jurisdiction. It raises hopes with Eastern Churchmen, which not being realized, bring upon the Bishop and his missionaries their severe criticisms. If there is such an opportunity for the Church to grow,—“the germ of a magnificent Diocese,”—why does it not discover itself? The question is naturally asked, and not unkindly. The Bishop is expected with such proposed materials to accomplish a great deal. And if he does not, then the censures fall upon him. He, and the General Convention also, was influenced by this imaginary portrayal. There was nothing for him to do which could not have been done by the Bishop of California, or by an Assistant Bishop. And even supposing that there were these prospects for a Diocese, the migratory habits of the people are such as to forbid any reliance being placed upon them. And this Committee seemed to place great importance upon these districts.

The Primary Convocation was held in Grace Church, Sacramento, May, 1875 A.D. There were fourteen clergymen connected with the jurisdiction, eight of whom were present, with fourteen laymen. There were eighteen parishes and missions from which reports were received.

The Convocation, with the consent of the Bishop, placed itself under the Canons of California.

Bishop Wingfield said in his first address to his clergy and laity, “One thing must be established in the minds and hearts of the people,—that the Jurisdiction of Northern California is most emphatically a Missionary District. There is not, so far as I know, any point where the Church supports herself after the Apostolic pattern. There is scarcely a congregation which is legitimately independent. There is not a clergyman whose support is guaranteed by the even and regular contributions of the people. There is scarcely a Church building unencumbered by debt.”

The first year's work of the Bishop shows: services at which he had officiated, 405; sermons preached, 104; lectures and addresses, 74; baptisms, 43; confirmations, 214; Church buildings consecrated, 1; lots for Church secured, 3; holy communions, 28.

Thus he was busily engaged daily about the Master's work, and no one but himself knows how great the strain upon him, and the discomfort, disappointment, absolute distress and fatigue he endured in this first year's work. There was no enthusiasm, no defined Churchmanship, no hearty greeting to meet him in his work. He had not found the nine self-sustaining parishes of which the Committee had spoken, nor had he crossed the tidal wave of immigration to which it alluded. There was much work for the Church, but he had left as important work for this. It was not of sufficient importance per se to claim a Bishop's sole and undivided attention. There is an air of sadness in this peroration of his second address: “I sympathize with you in all your trials, and earnestly pray for your success in winning souls. I know that the tongue of the ungodly is always ready to blame your most faithful efforts, and perhaps to praise what may not be pleasing to your Heavenly FATHER. Let us strengthen ourselves in the sublime Faith of Him who was unmoved by earthly approval or disapproval. Let us make little of human censure and less of human praise, and, fixing our eyes on the Master, think of His judgment, of His strict scrutiny, and of His just rewards.”

It remains that we speak of the institutions which give character to the jurisdiction.

The College of St. Augustine was founded May, 1867 A.D., by Dr. J. L. Breck, who came from the Indian Mission, and is located at Benecia.

Bishop Wingfield took charge of the College, June, 1875 A.D. It was not ready-made by any means when he took charge; it was a burden he should have been spared, and is almost too much for a Bishop in whose Diocese neither learning nor religion are regarded as of the supremest importance. “The College of St. Augustine,” he says to the Convocation in 1878 A.D., “has received much of my immediate and personal attention since my last report, the hard times rendering it necessary to husband finances in order to meet obligations. This is a sad and weary work for me, and more especially because I have grave doubts as to its compatibility with the duties of my office as a Bishop of the Church of God. Alone, unaided, and meeting opposition at all points, I feel that my cross is sometimes too heavy indeed for me to carry.” From this time the College received his personal oversight. In 1880 A.D. it was indebted to him for the sum of nearly $17,000. The Board of Trustees had determined to rent or sell the property to meet the mortgages, amounting to $20,000. Failing in this, Bishop Wingfield, desiring to save the College and the Church, determined to assume the whole debt of $38,490.20.

Another feature in the Diocesan work of the jurisdiction which marks its life is St. Mary of the Pacific. The property had been purchased by Dr. Breck with money raised in the East, a large contributor being William H. Aspinwall, and in his will it was to be under a Board of Trustees chosen from both Dioceses. Dr. Breck had mortgaged the property to a bank in San Francisco. The interest on the debt had not been paid during his lifetime, and at his death the Trustees were called upon for both interest and principal. The Board was unwilling to assume the obligations, and the property was ordered to be sold. On the 12th of June, 1877 A.D., it was sold at public auction, Bishop Wingfield being the highest bidder. He thus came to the rescue, hoping that Churchmen would at least assist him in its payment. Instead of which, on the 1st of January, 1878 A.D., he found himself responsible for the sum of $18,411.20, bearing interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum.

He says, “I have regretted my well-meant action at the auction sale in San Francisco, and been sometimes tempted to despair."

Another burden, through the sloth and indifference of Churchmen, is added to his shoulders. Now he has two schools for which he is personally responsible. In 1879 A.D. he placed St. Mary of the Pacific under the charge of the Rev. L. D. Mansfield, who has continued his work to the present year. Mr. Mansfield was to pay a nominal rent of $500 for the year ending June 1, 1880 A.D. This sum being below the interest on $23,000 would not justify the Bishop in accepting it beyond the first year.

In 1881 A.D., Bishop Wingfield thus speaks of St. Augustine's and St. Mary's: "The two Boards of Trustees have abandoned all thought of the Institutions over whose interests they were appointed by the Churchmen of the whole State, and have thrown all the burden of debt and stigma of failure on the shoulders of one man, and he a Missionary Bishop of the Church, with a Parish to look after, and having the care of all the churches besides. But he is not discouraged. Abandoned by the parent Diocese, unstained by his own Jurisdiction, without a dollar of endowment, overwhelmed with debt, without a word of encouragement from the millionaires of this State, who are rolling in wealth, which they are hoarding for selfish ends, unrepresented by a single layman of our Church,—he will continue to stand by his work to the last."

And the future will tell that he has acted wisely. His work is improving, and a Blessing will rest upon so unselfish an undertaking to which he has given, amidst the sneering smiles of indifferent Church people, his worldly substance. This sacrifice will possess a savor which God will recognize and accept.

During the last four years Bishop Wingfield has been called to the older and stronger and larger Dioceses of Louisiana and Mississippi; and while we recognize the assurance of their trust in him as an able administrator, we must not fail to award him all praise for the manliness shown in declining the tempting offers, and settling down to a residence among the rocks and hills of Northern California. The last year's work, ending May, 1883 A.D., shows a total of 466 families, 1708 souls, 504 communicants, 760 Sunday-school children, 87 teachers; offerings, including all moneys raised, $15,284.64; value of property, $61,748; indebtedness on Church property, $1358.95. The clergy list sums up 10.

REV. W. LEACOCK.

Northern New Jersey, Diocese of. This Diocese consists of the counties of Essex, Hudson, Bergen, Passaic, Morris, Warren, and Sussex, and of the township of Summit, Union County, in the State of New Jersey, and was organized in 1874 A.D.

At the Annual Convention of the Diocese of New Jersey, held in 1871 A.D., a resolution was offered by the Rev. Joseph H. Smith for the appointment of a committee to consider and report upon the propriety and feasibility of dividing the Diocese. The consideration of this resolution was postponed until the next Convention. In 1872 A.D. Bishop Odenheimer called attention to the subject, and a committee of thirteen was appointed, who reported the following year in favor of "the formation of a new Diocese within the limits of the present Diocese of New Jersey." The resolutions appended to the report of the committee were adopted by the Convention, and Bishop Odenheimer gave his constitutional consent to the erection of the proposed new Diocese.

At the Annual Convention of 1874 A.D., the question came up again, and to satisfy all parties as to the real wishes of the clergy and laity, the vote was taken by orders, and the division of the Diocese on the lines reported by the committee was agreed to by an overwhelming majority. At the General Convention which met in October of the same year the formation of the new Diocese was consented to and ratified, and Bishop Odenheimer issued his call the same day for the meeting of the Primary Convention, and announced his intention of electing the new Diocese as his future jurisdiction.

The Primary Convention met at Grace Church, Newark, November 12, 1874 A.D., Bishop Odenheimer presiding, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Farrington from the text, "Love the Brotherhood." It was decided that the Diocese should be called NORTHERN NEW JERSEY, and the following officers were duly elected: Secretary, the Rev. William J. Farrington, D.D. Standing Committee, the Revs. James A. Williams, D.D., Robert N. Merritt, George Z. Gray, and E. B. Boggs, D.D., and Messrs. D. Dodd, A. Mills, H. Meigs, and J. Edgar. Treasurer, Mr. Henry Hayes. Registrar, the Rev. Samuel W. Sayres.

Bishop Odenheimer departed this life August 14, 1879 A.D., full of honors and sincerely lamented, and a special Convention was called to elect his successor. This Convention was held at Trinity Church, Newark, October 28, 1879 A.D., and on the seventh ballot the Rev. Thomas Alfred Starkey, D.D., Rector of St. Paul's Church, Paterson, N. J., was duly elected Bishop. His consecration took place January 8, 1880 A.D., at Grace Church, Newark, the Rt. Rev. the Bishop of Rhode Island presiding, and he has just completed the fourth year of a successful Episcopate.

The Diocese contains 2800 square miles, or a little more than one-third of the area of the State of New Jersey, and has a population of over 600,000 souls. Since its formation it has steadily increased in the elements of strength, and already ranks three-fourths of the Dioceses which compose the American Church. Its Episcopal Fund amounts, in Parish bonds and other securities, to $56,000, and its Aged and Infirm Clergy Fund to $14,700. It has two Church Hospitals, viz.: St. Barnabas, Newark, and Christ, Jersey City; both of which are doing a noble work in ministering to the souls and bodies of men, and are prosperous.

The situation of the Diocese, between the Delaware and Hudson Rivers, and by the side of one of the world's great centres of commerce, its iron roads crossing every county, its rich ore-beds, its thriving manufacturing cities of Newark and Paterson, its growing towns and villages, many of them "beautiful for situation," all point to the continued and increasing material prosperity of this portion of the State, and this assured prosperity and the encouraging statistics given at the end of this article justify the prediction that a bright future is in store for the Church in this goodly jurisdiction.

The statistics for the last Conventional year (ending May 1, 1883 A.D.) are as follows: clergy, 82; parishes and missions, 79; candidates for holy orders, 9; baptisms, 1549; confirmed, 828; communicants, 9273; marriages, 311; burials, 829; Sunday-school teachers, 923; Sunday-school scholars, 8565; offerings and contributions, $270,769.

REV. WILLIAM G. FARRINGTON, D.D.

Northern Texas, Missionary Jurisdiction of. No better introduction to the Historical Sketch of this Missionary Jurisdiction can be given than that which the venerable Bishop of Texas has furnished in the history of his Diocese:

"In 1874 A.D., at the Convention in Jefferson, May 28, final action was taken upon the important subject of the reduction of the Diocese, which had been considered in previous Conventions and by the General Convention at its last session, the matter of making canonical provision being then considered. On this occasion a special committee reported in accordance with the recommendation of the Bishop,—proposing the cutting off large portions of the State (or Diocese) to be formed into the Missionary Districts of Northern and Western Texas, according to the lines suggested by the Bishop, and that the General Convention be petitioned to provide for and ratify the same. This was done notwithstanding the grave difficulty that no legal provision had been made for such a mode of relief. The Rev. Alex. C. Garrett, D.D., was elected Missionary Bishop of Northern Texas, and was consecrated at Omaha, Nebraska, 20th of the following December."

The area thus set off was 100,000 square miles, containing at that time about 400,000 inhabitants. There were five clergymen and thirteen parishes and stations in the jurisdiction. The new Bishop undertook his arduous task in a brave spirit, and began to set in order the means which the new Diocese afforded for the task. He at once began to have schools established and a Cathedral planned. Dallas became his residence, and there he placed the Cathedral of St. Matthew. There was great need both of means and laborers, and both were but slowly supplied. The care of the scattered parishes few and feeble, and the visits to new fields and the efforts to arouse and stimulate workers to greater exertions necessitated constant traveling, much of which was done in an open buggy. By 1878 A.D. three more clergy had been added and parishes had increased to nine, with five organized missions; and twenty-three other mission points had been opened. There were 968 communicants, and the contributions amounted to $14,275.21. Perhaps the greatest trial was, and will be for some time to come, the difficulty in retaining men for the work in a State whose population, so constantly increasing and so bent upon the most material things, cannot patiently listen to the Gospel. Too many workers lose heart.

"The population is cosmopolitan. Every degree of refinement and the reverse, of knowledge and its opposite, of religionism and agnosticism, may find here many representatives. The tongues of Europe, the dialects of England, the sounds peculiar to the lands of Burns and of Moore, mingle in our streets with those which may be heard in Boston or New Orleans. The sentiment of these people is as various as their nationality.

"The problem of civilization, politics, and the Church is the same,—to blend these heterogeneous elements in common language, nationality, and religion. With the last of these only have we any present concern.

"If any one will examine the few brief sentences traced above, the following observations will seem to be of weight:

"1. Speculation is excessive. Every owner of real estate gives it a fictitious value, while every owner of capital seeks investment with a view to speedy and extravagant returns.

"2. Investment rather than assured income is the normal condition of almost all the capital at present available for legitimate business purposes. Merchants and corporations and companies are all alike expending in hope of future benefit, but as yet have hardly begun to realize any profits upon the outlay.

"3. These circumstances and the peculiarities of our population above alluded to render the work of the Church, both in the erection of buildings and the maintenance of the Ministry, a work of extreme difficulty. To allay the prejudices of early training and association, overcome varieties of language and nationality, break the power of atheism and infidelity, and subdue the bitterness of sectarian animosity, would be a hard thing to do if original sin had been eradicated from the human heart; but while mankind is constituted as we find it, the bravest might well shrink from so great a task. This may, perhaps, account in some degree for the frequent changes among the Clergy. Men quite equal to the average, if not above it, as is proved by the good positions they have occupied elsewhere, have found it impossible to continue with us long. Some of them have plainly stated that the strain occasioned by the cosmopolitan character of the population, and its consequent lack of co-operation and cohesion, was too much for their powers. If this be so in the sphere of spiritual things, it will require no labored argument to prove a still greater difficulty in that of temporal things. Comparatively few have received any training in the Church. Of these, again, only a few have been trained to habits of systematic liberality in the cause of God. Hence gifts are seldom made or services rendered for the honor and glory of God, but rather to serve some lower purpose of a personal nature.

"To these facts we must add one more,—the fluctuating character of our population. The losses by 'removal' are so severe as to have almost extinguished some of our most promising Missions. This is an evil against which no foresight can guard. Restlessness is characteristic of the age, and especially of new settlements. Sudden changes of value, caused by a new railroad or town, shift the centre of population of a district or county, and the plans and labor of years are scattered to the winds."

By 1880 A.D. the organized missions had increased to eight, and the mission points which the Bishop himself mainly visited were now twenty-four. The calls for more laborers and for men who could move easily from point to point are ever urgent in such a jurisdiction as that of Northern Texas. But the disastrous seasons had injured very much the ability of the people to aid in the support of a clergyman, and it is difficult to obtain men who are not more or less encumbered. The last report of the Bishop (1883 A.D.) shows a marked increase. The communicants are 1112, eighteen parishes and organized missions, and twenty-six points at which more or less services are held during the year. Here as everywhere else schools are specially needed for the training of the young, and for the dissemination through them of the sound principles of the Church. There is no section of the South which needs to receive more aid in this than does Northern Texas. Three or four Church schools well founded and in successful operation in the three Dioceses would be capital and work wisely expended for the future of the Church. If the like means, given not too lavishly indeed to other fields which are more successful in presenting their great needs and fast passing opportunities, were given to the Northern and Western Missionary Jurisdictions of Texas, there would soon be seen an equally great advance in the growth of the Church.

Numbers. The Book of Numbers. The third of the five books of Moses, so called because it contains the two numberings of the people, the one when they left Sinai, the second when they were on "the plains of Moab by Jordan near Jericho." The book may be divided into four main divisions: I. The leaving Sinai (chs. i.-x. 10). II. Journey to Paran (x. 11; xiv. 45). III. Sojourn there and wanderings (xv.-xix.). IV. The last year of their wandering to the plains of Moab (xx., xxxvi.). The book is evidently the memoranda of the more notable events which befell the Israelites, the sore judgments they brought upon themselves by their conduct, and yet God's wondrous protection over them. The time had come for them to take possession of Canaan. The people in covenant with JEHOVAH, with the sanctity of His presence, now set forward in solemn march to fulfill their mission, thoroughly organized and after some sort of discipline, and with the Ark in the midst and the pledge of His presence, and with the Pillar of Cloud and of Fire leading them.

The second division contains the narrative of their march, the discipline God inflicted because of their murmurings at Taberah, and at Kibroth-hattaavah, and their arrival at Hazeroth. In this journey the people wearied of the manna, and were surfeited with quails, but with their willfulness came the penalty too. At Hazeroth the spies were sent out, and brought back an evil report, which led the people, despite the remonstrances of Joshua and Caleb, to refuse "to go up to possess the land." Then when God condemned them to the forty years in the wilderness they repented as suddenly, and were tempted to make a rash attack upon the Amalekites in the endeavor to force a way into Canaan. The third division (from ch. xv.-xx.) records their wanderings for thirty-seven years; the notable events which befell them, as the rebellion of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, and the budding of Aaron's rod, together with various Laws. Fourth, the account of what occurred (ch. xx.) at the camp in Kadesh. Miriam dies here. Moses and Aaron, for speaking unadvisedly with their lips, are forbidden the promised land. From thence, after vainly asking for a passage through Edom, they pass down southward. At Hor Aaron dies and is buried. On the journey thence the people murmur and are bitten with serpents. To heal them, Moses, by God's direction, made a brazen serpent and put it upon a pole. "But it came to pass, that if a serpent had bitten any man, when he beheld the serpent of brass, he lived." They asked a passage of Sihon, King of the Amorites, who, for reply, attacked them. But he was utterly defeated and his kingdom taken from him. The fear this produced in Moab led to the messages to Balaam, and his unwilling blessing, and to the plots he advised, which led to the destruction of Moab and Midian, and at last they reach the plains of Moab and encamp, preparatory to their crossing over. Here Moses makes the final dispositions and directions, gives the last Laws which are to be observed, and prepares for his death. It was in this interval that he read to the people the Book of Deuteronomy. The work has been often attacked, but none of the objections advanced can stand the severe criticism that they are arbitrary, willful, and inconsistent, and are based first on conjecture, and then that this conjecture is proven fact, a process that would establish any proposition that can be invented. Gaps do occur, but those incident to a record of notable facts, and special laws whose record covers a period of thirty-eight or nine years. The book is acknowledged to be, whenever traced, an accurate itinerary, jotted down by one who was an eye-witness. In the book we have several fragments of popular poetry, or of battle-hymns, most naturally, if briefly, introduced, and the three noble rhythms,—the chant when the people began their march, and the chant when they went into camp, and the threefold blessing of JEHOVAH, which was to rest, evening by evening, upon His people. In the very difficulties picked out or imagined we have a proof of the integrity of the book. The writer heeded nothing of apparent inconsistency. The several facts were true. He did not think of any imaginary discrepancy that might be fancied at a later date.

Numerals. In Holy Scriptures there are certain recurring numbers, either integrally or as factors of larger numbers, as Three, Seven, Ten, Thirteen, Forty, Fifty, and Seventy. The recurrence of these, and the fact that the periods assigned in many prophecies are products of such factors, have led many early interpreters to put a good deal of stress upon the numbers and the "arithmetical" of Scripture. It must be freely conceded that the prophetic cycles do have a roundness that shows a purpose, that seven is used mystically, as also forty, and that the seventy weeks of Daniel's prophecy do represent a period which accurately included the midst of the week when the MESSIAH was cut off, and was terminated when Jerusalem was sacked and the Temple burnt. There is no doubt of the interrelation of the numbers used typically, and the times and seasons which God hath appointed, but which He keeps in His own hand. Nor can we doubt but even in names were concealed numbers which made the names highly significant, for the letters of the alphabet were anciently used as numerals. No more than we can suppose for a moment that it was by accident that the birthplace of our LORD received its name, "the house of bread," or that it was not with an inner relation to His being the bread of Life that He was born there, though chiefly because it was the ancient home of the House of David. But it is only in accomplished predictions based upon periods of time that we can be certain that the results are correct, and such results too are useful to us now. A harmony thus appears which shows a definite purpose, a premeditation in the prophecy that utterly removes it from the rash objection that it was possibly a clever guess based upon political insight. No clever guess could have given to Jeremiah's prophecy its accuracy; nor to the far greater prophecy of Daniel, which so strangely compresses in its phrases tangled skeins of after-history, which were to help forward the unification of the once shattered Jewish nation and to give it the characteristics it bore when the MESSIAH did come.

These numbers in Scripture have a great value then, but a study of them becomes so fascinating that it tends to mislead. It was discredited because of the absurd theories built upon systems arbitrarily using the numerals given us. But it is not necessary to discredit a truth because it has been misapplied. And it surely is a misapplication to endeavor to force not only out of names but out of texts results which possibly might be wholly upset were a different reading to be established. It is a valuable auxiliary in proving the perfect accuracy of fulfilled predictions, but a dangerous one by which to try to solve future mysteries.

Nunc Dimittis. Simeon's Hymn of Thanksgiving when he took the infant SAVIOUR in his arms at the time the Virgin Mary presented Him in the Temple. It has been used for about thirteen centuries in the Services of the Church.

The American revisers omitted it in 1787 A.D., but within the past few years there has grown up a use of it after the Communion service has ended, and there is also a frequent use of it as an anthem. The proposed revision of the Prayer-Book has replaced it in the Evening Service.

Oath. An oath is a most solemn asseveration. God Himself is spoken of as thus asserting the truth to man (Heb. vi. 16, 17). Punishment for oath-breaking is denounced (2 Chron. xxxvi. 13; Ezek. xvii. 13, 18). Inviolability of an oath is declared in Num. xxx. 2. "Shall swear by the God of truth" (Isa. lxxv. 16). Cicero (De Officiis, iii. 29) styles an oath a religious affirmation. It is commonly used on solemn or legal occasions. It is usual to object to all oaths whatever, from our LORD's own words and from St. James' Swear not, but in St. Matt. xxvi. 63, 64, our LORD does not disallow the adjuration of the magistrate; though He Himself does not originate the oath, He answers it. The Church then understood our LORD's prohibition as directed against profane and careless swearing, not against the serious and judicial form.

An oath is taken as in the special presence of God. "Abram said to the King of Sodom, I have lift up mine hand unto the LORD, the most high God, the possessor of heaven and earth" (Gen. xiv. 22).

In oaths God is called upon as witness and judge, and their violation brings on, after conviction, the severe punishment meted out to perjury, which is considered as aggravated falsehood. "Love no false oath: for all these are things that I hate, saith the LORD" (Zech. viii. 17). "I will be a swift witness against false swearers, saith the LORD of hosts" (Mal. iii. 5).

In taking either an oath or affirmation one should think and speak as not only before God, but as conscious of His special presence, as when kissing His Holy Word, the prayer is said with due solemnity, "so help me God." After such a prayer, "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth" should follow. After such an oath there should be great care in making statements.

There are Oaths of Testimony, Oaths of Promise or Engagement, somewhat like the Jewish vows, and Oaths of Office for civil officers, and even for the King. In ancient times the soldiers took a military oath, and the oath of allegiance is a part of monarchical institutions. This oath is noticed in Ecclesiastes viii. 2: "I counsel thee to keep the King's commandment, and that in regard of the oath of God."

The King, or Queen, of Great Britain on assuming the regal office takes a coronation oath. Members of the English Parliament either take oaths or make affirmation. Certain English officers are required to take oaths of allegiance and the official oath. In the United States, when the President assumes his position he swears or affirms that he "will faithfully execute the office."

For the most part in this country oaths are made use of in courts of justice, and in the execution of legal documents. That their solemnity may be preserved it is desirable that they be not used on light and trifling occasions.

REV. S. F. HOTCHKIN.

Obadiah. Of Obadiah, the fourth of the Minor Prophets, we know nothing with certainty except what is to be learned from his prophecy, though there is a tradition that he was of the tribe of Ephraim, and some relate that he was carried a captive to Babylon, while others affirm that he died in Samaria. There are as many as twelve persons called by the name of Obadiah in the Old Testament, of whom there is hardly one who has not been thought to be the same as the prophet, but this very difference of opinion shows on how little ground these identifications are based, and while, on this account, they call for no attention, they are besides unnecessary, for Obadiah, meaning Servant of the Lord, was probably a very common name among the Hebrews. The date of the prophecy of Obadiah is determined according to the interpretation of the 11th verse, which speaks of a capture of Jerusalem. If this is understood to mean the captivity by Nebuchadnezzar, then Obadiah would have spoken after 588 B.C., and as the same monarch made a conquest of Edom in 583 B.C., these two dates are commonly assigned as the limits within which the prophecy must be fixed. This conclusion would probably be looked upon as final were it not that the book of Obadiah is arranged between Amos and Jonah, two of the very earliest prophets, and it is asked, Why was Obadiah put next to them if he were not contemporary with them, or nearly so? An answer has been suggested that there is a close connection in subject between the last few verses of Amos and the prophecy of Obadiah, such that the latter is, as it were, an expansion of the former. The similarity between the opening verses of Obadiah and Jeremiah xlix. 7 (as well as passages in Lamentations) make it probable that one of these prophets had the words of the other in mind when he spoke, which might very well be, for if the date assigned to Obadiah is correct, they were contemporaries; but it is held that Obadiah was the first to utter his prophecy. The book consists of a rebuke of Edom for taking part in the sack of Jerusalem, and cutting off the fugitives from the city (v. 12 to v. 14), and of a prophecy of judgment upon the Edomites for so doing (v. 15 and 16). "Remember the children of Edom, O LORD, in the day of Jerusalem, how they said, Down with it, down with it, even to the ground" (Ps. cxxxvii. 7). The prophecy concludes with a vision of the restoration of the captivity of Zion (v. 17 to v. 21). It is held that the words of Obadiah have been fulfilled (1) in the conquest of Edom by Nebuchadnezzar; (2) in the reduction of the Idumeans by the Maccabees; and (3) that the restoration of Zion has been accomplished in the return from the Babylonish captivity. But a fuller realization of this prophecy is yet to be looked for in the deliverance of Zion from Edom; in the triumph of the Church of CHRIST over the powers of darkness. For the curious interpretations of Obadiah made by the modern Jews, reference may be made to Smith's Dictionary of the Bible.

Obit. At present a memorial service on the anniversary of the death of a founder or benefactor. Originally it was a funeral service in the church apart, apparently, from the burial service. "In many of the English Colleges the Obit, or anniversary of the death of the founder, is piously observed. . . . The Obit Sundays (once a quarter) at St. George's, at Windsor, were celebrated formerly with great magnificence, and are, to a certain degree, still." (Hook, Church Dictionary sub voc.)

This commemoration is sometimes instituted in this country, but the instances are rare. "Commemorations" are more frequent.

Oblation. In Canon law the term "oblation" means an offering of any kind, whether of movable or immovable property devoted to pious and hallowed uses; but it is now usually taken to describe the offering of the Bread and Wine, which is placed upon the Holy Table at the offering of the Prayer for "the whole estate of CHRIST'S Church militant." It was originally selected from the offerings of the people for the support of the ministry, and every one offered in the supposition that of his offering at least some part of the oblation would be taken. And it was a reproach uttered by St. Cyprian that a certain rich woman did not offer, but partook of the offering of a poor person. And St. Augustine writes, "The Priest receives from thee that which he may offer for thee." Later the gifts of bread and wine for the general use of the Church ceased, and alms in money was substituted for them. The oblation of the Bread survived for some time. At the Reformation it was ordered that each house in the parish in turn should be at charges for the celebration in its turn, and should offer, since the Priest generally provided the loaf, "the just valour and price of the holy loaf, with all such money and other things as were wont to be offered with the same, . . . and that the house that offered should at that time communicate with the Priest" (First Book Edw. VI.). But in the Second Book, the rubric at the end directed that "The bread and wine for the Communion shall be provided by the Curate and the Church-wardens at the charges of the Parish, and the Parish shall be discharged of such sums of money or other duties which hitherto they have paid for the same, by order of their houses every Sunday." It is then, if not bounden upon the Wardens, at least in strict accordance with their duties, to provide in the name of the Congregation out of the devotions of the Congregation the Bread and the Wine as a formal act. The oblation is a formal one itself, and should be very solemnly valued by the Communicants. For the oblation thus received from them by the Priest is used in the most solemn act of our holy religion, and for the most sacred use for our own selves. Its preparation, and the placing of it upon the Credence-Table, should be done by the Priest or his assistant, and not carelessly left to other hands, as has been too often the case. The act of oblation is formally made by the Priest in the words of the Prayer, "We humbly beseech Thee most mercifully to accept our alms and oblations, and to receive this our prayers, which we offer to Thy Divine Majesty." Wherein there is a threefold offering of Alms, Oblations, and Prayers.

Octave. The eighth day after a festival. It was in honor of the festival, which was always one of the first order. It was an early Western use, based upon Jewish usage. For it was held that whatever was commanded the Jews was an intimation of what was acceptable to the Divine will, and so, if it could be justly used in principle in the Christian Dispensation, it should be received and carried out. As there were several Jewish feasts which were celebrated through seven days, and one—the feast of Tabernacles—which was observed for eight days after, the Church in the West observed the principle in regard to the feasts of Christmas, Easter, Whitsunday, and perhaps in places the feast of the Epiphany also, though this was probably done when it was observed as identical with Christmas. The American Church has received from her English Mother, and has formally retained only the octave on those feasts for which she has provided a proper Preface,—i.e., Christmas-day, Easter, Ascension, and Whitsunday.

Offertory. It is commonly applied to the act of receiving the alms and other devotions of the people, and of humbly presenting and placing them upon the Holy Table. But accurately the term means the sentence or sentences recited by the Priest. "After which the minister shall return to the Lord's Table and begin the offertory, saying one or more of these sentences following, as he thinketh most convenient." The anthem these sentences represent was introduced in St. Augustine's time (400 A.D. cerc). Again, Raban Maurus (850 A.D.). After this the oblations are offered by the people, and the offertory is sung by the clergy, which took its name from that very cause, being, as it were, the song of the offerers. The custom is now growing by which the minister recites a single sentence and the choir then sing an anthem. If it is done at all, the anthem should be strictly one of the sentences appointed for the offertory, and not anything selected at will. But taking the word offertory in its common use, the privilege of giving in the Church was confined anciently only to the communicants. None else were permitted to offer then and there, and any one under censure was not permitted to offer any gift. The privilege of giving is a very sacred one, and is indeed a grace which we should most highly value, for it is a consecration of a part of our goods which we hold in trust as stewards. It is a very important part of our worship. And our gifts are humbly presented and placed upon the LORD's Table as our acknowledgment of His Lordship, and of our holding only at His will and long-suffering. It is a part of our sacrifice of self and all we have. Notice that we offer the sacrifice of reverence of our bodies, the offering of prayer and praise, and then with our oblations the sacrifice of our goods. So that no part of our whole self is left not represented in some way.

Office. One of the three proper words for the several Services, as the Office of Burial, or the Funeral Office, the Visitation Office. It is used by the Infant and Adult baptismal forms in the rubric at the close of the form of Adult Baptism. It is the title of the Institution Office. The term ORDER is given to the Offices of Morning and Evening Prayer, Communion, Baptism, Confirmation, Visitation of the Sick, and Burial. FORM is applied to the Offices of Marriage, Prayers at Sea, Visitation of Prisoners, Thanksgiving, Family Prayer, Ordination and Consecration, and the Consecration of Churches. The term OFFICE is used once of the Institution Office as a heading, but it occurs in several places, notably in a rubric at the end of the Order of Adult Baptism. Service is a term used generally in the rubrics of all the offices. But chiefly the ancient use of the word was in reference to the Daily Service, which were named the Holy Office, the Divine Office. We now employ the word in a broad use for all the offices and forms provided in the Prayer-Book. Appended are the notices of the minor offices of the Prayer-Book.

Office for the Burial of the Dead.—All right feeling would prompt us to bury the dead with decent rites, but now that life and immortality are brought to light through the Gospel, the bodies of the dead in CHRIST are laid away in the hope of the resurrection. The Church has always taken especial care of the dead bodies of her children, and has committed them to their rest with confidence in the power of Him who is the resurrection and the life.

The Burial Office is forbidden in the case of unbaptized adults, excommunicate persons, and suicides. The reason for this prohibition is that adults unbaptized and excommunicate are not members of the Church. This service is for her members. In the case of suicides, no words of hope can be spoken if they have rushed unbidden into the presence of their Maker. The charitable instincts of our day prompt us to suggest insanity as generally preceding suicide.

The Burial Office consists of the following parts: 1. Passages from the Scriptures. 2. The Burial Anthem, taken from the 39th and 90th Psalms. 3. The Lesson, from 1 Cor. xv. 4. The Meditation and Prayers at the grave. 5. The Committal Sentence. 6. The words from Rev. xiv. 7. The LORD's Prayer, other Prayers, and the Benediction. All parts of this service are appropriate, and as a whole it is one of singular beauty and significance. The Committal Sentence, uttered at a time when hearts are heavy and when the remains of loved ones are to be hidden from sight, brings to view the sure coming of the LORD Jesus, and when the bodies of those who sleep in Him shall be changed and be made incorruptible.

The main objection made to this service is, that it speaks hopefully alike of all over whom it is used. The answer is:

1. It is to be used over those who, having been baptized, are thus in the membership of the Church.

2. We are never to judge what is the spiritual state of the departed. They have gone beyond all human tribunals. We do not know what their inner experiences have been before they left us. Shall we publicly condemn any? The service sets forth the words proper to be used over the Christian departed. The tone of the service shows what should have been the character of the departed, and we must err upon the side of charity if at all.

Office for the Churching of Women.—The other title for this office indicates its object, "The Thanksgiving of Women after Childbirth." It consists of an exhortation to the woman to give thanks, the recitation of a Psalm, the LORD's Prayer, some versicles, and a thanksgiving prayer. It is to be regarded as a most appropriate way in which a mother may acknowledge God's goodness to her, and may supplicate the continuance of His mercy.

The substance of this office has come to us from the Sarum use. A service for mothers after childbirth was in use in the early Christian centuries. It is mentioned in old records as far back as 460 and 610 A.D.

There are two important points in the rubric at the end of the office. One is that the woman should make a thank-offering, to be applied to the relief of distressed women in childbed. The second is that the person receive the Holy Communion, if it is then administered.

Two words occur in this office which are worthy of special notice. The word "Ordinary" and the word "convenient." The first means the person who orders, rules, or directs. Usually it refers to the Bishop of the Diocese. Here it may refer to the Dean or some one acting for the Bishop. The word "convenient" has the old significance of proper, seemly, most befitting.

Permission is given the clergy to use either the whole office or only the concluding prayer. Usually the latter is preferred in this country, but in other countries the whole office is frequently used.

The Confirmation Office.—The Rite of Confirmation, or the laying on of hands, has come down to us from the days of the Apostles. It is mentioned in Heb. vi. 2, as one of the first principles of the Christian faith. As a rite it is alluded to in Acts viii. 14-17; xix. 6.

It is administered to baptized persons for three reasons:

1. To enable them to renew their baptismal vows.
2. To assure them of God's favor and good will.
3. To convey to them the gifts of the HOLY SPIRIT.

The essential points in Confirmation are:

1. It is to be administered by the Bishop.
2. The candidates must previously have received baptism.
3. They must have reached years of discretion.
4. They must have a sufficient knowledge of the elementary truths of religion.
5. They must have a sincere purpose, with God's help, to live a Christian life.

The significance of the reply "I do," which the candidates make to the Bishop's question, extends to a renunciation of evil, the acceptance of the Christian faith, and a determination to live piously and soberly henceforth.

The benefits of Confirmation are numerous:

1. It gives opportunity for those baptized in infancy to make confession of CHRIST before the world.
2. It enables persons trained in other religious bodies, where this rite is not preserved, to conform to an Apostolic usage and to come into accord with our Apostolic Church.
3. It brings the persons into the most favorable condition for receiving the strengthening gifts of the HOLY GHOST.
4. It is a step forward to a reception of the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of CHRIST.

Office for the Consecration of a Church or Chapel.—The Consecration Office was set forth in 1799 A.D. by the American Church.

It is eminently proper that there should be some formal setting apart a church or chapel to its holy uses.

The service begins by the recitation of words from the 24th Psalm by the Bishop and clergy. Then are read any papers containing the record of the gift or endowment of the building. This is followed by the Bishop's address, in which he calls upon the congregation to beg the Divine blessing upon the present undertaking. Then follow the Consecration Prayers, in which the building is set apart to the honor of God, and dedicated to His service for the reading of His Holy Word, celebrating His Sacraments, for offering prayer and praise, and for the performance of other holy offices.

The Bishop then, turning to the people, who remain kneeling, continues the prayers, reciting the various purposes for which the building may be used, and imploring God's blessing upon those who use it for these purposes.

Baptism, Confirmation, Holy Communion, Reading and Preaching the Word of God, and Holy Matrimony are each specified. The concluding prayer of this part follows the outline of the exhortation used in the daily service.

The Sentence of Consecration is next read. This is a document set forth by the Bishop declaring the purposes for which the building has been erected, and its solemn dedication, and its separation from all unhallowed and worldly uses.

At the end of the reading of this Sentence the Order for the Morning Prayer follows:

The first Lesson is the story of the dedication of the Temple. The second is that part of the Epistle to the Hebrews in which we are taught that we may now, through the blood of Jesus, have access to the Holy of Holies, and that He is the High-Priest over the House of God.

The Epistle tells us that we are the temples of God through the indwelling of His Spirit, and the Gospel tells of the cleansing of the Temple by Him who would not have it made a house of merchandise or a den of thieves.

The Office for the Institution of Ministers.

—This is the last office added to our Prayer-Book. Its date is 1808 A.D. The institution of a minister is his formal recognition by the Bishop and the congregation as the rector or assistant minister of the parish. It furnishes opportunity for the offering of especial supplications for the blessing of God upon the work of the new incumbent. The use of this office, although it does not necessarily secure permanence to the minister's relation to his parish, serves to set forth the fact that the tie is not to be broken lightly, and makes it necessary that the proposal to terminate it shall be referred to the Bishop.

The Institution Office itself is very simple. There has to be, first of all, a certificate from the vestry of the election of the minister. When this is received by the Bishop he grants his letter of institution, which is read after the Morning Prayer has been said.

At Morning Prayer the institutor (who may be the Bishop or some one appointed by him), the new minister, and the attending clergy enter the church together. The wardens take their place outside the chancel-railing to the right and left, the senior warden holding the keys of the church. The Morning Prayer proceeds as usual, except that special Lessons and Psalms are appointed. When it is ended the institutor announces the object before them and demands if there be any impediment. If no impediment is urged, the Bishop's letter is next read. The senior warden then delivers the keys to the new minister with words of recognition of him as the rector of the church or parish. The minister, receiving the keys, promises, in the name of the TRINITY, to be a faithful shepherd.

After the prayers which follow, the institutor receives the incumbent within the rails, and presents him the Bible, the Prayer-Book, the Books of Canons of the General and Diocesan Conventions, charging him to let them be the rule of his conduct in dispensing the Divine word, in leading the devotions of the people, and in exercising the discipline of the Church, and exhorts him to be a pattern to the flock. An Anthem and special prayers are next in order. After the benediction which here follows, the instituted minister kneels at the altar and uses prayers for himself and for his people. These two prayers are very full and pointed summaries of the needs of a clergyman and his congregation. The Communion must be celebrated by the incumbent himself on this occasion, as is eminently proper.

At the close of the whole service the wardens, the vestry, and others are directed to salute the instituted minister and welcome him, bidding him God-speed.

The Office for the Solemnization of Matrimony.—Marriage is not a mere civil contract between two persons, but it is a holy estate, which is to be entered into soberly, advisedly, and in the fear of God. The Church has done much to preserve correct views as to the sanctity of marriage by setting forth an office which is admirable in its simplicity, and full and clear in the essential truths. The service is made up of two old forms, viz., the Betrothal and the Marriage proper.

It was once the custom to have a formal betrothal or engagement of the parties made in public before the marriage, with some religious rites. These rites were known as the service of Betrothal. In our present office the essential parts of this old service of betrothal are prefixed to the regular marriage service. The office may be analyzed as follows:

1. Exhortations to the friends and to the parties.

2. The Betrothal.
3. The Giving Away of the Bride.
4. The Vows of Affection and Fidelity.
5. The Endowment.
6. The Prayer.
7. The Formal Declaration.
8. The Benediction.

There are impediments to marriage which the law recognizes, such as an existing wife or husband, certain nearness of blood relationship, and immaturity of age, but beside these the Church forbids marriage to divorced persons, except that the innocent one of a divorced couple may remarry, and persons under the legal age must have the consent of parents.

The Church's aim is to set forth marriage as a most solemn and binding covenant, which no caprice or temptation or change of feeling should be allowed to break. For one cause only may it be annulled, and that is the offense mentioned by CHRIST Himself as the one offense for which the bond may be canceled. The position of the Church and the position of the State are in antagonism upon the question of divorce, but while the State grants divorces upon grounds other than adultery, nothing can compel the clergy to marry persons who have been separated for these reasons, and they can decline solemnizing the marriages of persons whom the civil magistrate or the less conscientious minister may unite.

The Office for Prayer in Families.—The forms of Morning and Evening Prayer to be used in families were composed for the Book of 1789 A.D.

They were probably suggested by the difficulty which many had in attending the daily service of the Church, and also by the fact that owing to the scarcity of clergymen and the changed habits of modern life but few churches were open daily.

Family Prayer has many reasons to commend its use. God is thus honored, the household is bound together more closely, and the members are trained in habits of devotion.

The simple services which are set forth in the Prayer-Book occupy each but a few minutes, but are very comprehensive.

After reading a portion of the Scriptures, the LORD'S Prayer is said, and then in the morning an acknowledgment is made of God's mercy in keeping us through the night, and we dedicate ourselves to Him anew, and grace is asked to guide and keep us through the day and to bless our work.

In the evening we confess our sins, ask grace to amend our lives, intercede for others, thank God for His goodness, and beg His protection for the night.

Offices to be used at Sea.—We derived our American Prayer-Book from the English Book, and as England is a great naval nation it is to be expected that provision would be made for services to be used upon her ships at sea. These forms were composed and adopted in 1661 A.D., and their author is probably Bishop Sanderson. There being no established Church in this country, and few of the government chaplains being ministers of our Church, these offices are comparatively seldom used in the navy as they are here set forth.

The first rubric directs that the Daily Morning and Evening Prayer shall be said, and then some special Collects are appointed for use in ships of war. These are followed by special prayers in time of a storm and before an engagement.

Some appropriate prayers for individuals when they cannot join with the others are given.

Special Prayers "with respect to the enemy," and "in respect of a storm," follow.

When the danger is very great, the direction is given that as many as can be assembled shall come together to confess their sins to God, and to hear the absolution which the Priest, if any be present, is to repeat.

Thanksgiving services are provided with their special Psalms and Collects, and the office ends with a modification of the Burial Office to suit an interment at sea.

In many American merchant vessels no provision whatever is made for holding services, and a sailor's life becomes one of peculiar deprivation of the means of grace,—not only so, but the temptations in port are of such a character that it is especially difficult for the seamen to live religiously.

The establishment of Seamen's Bethels in various ports, the distribution of Prayer-Books and religious literature, has of late enlisted the sympathy of many Churchmen, so that the disgrace of leaving those men so utterly unprovided with facilities of knowing the Gospel is to some slight extent removed, but the destitution is still most lamentable.

Office of Prayer and Thanksgiving for the Fruits of the Earth.—In the Preface to the Proposed Book of 1785 A.D. it is stated that "whereas it hath been the practice in the Church of England to set apart certain days of thanksgiving to ALMIGHTY GOD for signal mercies vouchsafed to the Church and nation, it hath best also been considered as conducive to godliness that there be two annual solemn days of prayer and thanksgiving to ALMIGHTY GOD set apart, viz., the fourth day of July, commemorative of the blessings of civil and religious liberty in the land wherein we live, and the first Thursday in November, for the fruits of the earth, in order that we may thereby be stirred up to a more particular remembrance of the signal mercies of God towards us; the neglect of which might otherwise be the occasion of licentiousness, civil miseries, and punishments."

When the Prayer-Book of 1789 A.D. was adopted this part of the Preface was omitted, as was also the service for the Fourth of July, but the Thanksgiving service was retained. Three additional sentences from Scripture were prefixed to the service as first set forth in the Proposed Book.

When proclamations calling upon the people to keep a day of Thanksgiving and Prayer are now issued by the civil authorities, the order for the observance of the first Thursday in November is of course modified to suit. Inasmuch, however, as the season is late when this fraternal Thanksgiving is appointed in some places, a Harvest Home Festival is celebrated earlier, usually at the close of the summer or early in the autumn. The origin of the formal united thanksgiving for the fruits of the earth is set forth in the first Lesson read on this day, Deut. viii., and it is in accordance with such scriptural precepts as 1 Thess. v. 18; Eph. v. 20.

The service appointed follows the order of the Morning Prayer, except that special sentences are read at the opening, the Venite gives place to appropriate jubilant verses from other Psalms; a special thanksgiving follows the General Thanksgiving, and a special Collect is given for the Communion.

Common usage on this day devotes the offerings to the relief of the poor, the sick in hospitals, and those who have been deprived of temporal blessings.

Office for the Visitation of Prisoners.—One main object to be attained by the detention of prisoners in jail is the reformation of their vicious lives, and hence the propriety of bringing to bear upon them the teachings of religion. In some of our large prisons chaplains are appointed, but in others all the religious instruction the prisoners receive is from the volunteer efforts of unofficial visitors.

When the Morning or Evening Prayer is used in a jail the 130th Psalm is substituted for the Venite, and special collects are provided.

A form for the visitation of a prisoner confined for some great or capital crime is given. It includes versicles, prayers, exhortations, and the like, with directions for the examination of the prisoner by the minister as to his repentance for sins and his being in charity with men. Especial admonitions are to be given him respecting the crimes of which he is charged, and he is to free his mind preparatory to the reception of the Communion. The purpose of this form of visitation is to bring the prisoner to repentance, confession, and amendment.

When the prisoner has been sentenced to death a form of visitation for one in his condition is provided, containing special prayers, exhortations, and examinations. Part of this form and the Commendatory Prayer may be used at the time of the execution. When the Communion is administered a special Collect, Epistle, and Gospel are appointed.

A curious form of prayer occurs at the end of this office, viz., a Prayer for Imprisoned Debtors, it once being the custom to imprison men for debt. The laws under this head being abolished, the prayer is now no longer used in this country. The sufferings of imprisoned debtors in old times appealed strongly to the sympathies of prayerful men, and hence this prayer.

This office is important as setting before the clergy their duty to visit the prisoner and him that is appointed unto death, and also for the clear statements of the Church's teaching. The exhortations are remarkably exact, and are full of suggestive truths which may well be pondered in other connections.

There is no such office in the English Prayer-Book. Part of it appears to have been taken from the Irish Prayer-Book, and part was composed by our American Fathers.

The Office for the Visitation of the Sick.—Our mother, the Church, follows her children with holy words and solemn rites throughout all the circumstances of their lives. Inasmuch as sickness makes up, or is likely to make up, part of our experience here, she has provided an Office for the Visitation of the Sick, which includes suitable prayers, exhortations, and Scriptures.

The office in its complete form is probably seldom used now, but it stands as a most instructive service, and suggests proper modes of ministering to those who are overcome by illness. Although the full office is now but seldom used, its prayers and exhortations, its responsive versicles, and its Scriptures are always ready for use as circumstances permit. The commendatory Prayer, the Prayer for all present, have become especially hallowed. The rubrics in this office are worthy of study, inasmuch as they set forth duties which are too often neglected. One of them requires that notice of sickness shall be given to the minister. Usually the minister has to find it out in some way for himself. Another requires the minister to examine the sick person as to his repentance and charity, and to exhort him to settle his temporal affairs.

With reference to the latter point, there is usually the utmost diffidence felt by the minister in speaking of making wills, paying debts, etc., and he prefers to fall back upon that other part of the rubric which declares that men while in health should be put in mind of the duty of settling their temporal affairs. Unfortunately, but few direct reminders are given to men in health about these matters.

This Visitation Office is particularly important as declaring the Church's Faith concerning what a proper preparation for death consists of. It emphasizes the need of repentance for sins and faith in the LORD JESUS, and declares with utmost solemnity that there is no other name under heaven given to man in whom and through whom health and salvation may be received.

The Visitation Office shows very clearly that the Church expects her ministers to aim at the spiritual profit of her children when they are visited, and also that just what is required at the commencement of a religious life is required at its close, viz., repentance, faith, and charity.

Office for the Communion of the Sick.—It ought to be considered a high duty and privilege to partake of the Communion while in health, and particularly when we are likely to be exposed to especial peril.

In the rubric before this office the Church reminds us of this fact, and warns us to be prepared always for death. To be a devout communicant is to be ready for death, inasmuch as no one can be a devout communicant unless he repent of sin, have a lively and steadfast faith in CHRIST, and be in charity with all men. Repentance, Faith, and Charity,—these are the needful prerequisites for a departure hence in peace and in the favor of God. When it is desirable to administer this Sacrament to a sick person there is a special order provided. Another rubric requires the administration to the sick person last. This is to prevent the spread of contagion, and for other good and sufficient reasons which are obvious.

The Collect used in this office gives us an idea of what a proper prayer for the sick is. It is not an absolute petition for his recovery, but if it be God's will. Patience is asked for, and, in the event of the sickness being unto death, that the departing soul may be made clean through the LORD JESUS. The Epistle and Gospel bring out the two truths that the sick person is in the hands of a loving LORD, and that eternal life is through His dear SON; but the general form of service is the same as that used in the church, some parts being omitted. There must usually be others present beside the minister and the sick person, and the presence of these others is stated in the old service-books to be "a singular great comfort to the sick person and a mark of their charity or good will towards him."

Provision is made by a special rubric for the comfort of a man in circumstances where it is impossible to administer this Sacrament to him. The minister is told to instruct him that he may eat and drink the Body and Blood of CHRIST profitably, although he do not receive the Sacrament with his mouth. If he repent of his sins, and firmly and thankfully believes in CHRIST and what He has done for him, he thus may receive CHRIST profitably to his soul's health.

REV. G. W. SHINN.

Ohio, Diocese of. That portion of the great Northwestern Territory which has become the great State of Ohio was, at the close of the last century, but little more than a wilderness.

In 1796 A.D. the estimated population of the entire Territory was fifteen thousand, including men, women, and children. Settlements were small, and Church services only occasionally held.

The first clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church who is known to have officiated in Ohio was the Rev. Joseph Doddridge, M.D. His home was upon the Virginia side of the Ohio River, but he gladly extended his Christian labors into the new territory beyond.

Dr. Doddridge was the first Christian minister who officiated in what is now the city of Steubenville. It was in May, 1796 A.D. Services were held in an upper room, reached by log steps on the outside of the building. In the year 1800 A.D., Dr. Doddridge commenced forming a congregation in what is now Jefferson County. So far as is known, this was the earliest attempt at Church organization.

In the year 1804 A.D. fifty-six persons in Worthington formed themselves into a religious society, by the name of "St. John's Church in Worthington and parts adjacent," expressing their agreement in the faith, worship, and doctrines of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and beginning preparations for the establishment of Church services.

In the year 1809 A.D. certain inhabitants in the towns of Boardman, Canfield, and Poland, in Trumbull County, met, organized a "regular Episcopal Society," and sought incorporation and counsel from the Bishop of New York. They also made an effort to secure the services of a clergyman. In September, 1814 A.D., they were visited by the Rev. Jackson Kemper, afterwards Bishop Kemper, then acting as missionary from the Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church for the Advancement of Christianity in Pennsylvania. During his visit Mr. Kemper baptized twenty-nine persons.

In other places throughout the State many Churchmen remembered the Church of their fathers, and maintained its services by lay-reading. Bishop Wilberforce, of England, in his history of the American Church, pays a deserved tribute to these faithful pioneers, making special mention of the work of Mr. Samuel Gunn, the founder of the Church in Portsmouth.

The earliest organized parishes in Ohio were St. James', Cross Creek; St. Thomas', St. Clairsville; St. Peter's, Morristown; St. James', Zanesville,—all formed under the ministry of Dr. Doddridge in 1816 A.D. At the head of the roll of the clergy who have labored in Ohio must be placed the name of the Rev. Joseph Doddridge, M.D.

After him comes the Rev. Roger Searle, who in January, 1817 A.D., left a well-established parish in Connecticut that he might seek for CHRIST'S sheep that were scattered abroad. He gave as his reasons for journeying to Ohio,—

1st. Its increasing population, in 1800 A.D. 45,000, in 1817 A.D. 400,000,—a population with the best elements of strength.

2d. It was represented to him that as many as one-eighth of this number had been trained as Episcopalians.

3d. Many of them were from Connecticut, and personally well known to him.

4th. He was an elected member of the General Convention soon to assemble. He might visit this missionary field, study its needs, and report to the governing body of the Church.

Mr. Searle reached Ohio on the morning of the 16th of February. At the line he knelt and offered a fervent prayer. His first visit was to Ashtabula, where he organized St. Peter's Church. He afterwards organized successively Trinity, Cleveland; St. John's, Liverpool; St. Mark's, Columbia; St. Paul's, Medina; St. Luke's, Ravenna; St. James', Boardman.

While Mr. Searle was thus officiating in Ohio, the mind of another clergyman was earnestly turned towards the great Western field.

Philander Chase was then Rector of Christ Church, Hartford. Many men would have remained at ease in such a position. But Philander Chase was of heroic mould, and besides, he felt within him the call of the DIVINE SPIRIT to push towards the regions beyond. He left Hartford on the 2d of March, 1817 A.D., and two weeks later preached his first sermon in Ohio, at Conneaut Creek, now the town of Salem. At Windsor he organized Christ Church, and there he met the Rev. Mr. Searle and some prominent laymen, who were connected with the Church throughout the Western Reserve. It was agreed that a Convention of all the parishes in Ohio should be held in Worthington during the following January.

Both Mr. Searle and Mr. Chase then journeyed throughout the State, laboring to do their Master's work.

Mr. Searle reported to the General Convention, which met in New York in May, what he had seen and heard of the Church "in the West." It was received as most gratifying intelligence, and measures were adopted looking "to the speedy organization of the Church, as well as to the sending of missionaries to the Western country." Dr. Horace Reed, of Zanesville, was admitted to an honorary seat in this General Convention.

The Primary Convention of the Church in Ohio was held in January, 1818 A.D., at the house of Dr. Goodale, in Columbus. This Convention adopted a Constitution for the government of the Church in Ohio, signified its union with the Church in the United States, and, having appointed a committee upon the support of the Episcopate, adjourned to meet in Worthington in June.

On the 3d of June, 1818 A.D., was held the first Annual Convention of the Church in Ohio. Four Ohio clergymen were present, and laymen representing ten parishes. Rev. Dr. Doddridge was also present. The chief matter transacted by the Convention was the election of the Rev. Philander Chase as Bishop. He was afterwards consecrated on the 11th of February, 1819 A.D., in St. James' Church, Philadelphia, by Bishop White, assisted by Bishops Hobart, Kemp, and Croes.

Bishop Chase remained Bishop of Ohio for more than twelve years. During his administration the clergy list increased from four to sixteen. The growth in the number and strength of the parishes was correspondingly great.

The chief work of Bishop Chase's administration was the establishment of the Theological Seminary of the Diocese of Ohio and Kenyon College. It was strongly felt that "sons of the soil" were needed for Western work. Men sent to the East for training were likely to linger there. Besides, it was thought that men trained at home would do better work. After various efforts of one kind and another, Bishop Chase determined to ask aid from the mother Church of England. He was opposed by influences in the American Church which were commanding, but he was resolute; he fought a hard battle and finally won the day. Subscriptions were received from hundreds of men and women, aggregating in all nearly thirty thousand dollars.

Eight thousand acres of land were bought in Knox County, in the midst of a well-nigh untrodden forest. For a time the students lived in log houses, and the institution owned two mills, a printing-office, a hotel, a carpenter's and a shoemaker's shop, with houses for professors and for workmen to dwell in. It was a monopoly, and carried on business of various kinds. The pioneer Bishop's first resources were soon exhausted. But he tried again. He first petitioned Congress for a grant of land, and spent a winter in Washington "lobbying." His bill passed the United States Senate, but was not reached by the lower house. Then he be thought himself of a small sum from many friends, and asked for one dollar each. The request was then a novel one, and brought success.

Through Mrs. Chase's wisdom and efficiency, and Bishop Chase's untiring labors, Kenyon College was for a time very prosperous. There was a strong corps of professors, headed by Dr. William Sparrow, and more students than could be well accommodated. But troubles came. Bishop Chase had dreamed of a patriarchal institution.

"Kenyon College," he wrote at the time, "is like other colleges in some respects, and unlike all in many other respects. The fundamental principle in which it differs from all others is, that the whole institution is patriarchal. Like Abraham on the plains of Mamre, it hath pitched its tent under the trees of Gambier hill, it hath its flocks and its herds, and its different families of teachers, scholars, mechanics, and laborers, all united under one head, pursuing one common interest, and receiving their maintenance and food from one common source, the funds and farms of the college." The picture, it must be confessed, is not without its beauties, though the coloring is certainly more Occidental than Oriental.

Accurately drawn, it would have shown Western workmen ready to cry "independence," a Western faculty to question the limits of authority, and Western Young America to cheer them on. Pecuniary troubles added to the embarrassments of the situation. So, on the 9th of September, 1831 A.D., Bishop Chase resigned the Presidency of the college and the Episcopate of Ohio. The next day he mounted "Cincinnati," and rode sorrowfully away, and Gambier saw his face no more. He was afterwards elected Bishop of Illinois, and died at "Robin's Nest," where he had founded Jubilee College.

Bishop Chase has been well described as "that toilsome, way-worn soldier of the Cross who was perpetually laboring while others entered into his labor, who was incessantly sowing while others reaped the fruits of his toil, who was ever moving Westward with the wave of emigration, having nowhere at times to lay his head, no rest for the soles of his feet. But he knew when he commenced his work what were the wages of a Christian hero, and that he looked for, that he reaped in rich abundance."

When he died, the language adopted by the Convention of Ohio was this: "Whatever alienation once existed on the part of the Convention of this Diocese from that great and good man has long since passed away, and we believe that throughout the Diocese of Ohio but one feeling is prevalent, and that is, reverence for his memory."

Charles Pettit McIlvaine was elected the second Bishop of Ohio, and was consecrated in St. Paul's Church, New York, on the 31st of October, 1832 A.D.

Bishop McIlvaine remained Bishop of Ohio for more than forty years. He died March 12, 1873 A.D.

For some years he acted as President of the Theological Seminary and Kenyon College. He lived indeed in Gambier till 1846 A.D., when he removed to Clifton, Cincinnati.

During the early years of his administration the growth of the Diocese was rapid. In five years the number of the clergy increased from 17 to 53. At the time of his death the number had risen to 108. The list of communicants grew from 900 to 10,000. The yearly charities of the Diocese, as reported, increased from $770 to $205,000.

In 1859 A.D. the health of Bishop McIlvaine had become so impaired that it was deemed wise to elect an Assistant Bishop. With great unanimity the choice fell upon the Rev. Gregory Thurston Bedell, D.D., then Rector of the Church of the Ascension, New York. He was consecrated in St. Paul's Church, Richmond, Va., on the 13th of October, 1859 A.D. For thirteen years he continued to labor with Bishop McIlvaine "harmoniously, easily, lovingly, without a jar or jealousy."

He too girded on his armor to labor for the Theological Seminary and Kenyon College. In addition to more than a hundred thousand dollars obtained by him for the endowment of professorships, he was enabled to build (through the generosity of his former parishioners in New York, aided by his own never-failing benefactions and those of Mrs. Bedell) the Church of the Holy Spirit, which is one of the most beautiful and attractive churches ever erected to the glory of God. The lover of art might well make a pilgrimage to Gambier for the sole purpose of beholding this "poem in stone and mortar," this temple that tells of the worship of the living God.

In 1874 A.D. the Diocese of Ohio was divided, Bishop Bedell electing the northern half of the State, which retains the old name of the Diocese of Ohio. The division has been a blessing. For ten years now Bishop Bedell has gently led his flock as sole Diocesan. The gray hairs have come to him, but his influence for good increases as the years go by. His step is still vigorous. May he continue for many years to tell the story which he knows so well how to tell with magic power, of the love of CHRIST, and to illustrate by his life the sanctifying power of the HOLY SPIRIT.

REV. WM. B. BODINE, D.D.

Oratory. It was used to mean a stool, and also a shrine of costly materials, in which were placed relics of saints, but chiefly and now principally it means a small chapel attached to some house, as either a Church, or a Monastery, or a Hospital, or a College, in which services were held for convenience or other cause.

Orders, or more generally Holy Orders, is the term used to designate the three classes of the Ministry of the Church collectively, and the character conferred by Ordination, or the Laying on of Hands. Three Orders of Ministers are recognized in the Church, viz., Bishops, Priests or Presbyters, and Deacons. These are men set apart and authorized to minister holy things, in the functions of their respective degrees, by the laying on of the hands of the Bishop with prayer, Priests uniting with him in the act in the case of Ordination to the Priesthood. A Deacon is said to be "in Orders;" when advanced to the Priesthood he is "in full Orders." A Bishop is a priest "consecrated" to the highest degree, and invested with authority to transmit Orders to others, and to bear rule over other ordered men within an assigned jurisdiction. The authority of Orders is derived through the Bishop in unbroken official succession from the Apostles, and it can be derived in no other way. Because no man can have authority to minister divine things except by receiving it from some one himself authorized to confer such authority. But the only source of such authorization must be CHRIST, the Divine Founder of the Church. Hence no such authority can exist unless miraculously conferred, or derived in unbroken series from CHRIST Himself. The fact of such unbroken succession through the Bishops is abundantly proven by the historic records of the Church. The character conferred by Orders is indelible. An ordained man may be deprived for cause and by due process of law of the right to exercise the functions of his ministry, either irrevocably by deposition, or temporarily by suspension; but if restored to that right, he may not be re-ordained, having never lost the character impressed upon him. In England no ordered man may sit in the House of Commons, and in some of the United States, as Maryland, no "Minister of the Gospel" is eligible to the General Assembly. The functions bestowed by Orders vary with each degree, but are progressive. Thus a Deacon may minister in public worship and in pastoral duties. He may baptize, bury the dead, and celebrate matrimony; but he may not preach, unless specially licensed by the Bishop to do so, and he may not even by license pronounce the benediction or consecrate the elements in the LORD's Supper. A Priest may do all these things, and have the cure of souls by virtue of his Orders. A Bishop may exercise all the functions of the Priesthood, and in addition may administer the Laying on of Hands in Confirmation and Ordination. The method of conferring Holy Orders is that instituted and practiced by the Apostles (Acts xiii. 2, 3; 1 Tim. iv. 14, v. 22; 2 Tim. i. 6; Heb. vi. 2), and used uninterruptedly by the Church since their day. In the Greek and Roman Churches Orders is ranked among the Sacraments, but in Churches of the Anglican Communion that term is restricted to Baptism and the LORD's Supper, the definition of the Catechism excluding Orders which possess no "outward and visible," i.e., material, "sign," as water, bread, or wine, of the "inward and spiritual grace" conveyed, and which lack scriptural record of having been "ordained by CHRIST Himself."

What are known as the "Minor Orders" in the Greek and Roman Churches are not esteemed by them as "Holy Orders," and are not in use in any Churches of the Anglican Communion. It should be noted that the various offices held by Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, such as Cardinals, Archbishops, Archdeacons, Deans, etc., are not to be regarded as Orders of the Ministry, but only as official distinctions belonging to different forms of ecclesiastical administration. It should also be observed that the three Orders as found in the Apostolic Church were Apostles, Presbyters, and Deacons, the term "Episcopus" or Bishop being applied in the New Testament to Presbyters or Elders. In the post-Apostolic Church the same Orders have been maintained, but the term Apostle fell early into disuse, and the term Bishop was transferred from the second to the first degree. In reminding Timothy of his ordination, St. Paul says, "Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery" (1 Tim. iv. 14), but in 2 Tim. i. 6, he adds, "I put thee in remembrance that thou stir up the gift of God which is in thee by the putting on of my hands." This is exactly the custom of the Church in conferring Orders. St. Paul was miraculously called to the Apostolate, and preached for years before the other Apostles received him. But he and Barnabas are not called Apostles until they had been separated for the work by the laying on of hands (Acts xiii. 2, 3; xiv. 14).

Ordinances of the Church are not only those Rites and Sacraments which are of Divine obligation, but are also those greater rules and disciplinary matters which are by the appointment of the Church herself. The Liturgy is in use by an ordinance of the Church. Feasts, Fasts, and Order of Services, morning and evening, are ordinances. The Sunday was substituted for the Jewish Sabbath, and the holy observance of the day was and is by an ordinance of the Church. But their obligation is not as clearly felt as it should be. As the Church acts in her collective capacity under the guidance of the HOLY GHOST, her ordinances are needful corollaries drawn from the essential propositions of the Faith in the Creeds, and are for the easier and more fruitful use of these greater Sacraments and Sacramental rites which are of direct Divine institution. Our CREATOR did not disdain to dictate for the chosen people a minute ritual. Without needing to claim for such minutiae, in the Church, the like observance, yet she must claim of every member a due obedience for his own sake of her broader ordinances.

Ordinary. The Bishop of the Diocese. The term ordinary, "ordinarius (which is a word we have received from the civil law), is he who hath the proper and regular jurisdiction, as of course and of common right, in opposition to persons who are extraordinarily appointed." The Bishop is called the ordinary, "and so he is at common law, as having ordinary jurisdiction in causes ecclesiastical; albeit, in a more general acceptation the word ordinary signifieth any judge authorized to take cognizance of causes in his own proper right, as he is a magistrate, and not by way of deputation or delegation." (Burn's Eccl. Law, sub voc., vol. ii. p. 39.)

Ordination. Part of this subject has been discussed under ORDERS (which see). But there are one or two points with reference to the three Orders which it may be proper to discuss here. It is a state to which a man is advanced by his ordination, and in one sense an irrevocable step. For it is an act done in God's name in His behalf. Now, since it is in His name and by His power committed to the Church, it confers a rank and a jurisdiction which cannot be revoked by any one less than GOD, as in Baptism, it is CHRIST who is the baptizer, the minister being His agent; and so none but CHRIST, at the last day, can deprive us of our birth-right, though our mother, the Church, can discipline us. So, though the exercise of the powers conferred by ordination can be resigned by him, or they can be restrained or prevented by the discipline of the Church, whether acting justly or unjustly, still the ordination itself and its powers can never be annulled and the man revert to his lay estate. He may act as a layman and live in that estate, and be prevented from doing his office, but he is not a layman really. Again, the three Orders of Bishop, Priest, and Deacon are distinct orders. The Bishop's office contains all others and retains as solely its own Ordination, Confirmation, and Jurisdiction,—this latter can be delegated to lower officials, not so of the other two. The Bishop commits to the Order of the Priesthood the power to celebrate the LORD'S Supper, Absolution, and Benediction, with power, if so commissioned, to exercise special or extraordinary jurisdiction. The Diaconate receives the power to Baptize and to minister to the Priest in the divine service and at the Holy Communion, and to take a care in Parish work. The authority to preach is official in the Bishop, and committed by him, as a usual part of his jurisdiction, to the Priest, and specially trusted to the Deacon by license. But all of these several divisions of the stewardship committed to the Apostolate are by the grace of God for the gifts and graces to be conveyed to the people in the Covenant of Baptism. Ordination is, then, itself an indelible character; it is a grace from God in itself, and it is to authorize men to be the conveyers of His Graces to the Elect, and to be the Embassadors for our reconciliation to God. While, therefore, Ordination is not at all a Sacrament, it has a sacramental grace in it.

Oregon, Missionary Jurisdiction of. The following account of the history of the Church in Oregon is drawn from the excellent report of Rev. Mr. Sellwood to the Centennial Commissioners in 1876 A.D. It was kindly furnished by Bishop Morris. This general acknowledgment of authority will be deemed sufficient.

The first Episcopal clergyman who visited Oregon was Rev. St. M. Fackler, who in 1847 A.D. went there in search of health. The first Church services recorded were held by him in Oregon City in 1848 A.D., at the house of Mr. McKinlay. He found a few members of the Church there desirous of services, but, as his health was poor, he did not attempt to organize a parish. In 1851 A.D., Rev. William Richmond, of the Diocese of New York, was appointed by the Board of Domestic Missions the first Missionary to Oregon.

Mr. Richmond reached Portland on May 11, 1851 A.D. His first service was held in the Methodist house of worship. He was assisted by Mr. Fackler, and baptized the infant daughter of that clergyman. Portland and Oregon City were chosen for central work, while Columbia City, the Dalles, Milwaukee, and Salem were selected as Mission stations. The Rev. Mr. Fackler's health improved, and he was appointed a Missionary. The newness of the country and the hardships to be endured are displayed in the following extract of a letter written by Mr. Richmond: "I occupy a room in a shanty, merely clapboards, quite open to the air, with a rough, unplanned, ungrooved floor; no carpets, no plastering, no ceiling. For this I pay twelve dollars a month, three dollars (fifteen was the price) having been deducted by the landlord on account of my Mission. I also do my own cooking, and gather my own wood out of the forest behind me, and yet my expenses will be as great as in a good boarding-house in New York."

In the fall of 1852 A.D., Rev. Jas. A. Woodward, of Pennsylvania, going to Oregon for health, was quite restored. He, by the courtesy of the Congregationalists, used their building for services in Oregon City till a room was prepared.

In 1853 A.D., Rev. Jno. McCarty, D.D., came as chaplain in the army to Fort Vancouver, Washington Territory. He took charge of Trinity Church, Portland.

The clergy and laity, at a meeting, requested a Missionary Bishop for Oregon and Washington, and the General Convention elected Rev. Thos. Fielding Scott, of Georgia, to that office. He was consecrated June 8, 1854 A.D. Bishop Scott was occupied from February 19 to April 22 in going from New York to Portland. A Convocation was held, when the Bishop, Dr. McCarty, Rev. Mr. Fackler, and lay delegates from Portland, Oregon City, and Champoege were present. On September 24, Trinity Church, Portland, was consecrated. This was the first church consecrated in Oregon, but St. John's, Milwaukee, was the first Church building.

The Bishop was encouraged by the admission of Mr. Jas. L. Daly as a candidate for Holy Orders.

In 1855 A.D. churches were consecrated at Milwaukee and Salem. In the fall Rev. Johnstone McCormac reached the field.

In 1856 A.D., Rev. John and Rev. Jas. R. W. Sellwood promised to engage in mission work, but John Sellwood was wounded in a massacre at Panama, so that he could not enter upon work at once. This year a boys' boarding-school was opened at Oswego, under Mr. Bernard Cornelius, nearly seventy acres of land, with a house, beautifully located on the Willamette River, having been bought for the purpose.

The ordination of Mr. Daly increased the clerical force this year, a gain being made of two Deacons and one Presbyterian.

Bishop Scott's work is compared by Mr. Sellwood to that of the officers of an army, who should see the depredations of Indians and yet have no men to station at needed posts. The Bishop says, "Since my return I have been continually on the tramp,—calling occasionally to spend a few days with my wife; northward to Vancouver's Island, and southward nearly to the head of the Willamette Valley; eastward to the Dalles, and westward to the Pacific. And yet, alas! in all this how little have I done! I can say little else of each point than veni, vidi, discessi. Were there a faithful clergyman at each point thus visited how different were the work, how different were the fruit, how different the retrospection!"

In 1859 A.D. St. Mary's Church, Eugene City, was consecrated.

In 1860 A.D. the Bishop was cheered by the arrival of five clergymen, viz., Rev. Messrs. Carlton P. Maples, T. A. Hyland, D. E. Willes, W. F. B. Jackson, and P. E. Hyland. Two, however, soon returned East, and one went to Washington Territory.

In 1861 A.D. the Bishop opened a school for girls at Spencer Hall, Milwaukee. It received a good patronage. This year the first number of the Oregon Churchman appeared. It was a monthly.

In 1862 A.D., John W. Sellwood was ordained Deacon. The Mission this year cheered the Bishop, as the parishes, schools, and Church paper seemed to promise growth.

In 1863 A.D. St. Stephen's Chapel, Portland, was opened, giving two places for Church services in that town.

In 1865 A.D., Rev. Messrs. Roberts and Stoy arrived, and the Bishop was encouraged by the ordination of Rev. John W. Sellwood to the Priesthood, as he was the first fruit of efforts to raise up men on the soil for missionary work.

In 1866 A.D. the Bishop was much discouraged by the closing of the Diocesan schools. He began to wish that some younger man should be appointed to the charge of his Mission field. In 1867 A.D. the Convocation met in Portland preparatory to the Bishop's return East for his wife's health, which was precarious. His address proved to be a farewell one. He detailed his thirteen years of toilsome labor for CHRIST and His holy Church. He says, "At no time have there been more than ten engaged in the work." Twelve churches had been set apart for sacred use, though one was not quite finished. They were free from debt. The greater part of those confirmed by the Bishop had removed to other parts of the country. "Shortly after Convocation the Bishop left for the East, and had only been in New York three days when he was called home to enter upon that rest which remaineth for all the people of God. When the sad intelligence of his death flashed across the wires it produced a feeling of deepest sadness, not only over the whole Church, but also over the whole State. His genial manners, and his marked ability as a preacher, won for him the affection and commanded the respect of all who had ever heard him preach, or been personally acquainted with him, so that not only did his children in the Church weep at the loss of their Reverend Father in God, but also all who had ever known him."

Oregon struggled on without a Bishop until the Rt. Rev. B. Wistar Morris, D.D., of St. Luke's Church, Germantown, Phila., arrived to take up the work, in June, 1869 A.D. His friend and companion in the Diocese of Pennsylvania, Rev. C. R. Bonnell, preceded him, and took charge of the Church at Salem. The coming of Bishop Morris marks a new era. In addition to a hearty zeal he is possessed of a sound common sense, and has business qualifications which lead men to follow his plans, believing that every dollar given will do its exact and appropriated work, if the Bishop can possibly make it do it. A school for girls was immediately planned by this wise master-builder. He was familiar with Bishop Doane's plans, as carried out in St. Mary's Hall, Burlington, N. J., and was accompanied by those who were also familiar with that school, and so its counterpart arose in St. Helen's Hall. Nearly a block of land was purchased in Portland for the school, and it opened with fifty pupils. In 1870 A.D. it was enlarged, and had one hundred and twenty pupils.

The Bishop at once began those journeyings of visitation and exploration which he has so faithfully continued.

In 1870 A.D. the Bishop Scott Grammar and Divinity School was opened as a boys' boarding-school with forty-six pupils. A large tract of land, beautifully situated, was secured for this purpose in the Couch addition to Portland. This year a church was commenced in East Portland, and a church and school at Corvallis commenced and nearly completed. Rev. John Rosenberg was added to the mission staff this year. Lots were obtained for the erection of churches. The Convocation of 1871 A.D. notes that the Oregon Churchman was revived as a monthly, and that there were many marks of improvement in the parishes. Two clergymen had been added to the clerical list.

In 1872 A.D., Rev. R. D. Nevins, D.D., and Rev. John H. Babcock arrived in Oregon. Trinity Parish, Portland, built a handsome new church, the Bishop Scott Grammar School was enlarged, and a Chinese school was opened in Portland. In 1873 A.D. there is a note of encouragement in the number confirmed, especially in Eastern Oregon, where the field was white for the harvest. At La Grande, Baker City, Union, and the Cove services were held at intervals by Rev. Mr. Wells, of Walla Walla. In 1874 A.D. two clergy were added.

The corner-stones of five churches were laid, and ground broke for two others. The Bishop bought ground in Portland for the Good Samaritan Hospital and Orphanage. On Ascension-Day its corner-stone was laid.

In 1874 A.D. the people offered to God $20,010.80. In 1875 A.D. the hospital and orphanage was formally opened. Six children had been previously admitted, and within twenty-four hours after its opening a patient was received into the hospital department. Mr. George Boyd was Superintendent, and Mrs. Cornelius Matron.

The Sunday-school has been found a valuable help in Church advancement in Oregon, and Women's Guilds have done much good.

In Bishop Morris's report for 1883 A.D., we find that sixteen clergy are under his care. The Bishop's visitations disclose new Church families to be cared for, and he endeavors to exercise a sort of parochial oversight over those who, in their dispersion, are still without settled rectors, and yet who show by their offerings their interest in the Church. A church building has been secured in Oakland, and St. Paul's, Salem, and the Church of the Redeemer, Pendleton; and St. David's, East Portland, have been enlarged. Rectories have been built at St. Matthew's, Portland, and at La Grande, and one has been purchased at Canyon City. There are fourteen rectories. Lots for a church have been donated in Sellwood, a district of Portland. The Episcopal residence is valued, with the adjoining ground, at $20,000. There is a small Episcopal fund. Samuel G. French lately bequeathed a beautiful property of one hundred acres for a girls' school, which the Bishop styles the Cove School, from its situation on a cove. St. Helen's Hall and the Bishop Scott School proper have had, together, in the past year two hundred and thirty-one pupils. Pupils have been received from Connecticut, British Columbia, and Honolulu. The Bishop considers the schools "the right arm" of his work. St. Helen's Hall has purchased a large block of ground for new buildings. The Bishop Scott School needs aid sadly on account of expensive street improvements made and contemplated. The Good Samaritan Hospital has cared for two hundred and sixty-five patients, and needs a women's and children's ward. Contributions of the Diocese reported to the Convocation, $25,244; communicants, 800.

The development of Oregon makes new demands on the Church at large. The Northern Pacific Railroad has taken much Eastern money for worldly purposes, the East should make it a highway for God by sending over it Bibles, Prayer-Books, Missionaries, and rich contributions to the Western Church. The advance in Church life under the present hard-working Bishop is shown in the fact that the report states that the number of clergy in Oregon alone is only one less than "the largest number ever reported when Oregon and Washington Territory made one jurisdiction." The work is, however, yet a scattered one, as is indicated by the fact that the Rev. Reese P. Kendall's ministrations extend for a distance of over sixty miles. In considering the lumber, coal, and grain interests of Oregon, it may be well to remember that this magnificent country was saved to the United States, when England was about to purchase it of our Government, by the heroic self-denial and fatiguing journey of the missionary Whitman, who, by returning to the East, succeeded in informing those in power that the district was too valuable to be lost. Let us honor this man, though he was not of our body, for showing even business men the value of missions. This narrative naturally notes the work of Bishops as leaders, but they would be the first to say that the history could never have been written had it not been for the constant help of faithful missionaries. Their deeds are recorded in Heaven.

Statistics.—Clergy, 18; missions, 28; communicants, 889; Sunday-school scholars, 954; confirmed, 68; adults baptized, 30; infants baptized, 172; contributions, $25,-224.27.

REV. S. F. HOTCHKIN.

Organizations in the Church. It is needless here to point out the need of co-operation and thorough organization to accomplish any purpose which may claim the energy and work of more than a single mind. Skill, thoroughness, and adaptability or flexibility in the plan of organization are as necessary as persistent, zealous labor in a given cause. In the Catholicity of the Church there is warrant for the widest scope for the full play of all aims in harmony with the broad lines of her fundamental polity,—no petty narrowness or restraint within the bounds of loyalty to the Faith, the Government, and Discipline of the Church. She must, to be really all things to all men, be ready to use all the varied energies of the men for whose sake she was founded, and to whom she ministers. So organizations apparently clashing, really representing those schools of thought which must be side by side in her borders, are to be found in the Church. The ancient Templum of the old divination was the open sky, meted out in its several parts by arbitrary mystic lines; in the spiritual Templum the metes and bounds may have different aspects, but they are in the beams of the sun of righteousness, and those who seek to work in one quarter, may be as much guided by the LORD of true Liberty, who wills that all should be in the sweetness and light and glory of a holy order, as those who work in another. The organizations which are sketched below are placed more as representatives than from any arbitrary selection, and certainly no invidious choice has led to the omission of other organizations quite as equally deserving of a place here.

The American Church Missionary Society was organized by Bishops, other Clergy, and Laity of the Church, May 9, 1860 A.D., and incorporated April 13, 1861 A.D. In the words of its constitution, "The object of this Society shall be to extend and build up the Kingdom of our LORD JESUS CHRIST in accordance with the principles and doctrines of the Protestant Episcopal Church." Its plan of organization is the same as that of the Church Missionary Society of the English Church, and known as "The Voluntary Principle." Its work is a national one, embracing the Missionary Jurisdictions and many of the Dioceses of the Church. It has been largely instrumental in aiding the formation of such missionary fields as Kansas, Iowa, Nevada, Colorado, Minnesota, and Dakota.

One of its ablest advocates, the late Rev. Dr. John Cotton Smith, thus presented its special mission: "The real purpose and object of this Society is not to preach the gospel upon the basis of the principles of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the broad acceptance of these terms, according to the understanding which any one may have of their meaning, but it is to preach the gospel in what is known as the evangelical understanding of it, upon the basis of the moderate and liberal principles of our Church; this is the object of this Society, and the only reason of its being."

In addition to its work of Domestic Missions, it has founded the work in Hayti, and for five years sustained that in Mexico, sending to the latter country more than $85,000. During the twenty-three years of its history it has sustained hundreds of missionaries, built churches in very many places in the West and South, and expended more than half a million of dollars. It is also the trustee of large amounts intended to promote, in perpetuity, the evangelical interests of the Church in colleges, missionary foundations, and special parish work. Its President is always a layman.

WILLIAM A. NEWBOLD,

General Secretary.

The New York Bible and Common Prayer-Book Society was organized in the city of New York in the year 1809 A.D., and from that date to the present time has been engaged in the circulation of Bibles and Prayer-Books.

It now distributes yearly from 40 to 50,000 volumes, valued at from $7000 to $8000. Its income is from interest on invested funds, church collections, and individual donations. The aim of the Society is mainly to furnish Prayer-Books to Missionary Stations scattered throughout the United States. Thus far its work has been found most useful and beneficial, and its importance most generally acknowledged. Without an agency of this kind the growth of the Church would be much retarded.

The Protestant Episcopal Tract Society is an institution in the city of New York organized for the purpose of distributing Church books and tracts. Its means are limited. Its publications are confined to those relating to the distinctive teaching of the Episcopal Church.

It distributes yearly from 700,000 to 1,000,000 pages of tracts. JAS. POTT.

The Protestant Episcopal Society for the Promotion of Evangelical Knowledge.—This Society was organized in the city of New York during the sessions of the General Convention in 1847 A.D. The occasion of its organization was the prevalence of opinions and teachings in the Episcopal Church which were regarded by many as unscriptural, and hostile to the acknowledged standard of said Church and opposed to its best interests. What was popularly known as the Oxford or Tractarian movement in the Church of England was quickly and widely felt in this country, and awakened no little anxiety on the part of many of the Bishops, Clergy, and Laity. To counteract what were considered the Romeward and dangerous tendencies of this movement the Society was established. It was at first located in the city of Philadelphia, and was under the management of a President, Vice-Presidents, Board of Directors, Executive Committee, Secretary, and Treasurer. The Rt. Rev. Bishop Meade, of Virginia, was its first President. Among its Vice-Presidents were Bishops Smith, of Kentucky, McIlvaine, of Ohio, Elliott, of Georgia, Eastburn, of Massachusetts, Lee, of Delaware, Johns, of Virginia, and several other Bishops. A few years later the Society was removed to the city of New York and located at the Bible House. The Rev. John S. Stone, D.D., was its first Editor and General Secretary. He was succeeded by the Rev. C. W. Andrews, D.D., of Virginia. When the war broke up the relations between the North and the South, the Rev. H. Dyer, D.D., who had been for some time the Corresponding Secretary and General Agent, was made the Editor and General Manager of the Society affairs. The chief work of the Society was the preparation and distribution of books, tracts, and periodicals bearing upon the issues agitating the Church. The growth of the Society was rapid and remarkable. Commencing with nothing, it soon had quite an extensive catalogue of its own and selected publications, suited to parochial, Sunday-school, and family use. Within a few years it had an income from the sale of publications, and from contributions, of from forty to fifty thousand dollars a year. It was not long before its own publications amounted to some six hundred in number. Many of them were good-sized volumes. It published and widely circulated the Parish Visitor, designed for use in parishes and families, and The Standard Bearer for Sunday-schools.

The Society is still doing an important work. Upon the death of Bishop Meade, its first President, Bishop McIlvaine, of Ohio, was elected as his successor, and upon the death of the Bishop of Ohio, the Bishop of Delaware, the Rt. Rev. Alfred Lee, D.D., was elected to the office.

REV. H. DYER, D.D.

Bishop White Prayer-Book Society.—This Society has just completed its fiftieth anniversary. The history of its establishment in brief is as follows: "The Rt. Rev. J. H. Otey, D.D., having been invited by the Executive Committee of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church to make some statements relative to the condition and prospects of the Church in Tennessee, a meeting was held for that purpose in St. James' Church on the evening of his consecration, January 14, 1834 A.D. Among the remarks to which his statement gave rise, the importance of a Prayer-Book as a means of promoting the cause of religion and the Church was adverted to, and the Rev. Dr. Delancy made some observations on the good which might be effected by a Society for its distribution as a tract. The Rev. Dr. Bedell expressed himself as much pleased with the idea, which, he said, had not before occurred to him, and it was very favorably received by all present." It so happened that four laymen occupied a pew in a remote part of the church, and to each of them the thought suggested itself that he would make an effort for the foundation of a Society. When the services were over they were pleased to find that a common spirit animated them all, and on the 6th of February, 1834 A.D., the preparatory steps having been taken, a meeting was held at the house of Mr. W. H. Newbold, to whom the society is chiefly indebted for its formation, when the following persons were present: "the Rt. Rev. Bishop Onderdonk, Rev. Messrs. Boyd, James, and Morton, Messrs. William Musgrave, James M. Aertsen, John Welsh, William H. Wayne, W. H. Newbold, and Dr. S. Littell.* On the 13th of February another meeting was held, at which the work previously begun was completed, and on the 18th of February, 1834 A.D., a public meeting was held in Christ Church, Bishop White presiding, with Bishops Onderdonk and Doane in the chancel, when the Society was organized. James S. Smith, Esq., Chairman of the Committee, presented and read the Constitution, and when he read the title, "The Bishop White Prayer-Book Society," Bishop White, in an audible and somewhat excited voice, exclaimed, "No, no, no!" but the audience were unmoved by his protest, and the name of that eminent and revered father of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States was then given to the Society, and in these days so given to changes the hope may be expressed that it will ever continue to be known by it. The Society has during these fifty years distributed a total of 328,631 Prayer-Books and 65,665 Hymn-

* Extracted from the records of Mr. Jas. M. Aertsen.

als. The total receipts into the Treasury have been $100,322.02. What the Society will do in the next half-century is known only to Him alone in whose service it is engaged. We can only utter the prayer that its humble work may be blessed, and that its usefulness may be increased with each passing year. (From the Fiftieth Annual Report of the Society.)

The Evangelical Educational Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church was organized in the City of Philadelphia by Bishop Alonzo Potter, November 3, 1862 A.D., as The Divinity Students' Aid Society.

It was at first Diocesan, but subsequently made general, and incorporated November 1, 1869 A.D., under its present name. It is governed by a Board of Managers, consisting of President, Secretary, Treasurer, and twenty-two other gentlemen, who represent the Church in different sections of the country, and are elected annually at the public meeting of the Society, which consists of those who have contributed to its treasury within the year. During the twenty-one years of the Society's work it has raised directly over five hundred thousand dollars to aid young men who are preparing for the ministry of the Episcopal Church, and a very large additional sum for the endowment of theological seminaries, colleges, and schools. It has sent into the ministry more than three hundred men, distributed thousands of books and tracts, and given considerable aid to aged, sick, and infirm clergymen, and the widows and orphans of the clergy.

REV. R. C. MATLOCK.

The Church Society for promoting Christianity among the Jews.—This most useful Society was incorporated in 1878 A.D. Its purpose is surely one which appeals most earnestly to our aid as well as prayers and sympathy. To the Jew we owe every authentic revelation of God's love and mercy. Salvation comes to us from them. The Church was first sent to them. For a thousand years, but in ever-dwindling numbers, they entered the Church. It is indeed true that there has always been some one of that chosen race ministering at her altars. Some have risen to the Episcopate. But for a century and a half the old Judaism of the Talmud has been breaking down. The Jew has lost his hope of the MESSIAH, and in some of their catechisms even they have taught that the career of the nation is the fulfillment of the prophecy of the MESSIAH. They tend now to rationalism more than to any Faith. Yet by Faith comes their inheritance to them, and more than are willing to confess it are secret believers in the CHRIST. (Vide Jew.) Within this century more than twenty thousand have embraced Christianity. It is the holy purpose of this Society to aid in so glorious a work, which is, in fact, an endeavor reverently to forward God's declared purposes towards the people He has so loved. It has established work among the Jews in thirty-four Dioceses and in ten Missionary Jurisdictions. It aids largely the clergy in their parochial work by contributing Bibles, Prayer-Books, and Messianic and Christian publications. Its work is purely spiritual, no temporal aid being given to proselytes.

Free and Open Church Association.—The objects of the Association are: 1. To maintain, as a principle, the freedom of all seats in Churches.

2. To promote the abandonment of the sale and rental of pews and sittings, and in place thereof, the adoption of the principle of systematic free-will offerings by all the worshippers in our Churches, according to their ability.

3. To promote the recognition of the Offertory as an act of Christian worship, and as a Scriptural means of raising money for pious and charitable uses.

4. To promote the practice of keeping Churches open throughout every day of the week for private prayer.

The following are the means employed: The printing and dissemination of Tracts and Papers; the holding of Public Meetings; the Preaching of Sermons; Discussions in the Public Press; and the promotion of needful Legislation.

The Council is always ready to assist in the organization of Public or Private Meetings in reference to particular localities and Churches, so that friends who wish to influence the public opinion of their neighborhood may obtain not only tracts and pamphlets, but speakers to help them, by applying to the Secretary.

The Council is also prepared to afford legal advice on questions connected with the movement.

The Association is entirely free from party character.

It has thirty Bishops as its patrons. As only a partial result of its work, out of a total of 1859 parishes in twenty-seven Dioceses from which comparatively full returns have been received, 1179 are made free and open to all who enter the Church doors. Nearly all the Churches in the Missionary Jurisdictions have been established as free Churches.

The Society for the increase of the Ministry (founded 1857 A.D., incorporated 1859 A.D.).

—As an exposition of the motives which have led to the formation of this Society, an extract from the report of the Corresponding Secretary to its second annual meeting is here given:

"The need of such a movement as this has long existed, and has been deeply felt. Those who are at all familiar with the affairs of our Church, need not be told that for several years past, and even from the beginning of her history in this country, her progress has been greatly retarded by the want of clergymen. At no time and in no part of the land, not even in those sections where she has been longest established, has the supply been sufficient for her actual wants. But the deficiency at the present time is greater and more alarming than at any previous period. The facts which official statistics reveal in regard to this matter are truly startling. They show that, while the population of the country is increasing with unexampled rapidity, and while new and promising fields, at home and abroad, are continually opening to the Church, the supply of laborers, so far from keeping pace with this growing demand, is scarcely increasing in any sense; that the yearly ordinations but little more than make good the annual losses by death and other causes; and that the number of candidates for orders now is not much larger than it was fifteen years ago. It appears that there was a gradual falling off from 1844 to 1850 A.D.; and while the reports to the General Convention show a gradual increase from 1850 to 1856 A.D., from 1856 A.D. to the present time there has been another falling off, so that there are not as many candidates now (1859 A.D.) as there were when the last General Convention met, though in the mean time there has been an absolute gain of about nine thousand communicants and two hundred parishes.

"The whole number of our clergy is about the same as the number of our parishes. But the number of those who, though occupying various stations of usefulness in the Church, are without parochial charge, together with the infirm and superannuated, must amount to at least three hundred and fifty, and thus that number, or more than one-sixth of our parishes, must be without pastors, or if supplied at all, only by lay-readers and occasional services of clergymen. It is no wonder, in view of such a state of things, that those who have the interests of the Church at heart, especially those to whom the oversight and administration of its affairs are intrusted, should feel so much anxiety on this subject as they have manifested, nor that it should have been dwelt upon so frequently and earnestly in our Conventions and journals, in the addresses of our Bishops and the sermons of our clergy, and in the reports and appeals of our missionaries and Missionary Boards."

It is important that the character and plan of the Society should be thoroughly understood. It is a general association, intended to cover every Diocese, and to include every member of the Church throughout the country. It knows no sectional objects or party purposes, but is organized as an institution of the whole and nothing less than the whole Church. At the same time, it acknowledges itself to be a voluntary organization, without the right to exclude other organizations, and with no design of interfering with local societies engaged in the same or a similar enterprise. It seeks to establish itself on a permanent basis, to deserve and to secure the confidence of the Church as something more than a temporary association, and so to conduct its affairs and discharge its responsibilities, as to be everywhere regarded in the light of a carefully, economically, and effectively administered institution. Whatever funds it may obtain will be devoted wholly to the great object which it professes to serve, subject to the smallest possible charges for expenses, and without any deductions for percentages or salaries.

The Society proposes a twofold course. In the first place, it undertakes to find suitable candidates for holy orders, not waiting for candidates to present themselves, but searching after them, encouraging them, and sustaining them, provided they prove deserving, in their earliest aspirations towards the ministry. In the second place, the Society desires to furnish the necessary instruction for such candidates as it may find to be entirely worthy of assistance, at the school, the college, and the Theological school, through either or all of which, according to individual cases, it is the intention of the Society to carry its beneficiaries.

The constitution admits as members all persons paying a yearly subscription of not less than three dollars. Clergymen may make the same payment, or they may take up a collection, or raise a subscription every year; or they may do both,—that is, subscribe for themselves and obtain contributions from others. Laymen, likewise, may serve the Society by raising subscriptions among their friends and fellow-parishioners, or within their respective Dioceses. Women may contribute to it through their sewing societies and similar associations, and Sunday-school children may aid the cause by devoting to it their offerings.

The disbursements of the Society will be proportioned to the contributions which it receives. It seeks for beneficiaries among parishes as well as for subscribers. Every Sunday-school, every secular school, every college or university, ought to be kept in view as likely to furnish some youth fitted for the ministry, and yet hesitating, perhaps unable, to prepare for it. It would urge parents to bring the obligation of the ministry before their children.

The society has aided 629 clergy in their studies, besides helping 111 sons of the clergy, not ordained. It has raised $577,279.72.

Original Sin, otherwise Birth Sin, is the infection or corruption inherent in human nature through inheritance from Adam, by which every man born into the world is in a state of condemnation without reference to the commission of actual sin; which infection so depraves the moral nature of man as to produce a constant tendency to evil and prevent any disposition to good. This doctrine makes it necessary not only that man must be restrained from the evil and incited to the good by the external help of God's grace, but that he must in some way be relieved from the condemnation due to Original Sin before he can be received into God's favor. It will at once be seen that a doctrine involving such subtle distinctions, and dealing with so obscure a subject, must have led to much controversy and diversity of explanation, and such is the fact. The denial of any such taint as Original Sin is known as Pelagianism, from Pelagius, who first taught it in the fourth century. The Council of Carthage condemned the doctrines of Pelagius as heresy. Denying the existence of Original Sin, there still remained the fact, proved by all experience, of man's tendency to evil, and this the followers of Pelagius account for by supposing an inherited weakness of will, through which all men sin after the similitude of Adam. This is known as Semipelagianism, and is condemned in the IX. Article of Religion of the Book of Common Prayer. The variety of views held in regard to Original Sin has been almost infinite, even within the limits of orthodoxy. Of these the harshest and most uncompromising are those of St. Augustine of Hippo and of the Westminster Confession. These teach the absolute opposition of the natural human will to God, and its utter indisposition to all good, disability to perform it, and entire inclination to evil. This is the result of the sin of our first parents, the guilt of which is imputed to all their descendants, and the infection of which is transmitted to them by ordinary generation. This extreme view, known as the doctrine of Total Depravity, was certainly unknown to the earliest Christian Fathers, such as Clement of Alexandria and Irenæus. In a modified form it was taught by Tertullian, but was fully developed and formulated by Augustine, under the polemical heat of his controversy with Pelagius. At the time of the Reformation a similar reason operated to fix it deeply in the Lutheran system and in that of Calvin, it being a powerful weapon in the disputes of the Reformers with Rome upon the doctrine of merit by good works. The influence of Erasmus is probably seen in the milder teaching of the Anglican Articles of Religion, which hold (IX. Art.) that "it is the fault and corruption of the nature of every man that naturally is engendered of the offspring of Adam, whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil, so that the flesh lusteth always contrary to the Spirit; and therefore in every person born into this world, it deserveth God's wrath and damnation." There is here a careful avoidance of the Tertullian doctrine of the natural heredity of Original Sin, as well as of the Augustinian view of total depravity of the will. The infection remains, however, even in those who are regenerated. Baptism, therefore, does not absolutely cleanse away Original Sin, but only secures its pardon through the merits of CHRIST, and insures the help of the HOLY GHOST to overcome its influences. From all this it is evident that the Scriptural teachings on the subject must be extremely obscure, and unquestionably they are so. The doctrine of

St. Paul of the Second Adam seems to throw the most light upon this difficult and much-vexed problem.

Adam is not only the natural progenitor, but the typical representative and federal head of the human race unregenerated. The moral taint and its condemnation which he incurred fell through him upon the whole race of men: "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned (Rom. v. 12). "Death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression" (v. 14). But in the Incarnation, CHRIST, of whom Adam was in this respect the type, became the typical Representative and federal Head of Regenerated Humanity: "For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of One shall many be made righteous" (Rom. v. 19). All men are naturally members of Adam. But in Baptism all men (baptized) are made members of CHRIST; because they are made members of the Church which is His body, and the members of the body must be members of the Head. All, therefore, who are thus made partakers of the nature redeemed and glorified by the Incarnation become the lawful inheritors of that release from the power and consequences of their natural moral infection which was won by the sinless life of CHRIST. "For as in Adam all die, even so in CHRIST shall all be made alive." But as the nature inherited from Adam was only redeemed, not changed, by the Incarnation, its taint of Original Sin was not removed, but only antagonized by the infusion of the Christ-Life, the indwelling of CHRIST'S Spirit, CHRIST Himself in His own Person being alone without sin. Hence the dual nature of which St. Paul is conscious, the evil constantly warring against the good and struggling for the mastery of the will; and hence, also, his attributing all his tendency to good, not to himself, but to the Spirit of CHRIST within him. "All his sufficiency is of CHRIST." But as this inheritance from the Second Adam is not by natural descent and concerns only man's moral nature, so we may reasonably infer that the evil nature inherited from the first Adam, which also concerns only man's moral life, is derived federally, rather than by natural descent; supposing, therefore, that it could be proven that Adam was not the natural progenitor of all men, it would in no way disturb the fact of the universality of either Original Sin or its remedy in the Atonement.

The subject of Original Sin has not been left entirely in the hands of theologians, but has been vigorously discussed by such philosophers as Kant, Schelling, and Hegel. Perhaps the most appropriate closing of the consideration of such a topic is that of Bishop Burnet's treatise on the subject: "One great and constant rule to be observed is to represent men's opinions candidly, and to judge as favorably both of them and their opinions as may be; to bear with one another and not to disturb the peace and union of the Church by insisting too much and too peremptorily upon matters of such doubtful disputation, but willingly to leave them to all that liberty to which the Church has left them and which she still allows them."

Ornaments. It is needless to show at length that by Divine command there were rich and costly ornaments provided for His service, and that this Law holds, since our LORD enacted that the Law should not pass away till it was fulfilled, nor that He obeyed the Law and fulfilled its bloody sacrifices and took them away. But the Epistle to the Hebrews proceeds upon an interpretation of the Law of ritual, which makes it apparent that the beauty, decency, and order of service were not abrogated. The earliest Liturgies exhibit an elaborate ornament both of furniture and of vestment. Eusebius gives the tradition that St. John wore a petalon, or mitre, like the High-Priest. So coming on down, we find the ornaments in the Church's service as beautiful as the circumstances of each Diocese or parish permitted.

Ornaments, in the legal sense of the word, are the necessary furniture and vessels for the due celebration of Divine service, especially the Holy Communion, and the necessary and uniform vesture of the Priest that shall execute the holy ministry. And the definitions concerning these several ornaments have in recent years formed the subject of several famous Judgments in English Ecclesiastical Courts. It has been a moot question whether, and if so, how far, the English Ecclesiastical Law holds in this country. This has never been decided; but the soundest legal opinion inclines clearly to the view that it stands with regard to the Church as the Common Law of England does to the Law of nearly all of the United States or the Civil Law to the Law of Louisiana. The Common Law of the times before 1776 A.D. is in force wherever it has not been directly abrogated by Statute Law. So the English Canon Law, as it was up to 1784-87 A.D., holds for the Church under common sense limitations, except where it is abrogated by our own Canon Law. It is limited by utter change of circumstances in some things, by the different relations of Bishops, Priest, and people in other things. In all else it holds. So, then, the famous Ornaments rubric of Edward VI.'s First Prayer-Book is deemed by many to be in force. The question is, in many points of view, to be considered as still open, and probably it is much more in the Bishop's power to decide it than is usually supposed, since by ancient rule it was an inherent part of the Bishop's office to regulate the Liturgy of his Diocese. This is ceded to the Province or to the National Church, but belongs to the House of Bishops properly. The Ornaments rubrics are as follows,—they rest for their force on the rubric of 1662 A.D. in these terms: "The Morning and Evening Prayer shall be used in the accustomed place of the Church, Chapel, or Chancel, except it shall be otherwise determined by the Ordinary of the Place; and the Chancels shall remain as they have done in times past. And here it is to be noted that such ornaments of the Church, and of the ministers thereof, at all times of their ministrations shall be retained and be in use as were in this Church of England, by the authority of Parliament, in the second year of the reign of King Edward the Sixth." The Rubric for the Vestments for Daily Prayer runs thus: "In the saying or singing of Matins or Even-song, Bapting and Burying, the minister in parish churches, and chapels annexed to the same, shall use a Surplice." Then follows a clause as to dignitaries and graduates of colleges wearing the hood of their several degrees. "And whensoever a Bishop shall celebrate the holy communion in the church, or execute any other public ministration, he shall have upon him, beside his rochette, a Surplice or alb, and a cope or vestment (i.e., chasuble), and also his pastoral staff in his hand or else borne or holden by his Chaplain." The Rubric for the Vestments at the celebration of the Holy Communion runs thus: "Upon the day, and at the time appointed for the ministration of the holy Communion, the Priest that shall execute the holy ministry shall put upon him the vesture appointed for that ministration, that is to say, a white Alb, plain, with a vestment or Cope. And where there be many Priests or Deacons, there so many shall be ready to help the Priest in the ministration as shall be requisite, and shall have upon them likewise the vestures appointed for the ministry, that is to say, Albs with tunicles."

The furniture and vessels used in Edward VI.'s second year have given rise to the greatest controversies, and even to differing and sometimes opposing Judgments. The only plan followed seems to have been to discover what was in use then by the lists and inventories, which have been transmitted to us. The list given here is merely what was considered legal in the Purchas Judgment of 1871 A.D. 1. A cross, but not on the Communion-Table, or attached to it. 2. A Credence-Table as made necessary by the rubric concerning the elements. 3. The plain linen cloth covering the Table at the time of the ministration. 4. The "carpet" of silk or decent stuff, ordered by the Canon of 1603 A.D., to cover the Table during Divine Service, other than at the Communion, might be changed, and be of various colors and ornamentation, subject to the discretion of the Ordinary. 5. The Organ.

With regard to vestments, the surplice is most nearly what we know of the vestments of the first four or five centuries of the Christian history. The vestments ordered by Edward's First Prayer-Book, if white is the dominant color, is nearly corresponding to the dress of the ministry from about 500 A.D. to 900 A.D. Vestments later than these are the inventions which were introduced at the worst period of the Church's History (900 A.D. to 1100 A.D.).

Orthodoxy. The holding the true interpretation of "the Faith once committed to the Saints." The acceptance of the Doctrines of the Catholic Faith. The test of orthodoxy must be the general consensus of the Teachers of the Church. What was the true sense of the Doctrines given in the New Testament has produced the department of Theology, and the discussion of these Doctrines results in a general consent, which is acknowledged to give the orthodox interpretation. In the Fathers we find the earlier orthodox teaching. In the Councils we have the dogmatic definitions of the Articles of the Faith. In the Creeds we have the Rule of Faith. So he holds the orthodox faith who holds (a) the Creed, (b) the definitions of the four general Councils, (c) the interpretation of those definitions in the line of general teaching of the Church. But while this is true, it must be added that without surrendering it he also submits his private judgment upon Scripture, its contents and its inspiration, to the definitions and authoritative interpretation of the Church.

Pagans. "The worshipers of many gods, the heathen, who were so called by the Christians because, when Constantine and his successors forbade the worship of the heathen deities in the cities, its adherents retired to the villages (pagi, hence pagani, countrymen), where they could practice their ceremonies in secrecy and safety. In the Middle Ages this name was given to all who were not Jews or Christians, theirs being considered the only true religion and divine revelations; but in more modern times Mohammedans, who worship the one supreme God of the Jews and Christians, are not called Pagans." (Encyc. Amer.) As Christianity had its first great success in cities, the Epistles in the New Testament are largely directed to them, as Rome, Corinth, etc. The term heathen means dwellers on a heath, and refers to those who dwelt in the country. In the city men congregate in masses, and are more easily influenced together than in quiet country districts.

Pall. From Pallium, a cloak thrown over the shoulders. It was originally an article of dress. It was in use as the coarse outer garment of the monks. From a cloak it became reduced to a long stole-like ornament, with a hole in the centre to put over the neck. At first it was given to Bishops by the Emperors as a mark of honor and privilege, as Anthimus of Constantinople received it from the Emperor Justinian, and when he was expelled of his See he returned the Pall to the Emperor. Later the Pall became more common in the East under the name Omophorion, and is worn by Bishops and Patriarchs. But in the West it was reserved as a special mark of honor given by the Pope to such Archbishops as he would honor, or upon whom he would confer certain vicarial powers.

But the word is used in another sense also. It is the cloth which is thrown over the coffin at a funeral. When used, it should be of black or of violet cloth with a cross of white upon it, the cross to extend across the whole of the Pall.

It is sometimes used to mean the Veils which should be put over the Cup and the Paten to prevent insects from falling upon the Elements, and sometimes the single Veil of the Cup. This Pall should be of fine linen about a foot square.

Palm-Sunday. The Sunday next before Easter. This is a very usual name for it, but it has dropped out of use in the English Prayer-Book, and has lost many of the ceremonies which from the tenth century were in use upon this Sunday, which ushers in the solemnities of Holy Week.

These ceremonies of blessing the palm branches, which were then distributed and borne in procession through the church, are of mediæval date. But the Sunday bore this name of Palm-Sunday fourteen centuries ago. The Collect expresses the tender love of God in the humiliation of His Son for our sakes, and the prayers for the gift of humility. The Epistle taken from the Epistle to the Philippians sets forth both the equality of the Son of God, His humiliation and His exaltation, and the worship due to Him. While the Gospel begins the wonderful recital of that passion and death by which our souls are redeemed.

Pantheism. A subtle and very attractive form of religious belief. It was very ancient, occupying the thoughts of acute reasoners in India. In its relation to Christianity it appeared through Egyptian influence in the Gnostic theories, after having fallen with the Gnostics. After several centuries of comparative abeyance it reappeared in the midst of the Christian Faith, under the influence of the famous John Erigena (850 A.D.). It passed into Spain, and was in vogue among the Arabs. Its latest authoritative expounder was Spinoza, and from him it has passed into much of modern thought, especially in late German speculation. For its history the reader must go to the Histories of Philosophy (cf. Schwegler, Morrell, and Tenneman). "It deifies the universe, it amalgamates together the notions of the Finite and Infinite, unity and universal substance. The system is a necessary result of the negation of the two received points of Christian Faith: that the world is created and that truth has been revealed to man from heaven. The old crux, ex nihilo nihil fit, is repeated. The universe, as it is now, is stated to have existed from all eternity; if, then, the world has had a necessary existence without a beginning, it is a necessary condition of the Divine substance as being co-eternal with it. Again, a direct revelation of the truth is denied. It is not questioned that man may possess the truth, but that he can gain a knowledge of it from any other source than the energy of human reason. He works it out for himself. Therefore the Divine substance and the Divine truth are identified with the spirit of man. Moreover, since human reason is a variable, changeful element, self-consistent at one while, self-contradictory at another, it is therefore a finite intelligence, but the Divine intelligence is infinite; nevertheless the finite and the infinite are also one, of which later the finite is only a particular mode. And further, since a divinely revealed system of truth is devised, and human reason is declared to be the only source of truth; since also there is no such thing for man as absolute truth, but only such modes of it as are discoverable by his finite intelligence; therefore all opinions stand upon the same level, whether they affect religion, philosophy, or political principle. They may be expected to wax and wane, to ebb and flow, like everything else in this world. Truth, like time, is in a state of perpetual flux." (Blunt's Dict. of Hist. and Doc. Theol., sub voc.) This concise statement of the main doctrine of Pantheism, opposed, as is pointed out, to two prime facts asserted by Christianity, the Personality of God and the fact of a Revelation, carries its own refutation with it to every Christian mind. The identification of Deity with the universe leads practically to the most degrading Nature worship; the denial that absolute truth lies without man and is imparted to him by some revelation leads to the practical destruction of all social ethics. It is by these things that the true value of a doctrine is to be set. The true question to be asked is, What does its teaching result in, in practice? not, What is the intellectual setting forth of its fundamental propositions? Valued in this way, we can easily see what the theory of Pantheism is worth to the human race, despite its subtlety and apparent philosophy.

Papa. Derived from the Greek πάππας, a word which passed into common use, and has so continued, as the name for the Presbyters of the Greek Church. It was early used so in the West, but became restricted to the Bishops and Abbots, and finally was confined to the Pope, who claimed it as his special title at or about the middle of the fifth century. (Vide POPE.)

Parables. In teaching children comparisons are constantly used, because they must be taught what they know not by reference to what they know.

Men are children in religious matters, and what "eye hath not seen nor ear heard" (1 Cor. ii. 9) must be learned by what eye hath seen and what ear has heard. The use of parables was common among the Jews. The comparison of the death of children to the plucking of rosebuds to bloom in heaven is a Jewish parable. This mode of instruction was in vogue among the Persians and Arabians, and in this country the North American Indians are noted for their figurative speech. Says Bacon, "As hieroglyphics preceded letters, so parables preceded arguments; and the force of parables ever was and will be great, as being clearer than arguments, and more apposite than real examples." The Scriptures are loaded with figurative language. When Nathan would rebuke David, he does it by the parable of the ewe lamb (2 Sam. xii.). When the wise woman of Tekoah would help Absalom, she uses similar means to gain her end (2 Sam. xiv.). Of our LORD's teaching it is written (Matt. xiii. 34), "Without a parable spake He not unto them." So the Great Supper, the Prodigal Son, the Shepherd, the Fig-tree, or the Lily, yield lessons at His command, and "the common people heard Him gladly." A woman once said, "The parts of the Bible I like best are the likes." The best preachers and Sunday-school teachers must imitate our LORD in this respect. Arguments have been styled the pillars of a discourse, and illustrations the windows. The Holy Scriptures form a book of rich pictures. Palestine held in a small compass, hardly possible in other lands, rock, tower, stream, forest, desert, gulf, sea, watchman, vine-dresser, robber, and beast of prey. All could give religious lessons. The gentle dove told of the HOLY SPIRIT, and the viewless wind of the new birth of the soul.

It has been supposed that some of our SAVIOUR's parables narrate real events; in any case the ideas are true for humanity, if not related in regard to any special person. Our LORD's parables secured attention as being attractive stories and touching sensible objects, and giving occupation to the mind in seeking their meaning. (For beautiful expositions of these parables, see Wordsworth's Intro. to St. Luke, on the Good Samaritan and the Prodigal Son, and Farrar's Life of CHRIST, on "The Sower," and Trench's Parables.) The "various reception" of the Gospel is shown in the Sower, the "mingled results" in the Tares and the Net; the "priceless value" in the Treasure and the Pearl; and its "slow, gradual extension" in the Mustard-Seed, the Leaven, and "the Springing Corn." As to the vividness and picturesqueness of the parables of our LORD, Geikie writes as follows: "Analogies hitherto unsuspected between familiar natural facts and spiritual phenomena; lessons of duty enforced by some simple imaginary narrative or incident; striking parallels and comparisons, which made the homeliest trifles symbols of the highest truths, abound in all the discourses of JESUS." "Nothing was henceforth left unused. The light, the darkness, the houses around, the games of childhood, the sightless wayside beggar, the foxes of the hills, the leathern bottles hung up from every rafter, the patched or new garment, and even the noisy hen amidst her chickens, served, in turn, to illustrate some lofty truth. The sower on the hill-side at hand, the flaming weeds among the corn, the common mustard plant, the leaven in the woman's dough, the treasure disclosed by the passing plowshare, the pearl brought by the traveling merchant from distant lands for sale at Bethsaida or Tiberias,—at Philip's court or that of Antipas,—the draw-net seen daily on the lake, the pitiless servant, the laborers in the vineyards around, any detail of every-day life, was elevated, as occasion demanded, to be the vehicle of the sublimest lessons. Others have uttered parables, but JESUS so far transcends them that He may justly be called the creator of this mode of instruction."

Sometimes, as Westcott shows, the parables in St. John's Gospel are transformed into words and acts. According to a figure daily and hourly before men, CHRIST is "the Door" (St. John x. 9), the True Vine (ch. xv.). The "corn of wheat" preaches of the resurrection (ch. xii. 24). Our LORD in taking a towel and girding Himself and washing His disciples' feet acted out a parable of humility (ch. xiii.). John the Baptist gives a short parable in likening himself to "the friend of the bridegroom" (ch. iii. 29). Compare our LORD's saying in Matt. ix. 15: "Can the children of the bridechamber mourn as long as the bridegroom is with them?"

To the devout soul in its Heavenly FATHER's house even here on earth all things are reminders of God.

Paraclete. The name given to the HOLY SPIRIT by our LORD in His discourse in the last chapter of St. John's Gospel. It is there somewhat strainedly translated Comforter, but its chief meaning is ADVOCATE. It is a title of one of the offices of our LORD, and is properly translated Advocate in the text, "We have an advocate with the FATHER, JESUS CHRIST the righteous" (1 John ii. 1). It is one of the special offices of the HOLY GHOST to be the Advocate, the Pleader of the Truth, before the bar of our conscience, our will, and our reason. He is our guide, our leader into all truth, as we heed His pleading with our souls. And thence, in a secondary sense, He becomes our Consoler, our Comforter, as He by His very pleading for and presentation of the Faith comforts us in our feebleness, and consoles us in our shrinking because of our sins. But the early English meaning of the title Comforter was Strengthenener, or Supporter, which was more nearly the general use of the word Paraclete in our LORD's discourse. But his office of Advocate is also set forth by St. Paul: "The SPIRIT itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God" (Rom. viii. 16). Nor is His office of Advocate confined to pleading with us, but He is also our pleader, making intercession for us, as well as helping our infirmities. The title Paraclete, then, while given to CHRIST, is also, and chiefly, given to the HOLY GHOST, describing His office towards us and His work in us as Advocate, and as Strengthenener and Consoler.

Paradise. This word seems to come from the Sanscrit, parrīḍā, a region of surpassing beauty, and the Armenian pardes, a garden or park. It is a place planted with trees, or pleasure-grounds (Solomon's Song iv. 13; Neh. ii. 8; Eccl. ii. 5). In the Septuagint it is used for the Garden of Eden (Gen. ii. 8). Xenophon makes use of the word for the pleasure-gardens of Persia. In the New Testament the word advances to signify the region in Hades—the invisible world—where faithful souls await their perfect bliss. "Their (the Jews') meaning, therefore, was this: that as paradise, or the Garden of Eden, was a place of great beauty, pleasure, and tranquillity, so the state of separate souls was a state of peace and excellent delights" (J. Taylor). "To-day," said our LORD to the penitent thief, "shalt thou be with Me in Paradise" (St Luke xxiii. 43). But the word goes higher than this inferior Paradise, and also means "The Paradise of God" (Rev. ii. 7), that is, "the third heaven" (2 Cor. xii. 2, 4). St. Paul, by using "paradise" and "third heaven" here as of the same meaning, indicates the place where the spirits of the blessed dwell with God. The imagery in Rev. ii. 7, is drawn from Gen. ii. 8, and so Old and New Testament combine. The Jews spoke of the upper and under paradises. So the word grows from "any garden of delight" to the Garden of Eden, and then to the joyful resting-place of souls, and lastly to Heaven, so revealed religion exalts a word "from glory to glory" (2 Cor. iii. 18). In the inferior Paradise the souls of the righteous enjoy a foretaste of future bliss and await the Resurrection and Day of Judgment, when they will be reunited to their bodies, and "be admitted to the infinite and everlasting glory of Heaven." In St. Luke xvi. 23, our LORD represents Lazarus as being in Abraham's bosom, as if reclining joyfully at a feast. He adopted a Jewish expression for Paradise. CHRIST's body was laid in a garden (St. John xix. 41, 42), and his faithful ones shall find the grave a garden of Paradise, and they shall be like "the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead" (Isa. xxvii. 19).

Whatever may be concluded, of St. Paul's vision or visions, the general and proper ancient idea of Paradise is that it is, as W. Archer Butler styles it, "the antechamber of Heaven," where the eye may be prepared for "the luminous Presence of the Ineffable One, a gentle twilight between the Night of this life and the Morning of Immortality." In the mystical imagery of Henry Suso, Paradise is painted as "the meadows of the bright May, the true valley of delight" where the martyrs shine "in their robes red like roses," and the confessors in "splendid beauty" and the virgins "in angelic purity." But this and much more Suso himself regarded as an image; and he thought that true happiness consisted in union with God. Happiness lies in character rather than place. Paradise is the home of divine life; the Rabbis rightly called it "the land of life." Such life is opposed to sin, which is the soul's death. Sin drove man from the Paradise of Eden; the Second Adam, CHRIST JESUS, opens the door of a new and better Paradise.

The right view of Paradise is a great help to the toiling soul in this world. A thin veil divides it from a place of rest and felicity, where streams of living water shall quench its thirst. While the paradise or park is not the Great King's Palace, it lies on the way to it, and is a preparation for it. As the dead in CHRIST pass away one by one, Christian mourners sorrow not as those who "have no hope" (1 Thess. iv. 13), but can think of the departed as in a state of great happiness, and freed from all pain.

"Tis sweet, as year by year we lose
Friends out of sight, in faith to muse
How grows in Paradise our store."
Keble on the Burial of the Dead.

Paradise is not a mere theory, but a place where the reader may be to-morrow.

Paraphrase. The word is used to signify the enlarging of a text by the interpolation of descriptive words, or by putting the same ideas into more diffuse and clearer language. The Targums, the Chaldee translations of some of the books of the Bible, are paraphrases also, and give the interpretation of the text current at that time among the Jews. At whatever date the Targums may be placed, still they contain remarkable paraphrases, which show that the Jews before our LORD's coming held the clue to the true meaning of the prophecies concerning Him. Paraphrases of the Gospels became more common in the mediæval ages, and several very valuable commentaries have been published upon this plan. The danger of interpolating a meaning not cognate to the text, or of doing something worse, makes the value of such works really very uncertain.

Parclose. Screens separating chapels, especially those at the east end of the aisles, from the body of the church, are called parcloses.

Parish. THE ENGLISH PARISH IN AMERICA.—The word parish is derived through the French and Latin from the Greek παροικία, which originally meant either a collection of men not enjoying full rights of Greek citizenship, or a class distinct from the rest of the people. In the latter sense the word was the designation of a body of Christians living in a city and its neighborhood, to distinguish them from the other inhabitants. Gradually, as Christianity spread over Western Europe, and the Church organization became more determined, it adjusted itself to the civil and military divisions existing under the Roman provincial system, and the parochia obtained a territorial meaning, and was applied to the district under the care of a Bishop. Under the Roman system any organization such as the present parish would have been almost impossible, and would have been prevented also by the centring of things ecclesiastical and lay in the hands of the Priests, and through them in the Bishop. It is not known positively when the parochia was introduced into England, but Gildas, writing about the sixth century, used it to denote the territory under the jurisdiction of the Bishop in Wales. The local divisions introduced into the island by the English were but reproductions and developments of the conquerors' organization in Germany, and they were but little, if in any degree, affected by the Romano-Celtic institutions which they supplanted. Christianity was reintroduced into England from two directions, and by different methods. The policy of the Roman missionaries was to convert the ruler and to organize downward. The practice of Aidan and his successors in the North was to labor among the people, establishing mission stations here and there, and to work up to the king.

The two methods, modified by each other, resulted in the Priest's being naturally confined in his ministrations to the territory of the township, or of a number of townships united, while the Bishop superintended the religious work of the shire or kingdom. Thus the civil and ecclesiastical organizations, with no apparent intention of so doing, were developing side by side, and the Englishman's duties to Church and State were becoming more nearly related, and it is probable that the laity began to claim a share in directing church affairs. The tendency to coalesce was greatly increased, though modified, by the unifying work of Theodore of Tarsus, the traditional founder of the English parish in its restricted sense. But, according to Pearson, parochia in England meant, up to the time of the Norman Conquest, the Bishop's province, and it is found with this meaning in the writings of Lanfranc, Anselm, and other ecclesiastics, although the smaller district, with its civil and religious organization, must have been in existence. One result of the Conquest was the conferring upon lords of land the right to found churches on their lands, which corresponded frequently in extent with the old township, and by the end of the twelfth century "the Parochial system, with all its legal apparatus, advowson, presentation, institution, induction, sequestration, etc.," had begun to displace the diocesan system. From that time the parish may be considered as the ecclesiastical form of the township, for the boundaries of the parishes and of the original units were identical, and in later days the personality of the older institution was in many instances absorbed into that of the younger. When the people of the township assembled to consider the affairs of the Church, the meeting was called a Vestry, from the place of meeting, originally the vestiarium, or apartment for the clerical garments. Many of the powers and duties of the township were bestowed upon the courts and officers of the manor, and the vestry had to attend to all business, civil and ecclesiastical, that did not come under the jurisdiction of the manor.

This rule brought about a confusion of the terms parish, vill, and town, though the word parish was used generally in referring to Church matters. From its beginning the ecclesiastical side of the parish was inclined to supersede the civil side, and this was the condition of affairs at the time of the first English settlements in America. The various classes and kinds of colonists may be, for convenience, considered as having been divided into two main streams, the first formed of those who settled New England, whose doctrines and practices have moulded the ideas of what to-day is known as the North; the second consisting of the first English dwellers in the region south of the present Mason and Dixon's Line, who influenced the life of the South. Massachusetts may be taken as representing the former, Virginia as a type of the latter. The men who founded Virginia and exercised the formative influence upon her institutions were in perfect accord with the pretensions of royalty and faithful adherents of the Church of England, and it can be safely said that in the golden age of the colony the predominant features of the customs and laws of the English at home were reproduced in Virginia. There it was that the parish, as it existed in England, was instituted, although, on account of the peculiar circumstances of the young estate, it was, as a local unit, preceded in time of organization by the military and civil divisions, and, in consequence, never possessed civil powers entirely equal to those of the same institution in the mother-country. On the other hand, the colonists of Massachusetts, originally members of the English Church, either came to America out of sympathy with the Establishment, or in their new home learned to cherish another form of church polity. The political unit in the colony was the township. But Parker wrote: "They founded a civil State upon a basis which should support the worship of God according to their conscientious convictions of duty; and an ecclesiastical State combined with it, which should sustain and be in harmony with the civil government, excluding what was antagonistic to the welfare of either."

In the union of the State and the Church there was produced an ecclesiastical government which was a combination of Independency and Presbyterianism, and which developed in course of time into Congregationalism. Such terms as "Church and Town," and "Members of the Church and inhabitants of the Town," did not signify, therefore, an English parish, but an English township, with provisions for the support of religion. The word parish was used in New England to denote the township from the ecclesiastical point of view as well as a portion of a township not possessing town rights,—but this was not the true English parish. The township of New England was the parish of England shorn of its ecclesiastical powers, and the Virginia parish was the English parish stripped of some of its civil functions. In Virginia the parish, both as a territorial division and as an institution, was a development, and in this respect differed from the same institution in Maryland, the Carolinas, and Georgia, which was fastened upon the body politic almost full grown and influenced by, if not modeled directed upon, that in Virginia. Its beginning may be seen in the order of the Assembly in 1624 A.D., that every plantation should have a place set apart for worship, and that "there should be in every parish a publick garnary" where should be stored by every person over eighteen years of age, within a year after his arrival in the colony, a bushel of corn, which was to "be disposed for the public uses of every parish by the major part of the freemen." The parishes in Virginia were at first co-extensive with the plantations, which lay along the rivers, and which afterwards became counties. Later the limits of county and parish were often the same. To meet the requirements of an increased population the original parish was divided, and smaller parishes thus formed became in a few years the bases for new counties. In Maryland and South Carolina parishes were originally divisions of the counties, and in the former province the hundred, which seems to have been laid out according to nature's bounds, was the basis for the new division, although not an integral part of the parish, but of the county. Some parishes, such as those lying between the rivers James and York, were very small, containing perhaps not more than thirty-six square miles, but some, on the contrary, were very large, for Augusta Parish in Virginia extended from the Blue Ridge to the Mississippi River, and many in Maryland contained over five hundred square miles. The consent of the Assembly had to be given before a new parish could be formed, and the inhabitants of the new parish paid all debts due the old one before they were legally organized. To meet the wants of all, chapels of easement were erected in very large parishes, and services were held in them when the mother-church was closed.

Governor Johnson, of South Carolina, was instructed about the year 1730 A.D. to lay out in the province eleven towns, each containing 20,000 square acres. Each of these towns were to be erected into a parish, which was to extend several miles around the town, and when one hundred heads of families had settled in the parish, it was to enjoy all the privileges of any other parish. This last provision was not carried out, at least for several years, for in a pamphlet description of South Carolina, printed in 1761 A.D., it was stated that "some towns which by the King's instructions have a right to be erected into Parishes, and to send two Members, are not allowed to send any." By a law of 1720 A.D. the South Carolina parishes became the election districts for representatives in the lower house of the Assembly, and they continued to send their delegates after they had changed from ecclesiastical to secular divisions. The same right, in somewhat modified form, was enjoyed by the Virginians, but experience soon limited it to cases in which the parish had some special measures to bring before the Assembly, and before the eighteenth century the practice had ceased. The parishes could make by-laws when no general law was applicable to certain circumstances. This arrangement did not work well, so it was changed to the right of electing two representatives of the parish to be assessors to the justices of the county court in making by-laws for the county. The first person in the parish was the minister. The Bishop of London ex officio had the general supervision of the Church in the American colonies, and in theory he sent over ministers to be presented by vacant parishes, and they were inducted by the governor. In practice, however, things were quite different. In South Carolina, by law, the parishioners were empowered to elect their rector, which was the same idea as that represented by the Massachusetts town-meetings choosing its minister, or by the poll-parish of Pennsylvania selecting the candidate of the "Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts." The Churchmen of Maryland recognized as a rule the governor's right of induction, but there were instances when this right was strongly disputed, the opposition being carried to such ends as locking the unwelcome minister out of the church, and threatening him with physical force. In Virginia, the matter was in dispute from 1662 A.D. until the Revolution, when it was settled by the institution of the voluntary system. The vestries acknowledged that the governor could induct a minister into a parish that had remained vacant over twelve successive months, but they evaded this right by employing their rectors by the year, and if, after some time, all were satisfied, the vestry would present the minister to the governor for induction. A great deal of the trouble arose no doubt from a confusion of the terms induction and presentation, but so strong was the feeling of the people against what they believed an invasion of their rights, that they submitted to the makeshift of lay-reading, although the vestries were thereby brought sometimes under suspicion of misappropriating parish funds that should have been devoted to the support of a rector. Matters came to such a crisis that an appeal was taken to England, and Sir Edward Northey delivered an opinion which the Virginia authorities construed against the vestries, and the governors foolishly tried not only to induct but also to present ministers to parishes, but the vestries stoutly maintained their position. There were, however, exceptions on both sides, some governors refusing to urge their claims, some vestries accepting whomsoever the governors sent.

Ministers were supported in Maryland for a few years by private subscriptions, and then by an annual poll-tax on every taxable of forty pounds, afterwards thirty pounds, of tobacco; in South Carolina their salary was made up by money from the Society, by private contributions, and by State aid; the ministers of Virginia at first were paid from the results of an annual levy of ten pounds of tobacco and a bushel of corn for every ground-tiller. This salary was increased until, in 1696 A.D., it was fixed at not less than sixteen thousand pounds of tobacco a year. In the colonies, especially in Maryland, parochial libraries for the use of the rectors were provided through the untiring efforts of the Rev. Dr. Thomas Bray, the first commissary sent to Maryland. There was generally in each parish a glebe for the use and support of the rector, who was also assisted by occasional fees for a baptism, wedding, or funeral. To the minister was joined a clerk, who in the incumbent's absence could perform all the Church services, except matrimony and the two sacraments. He published banns, read the responses, for Prayer-Books were scarce in the colonies, and set the tunes until the introduction of organs at quite a later date. He was sometimes the vestry clerk, and acted as collector of the tithes, similar in many respects to the town rates of New England. The church door, in accordance with an old English custom, and for convenience, was the place for advertising matters of all kinds,—the lists of taxed bachelors, notices of persons leaving the country, the extent of patrol districts, and the crying of boats or hogs that had been found or caught. The parish affairs were administered by select vestries, varying in different colonies in numbers, in powers, in the length of their tenure of office, and in minor points. The select vestries, which found their parallel in the selectmen and assessors of a New England town, were probably suggested by the select committees of the English vestry, and were adopted in America because of the impossibility of gathering together all the parishioners for the transaction of business. The minister, when present, was the presiding officer, though it was not unusual for the church-warden to occupy the position. In Virginia as early as 1615 A.D., the minister and four most religious men looked after the moral and spiritual welfare of the people, besides keeping the church in repair and fit for the worship of God. In this body one writer sees a resemblance to a Dutch consistory, but its prototype is more likely to be found in the "reeve and four best men," who represented the town or parish in the hundred-court and shire-moot of England. A somewhat similar idea found expression in Maryland, where, during the absence of an incumbent, the principal, i.e., the eldest, vestryman, with four of the next oldest vestrymen, had to account to the governor for the expenditures of the parish poll-tax. In 1643 A.D. the Virginia Assembly made a law requiring a vestry to be held in every parish, and "that the most sufficient and selected men be chosen and joined to the minister and church-wardens to be of that Vestrie," for the care of the church, laying of levies, etc. There does not seem to have been any limit to the number of vestrymen until 1660 A.D., when it was found that twelve would be sufficient, although in the eighteenth century there were still some irregularities, arising, no doubt, from misunderstandings. At the time of the Bacon rebellion in 1676 A.D., an unsuccessful attempt was made to restrict the term of office to three years at one time. When once elected, the vestry filled vacancies in its body; but vacancies rarely existed, except on account of death, removal from the parish, or old age, unless for incapability or misdeemeanors the whole vestry was dissolved by act of Assembly.

The Church of England was established, and parishes were organized, in Maryland by an act of 1692 A.D., and in the vestry were combined features which had already appeared or were afterwards prominent in similar bodies in other provinces. Six vestrymen were chosen at the first election by the legal voters of the parish. On each succeeding Easter-Monday the two eldest vestrymen were voted out, and the vacancies filled by two others elected in the same way. Neither of the ex-vestrymen were liable to serve during the next three years. Everywhere the qualifications of vestrymen were nearly the same. They were to be sober and discreet, and not members of the Church of Rome, and they were often men of good repute and occupying places of honor and trust in the community. Governors, members of the Council, and other high functionaries held the office, and many made it a step to political preferment. In the Virginia Convention of 1776 A.D. there were not three who were not or had not been vestrymen. When elected they took the oath of allegiance, supremacy, abjuration, the test, etc., varying according to the times. Although church-wardens existed in Virginia before vestries, yet after the latter had been created they chose annually from their own body two church-wardens, sometimes re-electing one to be a sort of adviser to the new appointee. In the proceedings of the first representative legislative assembly in America, held at Jamestown in 1619 A.D., the minister and church-wardens are mentioned as being the proper ones to bring offenders against the moral code to justice. In Maryland and South Carolina the wardens were elected annually in the same manner as the vestrymen. The vestry of a Virginia parish met at least twice a year at some convenient place, generally a small vestry-house, though a court-house or dwelling had to serve the purpose. The vestry-house represented a peculiarity of the Church, quite different from the idea of the New England meeting-house, which was used not only for religious services, or for assemblies for Church purposes, but also for the transaction of secular business. The Easter meeting was for the purpose of electing the new wardens and of examining the accounts of the retiring ones. At the fall meeting was apportioned the annual levy. This was done by adding the parish expenses, such as minister's salary, provision for the poor, etc., and dividing the whole amount by the number of tithables, which determined how much each had to pay. Ministers and poor or infirm persons were excused from paying tithes or poll-tax, which was collected by a sheriff, constable, or special collector. In Maryland vestries met generally once a month, and in some parishes refreshments were prepared for the members, who had traveled, perhaps, the whole morning through the forests. Eleven o'clock forenoon was the legal hour for the meeting, at which were discussed matters relating to the welfare of the parish, or in lieu of anything else absent members were fined, though the fines were remitted at the next meeting. Proceedings of vestries were chronicled in the vestry-book by the clerk or register, who kept also a record of births, marriages, and deaths. The clerk gave notices of vestry meetings, presented the claims or wishes of the vestry to the county courts, and attended to minor matters.

The guardianship of parish property and the censorship of parish morals were confided to the vestry, who had also charge of the building or repair of churches, the inspection of parochial libraries, the nomination in South Carolina of overseers of the poor, the sending of laborers for making and keeping highways in order, and the employment of the sexton. In Virginia, once in four years the vestry divided the parish into precincts, and appointed two persons in each of them to "procession" the lands. The surveyors in company with neighbors examined and renewed the boundary-marks by blazing trees or planting stones, and the results were recorded in the parish books. This custom, rendered necessary by the nature of the country and the fewness of fences, was nothing else than the old English system of perambulations, which still obtains. The name is preserved in the "processioners" of Georgia, men who are liable to be called on at any time to fix disputed boundaries. The vestries had to concern themselves about the decent maintenance of the indigent. In the palmy days of the colony, after the first bitter experiences and before so much land had been occupied, the few paupers in private houses and the expenses incurred by the householder were paid from the parish funds. When a pauper wandered from one parish to another, he was brought back by a constable. Poor children were apprenticed to people who promised to give them religious instruction and to teach them some art or trade, while, on the other hand, the children were obliged to endeavor to help their masters as much as possible and to keep out the company of evil companions. But poverty increased with the growth of the colony, so in 1755 A.D. a law was passed for the erecting in parishes of workhouses. The vestries had power to make laws for the government of these workhouses, and offenders against them were to be soundly thrashed. It was also enacted that the inmates should "upon the shoulder of the right sleeve of his or her uppermost garment, in an open and visible manner, wear a badge with the name of the parish to which he or she belongs, cut either in blue, red, or green cloth." With few exceptions this law of workhouses seems to have remained inoperative. Certain fines in Maryland were appropriated for the help of the needy, but the parish was concerned as a rule only with such poor persons as were members of the congregation. To endowed public schools the vestry sent a limited number of charity scholars. Rev. Thomas Bacon, an energetic rector, managed, with the aid of collections on communion Sundays and of private subscriptions, to found a charity working school, where even negroes could be taught reading, writing, and reverence to God, at no expense other than the cost of their living. Similar treatment of the poor prevailed in South Carolina after parishes had been introduced by a law of 1704 A.D., where overseers of the poor nominated yearly by the vestry were empowered to act with the church-wardens. As the tobacco crops were the chief sources of parish revenues, it was of the greatest importance to the vestries that the value of the staple should not be lessened. The parish was divided into precincts, in each of which two tellers or counters were appointed by the vestry to prevent the growth of too much or trashy tobacco, and vestrymen and church-wardens could arrest persons who tried to "run" tobacco, that is, smuggle it from the province. The counter's office was after a time discontinued, and the duties with some changes fell to the lot of inspectors, who were nominated by the vestry and appointed by the governor. Marriages within certain degrees of consanguinity or relationship were forbidden, and vestries in Maryland and South Carolina had to place in the parish church a table of such unlawful unions, and summoned those who infringed the law to appear before them. If the guilty parties could make no explanation, they were handed over to the clerk, who had to present their names to the clerk of indictments of the county court. At stated times during the year the minister or clerk had to read in church the laws against adultery, fornication, etc. Persons suspected of immorality were summoned to a hearing before the vestry, who caused them to leave each other or to marry. Negro women guilty of adultery were whipped. If the summons was not heeded, offenders were reprimanded by the rector or some members of the vestry, and if they still persisted in their evil ways, were presented to the county court.

Men who were profane in the presence of a minister, church-warden, or vestryman were liable to a fine; and if they refused to pay, any of the church officers could commit them to the stocks, or appoint a deputy constable to whip them. After Braddock's terrible defeat it was found necessary to increase the militia. To pay for this a tax was laid upon bachelors over a certain age, and the vestry prepared for the use of the sheriff a complete list of such delinquents. In Virginia, the minister and the church-wardens, or the church-wardens alone, were intrusted with the checking of immoral practices. When elected, wardens were required to take the following oath, which is a clear outline of their duties: "You shall swear that you shall make presentments of all such persons as shall lead a prophayne or ungodlie life, of such as shall be common swearers, drunkards, or blasphemers, that shall ordinarilie profane the sabbath dayes or contemne God's holy word or sacraments. You shall also present all adulterers or fornicators, or such as shall abuse their neighbors by slandering, tale carryinge, or back bitinge, or such as shall not behave themselves orderlie and soberlie in the church duringe devyne servise. Likewise they shall present such maysters and mistrisses as shall be delinquent in the catechisinge the youth and ignorant persons. So helpe you God!!!" Fines for drunkenness, Sabbath-breaking, neglect to have children baptized, and absence from church were collected by the church-wardens, and it was their duty to see that in church every one had a seat commensurate with his wealth or position as in the New England meeting-house, and to remove from the church and place in the stocks all disorderly persons. For adultery and slander penance was done, though such an act did not always relieve the offender from liability to prosecution by the civil authorities.

Unnecessary journeys, hunting, card-playing, gatherings for non-religious purposes, on Sundays, were prohibited, and the duty of preventing or correcting such offenses and of compelling attendance upon service, which had once belonged to the captain of the watch during the military régime, was transferred to the church-warden, whose office in this and in many other respects differed but little from that of tithingman or sabbath-warden in Georgia and New England.

Foundlings and bastards were bound out by the churchman, and who also could sell for a service of five years a woman convicted of bastardy, if she refused to pay her fine, while the father had to protect the parish from any loss likely to arise from the care of his child. They were the guardians of the pulpit to prevent all but regularly qualified clergymen from officiating, and they had charge of the church decorations, linen, and vessels for the Sacrament. They provided at the cost of the parish the bread and wine for Communion, which was administered at least three times a year. The church-wardens in Maryland, when they attended the visitation of the commissary, were compelled to make reports concerning the conduct and character of the rectors, the condition of parish property, and offenses coming under the penal laws. They saw that means were provided for the burial of paupers, looked up the infirm poor and paid for their accommodation in private houses, and sent some to the workhouse. By the workhouse act in Virginia, of 1755 A.D., the church-wardens had authority to commit a vagrant to the workhouse, and they were to keep a register of the poor in the parish. The last official in the parish was the sexton, having about the same duties as the present. Such was the parish in Southern colonies, in which were reproduced, as occasion required, with new features to suit different surroundings, the laws and customs of old England. But there grew up in the Northern colonies, from Pennsylvania to Maine, where there was opposition to a Church of England establishment, a system of Episcopal societies or congregations known as poll parishes, which meant either a body of Churchmen under one rector, somewhat resembling the ancient парокия, or this body with their estates. There was a partial exception in the province of New York, where at the same time were both poll and territorial parishes, and even in Philadelphia there was a tendency towards the idea of a territorial division. For when St. Paul's Church was struggling for existence, it was written by Rev. Hugh Neill, that "All the Town Clergy had one point in view, and that was either to annihilate the Church, or bring them under the dominion of Christ Church Vestry; as it seems to be an established maxim among them, that if Philadelphia was fifty Miles Square and had two hundred Churches in it, they must be all subject to one Rector and one Vestry."

These organizations originated either in a number of Churchmen of the same neighborhood sending to England for a rector, or in the small congregation that some missionary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts had succeeded in gathering about him. The temporal affairs of such parishes were in the hands of church-wardens and vestrymen, whose number and mode of appointment differed widely in various sections. The general rule, however, was for the parishioners to elect them, annually, though sometimes the rector appointed one of the wardens. The church-wardens were the agents or executive officers of the vestry, whose meetings they called. In the early part of the eighteenth century there was held a Convention of clergymen from New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, who proposed to do without vestries, but this did not meet with approval, and vestries continued to exist. They were of two kinds, one composed of the church-wardens and congregation, the other of church-wardens and vestrymen, in number ranging from twenty to two. Their duties were only such as related to Church affairs and were quite similar to those of present vestries. Occasionally vestrymen were appointed to civil offices, not as vestrymen, however, but as representative members of the Church of England. The minister was necessary to the complete organization of a parish, and to accomplish this the Bishop of London was made the first rector of Trinity Church Parish, New York. The ministers were supported by stipends from the government, by funds of the Society, or by private subscriptions. In the New England colonies Churchmen gained gradually the right of exemption from town rates. By a law of 1735 A.D., town treasurers in Massachusetts were obliged to pay to the minister of the Church of England the taxes collected from such of his parishioners as could prove that they were regular in their attendance upon his services. In the Declaration of Rights, in Maryland, made in 1776 A.D., there was a like provision. No one sect alone could be aided by the State, but the Legislature could impose a tax for the support of religion, and each person could designate to whom his quota should be paid. Rectors were either chosen by the vestries, appointed as in New York by the governor, or inducted by the vestries after presentation to the Bishop of London. In induction were without doubt the germs of the later office of institution. The vestry sent a deputy to the Bishop of London to recommend a desirable person for the rectorship. If all things were agreeable the Bishop gave to the minister a certificate and license, which were read to the vestry and congregation. All then left the church, the senior warden at the door giving the key to the minister, who locked himself in, tolled the bell, and, throwing open the door, welcomed his parishioners. But the American Revolution, which had been fomenting in vestry and town-meeting, checked the growth of the Church of England in America. The de-establishment of religion, the departure to England of many loyal clergymen for conscientious reasons, the rise of Methodism, and the general apathy if not hatred shown for the Church as such, produced disastrous results that at this day can hardly be appreciated. In those regions especially where the minister's support had depended upon taxes imposed by government, there seemed to be little hope of any kind of reorganization, and the churches in the North were strongly inclined to Congregationalism.

In some States the property of the Church remained in her possession, in others it was confiscated. As soon as the struggle was over, active movements were started for its organization upon an Episcopal basis. Conventions of the clergy had been held at intervals before the Revolution in some sections of New England annually. The idea was revived and extended to all the seaboard

States, and lay representation from parishes was developed. With the American Episcopate the Diocesan system was introduced, and in combining into Dioceses parishes had to relinquish certain privileges, and in time the civil duties of vestries were taken from them. To-day they exist for ecclesiastical purposes, controlled by Diocesan canons, and as civil corporations governed by State laws. The word parish is used, in rather a loose way, to designate the territorial parish, the poll parish, and the congregation, which is nearly the same as the poll parish. It is a recognized law or custom in some territorial parishes, that no new congregations within them can be admitted into union with the Diocesan Convention without asking the rector's consent. Parish affairs are controlled in some instances for special reasons by trustees, but generally by the "Rector, Church-wardens, and Vestrymen," who, as a corporate body, can make and enforce by-laws. But wide differences as to qualifications, number, and rights of vestries exist not only among different Dioceses, but among the parishes of single Dioceses. The General Convention of 1877 A.D. recognized this fact, and appointed a committee, who made an exhaustive report before the next General Convention on the "functions of Rectors, Wardens, and Vestrymen." In this report is shown with regret the prevailing want of uniformity, and suggestions are made which have been and should continue the ideal of parish organization in all Dioceses. To avoid unpleasant relations between rectors and vestries it was proposed that the Bishop should have something to say in the selection of a rector, for "according to the present laws of the Church, he has no right to say a word in reference to bringing into his Diocese, of which he is the sole custodian, and into his ecclesiastical family, of which he is the spiritual father, any minister who may be asked by a vestry to come into that Diocese, and take a place in that clerical family over which the Bishop presides." The opinions of the committee in regard to the functions of rector, wardens, and vestry may be summarized as follows: The rector being the ecclesiastical head of the parish, is president of the vestry, has control for parochial purposes of Church buildings, and, as a minister, is answerable to the authorized head of the Diocese only. The vestries and their representatives, the wardens, are guardians of the property and rights of the corporate parish, they can elect their rectors, whom they are bound to support, and to aid him as far as possible. A majority, if not all, of these officers ought to be communicants in the Church. If these suggestions were carried out faithfully there would be a unity in Church organization which would result in greater spirituality and increased usefulness.

EDWARD INGLE.

WORK IN A CITY PARISH.—We do not propose under this heading to say anything concerning the organization of a parish, its vestry, wardens, and other officers. Such matters are ruled by the Canons of each Diocese, or, failing these, by the Canons of the whole Church in the United States. Information upon such points must be sought from the Diocesan or other authorities. Our intention is to assume the existence of a parish such as may be found in any of our large cities, to consider the manner in which the work of such a parish is usually conducted, and perhaps to offer some suggestions for the better and more efficient management of the same. And first of—

The Church.—The church building is the centre of the life and work of the parish. It ought to be emphatically the Religious House of the people. In the older countries of Europe, and perhaps especially in rural districts, this is much more the case than is generally to be found among ourselves. There the Church has stood in the midst of the homes of the people perhaps for many hundreds of years, and has gathered around it a mass of history, tradition, and association, making it very dear to their hearts. The more fixed habits of the people, and the different character of parish organizations, have no doubt much to do with this. The parish there is a territory lying all around the church building, and every resident within its circumference has a right, whether he exercises it or not, to speak of "my parish," "my parish church." Many an emigrant, driven by necessity to seek our shores, has felt that the hardest wrench of all in leaving his native land was the separation from his church. In it he and all his family had been baptized, there he had been married, around it in the quiet church-yard lay the remains of many generations of his forefathers, in it he had many a time received words of cheer for daily troubles, and in the clergyman he had always found a kind friend and sympathetic adviser. It is much to be desired that the church should hold a larger place in the lives and hearts of American Church people than now it does.

The church should be worthy of its place in the parish. Pleasant, bright, and attractive, for the sake of the people; stately and richly furnished as may be, for the glory of God.

There should be in it all to teach by eye and influence as well as by words spoken. Children should feel instinctively that it is no common house into which they have come, and should be early taught habits of reverence. The emblems of salvation upon walls and altar should remind "How dreadful is this place, this is none other than the House of God, this is the gate of Heaven."

To be the home of the people the Church must be open all day that they may come in at any time and say a prayer, and feel a halloving influence touching the weary and commonplace every-day life. It is well, too, that they should be able to find their clergyman there in vestry or parish room, either at stated times or by frequent appointments, that in any difficulty or sorrow they may know where they will be sure to find a friend.

In addition to the main building of the Church, with its chancel, transepts, nave, and vestries, there need to be for its efficient working suitable parish rooms, where parish business may be transacted, charities dispensed, and Bible-classes or other classes for instruction held. And further, there must be one or more large rooms for Sunday-school purposes or large gatherings of the parishioners on social and business occasions. Many Churches have such rooms now, and often call them mistakenly chapels. We say mistakenly, for a chapel is but a small church, and should have its altar and other church-like fittings, and should only be used for sacred purposes, as the Church itself. Magic-lanterns, Christmas-trees, and social gatherings are as much out of place in the Chapel as they are in the Church itself; while they have their appropriate place in school-room or lecture-room, and are useful agencies in parochial work.

Clergy.—It is impossible that a City Parish, if it has any large number of communicants and is to have any number of good works or organizations connected with it, and still more if it is to be a missionary work towards the neighboring population, can be worked efficiently by one clergyman alone. Two, or still better, three, are needed.

If these men are single, they should live together in a clergy-house in the neighborhood of the Church, even though that neighborhood is poor and unattractive. A clergyman living away from his Church, for whatever reason, is sure more or less to fail in his work.

If, as is generally the case, the Rector of the parish is married, the assistants will probably not be, and they can live together in some suitable house. The strength that comes from sharing work with another and feeling mutual sympathy in all cares and labors cannot be measured.

Where three or more men are working together thus, the assistants may be chosen for special gifts. We are getting to expect too much of our clergy. It is not reasonable to expect to find in every clergyman a man who is at once a deep theologian, an eloquent preacher, a good financier, a skillful organizer, a discreet spiritual guide, an accomplished musician to superintend the choir, and of great and acceptable social gifts. All these qualities may well be found and efficiently used for the service of the Church where several men are living and working together.

The power of a parish is marvelously increased when it is felt that whatever the hour, whatever the need, whether among its own people or strangers, at their church or clergy-house, a clergyman can always be found ready and willing to aid.

Lay-Helpers.—But even where there are many clergy they must not be left to do all the work, the laity have their share.

Foremost, perhaps, among Lay-helpers are Sisters of Charity. We say advisedly Sisters, not a Sisterhood. A Sisterhood is no part of parish work. It is something altogether outside and independent of ordinary parochial work. It is autonomous, electing its own Superior and making its own rules, taking in and dismissing its own members, and directing and controlling its own work.

By Sisters we mean a small company, or two or more Sisters, sent out from some Sisterhood to do work in some parish. In their own house, which must be near the Church and distinctly set apart for them, they keep their own rule of life, but in all their work they are directed by the clergyman of the parish. It were well that the number thus working should not be less than three, so that a change of one might be made from time to time, as there was occasion for one or another to return to her community, without disturbing the general work they were engaged in.

Such Sisters, associating other ladies with themselves, would visit the poor and sick in their homes, administering necessary comforts of life, thus securing greater efficiency in the work by wise direction, and saving much time to the clergy. The sick and poor will often receive their words of spiritual counsel and help which hardly reach them from other lips.

Sisters will naturally gather girls around them, moulding them for good and raising their moral tone by such associations. Guilds and confraternities for girls of all ages may well be carried on under their direction. In many places their work has been very powerful among lads and young men, who, turning aside from other men and keeping away in timidity from the clergymen, are won in true, manly, and chivalrous feeling by the gentle influence of a high-minded, tender-hearted, and religious woman. The ladies working with the Sisters cannot but be helped themselves. Indeed, there seems no limit to the influence for good in a city parish that may be exercised by such a little company of devoted Sisters.

Other methods of lay-help will be what we have just hinted at, the visiting of the poor and sick by others than the Sisters. This work, generally delegated to women, may well be shared in by men. Indeed, in many cases, the work may be far better done by men whose business habits, trained minds, and strong resolution can hardly be more usefully exercised than for the benefit of the poor and sick.

The Sunday-school calls for lay-help, the choir also, and the workingmen's club and reading-room, if such there be.

Sunday-schools are too large a topic to be spoken of here. This much may be said,—the Sunday-school must be under the eye and direction of one of the clergy. Let one of the assistants have it as a special care. Let him appoint every superintendent and teacher. Let him know every child by face and name, and be able to greet all with an appropriate word. Let him direct the lessons and catechise the children. When the Sunday-school is thus worked there ought to be a school in which the children feel themselves at home, and that their Church loves and cares for them; in which the teachers may feel that theirs is a real work for God; in which teachers, children, and clergy alike are banded together and go forward lovingly in devotion to God and faithful service to His Church.

The choir, too, should be ruled on a similar plan. Let one of the clergy be in charge and have the general direction of the music. He need not train the choir, but be the friend of all. Let every man and boy feel that he is known and has a share in his clergyman's interest, and a high tone of life as well as of singing may be maintained. The choir should never be a singing party, or club, apart from the clergy. Every adult member should be a regular communicant, and every boy baptized and looking forward to his confirmation. No unbaptized person should ever be allowed to take an official part in the services of the Church, nor any person outside the fold, unless in some exceptional instance where one is earnestly seeking and preparing for admission.

Enough here has been said to indicate the tone that ought to be maintained in the choir, the subject is large enough to receive separate treatment. It may be added that it is better that none of the adult members of a choir be paid, but that they should give their services a free-will offering to the glory of God. Some small payment may be made to boys as insuring greater regularity at practices and more sustained interest.

Other forms of lay-help will occur, but too much stress cannot be laid upon the importance of the work of men in visiting the poor, and in teaching in the Sunday-school.

Services.—The hours of service must be suited to the habits and residences of the people, with some limitations. The great distance at which many parishioners live is a hindrance to church-going. It would be well if the lay-people would take this a little more into consideration when selecting a locality for their home.

Services must be frequent. The Daily Morning and Evening Prayer of the Church should be said in the principal church building of the parish, or in the chapel attached to it. In most city parishes it will be found well to have one or two early celebrations of Holy Communion during the week, looking forward to the time when they will be daily. This is a matter of real convenience when many members of a family are communicants and all cannot well leave home together on a Sunday morning. It also enables some to keep their birthdays or other anniversaries in the highest Christian method.

While an afternoon hour will generally be found most convenient for the Evening Prayer, some later services should be provided during the week for those whose hours of labor occupy them all the day. Such late evening services may be accompanied by sermon, lecture, or instruction, while the afternoon service may well be preceded or followed by a public Bible-class or meditation intended more especially for persons of inferior education; of course all Festivals of the Church and all Saints' Days will be observed by the celebration of Holy Communion and other services. It is sometimes found well to have a service with address on the evening before a Festival. The minds of the people are thus led on to think more of such days and give more heed to their observance.

In every well-worked city parish there will be at least one celebration of Holy Communion on every LORD'S DAY, generally there will be two, one early in the morning and one at a later hour. Probably 7.30 A.M. is the most convenient hour for the general communicants, but there may well be an occasional earlier service for servants, nurses, mothers of families, or others whose avocations employ them on Sundays as well as week-days.

The morning service at 10.30 or 11 A.M. is generally the best attended, and care should be taken to make the sermons and teaching of an educational as well as hortatory character. Sunday morning church-goers are oftentimes those to whom church-going is a mere habit, and who have little appreciation of the great spiritual realities that underlie the teachings and practices of the Church.

The afternoon service may well be devoted to children. If the Sunday-school meets at 2.30 or 3 P.M., a bright service in Church at 3.30 will be found very attractive. In our opinion the forms of service given in most Service-books for children are very objectionable. Let the older children be taught to attend the regular services of the Church, and to use their Prayer-Books, but at the children's service, which is intended distinctly for the young, let the Service be as simple as possible.

A processional Hymn, the Creed, a Metrical Litany, sung kneeling, followed by the Lord's Prayer and a Collect, is sufficient. Then let there be a short lesson from Scripture, another Hymn, and after that a bright address or catechising of not more than fifteen minutes, ending with another Hymn, a Collect, and the Blessing. The service will be about forty minutes, and the children's interest sustained throughout. Children get very fond of a service intended for themselves. Such service should not be limited to the children of the Sunday-school, but all parents belonging to the Parish may be invited to bring or send their little ones.

In some city parishes it will be found well to have the Evening Prayer on Sunday at 4.30 or 5 P.M., either with or without a sermon, and then to have a later service, when the office will be less formal and liturgical and the preaching of a character more adapted to mission work.

With regard to the time for Communion, the practice of receiving in the middle of the day is very much a matter of habit, and a little instruction will show the more intelligent of our Church people the better way of rising early, even at the cost of a little self-denial, to receive the Bread of Life. As we write, a parish occurs to us, where out of 520 communicants on an Easter-day, 470 received before 8.30 A.M. There were on that day celebrations at 6, 7, and 8 A.M., as well as at the 10.30 service.

Sermons.—The sermon is a most important factor in the life of the parish. Without exalting preaching above praying, this must be distinctly recognized. The majority of people do not read much, either in the Bible or in books of religious instruction. For the greater number their teaching comes altogether from the lips of the preacher.

Preachers need to remember this, and to make their preaching instructive. They must not think that the people in general know all that they ought to do, and the reasons why such things should be done, and only need to be moved to action by impassioned appeals. It is not really so, and many an earnest appeal is made in vain because the doctrines, or Scripture facts, upon which the appeal is founded are unknown.

For this reason instructive sermons are needed, and also instructions in addition to sermons. It is most useful to have set times for instruction, pure and simple, apart from homiletics and exhortation. Such instructions may well follow sermons on Sunday evenings, as they do in the course of Parochial Missions; or they may be given in connection with a week-day afternoon or evening service.

So much has been said by all sorts of teachers upon the subject of preaching that little need be said here, but the foregoing hints will be found useful and practical in working in a city parish.

Mission Chapels.—Subsidiary to the church building, in which the chief services of the Parish are conducted, and round which its life centres, may be small mission rooms, or mission chapels.

These may be located in the poorest localities of the city, being made out of some store or stable, clean, simply colored, and made bright with pictures. Here may be gathered a little Sunday-school of shabbily-dressed children, and on Sunday evenings a miscellaneous company, including many who could not be got within a church door. The Sunday-school may be worked entirely by Laymen, young or old, and so also may the evening service, if a really competent man can be found to speak. Written sermons in such places are worse than useless, but it will be well for the Rector or one of the assistants to go round from time to time with words of kindly interest. No Sacraments will be administered in such rooms, but the people will be led on to the Parish Church. It is not proposed that such places shall become in time parishes, but that they shall always retain their missionary character as feeders to the central church. As one family or individual after another is raised in religious, and therefore social life, or is prepared to receive Sacraments, he will be handed on to the parish itself, though he may still remain attached to the mission room as a helper for the sake of his influence upon others. Many a soul now in Paradise praises God for the work of conversion begun in some such simple room.

Societies.—There is much to be said for and against the multiplication of Societies within the Parish. Some we must have, and they are useful in organizing work and employing workers, but it is easy to have too much machinery.

Some that seem the most useful may be mentioned. A Temperance Society with both adult and juvenile branches. It is better that this should be a branch of the Church Temperance Society on its comprehensive basis, than a merely local organization.

A society for young girls, such as the Girls' Friendly Society, is a real need, and also some similar Guild or Society for boys.

It is extremely doubtful if large, mixed Parochial Guilds and Societies do good in proportion to the amount of labor they involve, and whether they do not really hinder work. All parishioners ought to be working in some way or another, whereas the existence of a Guild or Rector's Aid Society may hurt the workers, those not belonging to it giving that as a reason why they need not work.

An organization for distinctly spiritual purposes may be really valuable, in which, for instance, all the members undertake to keep a spiritual rule of life. An association for intercessory prayer, in which the obligation is to give a certain time to this work every day, and also meet together from time to time for united intercessions, is of great use in building up the true spiritual life of the parish.

An Altar Society is also desirable, not for the purpose of raising money, but to bind together in work and with a Rule of Prayer those who have leisure to care personally for the sanctuary and its furniture, or can occupy themselves in the necessary needle-work, embroidery, or washing of linen, etc.

In working among the poor advantage should be taken of any societies existing in the city, whether connected with the Church or not. In many places, as Philadelphia, Buffalo, Boston, and New York, there are Charity Organization Societies of various kinds. Clergy and visitors among the poor will do wisely to work in harmony with all such, and will find their own labors lightened thereby. It does not seem well to have a distinct society in the parish for the care of the poor, but still such work must be done methodically and under direction. If there are Sisters of Charity connected with the parish, it will naturally fall under their care. If none such can be had, individual visitors should be asked to care for individual cases, meeting together occasionally for mutual counsel and advice. Such meetings might be held weekly and be presided over by one of the clergy, or better still, by some competent layman.

Foreign and Domestic Missions must not be omitted, but this ought not to be a matter for personal solicitation and collections. It is the duty of Christians to give for such purposes, and such duty should form part of the regular instruction of the people, so that when the offerings are made at stated times the contributions of the parishioners may be forthcoming as a matter of course.

Finances.—Finances generally need a few words. The Scriptural mode of dealing with the matter is that the Church shall be free to all, and that all expenses be met by the free-will offerings of the people laying up as God has prospered them. Where this plan has been tried in faith and prayer it has not failed.

To win the young, the timid, and the poor, the Church must be free. Such are willing to come, and will give of their means to support the Church and its works, but they are not equal to the effort involved in taking a pew. Many, too, will come to free churches who would feel themselves pledged or compromised by taking a seat before they at all see their way to come out on the side of God and of His Church.

In free churches the envelope system is often tried, whereby persons pledge themselves to give certain amounts weekly or monthly through the year. By this means a fixed sum is guaranteed, and the wardens do not live in any anticipation that they will not be able to meet their liabilities. This plan has its advantages, though to some it may seem rather to take away the freedom of giving. Of course, however, where this plan is adopted, any person can add at will to his or her weekly contribution.

Permanence.—As we write a continually recurring thought is, But all this takes time to work out, and much of this work and these plans can only be tested by years of patient labor; and we live in an age of restlessness and change. People move, clergy move, there is little fixity at present in any of our Church work.

This is, unfortunately, true, and it is a reason why our city parishes will hardly ever reach that high state of efficient organization and work which may be seen by visitors to London and other great English cities. The people there are much more fixed in their homes and habits, while the Rector is almost an absolute permanency.

Whether the English plan by which a Rector once installed settles down and accepts the parish as his life-work, as by far the greater number of Rectors do, there being no power to displace him so long as he observes ecclesiastical law, could ever be naturalized in our country, or would work well if it were so naturalized, is a question. We do, however, need more stability. Clergy ought to be more content with their positions, and not be continually looking upon them as simply steps to something better. Parishioners, too, should be content with their Rector as he grows in years. He may, perhaps, lose something of brightness and freshness, but this is more than compensated for by the added experience and knowledge of his people. A younger assistant can always be found to meet the thoughts and wishes of younger people. A continual succession of young, inexperienced men is fatal to any spiritual growth in the parish.

So, too, with residences. We do change too much. And when we change we think far too little about our Church. It is not creditable that so many Church people, after they have secured a home and are comfortably settled, suddenly finding themselves far removed from any Church, should say, "I never thought of asking about the Church." No Christian has a right for mere purposes of comfort or money-getting to exile himself from the means of grace.

If the Rector remains at his post and gives time and energy to know and work among his people, and his people loyally and faithfully stand by him, all bearing and forbearing with one another, and all heart and soul in the work to which God calls each, a growing interest will be created, and the parish will increase in strength, efficiency, and spiritual life, and be fruitful not only in good works, but in a harvest of souls to the glory of God.

REV. EDWARD OSBORNE.

HOW TO ESTABLISH A COUNTRY CONGREGATION.—In establishing a country parish, the first requirement is a Rectory. The presence of the minister should be a fixed and recognized fact, and he should be secured against landlords and rivalry. In preparing to build, every one should be asked to have a share, thus enlisting interest. Many small offerings from many persons are far preferable to one of even greater amount from a single giver. And a score of churches could be built while congregations of men of small means are waiting for some rich and generous person to do all for them. Happily, for spiritual good and education in sustaining parishes afterwards, such events are comparatively rare. As the whole cost seems large to people who, really or in fancy, will always be "poor," write down each article needed, windows, furniture, etc., with its price, and many will agree with alacrity to place their names opposite as pledged workers, and will raise the small sum in a few months, who could not be aroused to the seemingly hopeless task of "helping to build a church." Scores can be found who will readily give one cent a day, who would be regarded liberal if, at the end of a year, they gave a dollar, who yet, by system, cards, and collectors, will even more cheerfully in the year give much more, and feel it less. It is marvelous how rapidly the whole amount thus accumulates. If all will thus give, there will be less disposition to engage in fairs and other expedients often more hurtful than leaving the church unbuilt, and hindering to the necessary acquirement of learning how to give from principle. As a matter of economy, whatever furniture is procured should be handsome and of the kind needed for the church. As soon as a room can be had, let the minister open a Sunday-school. If good teachers of sufficient number cannot be obtained, the minister should teach for a short time, and then drill in a part of the Church service. As Evening Prayer is the shorter of the two, it would be well, as soon as the children have learned two or three chants and hymns, to have regular Evening Service, with the scholars as the choir; this to be followed by catechising in place of a sermon, and enriched by anecdotes, but especially Bible stories. Brief catechising every Sunday should be a matter of course. Let the first books used be Prayer-Books and Church Hymnals. The "Nursery of the Church" should not drill for the Church in substitutes or imitations of her Liturgy, nor can we afford to expend brief time and limited opportunity in teaching hymns, good or bad, which have no place in her services. How to take their place in our worship is the lesson for our scholars, and they will delight as much in using the Prayer-Book and Hymnal, as in the ephemeral Liturgies and books of song which do nothing towards instructing in the Church. This will do much to solve the problem, "How to retain the older scholars in the Church." Each class should engage in work for some article of furniture.

The organization of a vestry should be deferred for a year or two, and until the men understand something of the Church's system and their peculiar duties. In some Dioceses the property can be vested in the Bishop. A treasurer, if desired, could be appointed by the minister. Two or three trustees could act for a year or two, when a vestry could be elected, and the organization effected.

Faithful visiting, avoidance of controversy, cottage meetings, spirited services, preaching, good common sense, and a loving spirit will commend the Church anywhere. We want no better "plan" or "system." Give the Church its opportunity, which it has not always enjoyed, without diluting or laying aside what we have for seemingly successful experiments, and we have all we need to plant the Church even in villages or country where others have failed.

REV. T. G. LITTELL.

Parochial Missions. We use the phrase "Parochial Missions" advisedly that we may at once clearly distinguish for our readers the nature of that of which we speak. We do not speak of "Missions" in the sense of mission stations permanently established with a view to future churches and parishes; nor yet of missions to the heathen, whether foreign or domestic, conducted by the Central or any Diocesan Board. We speak of missions of and the kind comparatively new and untried in the American branch of the Church Catholic.

By a Parochial Mission we understand a special effort made in a parish already existing and having a corporate life, lasting during a limited period, and intended to build up the parish in its life and work, to deepen the spiritual life of the individual members, and to draw others in the town or neighborhood within hearing of the Gospel, that they may also become partakers of the spiritual blessings held out to them in the Church of CHRIST.

I. A Parochial Mission implies a parish and a clergyman in charge of it. It involves much labor in preparation, and more still in carrying on the works that may result from the mission, and harvesting fruit from the seed sown.

A mission is not a substitute for the ordinary labors of a parish, such as services, sermons, house to house visiting, and the like. It is something added to all the organization and work of a parish, to fill these with new spirit and energy, and to supplement them by accomplishing that which they are not intended or are unable to do.

We can imagine a parish, long settled and solvent, with a church in good repair and well attended; a congregation drawn in average proportion from various walks of life; a fair number of communicants, the greater number of whom, however, are women; Lent and other Church seasons observed by somewhat more frequent services; the charities of the parish sustained; the Sunday-school in good order; a good feeling existing between clergyman and people, the former having been in the parish some years and knowing his flock and feeling himself at home with them. Such a parish might be accounted by some a model parish.

And yet the clergyman has a feeling, shared with him by some of the more devout lay-people, that all is not just as it ought to be. Perhaps the feeling is hard to describe. He is conscious of a want. He takes pains with his sermons, but there is a want of result; the words seem to have become familiar and to have lost their power with the people. The number of Eucharists may be increased with the increase of the parish, but the number of Communion made by individuals does not grow. Even the young people coming forward for Confirmation seem to do it in a formal way without the earnestness he desires to see. The parish works go on, as Guilds and other societies, but there is a lack of zeal. Besides this, there seems to be a cessation of the power of the parish as a missionary centre. Outsiders do not come, the people of the neighborhood are not affected by it, there are many, it may be living close by the Church, either poor or of the well-to-do classes, who disregard the Church and her services, who never heed the LORD'S Day, who practically, though so near the Church, are living without God in the world.

Here is the exact field for a Parochial Mission. "We want stirring up." "We want a revival, only we can't have that in the Church." "We want deepening in some way." "What is to be done?" A Parochial Mission is the answer.

II. For a Parochial Mission is a Church Revival, a time of awakening and stirring up, a "time of refreshing from the presence of the LORD."

It is a special and earnest attempt to bring all the agencies the Church has at command to bear upon those both within and without her fold, an attempt carried on vigorously for from seven to fourteen days, and, if possible, for a longer time, with many services, sermons, and instructions at different hours and suited to different classes of persons. There will be Eucharists at which many can be present and pray. There will be spiritual instructions adapted to those who have made some advance in spiritual things, and more elementary addresses to beginners. There will also be opportunities for intercession by those who have learned to pray, and rousing sermons with burning words appealing to those who never have bent the knee, or have given up the good habits of their childhood. The children of the parish, too, will not be forgotten, but have some opportunities provided when suitable words may be spoken to them, for though the mission is mainly for adults, still the young ones of the flock are capable of being interested and drawn nearer to God; through them, too, some of the parents may be reached. Special addresses will also be given to men and women separately, bearing upon their own special difficulties, temptations, and sins. Something may also be done for the young men and women just growing into manhood and womanhood, with life and its joys and temptations opening before them.

It will be seen at once that a mission in the Church differs from an ordinary Methodist revival in this great characteristic,—it is not simply a call to the unconverted, but while it is that, it is also a call to the converted and faithful members of the Church to a higher and closer walk with God, to more faithful and devoted lives in His service.

III. It may be fitting to say a word here of the origin of Parochial Missions. Like very many other things which mark the revived life of the English Church, and of our own branch of it, they had their origin in France.

St. Vincent de Paul, when chaplain to the De Gondi family, was called to minister to a dying peasant. He found to his horror that this man, though using the sacraments of the Church and living an outwardly respectable life, was yet in a state of most grievous sin which he had neither confessed nor attempted to overcome. Impressed with the thought that there were probably many others in the same condition, he preached on the Feast of the conversion of St. Paul, 1617 A.D., on the subject of a general confession. The effect of this sermon was so great that he had to send to Amiens for other clergy to help him in ministering to the people whose consciences were aroused. So encouraging were the results of this his first mission, that it was determined to set on foot others in other villages and towns, and to secure suitable preachers for the work. From this arose the Congregation of Mission Priests, or Lazarists, as they are sometimes called, an order of Priests in the French Church dedicated to this special work. Other religious orders, as the Dominicans, Passionists, and Redemptionists, have also engaged in it, and Parochial Missions have now become a recognized part of the system of the Roman branch of the Church.

John Wesley and others had long seen the need of some such work in the Church of England, but it was not until about 1869 A.D. that their thoughts and wishes took shape. In that year a mission was organized in the city of London, in which some sixty churches took part. The success of this effort and the many blessings following it caused Parochial Missions to be fully accepted in the Church of England. In 1874 A.D. the Bishop of London, Rochester, and Winchester organized another mission for London, in which nearly three hundred churches shared, and now a third is planned to take place in 1884 A.D., only, owing to the magnitude of the city, it has been determined to divide it into two sections and hold a mission for each section at different seasons.

From London the influence spread, until every large city and town in England has had its united mission, and many a small village and parish besides. It would not be easy to say how many of the thousands of parishes of the Church of England either have had, or are looking forward to, the time when in the near future they will have the benefit of Parochial Missions.

The need of men fitted for the work has been felt in England just as it was in France, and in several of the Dioceses Missionary Brotherhoods have been formed whose members are Priests, and in the Dioceses of Lichfield and Oxford laymen also, set apart for the special undertaking of preaching Parochial Missions.

In our own Church a beginning has also been made. The city of Baltimore stands alone, as far as we know, in having had a general mission in which the greater number of the churches of the city took part, but there have been a considerable number of missions in separate parishes in other cities and towns; Boston, Newark, N. J., Hoboken, Chicago, Cleveland, O., Utica, N. Y., Philadelphia, St. Louis, Springfield, O., Tilton, N. H., Louisville, Ky., Nashua, N. H., Kansas City, and others come into our mind as we write. Many missions have also been preached in Canada, as, for instance, in Toronto, Halifax, Montreal, Quebec, St. John, and other smaller places.

IV. It may be asked, What is the nature of the preaching, and what are the subjects of instruction, during such a mission? Perhaps the best answer will be to subjoin a full list of Sermons and Instructions given in a mission in Trinity Church, Utica, N. Y., in Advent, 1882 A.D., taken from the Earnest Worker, the parish paper.

Each sermon, except on Sunday mornings, was followed by an Instruction, the subjects being, What is a Mission? On making the Mission profitable. Conversion. Self-examination. Repentance. Confession of Sin. Pardon of Sin. Mission Resolutions. The Blessed Sacrament. Perseverance.

Addresses were given at mid-day upon Prayer, and at 4 P.M. on each week-day there was a Bible-class upon the life of St. John Baptist. Four special services for children were held. Two addresses were given to men on "The Image of God in Man by Creation" and "The Restoration of the Image of God in the Incarnation." One address was given to young women, and a Temperance Meeting was also held, at which a Branch of the Church Temperance Society was organized. On the first day there was an address to Church-Workers, and on the first Saturday night a Prayer-Meeting. The opening address of the Mission was given by the Bishop of the Diocese, who commended the Mission Preacher to the prayers and attention of the people. The Mission began on Friday evening and lasted until the morning of the Wednesday week following. In addition to the sermons, etc., the Holy Eucharist was celebrated on each morning, and Matins and Even-song were also said.

Where so many sermons or instructions are given in so short a space of time (forty-eight in eleven days at the above Mission), there must be some course of teaching to avoid mere repetition. In this the power of a Mission comes out. One thought can be taken and fully dwelt upon, and then before it is forgotten or the effect has passed from the mind of the hearers another is brought forward, bearing upon the former and enforcing it, and the soul is by this roused to attention and stirred to action.

This result is also attained by the use in many instances of what are sometimes known as "after-meetings." Generally an Instruction on some point of Christian Faith or Practice follows the evening sermon, but this is occasionally omitted, and an after-meeting either in the church or some adjacent room substituted. At such meetings the speaking is of a more personal and experimental character, the Missioner going round the room and addressing himself to one after another with the invitations of the Gospel. Several prayers are offered, either extempore or in the form of a Litany. Others engage in the work, conversing with individuals and endeavoring to lead them to repentance or faith in the LORD JESUS. Such workers are either men or women, Sisters of Charity, or simply private persons. The results of such after-meetings are often remarkably great and happy.

It will be understood from the foregoing that the Services at the time of the Mission are of the simplest character, without the ordinary formality. Matins and Even-song are generally said on week-days unaccompanied by any sermon or address. At the Mission Services proper there will generally be a Hymn, a few verses of Scripture, the LORD'S Prayer, and a few Collects, followed by the Sermon; after the Sermon a few more Collects will be said, or perhaps some words of extempore prayer. A form of Confession from the Prayer-Book or the opening sentences of the Litany are profitably used, or a penitential Psalm. Anything in the way of a musical service or choral singing would be entirely inappropriate. For this reason a volunteer choir is often better than the usual choir of the Church, whom it is difficult to move out of their accustomed manner of choral praise.

Much, or elaborate, music would destroy the penitential character of the work of the Mission. All deepening of spiritual influences must be accompanied by deepening penitence, and everything in the services should conduce to this end. In churches where variously-colored altar-cloths and hangings are used, violet is that chosen for the season of a Mission.

The last service of the Mission will generally be of a more joyful character; indeed, the TE DEUM is often sung as an appropriate thanksgiving to Almighty God that He has allowed the work to be brought to a successful issue.

V. In addition to the public teaching, there will be the fullest opportunity afforded for free intercourse between the preacher and those of his hearers desiring explanation, instruction, or spiritual help in their own lives. Such intercourse may be simply in the way of conversation over special needs and difficulties, or in the way of more formal use of the confession and absolution provided by the Church for souls burdened with a sense of sin.

It has always been found that this personal intercourse is the most important part of the work. There are many who find it difficult to speak to their own Pastor, meeting him frequently in daily life, who will open their hearts readily to a stranger; and many, who have long wished to speak to some clergyman upon spiritual matters, but to whom the right moment seems never to have come, are glad to avail themselves of the special opportunity which the Mission affords. Half the benefit of sermons is lost because the impression made is allowed to pass away. A few moments alone with the clergyman, with heartfelt words of counsel and an earnest prayer and blessing, will many a time save that which is most precious.

VI. Of course such a work as we have described needs preparation to make it really effectual. The preparation should in no case be less than three months.

The earnest communicants of the Parish should be asked to remember the proposed mission in their prayers, and especially at the time of the Eucharist. Bands of workers may be organized who will distribute tracts or papers inviting to the mission. The young people should be sought, and all those who, having been confirmed and become communicants, are known to have fallen away; the opportunity of a return to means of grace will be urged upon them. The clergyman and his workers will be careful to visit all persons living in the neighborhood of the church, whether attendants or not at any place of worship, and invite them to be present. Curiosity may bring some who will stay for better reasons, and there are in every community anxious souls who will be thankful to hear of such a work and occasion, on which mayhap they will obtain that which they are longing for.

A volunteer choir should be formed to supplement or take the place of the ordinary choir, and bright, stirring hymns be well rehearsed, that the singing throughout the Mission may be hearty and congregational.

A weekly or fortnightly Prayer-Meeting for special intercession will be found most helpful, persons being invited to send in special cases to be prayed for.

All such preparation carefully and thoughtfully made will tend to create a feeling of reality in the minds and hearts of the people. A great opportunity is really coming, a message to which they must give heed, a voice from God in their midst, a call to change their lives in some way; all this and more will come to them and prepare them to cry out and seek for the blessing of God upon themselves, their parish, and all those around.

VII. After the mission much remains to be done. At the closing services of the mission "Resolution Papers" are given away, that those who have received benefit may write upon them some good resolution by which the impression made may be fixed and become lasting, obtaining the signature of the Mission Preacher as a witness. It is for the parish clergyman to help such to keep their resolutions. Some will need instruction for Baptism, Confirmation, or Holy Communion, and for these classes must be formed without delay. Others who have been deeply moved desire to learn more of spiritual things that they may go forward. For these it is well to have one or more Bible-classes,—if none exist to which they can be invited. Special instructions upon various matters of doctrine or practice which have been brought prominently forward by the Mission may be usefully given at convenient times. In some cases it is well to organize a Parish Guild, or a Guild for some special class in the parish,—e. g., boys or young men. A Temperance Society may also be begun, or a branch of the Girls' Friendly Society. Nothing better can be used than a meeting for prayer and intercession. To this many will gladly come, and brief spiritual instruction on the deeper things of the Christian life may well be joined with it.

VIII. The results of the mission must be left until the Day of the Revelation of JESUS CHRIST. Some things will be seen, as increased attendance at church and at Holy Communion, an increasing number of candidates for Confirmation, more liberal offerings for Church purposes, perhaps the clearing off of some debt, a greater desire on the part of individuals to take an active part in the work of the parish, a distinct increase in the attendance at church of men; all these may be thankfully noted. But the mission preacher and the parish clergyman must often be content to labor and leave other men to enter into their labors.

It is not to be expected that all the parishioners will be benefited, nor that all will approve. Many careless ones will dislike to be aroused. Many staid, old-fashioned people may object because a mission is something new and, in their judgment, sensational. Possibly there may be some opposition to be overcome and much prejudice to be encountered in a spirit of faith and prayer.

In connection with the matter of prejudice, it is to be observed that these Parochial Missions have been adopted by every section of the Church, and have been prepared for, and also preached by, men of very varying shades of theological opinion and belief. Of course in every case the parish clergyman will be careful to secure the services of a preacher who is in full sympathy with himself and whom he can fully trust in every respect.

IX. This brings us to the last, and for some reasons hardest, part of our subject. Who is to preach such a mission? Where are the men to be found who are capable of giving from forty to fifty sermons or addresses on ten or more consecutive days, keeping up and deepening the interest of the hearers? Where are the men who have sufficient experience in dealing with spiritual things to be able to meet and deal well and wisely with the many souls who may come to them for counsel and help during the course of a mission?

Such men are greatly needed in the Church. We need Orders of men trained for the work. Men with no parochial ties, who can go from place to place as they are needed, at the invitation of the parish clergyman or Bishop of the Diocese. The number needed is large, for the work is growing, and where it is possible two preachers should always go together.

We have already the Society of St. John the Evangelist, with its houses in Boston and Philadelphia, and the more recently organized Society of the Holy Cross in New York, but these only represent one section of the Church's thought and teaching, and are but few in number. We have heard that in some Dioceses an effort has been made under the direction of the Bishop to associate together men adapted for the work. Where there is a Cathedral with staff of clergy, some of the Canons might well be set apart for this distinctive form of labor.

Meantime, the help of the parochial clergy must be sought by their brethren. The number of sermons, etc., does not seem so great and overwhelming when it is remembered that they are arranged in courses and are preached to strangers, and not to those among whom the clergyman is daily visiting. Many clergymen who have had the benefit of Missions in their own parishes might, from the experience there gained, be able to go forth to aid their brethren.

Still there is a need, and a growing one, of men for the work. We cannot doubt that as the need is felt God will be pleased to raise up men to supply it. For this it would become all Churchmen interested in the true spiritual growth of their Church to pray.

X. The last word must be a financial one. Of course the Mission Preacher receives nothing for his services, but is put to no expense for traveling or board. The expense for tracts and papers will be from twenty-five to fifty dollars, according to the size of the parish and number required. This and the necessary expenses of the preacher or preachers will readily be met by a collection on the last day of the Mission only (there should be none on the other days), supplemented by the free-will offerings of some of the wealthier parishioners. The expense should not be allowed to fall upon the clergyman of the parish.

REV. EDWARD OSBORNE.

Parson. The Priest set over a congregation is called a Parson (from the Latin Persona), because he is the representative of the Church, representing her in that Parish, and having certain legal rights, and too, certain responsibilities in the eye of the law. He is the holder of all the rights, temporal and spiritual, belonging to his office in relation to the Parish over which he is placed, and he is also answerable for all the affairs of the Parish which fall within the purview of his office. But the title does not occur in the Canons of the American Church. The titles used to describe this office are Rector or Minister in charge of a congregation. We have dropped the titles Curate and Parson from our Canons, and in fact the word Parson is retained only in common parlance. The canonical terms for those in holy orders (besides the three names Bishop, Priest, and Deacon) are Presbyter, Clergyman, Rector and Minister, and Assistant Minister. Vicar, Parson, and Curate have dropped out of our canonical usage. (Vide RECTOR.)

Parsonage. The house which should be provided by every parish as a residence for the Rector.

Paschal. Relating to Easter, or more correctly, to Easter through the Jewish Passover. It is the title of our LORD as the true Paschal Lamb. The Paschal Letters were letters written by Patriarchs and Archbishops to the Bishops within their jurisdiction, and by Canonical right, the letters written by the Pope of Alexandria to his brother Patriarchs to give the due notice of the true day on which Easter was to be observed in their several jurisdictions. There was also a famous controversy called the Paschal Controversy, which was set at rest by the Nicene Council, 325 A.D. Some claimed that Easter should be observed according to the Jewish rule, on the third day after the fourteenth day of the month Nisan, irrespective of the day of the week upon which it would fall,—the fourteenth of Nisan being the very day upon which our LORD's Passion and Death took place. This was a very early custom of the Asiatic Churches. But the Church at large followed the present rule of observing as Easter-day the Sunday after the fourteenth of Nisan. The controversy dates as early as the days of Polycarp (160 A.D.), and was carried to that pitch that Victor, Bishop of Rome, attempted to excommunicate those Asiatic Churches which followed the rule they claimed came to them from St. John.

Traces of these practices are found in the usage of the British Churches, which show the Ephesine origin of their foundation.

Easter is sometimes called the Paschal Feast.

Passing Bell. A bell which was tolled when any one was dying. The sixty-seventh Canon of 1603 A.D. enjoins, "When any is passing out of this life a bell shall be tolled, and the minister shall not then slack to do his last duty; and after the party's death (if it so fall out) there shall be rung no more but one short peal, and one other before the Burial and one other after the Burial."

Passion. The very and real suffering of our LORD, from His agony in the garden on through His trial, scourging, and revilings to its consummation in the parting of His soul from His body in a true and real death. That to a pure nature as His the jarring and clash of sinful men with evil passion was a suffering is very true. That a man so perfect should shrink in inexpressible pain from our pains, and suffer by coming in contact with them, is as true. But in neither of these senses do we generally speak of our LORD's Passion. To measure its love at all requires from every man earnest and true meditation. Its extent cannot be felt, its power will be unknown to us, its love a misty conception unless we will try to consider it in its several aspects towards ourselves and our needs, so great and pressing in His sight that for love of us He willingly did that from which He as naturally shrank. To give directions upon this is beyond the limits of this work, but there are many books of devotion which give much excellent direction for such profitable meditation.

Our LORD's Passion was in a certain sense necessary to show Him perfectly human as well as perfectly sinless,—its agony showed Him sinless, its reality showed Him human. It was in its beginning the fit step preparatory to the Atonement, which He completed by His death. As it passed from point to point of shame and pain, it was something far more than a most lovely example, it had a bearing upon the inner life of all His followers, and was a test for them. In its culmination upon the Cross He was made the victim and accomplished an act of redemption which we could not share in, but of whose inestimable benefits every baptized person becomes a partaker, and through the Christian indirectly but really all mankind, since CHRIST died for all men. It is noticeable that Plato should have pointed out that the good men must suffer shame and even death; but his was only a heathen idea, which could not conceive that God should take upon Himself perfect and pure flesh, and in it, by suffering all that hatred and malice could heap upon Him, wrest from His enemies the very instrument by which forgiveness could be proffered to them and to all. In this the Passion of our LORD is wonderful and beyond reach.

Passion-Week. (Vide HOLY WEEK.) To enforce upon us so far as she can the necessary meditation upon the marvelous work of redemption in its last steps, the Church has from very early times appointed the days before Easter at first only from Good-Friday, then prefixing to these the preceding days, till now Passion-Week, or Holy Week, extends from Palm-Sunday to Easter-even. For usages and ceremonies, see HOLY WEEK. But here it may not be amiss to add, that whatever worth the solemn services have for our souls, and whatever impression is made upon us, it must come from our own endeavor, both as individuals and as congregations, to realize the verities set forth, the facts commemorated, by meditation and by prayer.

Passover. "It is the sacrifice of the LORD's Passover, who passed over the houses of the children of Israel in Egypt when he smote the Egyptians and delivered our houses." The relation of this central Feast of the Mosaic worship to our LORD and to ourselves is so great that it must find a place in every work that relates to His Person and Life. While historically it was the commemoration of the deliverance of the Israelites, it was also a prophecy of the wider deliverance of God's people throughout all time, and over the whole earth, through the Blood of JESUS. Its observance was kept with a solemnity and care that marked its place in the National Life. The leaven carefully removed, the garnishing of the houses, the preparation of a guest-chamber for visiting Jews, the pure water brought to the house from a living stream, the ushering in of the solemn Feast with the blast of trumpets, the choice lambs taken to the Temple and there slain, and the offerers having the blood of the lamb poured out at the foot of the altar, and the kidneys and fat burnt with incense on the great altar,—all these made the public solemnity one of surpassing importance, while the worship at home by their families and the joyful feast which followed, was of incalculable use in preserving the household religion aflame in the Jewish home. Then the tale of their deliverance, so beyond all hope and human power, was the chief point with their children, which roused their pride in, and stimulated research into, their national history, and kept them up to the rigid observance of this Feast. But its historical value overshadowed its prophetic value, and the Jew was not prepared to admit that it prefigured anything else. Then this wondrous redemption. But with the Christian the Passover was a type of the greater passing of God's Judgments over those who have been sprinkled with the Blood of the Lamb upon those who have not. The fulfillment of the type in the sacrifice of CHRIST our Passover is very remarkable. It was at the time of the daily evening sacrifice, which was now offered earlier in the evening to allow space for the slaying of the Paschal Lambs, that the darkness covered all the land, and the evening sacrifice was interrupted, and as the light returned and our LORD yielded up the ghost, the true Paschal Lamb had shed His blood to be the deliverance of the children of God. CHRIST's Atonement, then, is that blood of the Passover that protects God's people. Its sprinkling upon the lintel and door-post of our life, our bodies and their senses, the gateways whereby our soul goes out to the world and through which it can return within itself, is by baptism, which is the application to our bodies and souls of the Blood of the LAMB. The Passover, then, is full of prophetic significance, and has not only a historic value and was a most important rite in the national religion, and was bound up in the political life of Israel, but it has a doctrinal significance to the baptized Christian. As the Israelite was, so is he of God's elect, and that Judgment which falls upon the world falls not on him. Yet as the Israelite, in the face of all that he had seen and shared in of God's holy deliverances, could sin and was destroyed of the destroyer, and fell by the way, so the Christian must feel that his deliverance is from the Judgments that fall on the world, but not from the discipline needful for him, or from the destruction which his disobedience may have brought upon him. Yet the relation of this Passover to ourselves must enter as completely into our religion, into our Christian citizenship, be as rigidly observed and as joyfully celebrated. Its spiritual application must but intensify its power over our lives and educate us to a better realization of the unseen.

Pastor. The word Pastor, or Shepherd, is an appropriate designation for a clergyman in charge of his spiritual flock, and it is to be regretted that it is not more in common use in this country. In Germany it is a familiar word, and when one reads of such a man as Oberlin he may consider it rightly given. Such names as Heber and Keble in England at once call up the thought implied in the word. In France, Archbishop Fénelon, sitting on the grass, and talking with the people about their affairs, and about religion, entering cottages, and eating with the poor, as a brother, or father, and even driving home a peasant's lost cow on a dark night, was a beautiful example of a pastor. The word is frequently used in Holy Scripture. The shepherd's duty was to feed his flock, and to watch them, lest wild beasts should tear them; and even to spend the cold night, if need be, in the oversight of his charge. In the xxiii. Psalm, ALMIGHTY God Himself is the Shepherd who provides "green pastures" and "still waters" for His flock, and guides them through "the valley of the shadow of death." CHRIST is "The Good Shepherd" who gives "His life for the sheep" (St. John x. 11), and who still from Heaven watches over them. Jeremiah styles spiritual teachers "pastors" (Jer. iii. 15).

After CHRIST's Ascension, "He gave some pastors" (Eph. iv. 11). David was a shepherd (1 Sam. xvii. 34). It was necessary that the shepherd should be tender towards the young and feeble (Isa. xl. 11, and Gen. xxxiii. 13). King Cyrus is called God's shepherd, and Homer speaks of the king as the shepherd of the people. In Heb. xlii. 20, the risen CHRIST is the "great Shepherd." In 1 Pet. ii. 25, He is "the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls." Did St. Peter in writing these words think of our LORD's direction to him, "Feed my sheep"? (St. John xxi. 15-17.) As CHRIST is "the chief Shepherd" (1 Pet. v. 4), His ministers are under-shepherds, seeking "a crown of glory" in His service. The term pastor is personal, while rector and priest are official. The clergyman is by his office somewhat isolated, and in giving social confidence to his people he needs to have it returned from them. Like the Good Shepherd he should know his flock by name, and they should gladly follow his lead. Geikie draws attention to the close relation that subsisted between the shepherd and the sheep as they found companionship on the lonely mountain. They shared common dangers, and the leader's voice was known as the call of safety. So has CHRIST drawn near to His people in His own figure, and so should His clergy feel that the words shepherd, watchman, overseer, and steward imply an acquaintance with individual wants, and a proper distribution of needed benefits. Bishop Andrews engraved on his Episcopal seal the words of St. Paul, "Who is sufficient for these things?" (2 Cor. ii. 16.) The HOLY SPIRIT answered St. Paul, and he answered himself, "our sufficiency is of GOD." Again, in trouble, this faithful pastor is cheered by the divine message, "My grace is sufficient for thee: for my strength is made perfect in weakness." As Matthew Henry says, the clergyman should "study CHRIST, preach CHRIST, live CHRIST."

Christian art delights to keep up the pastoral idea in the pictures of CHRIST bearing the lost sheep in His arms, which has been engraved even on the Sacred Vessels of the Holy Communion; and it is seen also in the pastoral staff of the Bishop. One of the best exemplifications of what a Christian pastor should be is found in the life of George Herbert, the saintly rector of Bemerton. The secret of his success is shown in his delightful book, "A Priest to the Temple; or, The Country Parson." Chap. i. is entitled "Of a Pastor." He begins with this definition: "A pastor is the deputy of CHRIST, for the reducing of man to the obedience of GOD." He demands a holy life of the Country Parson, and learning, especially in Holy Scripture. He should be devout in public prayer, earnest in preaching, a peace-maker, and a comforter of the sick. He should be courteous and charitable, and a visitor and counselor "from house to house" (Acts xx. 20). He must watch as a sentinel. He is a faithful catechiser, and wisely and reverently administers the Holy Sacraments. Chap. xxxvi. is on "The Parson Blessing;" and as he treats of the proper assurance and power of that benediction through GOD's authority, we can feel that Herbert's blessing was no common one, and it blessed the giver as well as the receiver, so that the Christian world sanctions Isaac Walton's description of him as "that pattern of primitive piety."

REV. S. F. HOTCHKIN.

Pastoral Letter. A letter or an instruction issued by one who holds a Pastoral relation to a congregation or to a Diocese. But chiefly it refers to the triennial letter issued by the House of Bishops at the close of the sessions of the General Convention. It is read there for the first time, and afterwards at the earliest convenient time to each congregation by its rector. The Bishop of a Diocese also may issue a Pastoral to his Diocese or to any separate members of it, as to the laity or to the clergy alone. In many parishes it is a custom for the rector to have to issue a letter to his congregation upon some pressing subject, calling their attention to or urging their action upon it. It has often proved of service, and may be made by the rector an effective way of appealing to his flock in some really important conjuncture.

Pastoral Staff. Vide VESTMENTS.

Paten. The Patena (Latin), a wide and shallow dish, most usually and correctly made of metal, gold or silver, in which the bread for the Holy Communion is placed when offered as the oblation, and on which it is consecrated. Ancient patens were of large size, as some of them were said to be very weighty, but those of modern use are much smaller. The paten used to be made with a foot beneath it, but it is now more usual that it should have no foot, and the bed be only of a size to fit upon the rim of the cup or chalice. The brim of the paten is often very broad and has some inscription upon it. The old paten was shaped like an ordinary plate, but made of silver. Gold patens are frequently presented by devout donors.

Patriarchs. The word Patriarch is found only in the New Testament, in Acts vii. 8, and then applied to the twelve sons of Jacob. Our common usage transfers the title first to Noah (though sometimes also to the antediluvians), and then to Shem, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, but generally withholds it from the sons of Jacob. In strictness, however, it should be extended not only to them but to the chiefs of great houses, as to Jesse. But the title has acquired in the Church another application. It was given to the Bishops of the five centres of Christendom, and thence to other important Sees. But originally there were only Antioch for Asia, Alexandria for Africa, Rome for Europe, and Jerusalem as the Mother City. Constantinople was added when it became the seat of the Empire. These, except Constantinople, were Apostolical Churches, as being founded by Apostles. But since political importance was the guide in arranging church precedence, Constantinople was raised to the second rank by the decree of the Council of Chalcedon (451 A.D.), an act which was not submitted to by the See of Rome for some time. But in the earliest usage, Primate and Patriarch were synonymous, and in fact the title was used rather in a general than in an official sense for some time after it was recognized as the proper designation of these five Sees. Their Patriarchal rank was acknowledged as early as the Council of Nice (325 A.D.), but the name was not exclusively used of them till about the time of Charlemagne. Besides these, other Sees were ranked as Patriarchal, and some of them still survive with this title, but, of course, do not rank with the Patriarchates as above recited. These are Canterbury, Toledo, Vienne, Lyons, Venice, Aquileia. The Church in this country has properly the extent of a Patriarchate, and were there an Appellate Court properly established, it would contain one of the chief notes of a Patriarchate. But as its Synod, the General Convention, is now organized and the precedence of its Bishops not placed upon any provincial system (vide PROVINCE), it is an inchoate Patriarchate.

The authority of the Patriarch is thus described (Blunt's Dict. Hist. and Doct. Theol.): "Their authority consisted in ordaining Metropolitans, confirming them or imposing of hands, in giving the pall, in convening patriarchal synods and in presiding in them, in pronouncing sentence according to the plurality of votes when metropolitan synods were insufficient to decide some important difference, and in some honorary privileges, such as the acclamation of the Bishops to them at the end of a general council."

The exercise of Patriarchal power is not refused, by every Churchman at all acquainted with Church history, to each Patriarch. But the exercise of such power without his jurisdiction has always been forbidden, and the Patriarch of Rome assuming to himself an uncanonical Supremacy, has suffered the consequences of a revolt from his communion of so many parts of Christendom. At a General Council his place in the rank of Patriarchs would not be refused him; his arrogated supreme powers alone would be excepted to and denied him. The Archbishop of Canterbury exercises practically Patriarchal powers in England, and his right to preside in all formal gatherings of the Bishops of the Anglican and American Communions is acknowledged. Two such gatherings, for they were not Synods and had no conciliar authority, have been held (the first in 1867 A.D., the second in 1877 A.D.) at Canterbury.

Patrimony. A name by which the estates and revenues of the Church were described. The most famous was the "Patrimony of St. Peter." The older Churches had estates given them in different parts of the Empire. Thus both the Sees of Ravenna and Milan had estates in Sicily. And Rome had large estates left to the See for various purposes,—the poor, the clergy, the church-furnishing,—e.g., one in Lombardy was for keeping the lamps alight in St. Peter's Church. It is eminently proper that some of the Church's permanent work should be independent of what is called the voluntary system. In this class should be put the support of the Episcopate, and the establishment of schools and hospitals. They should have a patrimony for their proper maintenance, and this patrimony should be so secured that it could not be wasted, alienated, or forfeited. It deserves the best attention of the laity, since to them is committed the ministry of the temporals of the Church, and upon them rests in the largest proportion the regulation of those matters of finance which should place the work of the Church and the discharge of her responsibilities upon a secure basis. This duty has been discussed under the head of FINANCE.

Patron. "The person who has the right to present to a benefice. The greatest part of the benefices in England are presentative: the thanes or lords who built and endowed churches having first agreed with the Bishops that they should have the privilege of presenting fit clerks to serve and receive the profits of the churches founded by them. This was a modification of the older system that built the churches at common charge and by which the right of presentation lay in the congregation. It was, however, the outcome of the needs of the times, and its use was the cause of many disputes between the wealthy founders and the Bishops. There is as yet in this country no departure from the primitive mode, but should there arise any imitation of this custom (which began about 400 A.D.), the limitations and the rights established elsewhere would form a sufficiently authoritative guide for the settlement of any disputes. These disputes, it may be added, have at times led to results far different from those involved in them at their inception. For example, the refusal of the Bishop of Exeter to induct the Rev. Mr. Gorham into the vicarage of St. Just in Cornwall, upon the presentation of Lord Lyndhurst, because of alleged unsoundness in the Faith, led to the famous "Gorham case." (Vide Hook's Ch. Dict., Stephen's Book of Common Prayer, Philimore's ed. of Burn's Eccl. Law.)

Paul, St. "Saul, who is also called Paul," was born at Tarsus, the capital of the province of Cilicia, and one of the three great Academies (Athens, Alexandria, Tarsus) of the classic world. His father was a Jew, a Benjamite, one of the great orthodox-patriotic party of the Pharisees; a "Hebrew," in the special sense of a maintainer of Hebrew customs and of the use (within his own household) of the Aramaic language, and, finally, a known citizen. This citizenship was no result of the "freedom" of Tarsus; for civic "freedom" under the Empire implied no more at the most than municipal self-government and exemption from public taxation. Saul's father may have been the freedman of a Roman noble, or he may have received citizenship in reward for political services during the great civil wars; or, just possibly, he may have bought the privilege. His name, as that of his wife, is unknown to us. We gather (2 Tim. i. 3) that they were sincerely pious. They had, besides Saul, at least one child, a daughter (Acts xxiii. 16). Saul's circumcision-name was perhaps common in his tribe, in memory of the First King. His other and, to us, far more familiar name, Paul (Paulus), was probably given him also in infancy for use in the Gentile world, just as Jewish children in England now have a Hebrew home-name as well as an English (or otherwise European) name for exterior use. If his father was in any sense a dependent of the Æmilian family, the choice of Paulus is easily explained, for Paulus was a common cognomen of the Æmilii. But it was used also by the Sergii and other families. The name first occurs, Acts xiii. 9. The marked mention of it there is sufficiently explained by the fact that the Gentile name was, just then, in the Apostle's life, necessarily coming to be the more usual name of the two, and that the first distinguished Gentile before whom he spoke for CHRIST was himself, by a coincidence, a Paulus. The exact date of Saul's birth is quite uncertain, but it must lie within the few years before and the few years after the common (or Dionysian?) date of the birth of CHRIST. When Stephen died Saul was still a "young man" (in the then recognized sense of the words); that is, he was not more than forty years old. And the date of Stephen's death must probably be placed in, or very near, 30 A.D. Quite early, perhaps as early as his ninth or tenth year, Saul was transferred, as a student of the Law, to Jerusalem, where the great Pharisaic teacher of the day was Gamaliel, grandson of Hillel. Gamaliel was an orthodox "Hebrew," but also a student of Gentile literature, and Saul, under his influence, not only matured into the best Rabinist of his generation (Gal. i. 14), but also gained an acquaintance, traceable in his Epistles and Discourses, with at least a few Greek authors and with the then prevalent Greek philosophies. Under Gamaliel, too, he would not be discouraged from using (along with the original Scriptures) the "Septuagint" (lxx.) Greek Version.

His quotations from the Old Testament indicate an equal familiarity, or nearly so, with the Original and the Version. He quotes in Greek much as an English Hebraist, with the authorized Version in his memory, might quote in English. Whether Saul dwelt continuously at Jerusalem till his first recorded public acts is uncertain. Acts xxvi. 4, 5, suggests a residence continuous on the whole; but, on the other hand, St. Paul's silence is sufficient proof that our LORD during His earthly life was unknown to him by sight. This suggests a break of residence, an absence (in Cilicia or at Alexandria) during about the period of our LORD's ministry; after which, perhaps, a return to Jerusalem was prompted by the sudden prominence of the Nazarene heresy. At the date of Stephen's work Saul was perhaps a member (as a Scribe) of the Great Sanhedrim. But more probably his election into it (which seems to be proved by Acts xxvi. 10, "I gave my vote against them") was due to his display at that great crisis (for such it was both for the Church and the Synagogue) of intense and energetic zeal. He now became a regular delegated inquisitor for the Sanhedrim, and, among other places (Acts xxvi. 11), visited Damascus, of whose 50,000 Jews, as of all the Jews of the Dispersion, the High-Priest (under certain imperial grants) was not only the spiritual head, but also in some respects the civil patronus. His delegate thus carried the power of arrest. Under King Aretas of Petra (a vassal of the Empire), who was just then lord of Damascus, the Jews there had a governor (ethnarch, 2 Cor. xi. 32) of their own, to whom Saul would show his commission, but who was soon to set guards at the city gates to bar the renegade's escape. On the ever-memorable conversion we only remark here that the appearance then granted was, in the convert's own lifelong belief, radically different from what is commonly called a vision. It was truly, though mysteriously, corporeal, for St. Paul (1 Cor. xv. 8) bases upon it his claim to count among the witnesses of our LORD's corporeal Resurrection. We do not dwell on the absolute and perfectly permanent change in the intense purpose of Saul's life which then and there took place; it is best read in the Scripture pages. We only suggest the study of its two contrasted yet harmonious aspects,—the supernatural aspect, in that it was wrought by an objective Divine act which was the issue of a Divine purpose (Gal. i. 15), and the first step in a life-long experience of Divine inspiration; and the natural aspect, in that it left the frame-work of character unchanged, preserved unimpaired the balance of intellectual judgment, or rather gave a vastly greater expansion to its legitimate use; and far from leading Saul impatiently to reject old beliefs as such, left him quite as fixedly as ever, and far more deeply than ever, sure of the entire and eternal truth of the prophetic Scriptures and of the Divine meaning of the very Ritual which had once seemed to him irreconcilably to contradict the teaching of the Nazarenes.

After baptism, and some intercourse with the Damascene disciples (Acts ix. 19), and then a withdrawal from the city (Gal. i. 17) for some weeks or months, Saul began at Damascus the new work of his life. His withdrawal had secured for him, probably, the mysterious preparation of supernatural intercourse with his Master in the solitudes of Arabia,—perhaps in the peculiarly congenial solitudes of “Sinai in Arabia.” After three years (at most) he left Damascus, to avoid arrest or murder, and made his way to Jerusalem, where Barnabas, his friend and perhaps once fellow-student, introduced him to the still hesitating Apostles. He became St. Peter’s guest; but after a fortnight of discussions with the Hellenists of Jerusalem he was again compelled, by plots of assassination, to retire to the coast of Syria, and thence to his native Tarsus (38 or 39 A.D.). From Tarsus, no doubt, he now worked as the evangelist of Cilicia, and so spent at least three years. At length he was summoned by Barnabas to the Syrian Antioch, the scene of wholly new developments; for in it first the “Greeks” or heathen Gentiles (Acts xi. 20) had now been freely welcomed to the covenant of the MESSIAH.

At Antioch he labored with Barnabas for “a whole year,” about 43 A.D., probably a year memorable as the birthtime of the Christian name (Acts xi. 26); and then visited Jerusalem to carry relief there during (or just before) one of the great dearths which marked the reign (41–54 A.D.) of Claudius. The martyrdom of St. James, the son of Zebedee, and the seizure and deliverance of St. Peter, occurred while Saul and Barnabas were in or near Jerusalem. This brief and troubled visit is scarcely (it would appear from the words of Gal. ii. 1) to be reckoned as a visit to the Apostles at all. Now followed, at Antioch, another period of work for Saul and Barnabas. It is a period not easy to date: some reckonings close it 45 A.D., some as late as 49 A.D. It lasted, however, till a Divine oracle called Saul and Barnabas to embark on their great missionary tour. They began with Cyprus, where at Paphos the Proconsul Paulus became, we may hope, a true convert to the Gospel through the work and word of the Tarsian Jew who bore his name. They then passed to the Pamphylian shore, and thence to the inner uplands of Pisidia and Lycaonia, including the Isaurian fastnesses where Derbe stood. At length they approached, from the west, the Cilician border, and then returned on their footsteps to the port of Attalia, and so by sea to the Syrian Antioch.

We attempt no details of this memorable circuit,—crowded as its story is both with Divine instruction and with innumerable notes of historic accuracy and reality. At Antioch they remained “a long time,”—probably till 50 or 51 A.D. And now a disturbance of extreme gravity broke in upon the work in this great centre of Gentile Christianity. The Judaic party in the Christian Church, retaining and intensifying the exclusive views which had once clouded even St. Peter’s mind (Acts x. 34), and which degenerated afterwards into manifold heretical divergences, now intruded on the field of St. Paul. Jerusalem, where by this time the Lord’s brother was what we may fairly call the Bishop, was recognized as the metropolis of the Gospel, and the dispute was referred thither,—a Divine oracle (Gal. ii. 2) concurring with, or prompting, the resolve of the Church. The result was in some sort a compromise, though it was a compromise divinely sanctioned (Acts xv. 28); but it was at least so solemn a statement of the covenant equality of Gentile Christians, and thus so real a victory for St. Paul, that it secured to him for life the bitter and restless opposition of the Judaic party,—an opposition curiously developed in somewhat later days in the heretical literature falsely inscribed with the name of Clement of Rome, and in which St. Paul is covertly assailed as the grand corrupter of the primal Gospel. The undiminished energy of the Judaists, even just after the decision at Jerusalem against their main principle, appears from the successful pressure they put upon St. Peter himself, and that at Antioch (to which he appears to have followed St. Paul), to act for the moment as a separatist (Gal. ii. 11–21). From this crisis, then, St. Paul came forth as more than ever a recognized Apostle, co-ordinate with the Twelve, and also more than ever the object of intense hatred with a powerful party. He had returned to Antioch with Barnabas, and accompanied by the newcomers from Jerusalem, Judas and Silas (Silvanus); and now, after a residence there of “some days,” he proposed to Barnabas a second circuit. But a personal difference led to their separation, and St. Paul set out with Silas (say 51 A.D.) on an independent track. This time he went by land; revisited his plantings in Syria, Cilicia, and Lycaonia; joined the young Timotheus to his company in what proved to be a life-long connection; broke new ground in Phrygia and the “Galatian region,” where (it seems from Gal. iv. 13) he was detained among the Celtic inhabitants by illness,—a detention overruled to a large and enthusiastic acceptance of the Gospel, soon, however, to be marred by Judaic intruders; and then attempted other districts of Asia Minor. But Divine commands, perhaps in the form of “prophesying,” closed all avenues, and at last guided St. Paul across the Ægean to Europe. Here he landed in Macedonia, perhaps 52 A.D.; made his first converts, now in peace, now amidst cruelties and terrors, at Philippi; passed southward to Thessalonica, a Jewish centre and a busy trading-place, where he planted a vigorous Church; then, southward still, to Berea, still followed by Jewish violence, but also by Divine blessing; and at last, for safety's sake, to Athens. Silas and Timotheus were left at Berea, with orders to follow in due time. At Athens he took advantage of the ways of the place, and opened discussion with the students and dilettanti who frequented the walks of the Agora; and at length (whether formally or informally, seriously or in irony, who shall say?) he was brought up to answer for his strange doctrine before (or at least in) the sacred Court of Areopagus. His address indicates familiarity with Stoicism. Before long he left Athens for Corinth, the seat of the Roman government of Achaia (i.e., the Southern Greek Province). Here a scene of mingled activity and vice made both peculiar difficulties and peculiar opportunities for St. Paul. Early in 52 A.D., Claudius, by a severe but soon canceled edict, banished from Rome its multitude of Jews. Of these, one married pair, Aquila and Prisca (or Priscilla), settled or rested at Corinth. They were work-people, hair-cloth-workers, and thus plied the trade which long before (according to Rabbinic precepts, by which every Rabbi was to learn a handicraft against a time of need) had been taught to the boy Saul, and this trade was now standing St. Paul, the Christian Rabbi, in good stead; and thus, perhaps at first in the way of business, he fell in with Aquila and Priscilla. Whether he found them Christians, or (under God) made them such, we shall never know, but it is more probable that they were already believers,—for otherwise we should certainly expect some distinct allusion in the Acts or the Epistles to so important a conversion. But doubtless they owed their first direct apostolic teaching to St. Paul, to whom now they were bound for life in a holy friendship. We have thus in Aquila and Priscilla, very probably, an example of what is antecedently likely,—the arrival already of the Gospel at Rome; the first facts and doctrines may have reached the city soon after the Pentecostal preaching (see Acts ii. 10), and there they would find rather easy audience than otherwise. At Rome a peculiar weariness of paganism was manifest in many directions. The East was, in a certain sense, in fashion; Judaism had attracted abundant notice; and the prophecies must have been at least superficially known to a multitude of proselytes or semi-proselytes.

But no organized Church seems as yet to have arisen at Rome. Indeed, there is no clear token of any Christian organization west of the Ægean before St. Paul's arrival at Philippi. At Corinth St. Paul spent eighteen months. This time was marked by the writing of his earliest Apostolic Letters,—the two Epistles to the Thessalonians. These must be dated in, or near, 53 A.D.,—certainly not earlier. Great opposition and great success marked the beginnings of the great Corinthian Church, with the "outstations" (in modern missionary language), which, doubtless, then sprung up at the port of Cenchree and other neighboring towns. Probably the assistants of St. Paul carried the Gospel through the whole Achaian province at this time, or very soon after (2 Cor. i. 1). About this stage of St. Paul's life Nero succeeded Claudius, October, 54 A.D.

After scenes of outrage which the Proconsul Gallio treated with impartial indifference, St. Paul at last left Corinth for Syria, say some time in 54 A.D. He touched at Ephesus; left Aquila there with his wife, perhaps to be the organizer of a regular community, and himself departed for Cæsarea and Jerusalem. There he was perhaps in time to keep, as he had intended, one of the great Festivals; but all that is certain is that he "saluted the Church" of St. James, and then soon left for Antioch, where again he spent "some time" (Acts xviii.). Now followed a missionary tour in the "upper coasts,"—i.e., the inland regions, of Asia Minor. It must have been long and laborious; but it is dismissed by St. Luke with a brief allusion. At length St. Paul reached the shore, at Ephesus, some time (say) in 55 A.D. Here an eminent Alexandrian Hellenist convert, Apollos, had meanwhile arrived; had held intercourse with the more advanced and instructed Aquila and Priscilla, and had crossed to Corinth; there to do much good (Acts xviii. 27, 28), but also, probably, by his more ornate and philosophically-worded preaching, to raise prejudices, unwittingly, against St. Paul. The Apostle spent about three years at Ephesus in ceaseless Christian labors; and during this time his assistants traveled, it seems, to Colossæ, and Laodicea, and other places in proconsular Asia which he could not reach (Col. ii. 1). At length the tumult of Demetrius, perhaps at the festival of the Ephesia, hastened St. Paul's already-planned departure for the European side. Very shortly before this departure (spring, 57 A.D.) he had written and sent the First Epistle to the Corinthians,—occasioned by distressing reports from Corinth as well as by questions raised by the Church there. To give the Epistle time to do its work, he resolved to reach Corinth by a long circuit round the head of the Ægean, and so southward through Macedonia. Titus went before, to ascertain the state of the Corinthians, and to report to St. Paul, if possible, in Asia Minor; but this proved impracticable, and St. Paul's intense anxiety was not relieved by the longed-for tidings until he entered Macedonia (2 Cor. ii. 12, 13). Thence he wrote the Second Epistle to the Corinthians,—a wonderful mosaic of serene revelations of eternal truth and outpourings of personal anxiety and affection.

He was now free to visit Macedonian churches and to evangelize new districts.

Here we may probably place his westward tour (Rom. xv. 19) as far as the Adriatic sea-board. Now also he effected throughout Macedonia (i.e., in the then sense of that term, the Northern Grecian Province) the ingathering of a fund, already organized, for the poor Christians at Jerusalem (Rom. xv. 25, 26; 2 Cor. viii. 1-4; ix. 1, 2); a task which was not only a tangible proof of deep sympathy with the work of St. James, but also an expression of St. Paul's own heart's love for his fellow-Jews. (See Rom. xv. 27.)

But the most lastingly important effort of this period (for to this period it surely belongs) was the Epistle to the Galatians,—the result of news of the inroads of Judaic propaganda in that well-loved, but already troubled, scene of his earlier labors. At length he reached Corinth; there found (as we have good cause to think) happy results of his two messages of warning and instruction, and there also collected the Achaian gifts for the Jerusalem Fund, which he now (Rom. xv. 25) prepared to carry to St. James. This stay at Corinth lasted only three months. But it was made memorable forever by the writing of our great Epistle,—the Epistle to the Romans. The Epistle was evidently written not under pressure of anxiety, but with calm deliberation. It was composed, apparently, in the house of a Corinthian Christian, Gaius or Caius, dictated by St. Paul, and written down by one Tertius. Would that we could call up the scene in the Corinthian chamber! The three months at Corinth over, he left Achaia for Macedonia, spent Passover at Philippi, crossed to Asia Minor, addressed the Ephesian Presbyters at Miletus, sailed to Tyre, and at length (amidst prophecies of danger) reached Jerusalem, perhaps in May, 58 A.D.,—not long after an Egyptian impostor, at the head of a huge gang of the zealot Sicarii (Assassins), had seriously threatened the Roman authorities of Palestine.

In the act of a last effort to conciliate the Judaic party, St. Paul was almost murdered in the Temple by the Jews; rescued by the Roman commandant, but under the belief that the victim of the mob was the Egyptian rebel; allowed to defend himself on the spot before the multitude, and the next day before the Sanhedrim, and then, for safety, conveyed as a prisoner to Caesarea. There, within a fortnight of his arrival at Jerusalem, he was heard before the Procurator Felix, who lingered, however, over the case, and at last, two years after, when recalled on a serious charge (summer of 60 A.D.), left St. Paul a prisoner still. Of these two years of St. Paul's life we know almost nothing. Some critics assign to them the writing of the Epistles to the Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon. But these are certainly to be dated later, and from Rome. At length, before Porcius Festus, the Apostle was heard again; but even this far better judge hesitated to do him full justice, and he appealed in due form, as a citizen, to the Emperor's own hearing. He was, ere long, shipped for Italy; but off the Cretan coast, perhaps early in October, a typhoon struck the ship, which soon was a drifting wreck, and was at last run aground at Malta. There the rescued company wintered, and not till the early spring of 61 A.D. (the year of Boadicea's revolt in Britain) did St. Paul at last see Rome. At some distance from the city, in detached parties, at two different spots, the representatives of the Church (now for nearly three years in possession of the great Epistle) met the captive Saint, and cheered his anxious and weary spirit by their loyal sympathy. In the city he was permitted to occupy a hired lodging, perhaps a story of one of the lofty Roman tabernæ. Here, a few days after his arrival, he made a last, long effort to convince the leaders of the Roman Jews of the Messiahship of Jesus; and here, under military custody, but otherwise unmolested, he spent "two whole years," full, no doubt, of immense mental and spiritual labor, and holy influence, and marked forever by the writing of the four Epistles (probably in this order), Colossians, Philemon, Ephesians, Philippians. This Roman residence closed in the course of 62 A.D., probably in the summer. The question how it closed—whether with condemnation to death or acquittal—is a famous one. Its discussion would be out of place here, but our undoubting conviction is that the result was St. Paul's acquittal; that he was set free, and once more undertook missionary labors; that he visited Western and Eastern Europe and Asia Minor; and that, late in this last stage of his life, he wrote the Pastoral Epistles,—in the order, 1 Timothy, Titus, 2 Timothy.

This last most affecting letter is dated once more from a prison, and from Rome. It is our only relic of St. Paul's second Roman captivity, which ended in his martyrdom,—probably 66 A.D., the year of the Great Fire and of the Neronian Persecution, though perhaps the date of the martyrdom must be placed one or two years later. Probably soon before St. Paul's execution, and probably also at Rome, St. Peter had suffered his predicted death. And (if 66 A.D. is the true date) the Jewish war had already begun a few months when St. Paul died,—to close four years later with the Fall of Jerusalem. The one question within our scope here, connected with this last period of St. Paul's life, is the question of a visit to Spain. Was the hope of Rom. xv. 24, 28, at length fulfilled? There seems to be good evidence that it was. In the Epistle to the Corinthians, written by St. Paul's own follower, St. Clement of Rome, we find it stated (ch. v.) as a familiar fact that St. Paul, before his "departure from this world to the holy place," "went to the end of the West." It has been pleaded against the theory of a Spanish journey, that this may mean only Italy, as viewed from the locality of St. Clement's correspondents at Corinth. But the then centre of the world could not possibly be so described, and above all not by a writer dating from Rome, however he might care to put himself in his reader's geographical position. And there is direct evidence besides that such a phrase as "the end of the West" would have a familiar connection, at that time, with Spain. (See Bishop Lightfoot's St. Clement of Rome, p. 49-51.)

This witness, certainly genuine and quite contemporary, is fairly conclusive. St. Clement cannot have been mistaken or ignorant on so leading a fact of his great master's latest labors as the westward limit of those labors. The only serious difficulty in the theory of the Spanish visit (once granting the theory, necessary to the genuineness of the Pastoral, of St. Paul's release and second Roman imprisonment) is that there is no traditional trace whatever of any work of St. Paul's in Spain. But this is equally true of other districts (as Illyricum), in which, however, we have St. Paul's own word for his labors.

We take it, then, for certain that St. Paul, some time after the spring or summer of 62 A.D., and probably before the spring of 66 A.D., visited the Western Peninsula,—whose present name, España, is said to be an aboriginal word, meaning "The Land's End." The belief that he landed in Britain possesses, in Bishop Lightfoot's words (St. Clement of Rome, quoted above), "neither evidence nor probability."

It is impossible not to wish to know something of St. Paul's personal appearance. Mr. Lewin (in his Life and Epistles of St. Paul, vol. ii. ch. xi.) has collected all that approaches to information in this matter; and in this one case at least tradition appears to be something better than mere fancy. It seems to be certain that St. Paul's stature was short, if not diminutive; that his head was bald and his face bearded; and that his expression, even if deformed in some measure by ophthalmia (which is one of the many conjectural explanations of the "thorn in the flesh"), yet reflected something of his soul. A medallion, dating perhaps from the generation next to St. Paul's own, is engraved by Mr. Lewin (vol. ii. p. 411): it gives the profiles of St. Paul and St. Peter; and that of St. Paul expresses, or seems to do so, all the elevation and intensity both of thought and feeling which still, as we read the Epistles, touch us with the touch of life. The character and labors of St. Paul have been so often eulogized, and are so inimitably described in a thousand unconscious touches by his own pen, that it would be vain in this brief summary to attempt another portrait.

We will only quote the words of but one of the many existing delineations.

"Amidst the circumstances of his apostolic work he developed a force and play of spirit, a keenness, depth, clearness, and cogency of thought, a purity and firmness of purpose, an intensity of feeling, a holy audacity of effort, a wisdom of deportment, a precision and delicacy of practical skill, a strength and liberty of faith, a fire and mastery of eloquence, a heroism in danger, a love, and self-forgetfulness, and patience, and humility, and altogether a sublime power and richness of endowment, which have secured for this chosen Implement of CHRIST the reverence and wonder of all time." (Meyer, Brief an die Römer, Einleitung, p. 7. From Rev. H. C. G. Moule's Intro. to his Comment. on St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans.)

Peculiars. They were parishes or monasteries which, for some reason or cause, were exempted from the jurisdiction of the Bishop in whose Diocese they were situated. During the Middle Ages there were many such exemptions granted upon one or other cause. Nearly all of those which lay in England were swept away at the Reformation; but some were retained, notably the famous Westminster Abbey, which is subject to visitation from the Queen only.

Pelagianism. This heresy, though it takes its name from Pelagius, "does not so much represent single notions of a single man as a complete moral and religious system," its peculiar tenets being concerned with original sin, freedom of the will, Divine grace, and predestination.

Differing opinions concerning these matters were entertained, and more or less clearly expressed, from the earliest times; but it was not until the fifth century that they were so developed as to claim general attention and merit the decision of Councils. In the beginning of this century there appeared, among others, two who seem to have been chief in formulating that system which has been rejected and condemned by the Church, Celestius, a monk of Rome, and Pelagius, a British monk, from whom the heresy has taken its name—Pelagianism.

They were bitterly opposed by St. Jerome, and with less asperity by St. Augustine, whose writings contain the orthodox doctrines on the disputed points. The following seven heads are given by Hagenbach as St. Augustine's summary of the Errors of Pelagius:

1. Adam was created mortal, so that he would have died whether he had sinned or not.

2. Adam's sin has only affected himself, and not the human race.

3. New-born infants are in the same condition in which Adam was previous to the fall.

4. The whole human race dies neither in consequence of Adam's death, nor of his transgression; nor does it rise from the dead in consequence of CHRIST's resurrection.

5. Infants obtain eternal life though they should not be baptized.

6. The Law is as good a means of Salvation as the Gospel.

7. There were some men, even before the appearance of CHRIST, who did not commit sin.

It is probable that some of these propositions would have been universally condemned by the earlier theologians, while upon others there would have been some differences of opinion. But the contrast between Pelagianism and orthodoxy may be best exhibited by comparing what each taught on the chief points of difference. Pelagius appears to have held that there is no other connection between the sin of Adam and the sin of his posterity than that which exists between example and voluntary imitation. Hence infants are in the same condition in which Adam was prior to the fall, and are free to develop sin or virtue as they choose, and are alone responsible for what they do. In opposition to this St. Augustine taught, "As all men have sinned in Adam they are justly exposed to the vengeance of God, because of this hereditary sin, and guilt of sin."

As regards liberty and grace Pelagius held that man stands in need of Divine aid, which he spoke of as the grace of God, assisting the imperfections of man; but this was something external, added to the efforts put forth by the free-will of man, and even merited by virtuous inclinations.

Augustine, on the other hand, taught that grace was "the creative principle of life, which produces out of itself the liberty of the will, which is entirely lost in the natural man." Out of this position follows as a logical consequence the whole doctrine of predestination, from whose harsh conclusions Augustine himself seems to have shrunk, seeking to soften them by practical cautions, though he combated the views of the Semi-Pelagians, who proposed a middle course between Pelagianism and Augustinism. The following summary may serve to illustrate this subject:

"The motto of Pelagius was free-will; that of Augustine efficacious grace. The former held that, notwithstanding the fall, the human will was perfectly free to choose at any time between good and evil; the latter that, in consequence of the fall, the will is in a state of moral bondage, from which it can only be freed by Divine grace. With the British monk election is suspended on the decision of man's will; human nature is still as pure as it came originally from the hands of the CREATOR; CHRIST died equally for all men, and as the result of His death, a general grace is granted to all mankind, which any may comply with, but which all may finally forfeit. With the African Bishop election is absolute. We are predestinated, not from foreseen holiness, but that we might be holy; all men are lying under the guilt or penal obligation of the first sin, and in a state of spiritual helplessness and corruption; the sacrifice of CHRIST was, in point of destination, offered for the elect, though, in point of exhibition, it is offered to all; and the saints obtain the gift of perseverance in holiness to the end." (Historical Introduction to Pascal's Provincial Letters, by Rev. Thomas McCrie.)

Pelagianism was condemned in the person of its teachers, Celestius and Pelagius, in a series of Councils from 412 A.D., the chief of which were held in Carthage in 417 and 418 A.D.; and in particular our own Church has condemned the doctrines of Pelagius in the IX., X., and XVII. Articles of Religion; not without reason, for the heresy is still held by many, though never at any time have Pelagianists formed a distinct sect. It is extremely probable that many of the sects would defend his doctrines, and in particular it may be shown that the Jesuits in their controversy with the Jansenists have probably fallen into this error.

In pursuit of this subject the reader is referred to Hagenbach's History of Doctrines, Blunt's Dictionary of Theology, Pascal's Provincial Letters, and Burnet and Browne on the Articles.

Penance. The outward expression of the inner repentance of the heart. This was required in the early Church, where the heathen civil law did not take cognizance of many offenses against the moral law. He who was guilty of some offense whereby the congregation was offended and injured was suspended from Communion, and was required before readmission to testify and prove in some public way his repentance. It was the protection that the Church then demanded for her purity, and from it arose the penitential discipline of the Primitive Church. It was natural, since the fault was more or less public, that the reparation of it should be as public. It was, moreover, a defense, and a hindrance to those who might be tempted to sin, were there no penalty. It was the expression, too, of the inward contrition of the soul. The publican in the Temple abased his eyes, beat upon his breast, and stood apart. In our own day, since there are legal penalties for nearly all overt infringements of ordinary morality, there is no public expression of contrition demanded of offenders, except in the cases of evil living or of a quarrel between communicants, as recited in the rubrics before the "Order for the Administration of the Lord's Supper;" nor is there at this place any order for any penitential act in any other sense than the acknowledgment of the fault or sin, and the vow of amendment. The ancient penitential system required something more than this. There was a definite penalty assigned for every breaking of the moral law, and the person who submitted to the Church's censures had to undergo it. If he were contumacious it but increased the severity when he finally did submit. "The theory of penitential discipline was this: that the Church was an organized body with an outward and visible form of government; that all who were outside of her boundaries were outside the means of grace; that she had a command laid upon her and authority given to her to gather men into her fellowship by the ceremony of baptism; but as some of those who were admitted proved unworthy of her calling, she had also the right by the power of the keys to deprive them temporarily or absolutely of the privilege of communion with her, and on their amendment to restore them once more to Church membership. . . . It was a purely spiritual jurisdiction. It obtained its hold over the minds of men from the belief, universal in the Catholic Church of the early ages, that he who was expelled from her pale was expelled also from the way of salvation, and that the sentence which was pronounced by God's Church on earth was ratified by Him in heaven." (Smith's Dict. of Chr. Antiq., sub voc.) Penitence has at once its origin and sanction in the New Testament, and primarily in the promise of CHRIST Himself (St. Matt. xviii. 18). There is room only for a mere mention here of the several orders of Penitents in the Primitive Church. In the earliest records we find the duration of the penance, as of fasting and weeping and prayer, quite short,—from two to seven weeks. This was gradually lengthened, and after the close of the second century we find years substituted for weeks, though the judgment of the Bishops and the circumstances of the case, as well as the dangers from persistence, often led to a shortening of the time. But the concession of the privilege of being restored was also granted. For with the shorter time was also held the greater depth of humiliation and the greater strictness of life after restoration. So it came to pass that the longer period, with all its sharp discipline, led to no greater strictness afterwards. But about 260 A.D., Gregory Thaumaturgus arranged an order of restoration, which was as follows: The Flentes were without the door of the church, where the sinner can beg the prayers of those who go in. The Audientes stood in the vestibule (Narthex), where they were to stand till the Catechumens were dismissed, as only worthy to hear the Scripture and the Instruction, but not to hear the prayers. The Substratentes stood within the Church, after the Catechumens were dismissed. The Consistentes were mingled with the Faithful, and did not leave with the Catechumens. This was in practical use, but still the Bishops could curtail it, and very often did so shorten or omit entering one or other of the steps.

The arrangement, too, varied in different parts of the Church, as however rigid the discipline was, it was yet adapted to the character of the people for whose correction it was inflicted. Besides, sackcloth was worn, sometimes continuously, but necessarily at some step in the restoration, also ashes were sprinkled upon the head. The restoration, when at last it did take place, was with public prayer and with imposition of the hands of the Bishop. If a penitent were in a mortal sickness the Priest could restore him at once, and if it happened that the penitent recovered, the remainder of the sentence was thereby remitted. But later on he was required to resume and complete it. It is foreign to our plan to go farther in this sketch, which applies only to those ages of the Church when penance, penitence, and repentance were more clearly understood, and the Church's work was to see that her spiritual power was enforced. Nor can we enter into any details of the English system of Church discipline, which is outlined in the Canons of 1603 A.D., and which is carried out in Archidiaconal and Episcopal courts.

In our own Church in this matter of penance, there is no enforcement of a public penalty in the Church, at least in the case of laymen. Suspension from the Communion is almost the sole penalty, and practically a layman conscious of having offended excommunicates himself by absenting himself therefrom. Nor under the Rubric can any notice be taken of scandals, unless they become notorious and the congregation be thereby offended. In, however, this matter of observation and presentment, the vestry, who can have much of the public opinion of the congregation in their hands, can be of material aid in presenting scandalous persons in such a way to the clergyman that he can act. For it is a hardship which now hinders the clergyman, in his effort to control his parish and admonish his flock, to present to himself as judge, an offender, and to be jury and witness both, and further, to execute the sentence. Yet practically this is the case, for the Bishop leaves it to him to do all that is needful. Happily, the notorious cases are but few, and there are some compensations in the consciences of offenders that keep them from urging an impudent claim for spiritual gifts; a private admonition generally is all that is needed. (Vide REPENTANCE and DISCIPLINE.)

Penitence. The preceding article has touched upon so much of what properly belongs to this, that but little more will be needed. A penitent mind continues in the state of repentance. It is a frame of life, so to speak, that holds over itself the discipline that a "godly sorrow that worketh a repentance to salvation not to be repented of" will constantly exercise. "My sin is ever before me" was David's repentant admission. It is the energetic display of sorrow for which St. Paul commended the Corinthians (2 Cor. vii. 11).

Penitential. A book of discipline containing the lists of crimes, offenses against, and infractions of the moral and ecclesiastical Law. The first books were probably digests of disciplinary canons, which were very numerous in the Church in Central and Western Europe. They were also the enactments of local authorities, and sometimes were in conflict with the canonical discipline. Probably this was owing to the attempt to apply to the people a relaxed form of the monastic discipline. Its attempt to classify sins, and to give a penalty rather than a remedy for it, had a bad effect. The chief Penitentials were that of Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, who, however, was not the actual author, that of the Venerable Bede, and that of Egbert of York. On these were based many other Penitentials, of which the chief was that of Halitgar's Collection of Canons. This effort at discipline was intended to impress the newly converted tribes of Upper Europe with the heinousness of vice and the need of compensation. It took hold of their ideas of fines and compensations, and through these endeavored to enforce the morality of a Christian life by the power of the Church wielded in a way that they could understand.

Penitential Psalms. The penitential Psalms were very early picked out and called by this name. In the West their use, especially in penitential systems, was much more marked than in the East. They are the sixth, thirty-second, thirty-eighth, fifty-first, one hundred and second, one hundred and thirtieth, and one hundred and forty-third. These have been appointed for the Service on Ash-Wednesday, but in rearranging our service, by oversight the fifty-first Psalm was omitted in the enumeration, since it was printed at length instead of being referred to by number in the English Communion Office, from which our Intercessions before the General Thanksgiving are taken. Their repetition was often imposed as a penance upon penitents, and thus they became by far the most familiar portions of Holy Scripture.

Pennsylvania. The Swedish Church is an Episcopal Church, and Bishop Morris therefore begins his sketch of this Diocese in "The Churchman's Calendar," with an account of the establishment of Swedish services. Pleasant relations subsisted in provincial days between the Swedish and English missionaries, and when the Swedish mission was given up by the mother-country, the parishes fell into the ranks of the American Episcopal Church. Wicaco (Gloria Dei), and Kingessing (St. James'), and Upper Merion (Christ Church), Bridgeport, lay in Pennsylvania. During Dr. Nicholas Collin's long rectorship these Churches were Swedish, until 1831 A.D., when Rev. J. C. Clay, D.D., became rector of the united parishes, as a clergyman of the American Church. Dr. Collin used the Prayer-Book, and his assistants for forty-five years were American Episcopal clergymen. The Swedish Governor, Printz, brought Rev. John Campanius with him, and settled at Tinicum. There he built a church, near the Lazaretto, in 1646 A.D. The church and burying-ground were dedicated by Campanius. This was the first church in Pennsylvania, and this clergyman of the Catholic and Apostolic Church was at work nearly forty years before William Penn's arrival. Campanius "translated Luther's Catechism into the Indian language." In 1677 A.D. the "Block-house" at Wicaco was "first used as a place of worship." It had loop-holes as windows, and the congregation came with fire-arms, through fear of a surprise by Indians. In 1697 A.D., Rev. Andreas Rudman arrived as pastor. In 1700 A.D. the present brick church (Gloria Dei) was built, and dedicated July 2. Rev. Andrew Rudman was the founder of this church. He afterwards officiated for the Dutch in New York, and at Oxford and Christ Churches, Philadelphia, where he died in 1798 A.D. Rev. Nicholas Collin, of Upsal, was appointed to the Wicaco Church in 1786 A.D., and died in 1831 A.D. In William Penn's charter (1681 A.D.) it was, by the desire of the Bishop of London, stipulated that if twenty persons in the Province should apply to the Bishop for a clergyman, that he might "reside within the Province, without any denial or molestation whatsoever." In 1695 A.D. Christ Church erected its first house of worship. It was "a goodly structure for those days, and of brick, with galleries large enough to accommodate more than five hundred persons." (Dr. Dorr's Historical Account.) "The cost was more than six hundred pounds." In 1697 A.D., Governor Nicholson is thanked by the members of the Church for his liberal assistance. In 1695 A.D., Rev. Thomas Clayton is appointed first minister by the Bishop of London. In 1699 A.D. he died of yellow fever, "caught in visiting the sick." In 1700 A.D., Rev. Evan Evans was sent as a missionary by Bishop Compton. William Penn writes of him, that he "appears a man sober and of a mild disposition." On November 8, 1702 A.D., Rev. George Keith and Rev. John Talbot, on a missionary tour, preached in Christ Church. They were missionaries of the Propagation Society. Keith notes that services were held at Christ Church on Wednesdays and Fridays, and holy-days. This year a bell was presented to Christ Church. It is now in St. Peter's. The Communion service of Christ Church was presented by Queen Anne in 1708 A.D. In 1711 A.D. Christ Church was enlarged. While it was closed, for three Sundays, the congregation worshiped with the Swedes at Wicaco. To denote their fellowship and unity, a Swedish hymn was sung at the English service. In "1721 A.D. the Propagation Society acknowledged the services of Swedish ministers in preaching to the vacant English Churches, and made an appropriation of ten pounds per annum for such services." Mr. Evans held Christ Church eighteen years, and in 1717 A.D. resigned and moved to Maryland. He was "a faithful missionary, and had proved a great instrument toward settling religion and the Church of England in these wild countries." In 1724 A.D., Rev. Dr. Richard Welton took charge of Christ Church. He had been consecrated a Bishop in England by a non-juring Bishop. He was recalled to England "for having exercised Episcopal functions in this country," but he went to Portugal, where he shortly died. In 1728 A.D. Christ Church bought an organ, costing two hundred pounds. In 1739 A.D., Whitefield preached in this Church. In 1754 A.D. a chime of bells, cast by Lester & Pack, of London, for Christ Church arrived. Now Thomas Makin's "Descriptio Pensilvaniæ," 1729 A.D., may be recalled in its reference to this church:

"A lofty tower is founded on this ground,
For future bells to make a distant sound."

In 1750 A.D., Christopher Gist, while exploring Western Pennsylvania, on Christmas-day read Prayers and a Homily to the Indians and traders, on, or near, what is now the town of Coshocton. In 1754 A.D., Col. Washington conducted public prayers in Fort Mifflin, and in 1755 A.D. he read the Burial Service at the funeral of General Braddock. In 1758 A.D., Rev. Thos. Barton, Missionary of the Propagation Society, held service in presence of Col. Washington, and many officers and soldiers, at Raystown, (now Bedford). On May 2, 1760 A.D., "a voluntary Convention" of Episcopal clergy in Christ Church heard "a sermon by Dr. Smith on the conversion of the 'Heathen Americans.'" In 1761 A.D. St. Peter's Church, and also St. Paul's Church, Philadelphia, were opened. In December of 1770 A.D., Wm. White was ordained Deacon by Bishop Young, of Norwich, in the Royal Chapel at London. In April, 1772 A.D., he was ordained priest by the Bishop of London. In November of this year he was elected Assistant Minister of Christ Church and St. Peter's, Philadelphia. In 1772 A.D., Dr. Jno. Kearsley, architect of Christ Church, died. He left a large part of his property to found Christ Church Hospital. He was a vestryman for fifty-three years. In 1774 A.D., on September 7, Rev. Mr. Duché, an Assistant Minister of Christ Church, read Prayers for the First Continental Congress, in Carpenters' Hall, Chestnut St., Philadelphia. The Psalter included Psalm xxxv. Jno. Adams wrote, "It seems as if Heaven had ordained that Psalm to be read on that morning." In 1775 A.D., Mr. Duché was elected Rector of Christ Church. On July 20 of this year, being a Fast-day appointed by the Continental Congress, the Congress attended service at Christ Church. On July 4, 1776 A.D., the Vestry of Christ Church and St. Peter's resolved to omit the prayer in the Liturgy for "the king of Great Britain." In 1775 A.D., Rev. Wm. White was elected chaplain to Congress, then sitting in Baltimore, but there is no evidence that he then entered on the duties of the office. In 1776 A.D., Rev. Mr. Duché was appointed chaplain. In 1777 A.D., Rev. Wm. White was elected chaplain to Congress, in connection with Rev. Mr. Duffield, a Presbyterian. The Congress, on account of British success, had left Philadelphia for York, Pa. Bishop White had removed temporarily to Maryland. Being on a journey, a courier met him, and announced his appointment. It was a very gloomy period in American affairs, but with his usual decision, he turned his horses' heads, and went to the Congress. In a like spirit, when the Bishop, on taking the oath of allegiance to the new Republic, was warned of his danger by a gesture from an acquaintance, after having taken the oath, he acknowledged to the gentleman that he knew it to be dangerous, but that he trusted in Providence, believing the American cause just. In 1779 A.D., Rev. Wm. White was elected Rector of Christ Church and St. Peter's. In 1784 A.D. the Protestant Episcopal Academy was opened in Philadelphia. A meeting in New Brunswick in reference to the corporation for the Relief of Widows and Children of Deceased Clergy led to the call of a General Meeting in New York, which meeting provided for a call for a General Convention in Philadelphia, September 27, 1785 A.D. In this year the Primary Convention of the Church in Pennsylvania met at Christ Church. The clergy were Dr. White, Robt. Blackwell, Jos. Hutchins, and Samuel Magan. There were twenty-one laymen. Sixteen Churches were represented. Dr. White was chairman. In 1785 A.D. the first proper Diocesan Convention of Pennsylvania met in Christ Church. "Of the first twenty-nine Annual Diocesan Conventions, all but one were held in Christ Church."

At the close of the Revolution the Pennsylvania country parishes had been scattered and their pastors driven away. The missionaries of the Propagation Society could no longer pursue their faithful work. Bishop Perry refers to the second volume of the "Historical Collections of the American Colonial Church," and to Bishop White's Memoirs of the Church, for the sad story. Bishop White took steps, however, for organization. In 1784 A.D. a meeting was held at his house, composed of persons delegated by the vestries of Christ Church, and St. Peter's and St. Paul's. They asked for a conference with the Episcopalians from the country, who were then in Philadelphia, and some Churchmen were members of the House of Assembly in session there. A circular letter was sent out to the churches in the State, calling a meeting of clergy and laity in Philadelphia. On May 24, 1784 A.D., this meeting took place in Christ Church. At this time and on the following day delegates were present from Christ Church and St. Peter's, Philadelphia; St. Paul's, Philadelphia; St. James', Bristol; Trinity, Oxford; All-Saints', Pennapecta (Torresdale); St. Paul's, Chester; St. David's, Radnor; St. Peter's, in the Valley; St. Martin's, Marcus Hook; St. James', Lancaster; St. James', Perkioming; St. John's, New London, and Huntingdon Church, York County; and St. Mary's, Reading, and St. Gabriel's, Marlton, Berks County. A Standing Committee of clergymen and laymen was appointed to confer with representatives from the Church in other States, "and assist in framing an ecclesiastical government." The committee delegated their powers to certain persons of their own number, together with Samuel Powel and Richard Peters, Esqs., who attended a meeting held in New York. At a meeting February 7, 1785 A.D., it was resolved, that there should "be sent to every clergyman and congregation in the State an account of the proceedings of the Committee, in concurrence with sundry clergymen and others at a meeting in the city of New York, on the 6th and 7th days of October last," and that a Convention should meet in Christ Church, Philadelphia, on May 23, "to organize the Episcopal Church in this State, agreeably to the intentions of the body assembled in New York, as aforesaid." This resulted in "An Act of Association." It was determined that there should be a Diocesan Convention, composed of clergy and laity, each congregation having one vote. The Orders were to vote separately, and their concurrence was needed to make a measure valid. The Convention of Pennsylvania should have power to admit clergy or deputies desiring seats from any adjoining State or States. The Act of Association was signed by the Deputies on May 24, 1785 A.D. Bishop White was a leader in the idea of lay representation, and it has been generally acceptable in this country, though the Diocese of Connecticut, for a time, insisted on clerical representation alone in its own Convention, but it soon gave way. The meeting chose deputies, "in accordance with the recommendation of the preliminary Convention at New York, for the meeting in Philadelphia, in September, 1785 A.D." This first General Convention met in historical Christ Church. "There were clerical and lay deputies from seven of the thirteen States, viz., from New York to Virginia inclusive, with the addition of South Carolina." What a small body compared to the General Convention which met in 1883 A.D. in the same church for its opening service! "What hath God wrought!" still, let us not boast, when so much remains undone on this vast Continent.

A special Diocesan Convention elected Rev. Dr. Wm. White as Bishop, September 14, 1786 A.D. He was consecrated at Lambeth together with Bishop Provoost, of New York, on February 4, 1787 A.D., by the Archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by the Archbishop of York, and the Bishops of Bath and Wells, and Peterborough. In 1809 A.D., Bishop White confirmed in Trinity Church, Swedesborough, N. J., 251 persons. The Episcopal Fund began this year by receipt of a bequest of $2000 of Mr. Andrew Doz. St. James', Philadelphia, was consecrated this year. In 1812 A.D. the Advancement Society was organized. In 1816 A.D. the Episcopal Missionary Society of Philadelphia was formed, which was the germ of the General Foreign and Domestic Society. In 1823 A.D. St. Stephen's, Wilkesbarre, was consecrated. In 1825 A.D. Trinity Church, Pittsburg, was consecrated, and 135 persons confirmed there. Rev. Jos. Pilmore, D.D., died this year. In 1826 A.D. an attempt was made to elect an Assistant Bishop; Rev. Wm. Meade (afterwards Bishop of Virginia) had 27 clerical votes, and Rev. Bird Wilson 26. There being 54 entitled to vote and one not voting, there was no election. This year the corner-stone of St. Stephen's, Harrisburg, was laid, Rev. Messrs. Bedell, Clarkson, Piggot, and Clemson assisting. In 1827 A.D., Rev. H. U. Onderdonk was elected Assistant Bishop. He was consecrated this year in Christ Church, Philadelphia. In 1828 A.D. St. James' Church, Philadelphia, was separated from Christ Church and St. Peter's, but Bishop White remained Rector of the three parishes. In 1831 A.D., Rev. H. J. Morton was elected Assistant Minister to Bishop White at St. James' Church, Philadelphia. In 1832 A.D. Christ Church and St. Peter's were separated as corporations, but Bishop White was still Rector of both. In 1834 A.D. the Bishop White Prayer-Book Society was organized. Bishop White died July 17, 1836 A.D., in the eighty-ninth year of his age, having been Bishop nearly fifty years. Prefixed to Bishop Stevens's sermon, "Then and Now," is a fac-simile of the certificate of the ordination of Bishop White to Deacon's orders in 1770 A.D. by the Bishop of Norwich. Little did the English Bishop, or the young American deacon, afterwards to be Presiding Bishop, dream of the history that should follow. A lady, who was a playmate of the future prelate, declared that "Billy White was born a Bishop," as he would always be playing Church in his childhood. Dr. Morton speaks of his youthful wisdom. In old age his venerable form impressed all. The universal regret at his death showed his wide influence. He was buried in a vault adjoining Christ Church, but in 1870 A.D. the remains were moved to the Chancel of that Church. At one time Bishop White (as a Presbyter) was the only Episcopal clergyman in Pennsylvania. At the Convention next before his death, that of 1836 A.D., there were 86 clergy and 91 congregations. It was a blessing to this Diocese that it was so long guided by a Bishop so judicious and godly. The advance in Church life has continued under other wise Bishops. Dr. Buchanan, in the Convention Sermon of 1876 A.D., recalls his memory of the small Convention of 1834 A.D. as compared with that one, though the Diocese then contained but five counties, instead of the whole State. The State now has three Dioceses.

In 1841 A.D. the Christmas Fund for Disabled Clergymen was created by the Convention. Rev. Dr. Abercrombie died this year. "Up to this year the Diocese of Delaware had been under the care of the Bishop of Pennsylvania." In May Rev. A. Lee was elected Bishop of Delaware, and consecrated at the General Convention in St. Paul's, New York, October 12.

In 1842 A.D., Bishop, Mar Johannah, of Persia, was introduced into the chancel by Bishop Onderdonk at Convention. In 1844 A.D. a special Convention received the resignation of Bishop Onderdonk. In 1845 A.D., Bishops Kemper, Lee, and Gadsden performed various Episcopal services. This year Rev. Alonzo Potter, D.D., was chosen Bishop. He was consecrated in Christ Church, Philadelphia, September 23. In 1847 A.D., Bishop Potter requested offerings for sufferers by famine in Ireland, and nearly nine thousand dollars were raised. In 1849 A.D. there were one hundred and forty-four clergy and one hundred and forty-three organized congregations in the Diocese. The floating church for seamen was consecrated this year. Now (1884 A.D.) the mission has a beautiful stone church on land not far from the Delaware River.

The Clergy Daughters' Fund was established in 1849 A.D. In 1850 A.D., Bishop Potter, in his Convention address, commended the Bible Society. In 1858 A.D., Bishop Onderdonk died. This year Rev. Samuel Bowman, D.D., was elected Assistant Bishop. He was consecrated in Christ Church, Philadelphia, on August 25. The missionary work of the Diocese was, in 1859 A.D., committed by the Convention to the Diocesan Board of Missions. The corner-stone of the new building of the Episcopal Hospital was laid by Bishop Potter, in presence of members of the Convention, in 1860 A.D. This noble institution is largely indebted to Bishop Potter for its existence. In 1861 A.D. (August 3) "Bishop Bowman fell dead while walking beside the Alleghany Railroad, about twenty miles from Pittsburg," while on a visitation. Thus closed a saintly life. In 1861 A.D., Rev. William Bacon Stevens, D.D., was elected Assistant Bishop. In 1862 A.D. the Philadelphia Divinity School was organized, with Bishop A. Potter as President. Bishop Stevens was consecrated in St. Andrew's Church, Philadelphia, where he had long been rector, on January 2, 1862 A.D. On the 23d of May in this year the chapel of the Episcopal Hospital was consecrated during the session of the Convention. In 1864 A.D., the Convention was held in St. Peter's and Trinity Churches, Pittsburg. In 1865 A.D. the Convention consented to the division of the Diocese. On Tuesday, July 4 of this year, "Bishop Potter died on board the steamship Colorado, in the harbor of San Francisco, California." So passed away a wise master-builder in the Church of CHRIST. In 1869 A.D., Bishop Stevens, in his Convention address, spoke of the necessity of a further division of the Diocese. The Diocese of Pittsburg had been set off by the General Convention in 1865 A.D., and had held its first Convention in Pittsburg November 15 of that year, and elected Rev. Dr. J. B. Kerfoot, President of Trinity College, as Bishop. He was consecrated January 25 (St. Paul's Day), 1866 A.D. In 1869 A.D., Bishop Stevens recommended to the parishes the insurance of the lives of their clergy. The Committee on the Episcopal Residence reported its purchase, the amount needed ($35,000) having been procured. The Christmas Fund for Disabled Clergy, and the Widows and Orphans of Deceased Clergy had received over $5000. Ten churches were admitted into the Convention. A committee recommended the free opening of the churches for "at least one service on every Sunday." In 1870 A.D. the Bishop in his address to Convention noted the death of the venerable Dr. Dorr, rector of Christ Church. Mr. John Welsh's gift of $18,000 to the Episcopal Hospital was named. The Bishop outlined the plan of the City Mission, with a Superintendent, all the missionaries being appointed by the Bishop, and responsible to him. He also desired lay-workers to assist the missionaries. The benevolent and reformatory institutions of the city needed religious instruction, and it was thought best thus to secure it. The Bishop consented to the second division of the Diocese, stipulating that there should be left "in the Diocese of Pennsylvania not less than the five counties of Philadelphia, Montgomery, Delaware, Chester, and Bucks." The Committee on Parochial History had received sketches of twenty-nine parishes, and accumulated numerous "books, pamphlets, and files of Church papers,—some of them rare and important." The Convention consented to the formation of another new Diocese. Eight churches were admitted into union with the Convention.

Rev. Dr. M. A. De W. Howe having been elected Bishop of Central Pennsylvania, was consecrated in St. Luke's Church, Philadelphia, of which parish he had been rector, on December 28, 1871 A.D. The Diocese of Pennsylvania, thus diminished greatly in size by two divisions, in 1883 A.D. had 20 candidates for orders, 200 clergy, and 120 parishes, including 2 not in union with the Convention. There were 9 corner-stones laid and 9 consecrations. The whole number of churches is 120, and chapels 27. There are 61 parsonages. There were over 10,000 baptisms, and 5583 persons received confirmation. The value of Church property, including parsonages, cemeteries, school buildings, and endowments, hospitals, etc., was $8,700,000. The Bishop, in his address in 1883 A.D., spoke of the death of Rev. Dr. Suddards, who ministered "for nearly half a century" in Grace Church, Philadelphia. There are in Philadelphia Italian and Spanish Missions, and a Chinese Mission. Faith Home, for crippled children, has lately been opened, as a venture of faith, by a Christian lady. The Hospital of the Good Shepherd, for children, at Rosemont, is a similar institution, which has been doing loving and faithful work for years. There is also a Home for the Homeless. The Episcopal Hospital does a CHRIST-like work. The Burd Orphan Asylum, the Church Home for Children, the Lincoln Institution, must not be forgotten. There is also a Mission work among Deaf-Mutes, conducted by Rev. H. W. Syle. If the early Church people, who for a few Sundays in 1711 A.D., during the enlargement of Christ Church, walked along the river-shore to Gloria Dei to worship with their Swedish friends, could see the wharves and residences and places of business that now cover the green fields of their day, and could behold the churches and charitable institutions of Philadelphia at this time, they might realize the importance of the good work which they began, and which the children of God have continued. May the blessed work still prosper and advance to the glory of CHRIST.

REV. S. F. HOTCHKIN.

Pentateuch. The writer of this article has availed himself largely of Bishop Harold Browne's Introduction to the Pentateuch in the first volume of the Bible Commentary, and of "Moses and the Prophets" by Professor W. H. Green, D.D., of Princeton Theological Seminary, in addition to other works.

The Pentateuch, the name given to the first five books of the Old Testament, is a Greek word, signifying the fivefold volume. It is derived from the Septuagint translation, and some authors attribute to those translators the division into separate books. The Jews, however, recognized this arrangement, but distinguished the different portions by the initial word of each. The whole was called by them "The Law" (Torah), or "The Law of Moses."

In the Pentateuch are continued the annals, civil and religious institutions of the people of Israel, and a record of the Divine dealings with them until the eve of their entrance into the land of Canaan. This national history is prefaced with an account of the creation of the world, the formation of man and his lapse from a state of original righteousness, the growing corruption of the human race, the judgment of Almighty God consequent thereupon, bringing upon the earth a deluge of water, the saving of Noah and his family from the common doom, the repeopleing of the earth by his posterity, and very interesting notices of kingdoms founded in the region of Mesopotamia and ancient cities built there. Then the historian passes to the call of Abraham, the great progenitor of the Hebrew people, from the midst of idolatry to the knowledge and worship of JEHOVAH, the true and living God, and his removal from Chaldea to Canaan. The incidents of his life are related, as well as those of Isaac, his son, and Jacob, his grandson, and with much particularity the circumstances which brought the sons of Jacob, ancestors of the twelve tribes, to become dwellers in Egypt.

The Book of Genesis is evidently introductory. It accounts for the sojourning of the Israelites in the land of Egypt, narrates their ancestral traditions, and explains their inherited faith. Without it much of the subsequent history would be unintelligible. While we are by no means compelled to maintain that every portion and word were written by the author of the remaining books, there is clear indication of one mind directing and arranging the whole work.

In the Book of Exodus are fully related the bondage, deliverance, and departure of the Israelites from Egypt through direct intervention of JEHOVAH. The plagues sent upon the Egyptians, the passage through the Red Sea, and many incidents of their wanderings in the desert are graphically described. Miracles are interwoven with the whole narrative, and especially was the giving of the Law upon Mount Sinai accompanied with awe-inspiring manifestations of the majesty of God. The writer sets forth an array of wonders which he evidently believes, and would have his readers believe, accompanied a theophany. For his legislation, and for the religious system and worship which he enjoined, he constantly and confidently claimed Divine warrant and direction. The Law came by Moses, but he himself being witness, the Lawgiver was JEHOVAH.

In the remainder of the Book of Exodus, and in that of Numbers, the wanderings of the twelve tribes for the space of forty years are related, and the most noteworthy events occurring during this long period.

The Book of Leviticus contains the ceremonial law, the ordinances of priesthood and sacrifice, and whatever pertains to Divine worship.

Deuteronomy is hortatory, didactic, and prophetic. The great legislator, before laying down his office and his life, seeks to impress, with earnest reiteration, the duties bound upon a people so distinguished from other nations, and with whom the ALMIGHTY had condescended to enter into a special covenant relation. The book is full of allusions to past events in their history, appeals to miracles wrought in their behalf as well-known facts, and contains prophetic announcements of the rewards that would follow their obedience and the severe punishments that would be sure to follow disobedience and apostasy. As Genesis is a preface to the whole work, so Deuteronomy is an appropriate conclusion, such a summary of facts and duties, such a recapitulation and practical enforcement of the lessons of the past, as became the author upon the point of resigning his great charge. Such a man as Moses, at such a period, might well speak in just this manner to the people over whom for so many years he had been so faithful a shepherd. The Pentateuch, therefore, is a unit—a single coherent work, following out a great purpose from beginning to end. The attempt to break it up into fragments and assign different portions to different authors is doing violence to a well-arranged and complete whole. Of the skeptical tendency inspiring and underlying the criticism which so boldly gainsays the integrity and unity of the work, there will be occasion to remark.

We have spoken of Moses as the author of the Pentateuch in accordance with the concurrent testimony of Hebrew and Christian antiquity. This is a vital point, and upon this mainly hinges the controversy between the maintainers and impugnors of the Divine inspiration of the work and the reality of the supernatural interpositions. Denial of the supernatural is the true source and meaning of the destructive criticism that has been of late so radical and positive. If the authorship of Moses be conceded, then the account of the signs and wonders therein described was the work of an eye-witness and principal actor. It was credited by the generation then living. Laws, rites, ceremonies, and observances commemorated them. The miracles and the institutions were coeval. Of course it would have been impossible to persuade a whole people that they saw with their own eyes what they never had seen, experienced deliverances and chastisements which they had never known, and were observing ceremonies in testimony of events which had never occurred.

Then there is that in their later history which closely corresponds with warnings and denunciations contained in the book, especially in Deuteronomy. If really written by the hand of Moses, it is difficult to deny his prophetic inspiration. He uttered, through the HOLY SPIRIT, Divine oracles. The only escape from this conclusion is to deny that these supposed prophecies were penned by Moses. To this recourse those critics are driven who admit no such thing as Divine inspiration. With them it is a foregone conclusion that miracles and prophecies are incredible. The histories embodying them, therefore, were the production of subsequent ages. Old myths and legends were converted into historical facts. Ingenious forgers palmed upon their credulous contemporaries compositions written after the events referred to had taken place, as if they had come down from remote antiquity. Moses being a heroic character in the nation's infancy, was the most attractive name to be affixed to these fables. Policy and priestcraft combined to persuade the people into the acceptance of these fictitious writings as if they were genuine works of the venerated lawgiver of Israel. Thus laws, doctrines, ceremonies, tributes, were imposed upon the nation, and this, mainly from religious and patriotic motives. According to these critics the Pentateuch is largely a pious fraud.

Encountered by such bold denials, we turn to the reasons for the opinion once so universally prevalent. Upon what grounds do we believe Moses to be the author of the Pentateuch?

In maintaining this view we are not obliged to contend that every word was penned by his own hand or written from his mouth. For historical works to contain documents of an earlier age, public or private record, and genealogies, fragments from ancient annalists is not unprecedented or uncommon. If some of the narratives embodied in the Pentateuch, especially in the Book of Genesis, are of this nature, it does not at all invalidate the claim to Mosaic authorship. There is no necessity for solving perplexing questions as to whether the use of the words Jehovah and Elohim indicate different sources, nor to draw the lines between the respective positions of each. We can readily grant that the accounts of the creation, the fall, the antediluvian patriarchs, the deluge, etc., had been preserved by tradition, and were transmitted by Noah to his descendants. The similarity of these primeval annals to records preserved by the most ancient nations, especially by Egypt and Babylonia, point to a common origin. The traditions of these people bear a striking resemblance to the Biblical narratives, although often distorted and intermingled with heathen fables. If Moses selected certain accounts, of the truthfulness of which he was well assured, and inserted them in his book, this detracts nothing from his authorship of the work or from overruling Divine inspiration. This will satisfactorily explain peculiarities of style upon which great stress has been laid by skeptical critics.

So also, at a subsequent period, explanatory notes may have been introduced by learned men, like Ezra, who reviewed the work, and perhaps the Old Testament Canon. The account of the death of Moses was of course so written, and some geographical and historical annotations. To this source might be ascribed personal allusions, like Exodus xi. 8, and Numbers xii. 3, although there is no urgent necessity for admitting this. The objection that Moses could not have spoken of himself is a petty cavil, unworthy of scholars who have read Cæsar's Commentaries.

In support of the genuineness of the Pentateuch appeal is first made to its own testimony. This is prima facie evidence, and of great weight unless it can be set aside by convincing arguments. Moses repeatedly represents himself as the writer.

Exodus xvii. 14, "And the LORD said unto Moses, Write this for a memorial in a book,"—where instead of a "a book" read "the book," reference being to a well-known register. Exodus xxxiv. 27, "And the LORD said unto Moses, Write thou these words: for after the tenor of these words I have made a covenant with thee and with Israel."

Moses makes express mention of his doing what was thus enjoined. Exodus xxiv. 3, 4, "And Moses came and told the people all the words of the LORD, and all the judgments: and all the people answered with one voice, and said, All the words which the LORD hath said will we do. And Moses wrote all the words of the LORD." So he recorded the history of the wanderings of Israel in the desert, specifying the stages of their journeys. Numbers xxxiii. 2, "And Moses wrote their goings out, according to their journeys by the commandment of the LORD."

Towards the close of the book (Deut. xxxi. 9-12) we read, "And Moses wrote this Law, and delivered it unto the priests the sons of Levi, which bare the ark of the covenant of the LORD, and unto all the elders of Israel. And Moses commanded them, saying, At the end of every seven years, in the solemnity of the year of release, in the feast of tabernacles, when all Israel is come to appear before the LORD thy God in the place which the LORD shall choose, thou shalt read this Law before all Israel in their hearing. Gather the people together, men, and women, and children, and thy stranger that is within thy gates, that they may hear, and that they may learn, and fear the LORD your God, and observe to do all the words of this Law." Deut. xxxi. 24-26, "And it came to pass, when Moses had made an end of writing the words of this Law in a book, until they were finished, that Moses commanded the Levites, which bare the ark of the covenant of the LORD, saying, Take this book of the Law, and put it in the side of the ark of the covenant of the LORD your God, that it may be there for a witness against thee."

This mention of the writing of the book of the Law by Moses himself may have applied only to Deuteronomy. Granting this detracts not from the weight of the arguments already adduced in behalf of the preceding books. Deuteronomy, moreover, has been the special object of assault by recent critics, who while assigning this book to the reign of Josiah, or to a still later period, have been willing to allow to Moses considerable portions of the others.

While reading the majestic flowing sentences of this grand composition, glowing with intense feeling and breathing sentiments so elevated, it is difficult to repress some emotions of indignation, if not contempt, for men who, whatever the extent of their erudition, can see nothing here but an artful invention of priestcraft. The impress of a noble spirit, far above dishonest arts and base imposture, is stamped upon the whole. And what forger would venture so to speak in the name of JEHOVAH, and use such solemn language of warning against any attempts to tamper with the oracles he was commissioned to deliver? Deut. iv. 2, "Ye shall not add unto the word which I command you, neither shall ye diminish aught from it, that ye may keep the commandments of the LORD your God."

Moses was perfectly competent to compose such a work as the Pentateuch. It is impossible to deny eminent* ability and intellectual power to the man who led a multitude of serfs out of Egypt, formed them into a compact, well-ordered nation, and impressed himself so deeply upon their institutions and traditions. For this we have the concurrent testimony of both secular and sacred history. Moses is indisputably a historical character, and the transfer of the Jewish people from Egypt to Israel is established from other sources than the Scriptures. That such a man should have superior knowledge and mental training is a necessity.

When Stephen affirmed that "Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians and was mighty in words and in deeds," he uttered what was not only the universal belief of his people, but an unavoidable inference from his public life and acts. Even the most carping and destructive critics concede the Decalogue to Moses, and the man who can be believed capable of producing such a code cannot surely be pronounced incompetent to compose the entire Pentateuch. That the art of writing was then well known in Egypt is abundantly proved. Papyri of dates several hundred years earlier than the Exodus have been brought to light.

Moses being certainly capable of such a performance would naturally desire to effect it. He would not, we may be confident, have been willing to abandon the memory of events so important to the uncertainties of oral tradition, or that laws and religious rites should lack a sure and trustworthy method of transmission. Coming generations had as deep a stake in the truths and ordinances delivered as that which was then living. The solicitude of the great lawgiver for the future welfare of his people is everywhere apparent. His patriotism was profound and fervent. For the preservation of their national existence and prosperity he was ready to make any personal sacrifice. He was always looking forward to the future destinies of the nation, most anxious for its loyalty to JEHOVAH and faithful observance of the covenant. He felt his own mission to be very much preparatory. He was moulding and shaping a nation for the great part it was to perform in another land and through many ages. Knowing how much depended upon the Israelites, keeping in mind the eventful beginnings of their history, he would certainly not have neglected to put these things in permanent shape. Without overweening self-estimate, Moses knew that no subsequent leader or legislator could give institutions better adapted to the wants of the people than his own, or speak with anything like his authority.

For such a work, moreover, he had time and opportunity during the long sojourn of Israel in the wilderness. During these weary waitings and wanderings, Moses was profitably occupied in composing records of such deep interest and vital consequence to the welfare of his people.

The historical, political, and geographical allusions found in the Pentateuch are in perfect harmony with the theory of its Mosaic authorship. The writer shows especial familiarity with Egypt and Arabia. The recent highly-interesting disclosures of old Egyptian life in no way contradict, and often strikingly confirm, his references thereto. The royalty and priesthood of Egypt as described in this book, the labors imposed upon bond-servants, the longevity of the plagues, with phenomena of the region and features of the prevalent idolatry, sepulchral rites, proficiency in the arts of embalming, engraving, and embroidery, and occasional words and phrases, accord with modern discoveries. It is scarce conceivable that writers of a later age and different nationality and education should manifest such familiarity with the customs of Egypt, or that a fabricator should introduce so many local allusions and never betray himself by anachronism or misstatement.

The wilderness has left its impress on the work. Many passages breathe the air of the desert and tell of a nomad people dwelling in tents. The nation could be readily assembled. Each tribe had its position in the encampment and in the order of march. The unclean and lepers were to remain without the camp, and thither was the sin-offering to be carried and consumed. The phraseology thus originated was of lasting continuance. "To your tents, O Israel," was the watch-word of sedition. The Hebrew Christians were reminded that JESUS, as a sin-offering, "suffered without the gate," and were exhorted to "go forth to him without the camp." The tabernacle, so conspicuous a feature in their religious institutions, was a movable tent, and precise directions are given concerning the mode of its transportation. Could such numerous, often slight and incidental, allusions have proceeded from a forger and have been designedly scattered throughout the work?

The consensus of later books of the Old Testament corroborates the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch. From Joshua to Chronicles and Malachi there are numerous quotations from the Pentateuch, or allusions to events and precepts there recorded, and nowhere the least doubt expressed or implied. The Law of Moses is the constant standard of appeal. Obedience or disobedience thereto is the test of character, the key of Divine blessings or judgments. Those who reverence it are commended. Those who neglect or scorn it are threatened and condemned. The constitution, laws, and rites represented as obligatory correspond with the legislation and ordinances of the Pentateuch. The Priesthood is continued in the family of Aaron. To the tribe of Levi is assigned the performance of various ministries connected with divine service. The ark is regarded with peculiar veneration, as the depository of the tables of the ten commandments, and associated with the manifestation of the Divine glory. There is constant mention of circumcision, the Passover, the sacrifices, as well known to those addressed. Now, is it credible that this minute, onerous, and expensive ritual could be foisted upon generations which had not grown up under it, and that they could be made to believe that they had received it from those before them as divinely communicated through Moses? It would seem that one who could persuade himself of this had little cause to sneer at the credulity of believers, who reverently accept as trustworthy the account of those miracles and the early date of the prophetic portions.

So cogent is this argument that the impugnors of the Mosaic authorship are compelled to deal in like manner with the later books. Inasmuch as the Book of Joshua is so closely connected with the Pentateuch, that also must be discredited. The allegation of forgery is a short and easy method of disposing of this troublesome witness. And so the process is continued. Either whole books or intractable passages must be swept away by this bold assumption. Historians, judges, and prophets, unless they confirm the theories of rationalizing critics, are summarily thrust aside. Verily, according to the theories of these intrepid arguers, we have in the Old Testament a most amazing series of literary impositions. The attempts of later ages in this line fade into insignificance. For unscrupulous, plausible, and successful fictions these ancient prophets and scribes must be allowed the palm. Wonderfully have they deceived after-ages as well as their own, the learned as well as the ignorant, teachers as well as the multitude, Christian Apostles as well as Jewish Rabbis, and we cannot avoid adding (with reverence) JESUS CHRIST Himself. And what was to be gained by these stupendous frauds?

According to some critics the imposition of the Levitical sacrificial and ritual system was to be a proof of priestly power and a support of monotheism. Others charitably impute such devices to zeal for promoting the moral and religious improvement of the nation, and suggest that through these means it was better prepared for the acceptance of the gospel. It is even piously intimated that the hand of God may be recognized in this preparation. It is difficult to decide whether such theories are the more preposterous or dishonorable to the God of truth.

And who were the astute and crafty men, of intellects so acute and of morality so defective, who successfully essayed this great imposture? To what age and to what agents shall it be attributed? Here the critics are much at variance among themselves. Each propounder of a new interpretation begins by demolishing that of his predecessor. Whether successful or not in establishing his own hypothesis, he is fairly so in overthrowing structures already reared. "The most effectual reply to these various hypotheses often is to set them over against each other and exhibit their mutual contrariety."* Samuel, Hilkiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Ezra have been named in turn as probable achievers of this marvelous deception. Dr. Robertson Smith maintains that Deuteronomy first appeared in the reign of Josiah, and that the Levitical Law was not in existence before the time of Ezra. Great stress is laid upon the finding of the book of the Law, in repairing the Temple, and the effect produced upon the king, as recorded in 2 Kings xxii. 8. Hence it is argued that previously to this presumed occurrence the law could have had no existence. The finding of the Bible by Luther in the library of the convent at Erfurth, produced upon his mind an impression as profound as that ascribed in the passage referred to upon King Josiah. This would be as valid an argument to prove the non-existence of the entire sacred volume before Luther's day. The constant references to the Law in earlier writings cannot be dismissed in this summary way. During the reigns of Josiah's predecessors who favored idolatry, especially Manasseh, whose reign was of such long continuance, there would be no disposition to bring into prominent notice a testimony so strong against prevailing evil practices. The rolls of the Law would be treated, as the holy volume has been often treated since, thrust out of sight and out of mind. Copies must have been rare, and it is not improbable that some were purposely destroyed. But Hezekiah's attempted reform recognized the obligation of this Law a century before. It was "the testimony" given to Jehoash at his coronation (2 Kings xi. 12). Solomon appealed to it in his prayer at the dedication of the Temple (1 Kings viii.). The Book of the Law found in the Temple was very possibly the autograph directed by Moses to be deposited in the side of the ark. If from the circumstances of his education Josiah had only a partial acquaintance with the words of the Torah, the complete work, so remarkably brought to light, would naturally agitate a mind so open to religious impression and render him more zealous for the national reformation.

Ingenious attempts are made to disprove the Mosaic authorship by adducing passages showing the neglect and disregard of many of the injunctions contained in the Pentateuch in subsequent ages. If infraction of a Law proves its non-existence, Christianity is likely to suffer as well as Judaism, the New Testament is as open to attack as the Old, and the existence of the LORD JESUS CHRIST as an actual living person might be called in question. In truth, the perverse heart of man is continually struggling to escape from the holy commandments of God. "Why call ye me LORD, LORD, and do not the things which I command?" The disobedience of the recipients of Divine revelations is their own sin and loss, no disproof of the revelation itself. This is a sufficient answer to objections drawn from irregularities of worship, as well as from moral disobedience.

That there were periods when the prescribed ritual was not fully carried out, nay, fell into extreme neglect, and when corrupt practices widely prevailed, is freely conceded. Of this degeneracy we have frequent instance, during the periods embraced in the Book of Judges, and until the establishment of Divine worship as it had been appointed in the reign of David. It is hence argued that the provisions restricting sacrifice to one appointed place could not have been then enacted, and so the early date of the Pentateuch is discredited.

But wherever God manifested His glorious presence it was lawful to erect an altar and offer sacrifice. This is sufficient explanation of the sacrifices offered at Bochim (Judges ii. 1-5), by Gideon (Judges vi. 20), by Manoah (Judges xiii. 16), and by David at the threshing-floor of Araunah (2 Sam. xxiv.). In the Book of Judges the Tabernacle at Shiloh, containing the ark, is recognized as the house of the LORD until the ark was carried into captivity by the Philistines. This was a Divine judgment. God's people had broken their covenant with Him, and were no longer entitled to retain the symbol of His presence. Shiloh then lost its peculiar sacredness, and was deserted by JEHOVAH (Jer. vii. 12, 14). Afterwards Samuel, as God's prophet, exercised a general religious superintendence. During the interval between the capture of the ark and its solemn restoration by David, the regular performance of the Levitical service was suspended. Upon solemn occasions Samuel, the LORD's prophet, exercising general religious superintendence, offered sacrifices. But while the ark was in the hands of the Philistines God had no sanctuary in Israel. And when first returned by its captors, the ark became a source of terror and alarm. No priest or Levite ministered before it. From the time the ark was laid up at Kirjath-Jearim till David removed it to Zion there is scarcely a recorded instance of sacrifice where Samuel was not present, except Saul's rash and unhappy act. Samuel is plainly the centre of the religious life of this period. (Green, pp. 101-105.)

To argue, therefore, from the record of sacrifices offered elsewhere than at Shiloh, during this season of disorder, while ordinary service was intermitted, against the existence of the Levitical directory, is to base grave conclusions upon very slight premises. Can such reasoning overthrow conclusions founded upon clear and cogent proofs which have carried conviction to the minds of thousands of thorough Biblical scholars? Is the veritable historian and lawgiver of ancient Israel to be thrust aside and mighty miracles converted into myths and fables by cavils of this sort?

So, also, if the prophets in their zeal for true religion, genuine faith, and godliness sometimes use very strong language in condemnation of formalism and hypocrisy, are we to understand them as meaning to deny that the ceremonies and sacrifices of the Law were actually given as set forth in the Pentateuch? For instance, we read in Jeremiah (vii. 22, 23), "I spake not unto your fathers, nor commanded them in the day that I brought them out of the land of Egypt, concerning burnt-offerings or sacrifices. But this thing commanded I them, Obey my voice, and I will be your God, and ye shall be my people: and walk ye in all the ways that I have commanded you, that it may be well with you." Can it be seriously maintained that the prophet here denies the enactment of the Ceremonial Law? Or can a like inference be drawn from penitential confessions, such as those of David? (Ps. li. 16, 17.) Who that is familiar with Scripture style cannot turn to numerous instances of similar phraseology? Is Samuel controverting the Divine appointment of altar-service when he says to Saul, "Hath the LORD as great delight in burnt-offerings and sacrifices as in obeying the voice of the LORD? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams." The spiritual requirements of the Law coexisted with the outward ordinances, and the mission of the prophets was mainly directed to arouse the national conscience, and turn the hearts of the people to God in repentance, submission, and holiness of life.

Arguments against the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch have also been sought in its phraseology. It has been urged that the style is too much like that of later books of the Old Testament to warrant the opinion that so long a period of time intervened. But to this it is answered that there is not in Semitic languages the tendency to change which exists in modern European tongues. Scholars attest that the Arabic of the Koran does not differ materially from that of the present day, although quite as long a duration has elapsed as that between Moses and Ezra. The Syriac of later times is said not to vary from that of the Peshito version. Egyptian papyri much more widely separated from each other in age are the same in style. The work of Moses, moreover, like the translations of Tyndall and Luther, would strongly tend to fix the national style and become the standard of language as well as of religion. The sacred books were mainly the literature (ῥα γραμματα) of the people.

Biblical scholars, however, do find archaisms in the Pentateuch and peculiar phrases to fully as great extent as could be reasonably expected.

Another objection, somewhat dissimilar, has been drawn from alleged variations of style between Deuteronomy and the preceding books. But when the respective circumstances under which they were composed are considered and the design of the author, this is no more than might be looked for, and is rather a confirmation than a difficulty. An interval of nearly forty years separates them. Probably the earlier books were written, from time to time, in detached portions. In Deuteronomy, the venerable lawgiver in a connected discourse reviews the past, pours out his heart in affectionate exhortations, solemn prophecies, and fervent praises. The prophetic spirit burned within him. His eye penetrated into the hidden future, his soul was wrapt in holy ecstasy, and his great loving heart yearned over the people whom he had watched over for so many years, and from whom he was now about to be removed. A more elevated, diffuse, and impassioned style would fittingly clothe his farewell utterances.

The theory of the later date of the Pentateuch involves far greater inconsistencies and difficulties than are encountered by those who accept its early composition. According to this interpretation laws are promulgated which have no meaning or fitness. What object in the reign of Josiah to issue injunctions forbidding peace with the Amalekites, who had long since disappeared? Or to prohibit foreign conquests, when the urgent question was whether Judaea could maintain its own existence against powerful and warlike neighbors? A law discriminating against Ammon and Moab in favor of Edom had its warrant in the Mosaic period, but not in the times of the later kings, when Edom was to the prophets the representative foe of the people of God. Would an injunction to show no unfriendliness to Egyptians be found in a code composed by the prophets, who were striving with all their might to dissuade the people from alliance or association with Egypt? And what necessity for the requirement that, when the kingdom was established, the King should be a native and not a foreigner, when for ages the succession to the throne in the family of David had been undisputed? (Green, pp. 62-66.) On the post exilic theory there is a ritual arrangement, full and particular, framed at a time when no cultus existed, an exhaustive description of the tabernacle and all its parts as if it were a reality, when according to this assumption it was an imaginary structure, great prominence given to the ark and all that pertained to it, although the ark perished in the destruction of the first Temple, and was never subsequently renewed. (Green, pp. 62, 67.) Such are specimens of the absurdities and incongruities continually confronting the acceptors of this pretentious criticism, which claims to disabuse us of old and vulgar errors.

The great schism, which was never afterwards healed, took place in the reign of Rehoboam, about 975 A.C. It was the policy of Jeroboam to deepen and perpetuate the alienation between Israel and Judæa. With this end he discountenanced any participation of his subjects in the prescribed Temple worship at Jerusalem, and established shrines of an idolatrous character at Dan and Bethel. The prophets who testified in Israel against these corruptions constantly appeal to the Law of Moses as the standard of religious truth. The correspondence of many passages in Hosea, Amos, Micah, with events described and laws contained in the Pentateuch show unmistakable reference thereto. Now it would have been a manifest impossibility, after the separation, to have palmed upon the Northern Kingdom a fictitious work containing such strong condemnation of their own practices. There is no way of accounting for the reverence in which the Pentateuch was then held but upon the fact of its having been the sacred book of the whole nation prior to the severance. Jeroboam and his counselors tried to prevent the subjects of his kingdom from going to Jerusalem to worship, but did not venture to question the Divine mission of Moses or the genuineness of the received sacred books. The books, therefore, were existent, and their holy character recognized prior to the revolt of the ten tribes. This is of itself a sufficient answer to all pretenses of a subsequent fabrication.

As illustrative of references in the prophets, compare

Hosea ix. 10 with Numb. xxv. ;

Hosea xi. 8 with Deut. xxix. 23 ;

Amos iv. 9, 10 with Deut. xxviii. 27, 60 ;

Micah vi. 5 with Numb. xxii., etc., and very many similar correspondences.

The date of the Samaritan Pentateuch is disputed, but there is reason for assigning it to an age as early as that of Ezra, if not earlier. Indeed, there is much to favor the supposition that the priest sent by the King of Assyria to teach the Samaritans the manner of the God of the land, and who taught them how they should fear JEHOVAH, then gave them the Torah (2 Kings xvii. 26-28). This book, differing not materially from the Jewish text, has been held in the highest veneration by the Samaritans. Jealous as they were of their Jewish neighbors, it is incredible that they could have accorded to the volume implicit faith unless its claims and character, as communicated by God through Moses, were considered indisputable.

There remains another branch of confirmatory evidence, that derived from the New Testament, than which none can be more conclusive to the believer in the LORD JESUS CHRIST. The Scriptures of the Old Testament, just as we have them now, were in the hands of the Jewish people at the time of our SAVIOUR'S appearance. In His intercourse with that people the import and meaning of these books were a subject of constant discussion. With those who accept JESUS as the SON of GOD, the light of the world, the great revealer of grace and truth, there can be no question as to His knowledge of the grounds upon which the belief of the nation rested, and whether or not their reliance was justified. If JESUS knew that they were laboring under an error in believing Moses to have been the author of the books attributed to him, would He not have sought to undeceive them? Would He have taken advantage of their mistakes and availed Himself of falsehood? Yet, so far from uttering a syllable to that effect, He consents entirely to their exalted estimate of the Scriptures, and appeals to their testimony in support of His Messianic claims. He argues therefrom to expose and condemn the corrupt glosses of the Scribes and traditions of the Rabbins, as from a standard point and incontrovertible.

When the Pharisees question Him upon the subject of divorce and adduce the permission given by Moses (Deut. xxiv. 1), He makes no question of the permission having proceeded from Moses, nay, expressly admits it, but assigns the reason for his legislation, "Moses because of your hardness of heart suffered you to put away your wives" (Matt. xix. 8). When the Sadducees hoped to entangle Him by pretended perplexities touching the resurrection, connected with the provision in Deut. xxv. 5, He does not gainsay their assertion that the injunction came from Moses, but rising to a loftiness far above their wretched cavils, He charges them with ignorance of the very Scriptures upon which they rely. "Do ye not therefore err, because ye know not the Scriptures, nor the power of God?" And in proof of the doctrine of the resurrection He educes great meaning, unsuspected by His hearers, from a passage in the book of Exodus, "Have ye not read in the book of Moses, in the place concerning the bush, how God spake unto him, saying, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? "He is not the God of the dead, but of the living" (St. Mark xii. 18-27). Here our LORD recognizes not only the authorship of Moses, but his Divine mission, taking the words quoted as undoubtedly the words of God. In St. John iii. 14, CHRIST recognizes the genuineness, as well as historical accuracy, of the Book of Numbers in the reference to the brazen serpent. In St. John vi. 32, the miraculous supply of manna is argued from as a historical fact. So far from our LORD making any attempt to weaken the popular faith in the writings of Moses, He rests His own title to acceptance upon the words of the great lawgiver rightly interpreted. "Had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me; for he wrote of me. But if ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe my words?" (St. John v. 46, 47.)

In the converse of the risen Saviour with His disciples there is express and conclusive attestation to the genuineness and inspiration of the Scriptures, classified, as the Jews were wont, in a threefold division. "And he said unto them, These are my words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, how that all things must needs be fulfilled, which were written in the Law of Moses, and the prophets, and the Psalms, concerning me" (St. Luke xxiv. 44). That the first division, the Law of Moses, consisted of the five portions of the Pentateuch, is undeniable. We could not have a more decided and conclusive attestation. The entire fivefold volume is stamped with the seal of the world's Redeemer. Questions of minor importance, to which allusion has been made, are not so determined as to preclude examination and discussion, but the language of JESUS leaves no room for doubt that He accredits the Pentateuch as a whole, and confirms the Divine mission of Moses.

The Apostles deal with the Scriptures with the same reverence, and appeal to the volume as ultimate authority, nowhere intimating the slightest doubt as to the authenticity and credibility of the different books. The words ascribed to Moses are relied upon as his veritable utterances, and decisive upon the points in dispute (Acts iii. 22; vii. 1-41; xiii. 39; xv. 21; xxvi. 22; xxviii. 23; Rom. x. 5; 1 Cor. x. 1-11; 2 Cor. iii. 7-16). The reasoning of the Epistle to the Hebrews supposes throughout the Divine institution of the Levitical law and ceremonial, and the Apocalypse authenticates the song of Moses.

It is no satisfactory answer to these citations to say that the age was not a critical one, and that JESUS and His Apostles adopted the current opinions of the day. JESUS is Himself "the Truth." He can neither be deceived Himself nor mislead others. "Every one that is of the truth heareth His voice." We are not indeed by our faith in CHRIST compelled to discourage critical inquiry, or shut our eyes to evidence, or to decline discussion. The studies and investigations of learned and judicious men are to be welcomed. The purity of the text and the elucidation of obscurities are to be diligently sought. Words may be changed, other readings may be vindicated as of superior authority, and some portions traced with more or less probability to other sources. But to suppose that a stupendous fabrication was imposed upon the Jewish people, that the oracles esteemed by them as of God were the invention of priestcraft, and that JESUS CHRIST was either imposed upon, or knowingly countenanced a fraud, is too monstrous a supposition to be admitted for a moment. He knew whereof He affirmed, and we know that His witness is true. And the theories and objections of skeptical critics, were they vastly more able, ingenious, and alarming than they are, will not shake this conviction, and need occasion no anxiety to the sincere, albeit unharmed, follower of the LORD JESUS CHRIST.

RT. REV. ALFRED LEE, D.D.,

Bishop of Delaware.

Pentecost. The Feast of weeks. It was a single, solemn feast-day when the harvest was completed,—the fiftieth day from the great Sabbath of the Passover, when the unleavened bread was put away and the Paschal Lamb was prepared. The feast of the Pentecost was the offering of the harvest sheaf and the two loaves of leavened bread, the unleavened bread of the first feast typifying the pure nature (1 Cor. v. 6-8) of our LORD which He offered for us, the leavened bread our own human nature. For at this Feast the HOLY GHOST was given to the Apostles, according to the most true promise of our LORD (Acts ii.) when the "HOLY GHOST came down from heaven with a sudden great sound, as it had been a mighty wind, in the likeness of fiery tongues lighting upon the Apostles to teach them, and to lead them into all truth, giving them both the gift of divers languages, and also boldness with fervent zeal constantly to preach the Gospel unto all nations, whereby we have been brought out of darkness and error into the clear light and true knowledge" of God and of His SON JESUS CHRIST (Preface for Whitsunday). Its real meaning and power is summed up in the prophetic verse of the lxviii. Psalm, so appropriately used on the Feast-day: "Thou hast ascended on high; Thou hast led captivity captive; Thou hast received gifts for men, yea, for the rebellious also, that the LORD GOD might dwell among them." It is that Gift that includes all other gifts, the Gift of the abiding of the HOLY GHOST in the Church of the SON of GOD. It was the filling of the mystical body of CHRIST with His Spirit, which should lead that body into all truth, and should preserve it despite all its failures and falterings from utter loss. It is this aspect of the celebration of this day, which has passed with all its pomp and significance from the Jewish into the Christian ritual. The Church administered baptism to the classes of the catechumens who had been preparing, and received them at the font clad in white array. It was a day of solemn celebration of worship and of thanksgiving, and was observed with all due honor. It is a type of our own confirmation when we receive from the Bishop's hands that gift of the HOLY GHOST which St. Peter preached the special gift of that day,—“and ye shall receive the HOLY GHOST. For the promise is unto you and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the LORD our God shall call” (Acts ii. 38, 39).

Pentecostals, otherwise called Whitsun farthings, took their name from the payment due at the Feast of Pentecost. It appears that Pentecostals were oblations, and as the inhabitants of chapelries were bound on some certain festival or festivals to repair to the Mother-Church and make their oblation there in token of subjection and dependence, so, as it seems, were the inhabitants of the Diocese obliged to repair to the Cathedral (as the Mother-Church of the whole Diocese) at the Feast of Pentecost. These oblations grew by degrees into fixed and certain payments from every parish and house in it. These are still paid in a few Dioceses, being now only a charge upon particular Churches where by custom they have been paid. (Burn's Eccl. Law.)

Perambulation. An old custom, now nearly fallen into disuse, in England. The Parson, the Church-wardens, and parishioners went in solemn procession round the bounds of the parish once every year, in or about Ascension-tide. There is a homily to be read on this occasion, extant in the Book of Homilies. Queen Elizabeth's injunctions appointed the cxii. and civ. Psalms to be recited during the procession. The custom was also used in this country in colonial days.

Pernoctations. Vigils. It was a custom among the early Christians upon certain feasts and fasts to watch all the night previous.

Perpetual Curate. When the revenues of an English parish are in the hands of a lay impropiator and there is neither spiritual rector nor vicar, the curate who does duty under the impropiator is called a perpetual curate. It can be held with a benefice, and is revokable if the impropiator so choose. The title “perpetual” seems to mean that the impropiator is compelled to have a curate in charge continually, but not that particular curate to whom he may have given it. But Acts of Parliament, however, provided for some cases.

Persecution. It is the suffering of what malice, hatred, and violence, whether legally or irresponsibly, can inflict upon a person because of his religious convictions. Persecution means, generally, physical pains and more than mere threats to compel a surrender of opinion. In this Persecution, by whomsoever used, is an evil, and has always proved to be a most dangerous weapon in the hands of those who use it, and it should be remembered that persecution cannot be used in behalf of a righteous cause. Truth must be intolerant of error, the two are incompatible, but we must speak the truth, the whole truth, in love, and we must use all such influences as are holy and right to lead others into the truth. There is a holy compulsion that lies within the power and influence of a holy life, but this is the sole compulsion we should use. The Church's compulsion is the earnest prayer she uses. It is the loving setting forth of the doctrine of our LORD JESUS CHRIST, and a trust that if she is faithful to her trust He will not fail in His answer to her intercessions. But the rulers of the Church have not always taken this view, and because of some chance expressions of the Fathers, notably of St. Augustine, upon force to be used with those who will not believe aright, the power to inflict temporal penalties for spiritual offenses has been assumed, as by the Roman Church. But again, since Church and State were joined together and overt acts against the religion established by law would lead, as was foreseen, to the attack upon political institutions, the English State persecuted religious opinions after the Reformation. The history of Persecution is divided naturally into two parts. The first is the Persecutions she suffered, at the hands of the Jews as a sect subversive of Judaism, and at the hands of the heathen as being a religio illicita; and, secondly, the Persecutions which were taken up by the Church and State in later times. It is impossible to give more than an outline of either of these. In their attempts at persecution the Jews either prosecuted the Christians by their own officers (as when Saul, yet breathing out threatenings and slaughter, went to the high-priest and desired of him letters to Damascus to the Synagogue, that if he found any of this way, whether they were men or women, he might bring them bound unto Jerusalem), or raised a riot (as Acts xiii. 50; xiv. 2), or used the prefects and governors for the same end (Acts xvii. 4-9). But when Christianity outgrew this limit it was ranked as treason against the State, and therefore was proceeded against by imperial edicts and by legal enactments. In consequence there was a constant persecution going on all the world over, till the conversion of Constantine, 315 A.D. But the formal persecutions inaugurated, sometimes by the policy of the Emperor, sometimes by some conjuncture, were reckoned as ten in number. Not counting that of Nero, 64 A.D., they are: I. Domitian's, 95 A.D. II. Trajan's, 102 A.D. III. Marcus Antoninus's, 167-177 A.D. IV. Severus's, 202 A.D. V. Maximin's, 235-237 A.D. VI. Decius's, 250 A.D. VII. Valerian's, 257 A.D. VIII. Gallienus's, 260 A.D. IX. Diocletian's, 303 A.D. X. Maximin's, 311 A.D. For the next ten years the political troubles and the struggles for the purple make it difficult to distinguish into formal persecution the edicts issued and then modified and then partially enforced by Galerius, Maximin, Maxentius, and Heraclius, together or in turn. Persecutions which occurred later, as in Persia, and the martyrdoms of such great men as Boniface, the Anglo-Saxon Apostle to Germany, are not within our limits. But we now turn to the persecutions of heretical bodies in Europe. The most notable are the war against the Albigenses, ordered by Innocent III., 1209 A.D.; the continuous persecutions of the Inquisition, an organization which sprang out of this war against the Albigenses; and the persecution of the Spanish Jews, 1391 A.D. The war of the Hussites was a successful resistance to persecution. The Inquisition was one continuous act of persecution of both Jews and heretics, which was pushed forward with the vigor of a relentless organization. Kings were made its executioners, since the Church could shed no blood. The Reformation was the real culmination of persecution. In England there had been a persecution of the Lollards, but when Mary Tudor ascended the Throne (1554 A.D.) she began, contrary to the advice of her soundest Councillors, that persecution which only established the Anglican Church more firmly under the rule of Elizabeth.

The English Church was also guilty of persecution later. (The execution of the Jesuits and of the seminary priests who suffered under Elizabeth was not a persecution, it was Elizabeth's counter-stroke to the excommunication and forfeiture of her kingdom issued against her in her excommunication by the Pope.) The dissenters, who were fined and imprisoned for opinion's sake, suffered persecution. But as was pointed out at first, there was in men's minds then no such idea as we have now of religious liberty, and to attack the Church was in the conception of the statesmen of those days to injure the majesty of the State. This principle was used quite as freely by the Presbyterians and Independents when they obtained power (1642-1656 A.D.). Toleration was not thought of as a Christian duty till after the Revolution, and there was no complete announcement of religious liberty. Indeed, Toleration is only a half-step. In Maryland, the nearest approach to civil liberty was granted by Charles I. to Lord Baltimore. But persecution in one sense never ceases. So long as the world lies in hatred and enmity, so long must persecution in one or other shape exist. It is an exercise of faith, it is the patience in which the Christian must possess his soul, and it is not the less a persecution if it comes from one's own household,—the division of homes our LORD foretold His Doctrine would bring about.

Person. Person, in theological language, refers to the (a) Personality of GOD as being a SPIRIT, sole, self-existent, governing all things, and apart from them. Here we can only speak of the Nature of the HOLY TRINITY. GOD has revealed to us the Unity of His Substance and the TRINITY of Persons. For ourselves the Unity can be readily conceived of, and that He can act through the many powers of nature. That so men did mislead themselves into Polytheism, is also a historic fact. But that the Divine Substance consists in Three Persons is a mystery that we cannot now comprehend. But if GOD be not a Personality in the highest sense, our noblest instincts are at fault. We seek for the impersonation in some form or other of all abstract moral and religious ideas; they must become facts, and must be related either as essential or as attributive to some living sentient Being. We cannot merely or consistently worship an abstraction. So far can we go, but here we must stop. GOD must be a Being. Revelation, then, shows us that these apparently abstract ideas, the longings of the soul, are indeed indissolubly bound up in the Essence of GOD. GOD is love, GOD is truth, GOD is Justice. The Being whose law of Being involves these. The Persons, then, of the HOLY TRINITY most certainly contain these as facts, as essential laws. "I am the Light of the World" saith our LORD, "I am the Bread of Life," "I am the way, the truth, and the Life." Holiness is of the essence, Perfectness is of the nature, of the HOLY GHOST.

(b) As for the Person of our LORD, His humanity is so infolded with His Divine Nature, that from the moment it began to be in the virgin womb it was perfectly His own, as it grew, was perfected, and entered into our life. He had our nature interpenetrated with His own eternal nature, so that the two not being commingled yet thoroughly cohering together, were but one Person,—the God-man, CHRIST JESUS. This, while an unfathomable mystery, because on a higher plane, is yet quite within the range of our acceptance by the analogy of our dual nature while we are yet single Persons. In this Person our hopes are bound up, and all our realization of what our GOD has done and is doing for us. Through Him we receive that partaking of the Divine Nature which it is His prerogative to bestow upon us. Therefore to us the Person, JESUS CHRIST, is the man.

(c) As for the HOLY GHOST, He must be a Person, for He is sent from the FATHER by the SON. He searches the deep things of GOD, He gives the gifts CHRIST hath received for us, He reveals, He sanctifies, He guides, He leads into all Truth. No abstract idea can do these things, only a Person can possibly execute them.

It is not necessary for us to picture to ourselves aught beyond these facts, but it is necessary to conceive of and acknowledge with all our power the fact of the Persons of the Holy Trinity and their relation to us, that our religion may have its rightful power over our lives, and that our worship may be fervently paid, not to a holy idea, but to the living God.

Peter's Pence. Offa, King of Mercia (798 A.D.), made a pilgrimage to Rome, where he granted to the English school a silver penny from every family in his dominions as a yearly income for its maintenance. It was claimed as a tax later, and continued to be paid, not without remonstrance (see Hart's Eccl. Records), and not without many interruptions, till Henry VIII. forbade it altogether.

Peter, St. The notices in the New Testament of St. Peter's life are very scanty, but there is a coherence in them which enables us to restore in a measure the great Apostle's characteristic traits. When we leave the New Testament, however, we are without any trustworthy guide; on the contrary, we are wholly misled by tradition, which is too late to be of any value. Simon, son of Jona, was a native of the village of Bethsaida, on the Sea of Galilee; a fisherman in partnership with his brother and his friends, the brothers John and James, the sons of Zebedee. His brother Andrew and another (doubtless John) had been attending upon the ministry of St. John the Baptist, who pointed out to them JESUS the Lamb of God; they at once followed Him; abode with Him that night; and the next day Andrew sought his brother Simon and brought him to JESUS. The LORD addressed him with the memorable words, "Thou art Simon the son of Jona: thou shalt be called Cephas, which is by interpretation 'A stone' (Peter)." Henceforth he bears this name also, being sometimes called in the Gospels Simon, often Simon Peter, but generally Peter. Simon returned to his work till CHRIST was ready to call him from it to be trained to catch men. As JESUS was preaching on the seashore the people so pressed on Him that He entered Simon Peter's boat, and from thence taught them. His sermon finished, He would reward the owners of the boat. The miracle of the large draught of fish follows, and the consequent call to him and to the two brothers to leave all and follow Him. As yet for some months the Twelve were not chosen, but our LORD was gathering around Him the band. Peter was present at some of His miracles, and was present when Levi was called; and with James and John was present at the raising of Jairus' daughter. When the LORD chose the Twelve, St. Peter seems to have been the leader. He stands first in all the lists. He is spokesman for the rest. He shows his love and zeal for our LORD promptly, almost to rashness. When, after the discourse at Capernaum, the LORD turned to the Twelve and asked, "Will ye also go away?" St. Peter at once replied for them all, "LORD, to whom shall we go? thou hast the words of eternal life. And we believe and are sure that Thou art the CHRIST, the Son of the living God" (St. John vi. 66-69). Here this Confession was indeed the same as the one made afterwards at Casarea Philippi. But it was not so much that personal conviction now, which it was at the later Confession.

With the others, two and two, he is sent forth by our LORD when He had given them special supernatural gifts by which they were to attract notice to, and prove the authority of, the preaching He gave them, to cast out evil spirits, to heal the sick, to raise the dead, to cleanse the lepers (St. Matt. x. 8). Nothing is recorded of their work. They seem to have, however, little insight into the spiritual character of their work. It was to them a power to be wielded, not a training, which they had received. In these things St. Peter shows the defects of his character as well as its salient strong points. Ready to begin, bold, forward, trained in the hardy work of a fisherman on a dangerous lake, loving, devoted, zealous, yet he is easily daunted, and passes from one extreme to the other. This he displayed at the several crises of his training from our LORD. When he made his great Confession and received for it the famous promise, it would seem that he was so elated with spiritual pride, that when soon after the LORD showed to His disciples His future humiliation, St. Peter took Him and began to rebuke Him, saying, "Far be it from Thee, LORD, this shall not be unto Thee." Then, again, when before this the LORD appeared to the disciples at near dawn, walking on the sea, St. Peter asked, "LORD, if it be Thou, bid me come unto Thee on the water. And He said, Come. And when Peter was come down out of the ship, he walked on the water, to go to JESUS. But when he saw the wind boisterous, he was afraid, and beginning to sink, he cried, LORD, save me. And immediately JESUS stretched forth His hand, and caught him, and said unto him, O thou of little Faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?" The disciples here too worshipped our LORD, confessing Him to be the Son of God. Again, this characteristic of St. Peter, in failing to completely apprehend spiritual things, is shown by his reply, so wide of the meaning of the scene when on the Mount of Transfiguration. After seeing the wondrous change in the Master's person, and hearing the converse of Moses and Elias, he could only say, Master, it is good for us to be here: and let us make three Tabernacles: one for Thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias. For he wist not what to say; for they were sore afraid" (St. Mark ix. 5, 6).

But these characteristics came out most strongly on that sorrowful night; how he shrunk at first from the Master's humble service! how he vowed devotion to death! how poor a guard he kept with the two while the LORD underwent His agony! how rashly he smote with the sword, and yet how readily he fled! how he timidly crept into the Court of the High-Priest and there denied his Master! well might he go out and weep bitterly. It was so wholly in keeping with all we have been told, the loving, bold, yet easily daunted heart, ready to go to either extreme. Even at the Tomb, St. Peter, outstripped by St. John in running to see if indeed the Sepulchre were empty, enters in when St. John shrinks back at first. So too after the Resurrection, when they go to their fishing on the Lake. St. John exclaimed to St. Peter as he looked on the shore, "It is the LORD!" then St. Peter plunged into the water and hastened to the LORD. It was then that the threefold restoration for his triple denial took place. St. Peter's answers show how utterly devoted he was to his LORD: "LORD, Thou knowest all things: Thou knowest that I love Thee," and yet the old temperament made him ask of the fate of his brother Apostle: "LORD, and what shall this man do?" to receive the check again: "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? follow thou Me." So too, St. Peter leads in the election of St. Matthias, and his sermon is chosen as typical of the sermons preached at Pentecost. He is foremost in the steadfast confession the Apostles made before the Sanhedrim. He administers the discipline of the Church, as in the case of Ananias and Sapphira. He is sent with St. John to Samaria by the College of Apostles to confirm those baptized by the Evangelist St. Philip. He afterwards spent some time in the villages near, goes to Lydda and to Joppa. Here again came a crisis in his life. He was at Joppa, in the house of Simon the tanner. While fasting there was given him the thrice repeated vision of the great sheet knit at the four corners, and filled with all manner of beasts of the earth and wild beasts and creeping things and fowls of the air. While wondering at the vision the messengers from Cornelius the Centurion came seeking him, and the Spirit bade him go with them nothing doubting, for He had sent them. The Baptism of Cornelius was the fulfillment of the LORD's promise that he should be a foundation-stone of the Church. Attacked by the stricter brethren, he defended himself by reciting to the Apostles the Divine authority by which he acted.

The next record of him is his imprisonment by Herod (Easter, 44 A.D.), and his deliverance by the Angel. His work in the interval is not given us, but he appears in Jerusalem at the council which was summoned under the presidency of St. James to decide the question of circumcising the Gentile converts. After much debate, St. Peter clearly and concisely stated his position in the question, urging that it was too heavy a yoke for the Gentiles to bear. St. Barnabas and Paul then recounted their mission work, and St. James summed up the question and gave the final decision. The last time St. Peter comes before us is most characteristic. When at Antioch, first he had eaten with the Gentile converts, yet from fear of the censure of those who came thither from St.

James, he withdrew and separated himself from his Gentile brethren, and influenced many Jews to do this, and even Barnabas was carried away with their dissimulation. Therefore St. Paul withstood him to the face, because he was to be blamed. Apparently St. Paul did not take a hasty step, nor too soon, since St. Peter's vacillation had affected so many who should have known better. This is the last authentic notice of him in the New Testament history, save (what we may note in his Epistle) that he was at Babylon (65 A.D.). Legend has given us minute accounts of his life, which may be briefly dismissed by saying that they are too late to be authentic. The tradition that he died at Rome is not sufficiently early to be free from much doubt. We have passed rapidly over his career, and omitted many slighter details—if aught in the Gospels could be called slight—to obtain space to discuss one or two points of special importance in his career, and of the claims founded upon them by the Roman See. The Promise given to him upon his Confession at Cæsarea Philippi. His confession, "Thou art the CHRIST, the Son of the Living God," procured for him the blessing, "Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-Jona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but My FATHER which is in heaven. And I say unto thee, That thou art Peter, and upon this Rock I will build My Church; and the gates of hell (Hades) shall not prevail against it. And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." (St. Matt. xvi. 17-19.)

The Roman theologians claim that this gives to St. Peter a transmissible headship over the Visible Church, which belongs now to the See of Rome. The reply is clear, concise, convincing. (a) That the words Peter, or stone, and Rock, are two different things, and are to be determined by their use in the New Testament; now St. Paul uses the word Rock to refer to CHRIST: "For they drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them, and that Rock was CHRIST" (1 Cor. x. 4). (b) That St. Peter's relation to the foundation of the Church is settled by St. Paul's words: "Now therefore ye are no longer strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the Household of GOD; and are built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, JESUS CHRIST Himself being the chief corner-stone" (Eph. ii. 19, 20), and by St. John's words of the Vision of the New Jerusalem, "And the city had twelve foundations, and in them the names of the twelve Apostles of the Lamb" (Rev. xxi. 14). (c) Again, St. Peter received the privilege of being the leading Apostle. This was undoubtedly a prerogative of leadership, but certainly not of supremacy. In no official act after the Resurrection did he lead, save in one,—the election of St. Matthias. In this he did take the directing part. As for his Sermon at Pentecost, it was not the only Sermon preached, but his was the only one reported. He passed sentence upon Ananias and Sapphira, but this was a momentary disciplinary act, involving no leadership. He was by natural temperament chief spokesman before the Sanhedrim. But he is sent by the College of Apostles to Samaria (Acts viii. 14). He was questioned before the Apostles by some of the brethren (Acts xi. 1-18). When miraculously escaping from prison he sends word to St. James (Acts xii. 17). He is a chief debater only in the Council at Jerusalem (Acts xv.). It is very evident from these facts that he was the foremost and the influential Apostle, but not the Governor. But in a still more marked way we find this to be his true position when we contrast him with St. Paul. St. Paul gives very positively their relation to each other (Gal. i. 18, 19; ii.). In this narration he declares his independence. He and St. Barnabas received the right hand of fellowship from SS. James, Cephas, and John (notice the order). His own gifts were equal with St. Peter's. They parted the mission work between them, and this at Jerusalem, where St. Peter's influence would be paramount. At Antioch St. Paul rebuked St. Peter openly, and apparently St. Peter made no defense. In another place St. Paul is not behind the chiefest Apostles. At every point, by undeniable facts, we find St. Peter acknowledged a leader, but by no means a master.

Turning to the claim that St. Peter established his supremacy in and transmitted it through the Roman See, the facts prove to be still weaker. The passages which refer to his going there at all are at the best a full century after the alleged event. The "Clementines," a heretical work, rejected by Rome herself, first assigns to St. Peter a visit to Rome. But Dionysius of Corinth (170 A.D.) refers to it in an Epistle to Rome. Irenæus (177 A.D.) repeats it. Tertullian (180 A.D.) speaks of it; and Caius of Rome, 200 A.D. The tradition, of course, was more widely received as time went on. St. Cyprian (250 A.D.) takes it for granted, and argues from it. Firmilian, 250 A.D., says that it was urged in Rome very strenuously. But this visit and martyrdom, not testified to by any earlier writer than Dionysius, had grown to a residence and a government of twenty-five years by the thirteenth century. In the light of these facts, while a martyrdom in Rome may be admitted, there is not the shadow of proof that he exercised any Episcopal right. Nay, if any did so, it must have been St. Paul, who was there in his own hired house two whole years at his first imprisonment. Of the legends which surround his life, but one is really worth the quoting. It is said that on the night before his martyrdom he succeeded in escaping from prison. As he was passing the city walls he met his MASTER coming, and exclaimed, Domine quo Vadis,—MASTER, whither goest Thou? The reply was, To suffer in place of my servant. St. Peter at once returned to his cell, and was crucified the next day,—some later writers say head downward, as not worthy to suffer as did his LORD.

Epistles of.—The First Epistle of St. Peter, addressed to the Christian Jews of the dispersion, was received at once and without dispute. As we read that Silvanus (St. Paul's companion) was with the Apostle at the time, and since those addressed were partly churches which St. Paul had founded, we see at once the kindly relationship which existed between the two chief Apostles. It is most probable that the Apostle wrote from the Babylon upon the Euphrates and as the Apostle to the Circumcision. That he knew of St. Paul's Epistles to these Churches is shown by the similarity of thought in the Epistle to those of St. Paul to the Ephesians, Romans, Colossians, Corinthians, and Thessalonians. These are not in any sense quotations, but certain coincidences, which prove that each of the two Apostles was aware of the teachings of the other. St. Peter's practical character is shown in his Epistle. Earnest, straightforward, zealous, he has not the genius of St. Paul, but a soberness seems to run through what he writes. There is mingled a strain of reminiscences and allusions to our LORD's life and the incidents at which St. Peter was present which give a vividness to some of his sentences. He begins with an allusion to their inheritance in CHRIST's Kingdom, of which they had a most certain hope, based upon a faith which, indeed, had not seen the LORD, but rejoicingly accepted Him. He exhorts them to be steadfast in holiness and purity, seeing by whom they were redeemed, and at what a price. As innocent children live in purity and truthfulness founded upon CHRIST JESUS and in Him act as a royal priesthood, a peculiar people. Then (ch. ii. 11 sq.) he urges them to greater purity of life, since their Christianity makes them, as it were, public, submitting to the Law and to the Administrator of it. Servants are exhorted to bear and to forbear, as CHRIST did, wives to be obedient, husbands to honor their wives. The love towards each other, the keeping a good conscience, the reference to the baptismal vow (the answer of a good conscience is the replies to the questions in a good conscience) which makes us subject to CHRIST, our ascended LORD, are used as urgent reasons for a greater use of their opportunities for patience, for prayer, for suffering joyfully for the LORD's sake, committing themselves to Him in all things. The Apostle closes with an exhortation to the Presbyterate to rule CHRIST's flock as ensamples to the flock, and with a prayer for their firmer establishment in the Faith.

The Second Epistle at an early date had suffered from doubts of its genuineness. It had some points of resemblance to the Epistle of St. Jude, and was consequently quite different in style from the first and undoubted Epistle. The question is closed for us, since the canon is received by the Church, and, admitting the guidance of the HOLY GHOST, and the inspiration of Scripture, not to preserve the identity of style, but to reveal and to teach, there is no reason for us to doubt of its genuineness. It contains the doctrine of the "last things," conveyed in a style different from those of any other Epistle. It reads more as the production of the headlong zeal of the disciple who smote off the ear of the servant of the High-Priest than of the calm courage of the Apostle before the High-Priest. It has very much of the tone of St. Jude. In these very objections we see that very character of the Apostle which both the Gospel and the Acts bring before us. He is calm and courageous at one time, at another he shrinks, and again he is forward through zeal. This Epistle may well have been suggested by St. Jude's Epistle, as probably the first Epistle was written because of the visit of Silvanus, St. Paul's companion. Its contents may be summarized thus: (A) The first chapter is very similar in every respect to the parallel passage in the first Epistle, the salutation, the reminders to them of their calling, and of the Christian virtues they should cultivate, of their redemption, of the value of prophecy. (B) With the second chapter he begins his denunciation of false teachers deceiving the members of the Church. The warning is vehement and couched in energetic style, condemning their evil life, which is intimately bound up in their false doctrines. The third chapter closes the Epistle, with a passage which seems written for the scientific opposition of the present day upon the end of all things. "If these things are true, and their consummation is largely in your own hands, hasting unto the coming of that day by your prayers and conduct, be diligent, that ye may be found of Him in peace without spot and blameless."

Pews. Anciently the ground floor of a church was open. The chancel contained stalls for the officiating clergy and musicians. Standing and kneeling space was free to all, and the worshiper had no special place assigned to him. The founder of an English church and his family often retained a part of the building for their use, one side of the church, or the east end of an aisle. Here they buried their dead, and the place in church descended to the heirs. Sometimes a person added a chapel or aisle to a church. In the fourteenth or fifteenth century, benches were occasionally placed in the nave or aisles of the churches; considerably later they were supplied throughout the building. In a few old English churches a stone bench ran around the inner, and even almost as often the outer, part of the edifice, and in one case round each pillar.

In the greater part of Europe the churches are still without fixed seats, except a bench or so.

In old times stools seem to have been used, according to antique pictures, as early as the fourteenth century. The earliest example of regular benching Hailes met with in the nave of the cathedral at Soest, Westphalia. The word "pew" is used in the diary of Pepys in the seventeenth century. In 1454 A.D. there is a record of Swaffham Church having been pewed by "Thomas Styward and Cecily his wyf" previously. In one version of Pier's "Plowman's Vision," in the fourteenth century the word "pues" occurs. Accounts of St. Michael's, Cornhill, London, 1457 A.D. and onward, contain references to pews, and I am sorry to say, refer to doors and "a lok." From the beginning of the sixteenth century there is a frequent mention of pews. The Church accounts contain entries concerning mending and making them. It is probable that the churches were only fitted in part with pews, and especially in country places their use was not universal until long afterwards. Seats in the church and choir were given to kings and distinguished persons. Anciently, women occupied one side of the church and men the other. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, young women were separated from matrons in some English churches. In St. Margaret's, Westminster, in the seventeenth century, expenses about old and new pews are noted in the accounts. In the early part of the sixteenth century payment for use of pews is recorded in that parish, before pews were common in that church. It seems to be a rare case at the time. In England there were corporation pews and a mayor's pew. Up to the middle of the sixteenth century there does not appear to have been a payment for a pew-rent, except at St. Margaret's, Westminster. St. Matthew's, Friday Street, London, has accounts which show that the pews were numbered in 1569-70 A.D., where payment is made for painting the numbers. Spelman, 1641 A.D., refers to the sale, but not the renting of pews. A motion against locks was issued by Bishop Neile, of Winchester, 1631 A.D.

Pepys, in 1661 A.D., was obliged to stay at the door of his pew during "a good sermon by Mr. Mills," because the sexton had not unlocked it. Galleries, or lofts or scaffolds, as then called, were built because the general allotment of pews required larger accommodation. The early pews were benches, with backs and ends, not square pews. A pew at St. John's, Winchester, is thought to be as old as the third quarter of the fourteenth century. Doors were used as early as 1457 A.D. in St. Michael's, Cornhill. The benches at Bishop's Hull, Somerset, had a bar across them for a door. While Gothic architecture prevailed the seats were rows of single benches, which seem always to have faced the East, though possibly some examples might be found of their facing North or South. Practice did not allow the congregation to sit with their backs to the altar. Afterwards seats were made approaching a square in form; the earliest is dated 1601 A.D., at Barking, Suffolk. In 1612 A.D. a pew is named five feet high. At Cholderton, Wiltshire, is a pew six feet high, with glass windows in the door to enable the occupants to see the preacher, and other windows in the side to permit them to survey the congregation, all being fitted with sliding shutters. At Branksea, Dorsetshire, there is a pew as large as a drawing-room, magnificently furnished, having a fire-place, and windows, and blinds to secure privacy. In Little Beningham Church, Norfolk, a pew was built by a shepherd for strangers and wedding parties. On it is a skeleton carved in wood, and an inscription warning the passer-by to "Remember Death."

In Central and Southern France chairs are used in church. In Spain and Italy the cathedrals and churches are free and unappropriated, and the Eastern Church, including Russia and Greece, keeps up its old traditions, and has a clear and free area for all worshippers. The noble and peasant may kneel together before God, who "is no respecter of persons" (Acts x. 34). "The rich and the poor meet together: the LORD is the Maker of them all" (Prov. xxii. 2). The Church of God should be as free as His blessed sunlight, and reviving air, and refreshing water. In giving a church to God, let us not keep "back a part of the price." Pews should be low, so as not to be obstructions, and doors, and locks, and waiting for seats should be unknown. It is the plain duty of the Church to return to the custom of primitive times, and to make the house of God free. Can she not hear her Master's cry as it comes down loud and clear through the ages, "Make not my FATHER'S house an house of merchandise"? (St. John ii. 16.) The "man with a gold ring in goodly apparel" and the "poor man in vile raiment" (James ii. 2) are to be equally cared for in the Christian "assembly." We may not say to him of the "gay clothing," "Sit thou here in a good place;" and to "the poor, Stand thou there, or sit here under my footstool;" if so, we become "partial" and "judges of evil thoughts" (ver. 4).

Pew-rents are declared by some to be necessary for the expenses of the parish, but quite half of our parishes are free. The offering on the LORD'S day is the old Apostolic plan of church support (1 Cor. xvi. 2). New dioceses and new parishes can correct old faults. The desirability of seating families together is urged for the pew-rent system, but in many cases by early attendance that could be secured, and the principle of church freedom would not be violated. Free churches imply a deep and constant interest in all, but if a tithe of the money spent in fine houses, rich dress, jewelry, and travel could find its way to the altar of God, not only could the church be free, but also open daily for public and private prayer. May God hasten the good day that this may be a reality. The facts of this article are drawn from the valuable work of Alfred Heales, F.S.A., Proctor in Doctor's Commons, on the "History and Law of Church Seats or Pews," 2 vols. That author refers to Rev. Jno. Mason Neale's "History of Pews," and to works by Billings, Oliphant, Fowler, and Rogers, as well as many others, and to various church records. The second volume has references to cases in law with regard to ownership in church seats, which lawsuits should never have been possible, for no man should have the slightest right to call a church a gift to God, and then to claim any part of it for himself.

REV. S. F. HOTCHKIN.

Pharisees. The leading party or school of theology among the Jews in our LORD'S day. Their name meant separated. By a minute analysis of the Law, and by petty regulations they had formalized, as well as formulated, the precepts of Moses, and by these means had constructed a system which went counter to the spirit and often to the very letter of the Law they professed to obey. Now our LORD at once opposed this, for it created a party and a sect of pretentious saints; it also separated the people from the obedience to the law,—these were, to the Pharisee, ignorant of the Law, and so cursed. It was, therefore, in defense of the Law our LORD opposed them; in defense of the rights of the people He denounced them; in defense of all true interpretation of the Law He wittingly broke through their maxims. What of truth they taught that He did but commend, "these ought ye to have done and not to leave the other undone." They held to the resurrection of the dead and to the duty of constant prayer, which two doctrines are not enjoined in the Law at all. They trained their nation in that exclusiveness which is even yet so marked a characteristic, and when their wretched troubles unified the Jewish nation, if indeed it needed this after the Babylonish Captivity, if these Jews were Pharisees in doctrine. It has been only lately that this yoke has been really broken. But this formalism trained the Pharisee in a hypocrisy which our LORD most bitterly denounced. It was an ostentatious, sinful observance of the letter of religion, the long prayer, the parade of gifts and of natural formalities, the niceties of dress and of meats, and with it was a disregard of an inner morality. This party had yet noble men in it, Nicodemus, Joseph of Arimathea, Saul. Many fled from it into Christianity, as the refuge that could satisfy them, as is shown by the mysterious hints given in the Talmud, of the influence of the hated sect of Christians. Both by their evil traits, by their organization, and by the good that was in them, for they upheld the law, and the prophets, and were conservators of the main doctrine (the resurrection), and the chief practice (prayer) of Christianity, both for good and for evil they stamped their form of Judaism upon the Nation, which shrunk from the epicurean scorn of the Sadducee.

Philemon. The Epistle St. Paul wrote to his friend Philemon at Colosse, commending to his pardon and favor the slave Onesimus, who had run away and whom St. Paul had found and recovered at Rome. It was written at the same time that the Epistle to the Colossians was written. It is replete with all the love and tenderness and friendship that the Apostle's large heart felt. Onesimus was reclaimed no longer a faithless runaway slave, but a Christian in the same bonds of Faith as his master. Onesimus was St. Paul's son in the Faith, and he pleads for him as for a son. It is of importance both as having a relation to the Apostle's life and work, and as having beneath it the divine will upon the relation of master and servant, the true principle upon which emancipation from slavery can be soundly instituted and as from which emancipation will surely follow.

Philip, St., the Apostle. Philip of Bethsaida, the fellow-townsmen of SS. Andrew and Peter, was the first to whom our LORD said, "Follow me." Of his life we have only the scanty notices in the Gospels. From his finding Nathaniel and bringing him to JESUS, and from his intimacy with St. Andrew, we may conjecture that these had before been bound together in a common communion upon the highest of all the hopes of the Jew,—the coming of the MESSIAH. It is a lovely trait that is pictured to us. John and Andrew follow JESUS and abide with Him; they bring Simon to the MESSIAH; JESUS seeks their fellow-townsmen and attaches him to Himself; but as he obeys the call Philip brings another, Nathaniel, the guileless Israelite, to the LORD. It may well have been the bond of a longing common to them that brought them to that height of faith which fitted them to be His Apostles. After our LORD began His fuller ministry after the imprisonment of St. John the Baptist He called anew the band He had selected. When our LORD set them apart for the Apostolate he in the lists stands fifth. At the head of the second group of four, and closely joined to him is Bartholomew (who was most probably also the Nathaniel of St. John i. 45 fn.). That Philip was most devotedly attached to the Master is shown in the very few notices of him in the Gospels. Clement of Alexandria assumes as a well-known fact that Philip was the one who pleaded to the command to follow Him, "Suffer me first to go and bury my father," and received the reply, "Let the dead bury their dead, follow thou me." It was to Philip that our LORD addressed the question, "Whence shall we buy bread that these may eat?" when He paused in His instruction to the people. How little he could yet trust the Divine power, how little he could forecast his own future duty of feeding the hungry multitudes with spiritual food is shown by his reply, "Two hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient for them that every one may take a little." This spiritual dullness was not his peculiarity; the other Apostles shared it, yet it was compatible with loving zeal. It was to him the Greek proselytes came, asking to see JESUS. Again he goes to his friend Andrew, and the two bring the Greek seekers to JESUS. Once more Philip comes forward. He has listened to our LORD's discourse, He is going to the FATHER, those who know Him know His FATHER also. The eager Philip exclaims, LORD, show us the FATHER and it sufficeth us. His faith is yet with dimmed spiritual eyes, and our LORD gently pleads, "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip?" The Apostle afterwards undoubtedly understood the tenderness of the appeal when it was his duty by his Apostolic labors to make others see JESUS as he had seen Him, and to know Him as he had known Him. This is the last incident in which he appears. All beyond is either doubtful tradition, or it is so apocryphal as to be beyond belief. He is said to have married and not to have refused his daughters in marriage, and also it is stated that he died a natural death, but this again is contradicted.

Philip, the Evangelist. The notices of the Evangelist are all confined to the Acts of the Apostles. He appears as one of the seven men of good report selected for the work of serving tables, and is ordained deacon. When upon the death of Stephen the disciples were scattered, St. Philip proved to be a most active Evangelist. He went to Samaria and then among the proselytes, converted and baptized very many; tidings of his success came to the Apostles (who still remained in Jerusalem), and they sent SS. Peter and John to confirm the new converts. St. Philip was not permitted to remain longer in Samaria, but the HOLY GHOST selected him to convert the Ethiopian Eunuch, the treasurer of Queen Candace. This is a marked record, since it gives us the terms of admission (repentance implied), and Faith in CHRIST as the Son of GOD. It gives us the rule for the Church as to the proper procedure when compared with the direction of our LORD, just to baptize them, to teach them all things whatsoever He had commanded the Apostles to instruct the Church in. Then he was sent to the villages of the old Philistine country. Finally he came to Cæsarea. There we find him in his own house, the centre of many, journeying to and coming from Jerusalem. He has a family, four daughters, who were endowed with the gift of prophecy. He is the entertainer of St. Paul on his way to Jerusalem, the last journey the Apostle made of his own free-will, for thenceforth he journeyed as a prisoner of the State. "At such a place as Caesarea the work of such a man must have helped to bridge over the ever-widening gap which threatened to separate the Jewish and the Gentile Churches. One who had preached CHRIST to the hated Samaritan, the swarthy African, the despised Philistine, the men of all nations who passed through the seaport of Palestine, might well welcome the arrival of the Apostle of the Gentiles." (Smith's Dict. of Bible.) Here we lose sight of the Evangelist. His future, whether he died at Caesarea or whether he really became Bishop of the Trallians, cannot be known in this present life.

Philippians, Epistle to. This is usually considered the last of the Epistles of the first Imprisonment. It has been assigned to the Apostle's imprisonment under Felix, but this is to do violence to all the indications of the chronology of St. Paul's life contained in the Acts and in the Epistle itself. It is far more natural to suppose that it is the last of the series, Ephesians, Colossians, Philemon, and Philippians. The contents of the Epistle are so within the scope of the Apostle's time and the order of his work that no rational commentator can doubt its authenticity, and Dean Alford has well branded the doubts of recent German Commentators as the insanity of hypercriticism. The Epistle must have been near the close of his imprisonment, for Epaphroditus' sickness being known to the Philippians implies at least four journeys, back and forth, between St. Paul's arrival in Rome and the date of his letter. First the news that he had reached Rome, then Epaphroditus' journey, then the report of his sickness, and, lastly, the return account of the anxiety at Philippi, before St. Paul indites this letter. Besides, the tone of his letter shows that his present condition and future acquittal were very doubtful at the time he wrote. This places the date of the Epistle near the time of his trial, which took place probably in 63 A.D.

The contents of the Epistle are chiefly notable for two things: (a) That there are none of the warnings against some besetting sins that were current in the other cities, as in Corinth, or in Ephesus, or in Colosse, as is shown by the other letters. Here his exhortations are general, and imply a faith and general purity which call rather for his commendation; and indeed an exhortation to Euodias and to Syntyche to unity is the only hint at any failure of charity from his pen. (b) The contents of the Epistle are grouped around two central points. The inscription, so different from the others by the omission of his official position as Apostle, introduces his urging to greater love and confidence and forbearance in the midst of affliction and persecution, culminating at last in the noble passage declaring the Divinity, the manhood, the humiliation and exaltation of the LORD JESUS CHRIST (a passage the Church reads most fitly upon the Sunday next before Easter), followed by a loving exhortation to a blameless life. The passage is on its surface wholly dissimilar, yet withal underneath very like the parallel exhortation in St. Peter's first Epistle upon the meekness of CHRIST. A comparison of the two is very instructive. With this thought of meekness and long-suffering in his mind, the Apostle is next led to speak of those temporal advantages which he had joyfully cast away for CHRIST's sake, and thus adds a noble practical declaration of the righteousness which cometh by the Faith of CHRIST and his longing for that resurrection in Him; to gain this he urges the pressing forward to the mark of our high calling of God in CHRIST JESUS, and closes with that magnificent image of the Politeia we have in our Mother-City in heaven of which we are colonists, by whose laws we are governed here, and from which we look for our Judge, who will refashion us into His own perfect and glorious body. The glow of love, tenderness, enthusiasm, eager longing for his LORD's presence, and the exhortations scattered through the whole Epistle, not as in others placed at the end, make it, apart from its great doctrinal value, one of the most delightful of all the Apostle's letters. We seem to be on different terms with him. He is not the Lawyer holding a weighty brief, as in the Epistle to the Romans, not a vehement expostulator, as in the Galatian and Corinthian Epistles, nor setting forth the unity of the Church, as in the other two Epistles of the Imprisonment, but here, as in the short Epistle to Philemon, apparently pouring out his enthusiastic heart to loving friends in the joy of their faith.

Pilgrim. The word pilgrim means a wanderer or traveler, and it is generally used to designate those who visit some sacred place. Sometimes the term has a general sense, as in Purchas's "Pilgrimages, or Relations of the World." In Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress" the Christian is represented as journeying through earth to his heavenly home.

Pilgrimages. There is a natural desire among men to behold places which have been made famous by the residence of those who were esteemed great or holy. The looking on the scenes which gratified the eyes of heroes and the treading on the ground where they have trod seems to bring them nearer to us. The idea attains its height in respect to our LORD and SAVIOUR. It is, then, little wonder that hundreds of thousands through the Christian centuries should have thronged to look on the abode of CHRIST. As one stands on the Lake of Galilee he can almost hear again the Divine words which resounded over it when the Son of God taught men there, and can in imagination see the waiting crowds who heard them.

Pilgrimages were common among the Jews. Jerusalem, their central place of worship, called them to its sacred services thrice a year, and with glad Psalms they approached it in vast crowds. "Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem" (Ps. cxxii. 2), was the burden of their song, and the city is described as the place "whither the tribes go up, the tribes of the LORD, unto the testimony of Israel, to give thanks unto the name of the LORD" (ver. 4).

In Christian times Jerusalem again became a centre of pilgrimages. The Church historians, Socrates and Theodoret, relate that Helena, the mother of Constantine the Great, was instructed by a dream to go to Jerusalem, and believed that she had found there the cross on which our Blessed LORD was crucified. Thus she "seems to have been the first who gave the signal for these religious journeys." Many went to be baptized in the Jordan, which was the desire of Constantine, and they were also "attracted by the marvelous and the love of relics. Even the very dust of the Holy Land was thought of great value, and was carried home by pilgrims.

"Chrysostom says that from all quarters of the earth men flock to see the place where CHRIST was born, where He suffered and was buried." He also declares that "the memory of Job drew many pilgrims to Arabia to see the dung-heap and to kiss the earth on which the man of GOD had suffered with such resignation." It seemed to Chrysostom a remarkable thing that places sanctioned by religion should be sought after for thousands of years in preference to "monuments of earthly glory," and he speaks of the profit from such sacred recollections. The trouble was that the impression was too often a fleeting one. It is easier to trust in the outward than to seek inward grace, and hence we find St. Jerome declaring that "the places of the crucifixion and of the resurrection of CHRIST profited those only who bore their own cross, and rose each day with CHRIST, but those who said 'The temple of the LORD, the temple of the LORD,' should hearken to the Apostle, 'Ye are the temple of the LORD, the HOLY SPIRIT dwells within you.' Heaven stands open to us in Britain as well as in Jerusalem; the kingdom of God should be within ourselves." He states that the venerable monk Hilarion, in Palestine, had visited the holy places but once, though near them, that he might not countenance the exaggerated veneration of them.

Gregory of Nyssa said, "Change of place brings GOD no nearer. Wherever thou art, GOD will visit thee, if the mansion of thy soul is found to be such that He can dwell and rule in thee. But if thou hast thy inner man full of wicked thoughts, then, whether thou art on Golgotha, on the Mount of Olives, or at the monument of the Crucifixion, thou art still as far from having received CHRIST into thy heart as if thou hadst never confessed Him." In after-years the Council of Chalons (813 A.D.) found it necessary to denounce the false confidence of some in the merit of pilgrimages to Rome and the church of St. Martin at Tours, without a holy life, being "so foolish as to believe that by the mere sight of a holy place they should be cleansed from their sins." The pilgrimages were thought commendable which proceeded from sincere piety, and aimed at amendment of life. Alcuin wrote to a nun troubled in conscience on account of inability to finish a pilgrimage which she had begun: "This was no great harm; for GOD had chosen some better thing for her; she had now only to expend in supporting the poor what she had appropriated to so long a journey." The English pilgrimages to Rome in the eighth century, though often morally injurious, helped to transplant a needed culture to rude Britain, and were the means of bringing Bibles and other good books to her shores, as well as "the elements of many of the arts."

As the ages passed on an undue reverence for the tombs of martyrs caused many to make superstitious pilgrimages to them. People who should have remembered that their own bodies were temples "of the HOLY GHOST" (1 Cor. vi. 19) began to reverence the bones of dead saints, who if they could have spoken from Paradise would have rebuked such action, as Barnabas and Paul did the heathen priest at Systra, who "would have done sacrifice with the people" to "men of like passions" with themselves (Acts xiv. 13, 15). They warned the people to turn "unto the living GOD."

The Crusades, those strange mixtures of war and devotion, were pilgrimages, and Peter the Hermit and others excited vast numbers of people to throng to the Holy Land to redeem the sepulchre of CHRIST from the hand of the Turks. Perhaps the most remarkable feature of these times was the children's crusade, whereby thousands of innocents were drawn from their homes, many of whom perished miserably.

While merit is not to be sought in pilgrimages, Christian hearts will always long to behold the scenes of CHRIST's earthly work, and crucifixion, and burial, and resurrection, and ascension. Dr. Johnson, with his usual good sense, in "Rasselas," makes distinctions between proper and improper pilgrimages. He calls them "reasonable or superstitious according to the principles upon which they are performed."

In short, instead of leaning on sacred places or sacred people to make us holy, we must be ourselves "perfecting holiness in the fear of GOD" (2 Cor. vii. 1). St. Peter's exhortation (1 Pet. ii. 11) is, "Dearly beloved, I beseech you as strangers and pilgrims, abstain from fleshly lusts, which war against the soul." Life is the real pilgrimage, Heaven is the true goal. The aged Jacob speaks of his still more aged fathers, "in the days of their pilgrimage" (Gen. iv. 7-9). Earthly life to the patriarchs was as an inn or a tent, a sojourning place. Their steps tended towards the "city which hath foundations," the "Jerusalem which is above." "From the ends of the earth do I cry unto Thee" (from this distant earth, this remote and foreign land); "O that I might dwell in Thy tabernacle of the eternities. O that I might find shelter under the covert of Thy wings, in the secret place of Thy Presence" (Ps. lxi.). In Ps. cxix. 54, the statutes of God are the "songs of the Psalmist in the house of his pilgrimage." In the eleventh chapter of Hebrews, the ancient worthies, who "died in faith, confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth" (ver. 13). Philo says that "All the wise men are introduced by Moses as strangers, their souls coming from heaven to travel here on earth, looking upon heaven as the city where they dwell, and the earth in which they travel as their place of pilgrimage." The philosophers taught that to die was to go into our country, "to the true country whence we came." Abraham and David call themselves strangers and sojourners (Gen. xxiii. 4; Ps. xxxix. 12). So of the Jewish nation (2 Chron. xxix. 15, and Lev. xxv. 23). The rest for the pilgrim and the stranger comes hereafter, and the best pilgrimage is that which ends in Abraham's bosom, the Paradise of God.

Pittsburg, Diocese of. The Diocese of Pittsburg is formed out of that part of the old Diocese of Pennsylvania lying west of the Alleghany Mountains, and comprises twenty-four counties of the State; the Eastern boundary being formed by the Eastern lines of McKean, Cameron, Clearfield, Cambria, and Somerset Counties. According to the last census the population of these counties is about 1,300,000. The first movement towards setting apart this territory a separate Missionary Jurisdiction was made in the early part of the century. The consent of Bishop White was readily obtained, and the preparatory steps were taken in General Convention * but nothing practical came of it. The project was not revived until some fifty years later, and it then took the form of a proposal to form a new Diocese. The application to the Convention of the Diocese of Pennsylvania was made at nearly every annual meeting; but for a long time was vehemently opposed and consent refused. At length, in the Convention of 1865 A.D., a resolution was passed permitting the formation of the new Diocese, coupled, however, with the condition that the consent of the Bishop should not be asked until the sum of at least $30,000 should be raised and safely invested, as a fund for the support of the new Bishop. A larger amount than was demanded was very soon secured, and the Bishop of the Diocese of Pennsylvania gave the required consent. This action of the Diocesan Convention and the Bishop was ratified by the General Convention at its session held in Philadelphia, October, 1865 A.D., to take effect November 1, 1865 A.D. It is worthy of note that this was the first instance of the division of a Diocese since the formation of the Diocese of Western New York in 1836 A.D. It is also to be remarked that the Diocese of Pittsburg was the first to adopt as its ecclesiastical letter the name of the leading city within its bounds, and the consent of the Bishop in charge was given only with the public declaration that "the name adopted is open to very grave objections."

The Primary Convention was held in Trinity Church, Pittsburg, November 15, 1865 A.D. All the clergy entitled to seats, 28 in number, were present, and 28 parishes were represented by lay delegates. The Rt. Rev. Wm. Bacon Stevens, of Pennsylvania, the Bishop in charge, preached the sermon at the opening service and presided over the sessions. The preliminary business having been disposed of, on the second day the President announced the order of the day to be the election of a Bishop. The Rev. Mr. Swope, Rector of Trinity Church, Pittsburg, nominated the Rev. John Barrett Kerfoot, D.D., President of Trinity College, Hartford, Conn., and the Rev. Dr. Page, of Christ Church, Alleghany, nominated the Rev. Frederic Dan Huntington, D.D., Rector of Emmanuel Church, Boston. The election was suspended in order to fix the salary of the Bishop who should be elected, which was, upon the motion of Mr. John H. Shoenberger, made $4500 per annum.

The election then proceeded, and on the first ballot Dr. Kerfoot was "duly nominated and supported by the order of the clergy" by a vote of 19 to 9. The election was confirmed by the laity; 19 Parishes voting for approval, 8 for disapproval, and 1 being divided.

Dr. Kerfoot accepted the election, and was consecrated in Trinity Church, Pittsburg, St. Paul's Day, January 25, 1866 A.D. The Presiding Bishop, the Rt. Rev. John Henry Hopkins, D.D., of Vermont, Bishops McIlvaine, Whittingham, Williams, Talbot, Cox, and Clarkson took part in the consecration.

Bishop Kerfoot's Episcopate extended over fifteen years, though for nearly eighteen months before his death he was disabled by sickness from performing his accustomed duties. He died, after a long illness, at Meyersdale, Somerset Co., July 10, 1881 A.D. During his administration the Diocese developed both strength and growth. The effects of closer supervision and more frequent Episcopal services were speedily felt. At the end of two years, in his Convention address of 1868 A.D., he was able to report that the amount raised for Diocesan and City Missions was six times as great as before

Division, i.e., $6000; that the Clergy had increased from 33 to 49; that the number of Communicants had grown 50 per cent. (from 2000 to 3000), and that the Confirmations had increased threefold. Besides, $100,000 had been expended in Church building.

Again, in 1871 A.D., he summarizes the growth of the Diocese for the six years of separate Church life and the six years previous to the Division for comparison, showing the increase in offerings for Diocesan Missions was in the ratio of 6 to 1; in Communicants of 5 to 3; in Confirmations of 5 to 2. Up to that time there had been at least $500,000 spent in Church building; and during the same period of six years 22 new churches had been built, 17 of them being entirely new organizations. The amount of labor which Bishop Kerfoot performed can be appreciated only by an examination of his yearly journal.

The progress of the Diocese may be estimated by the following comparison of statistics for the first year of Diocesan life, 1866-67 A.D., with those of the last Convention year, 1881-83 A.D.:

Baptisms.....	712	1012
Communicants.....	2629	6206
Confirmations.....	404	506
Sunday-School Teachers and Scholars.....	3679	6200
Contributions.....	$130,500	$191,250
Clergy.....	49	53
Parishes.....	44	58

The Church Institutions were, 1. The Church Home, having as inmates 5 aged women and 71 children. 2. The Bishop Bowman Institute, a Church School for Girls. 3. The Bishop Kerfoot Library, bequeathed by the first Bishop of the Diocese for the use of the clergy. There is also a flourishing Boys' School, Trinity Hall, at Washington, Pa., under Church, but not Diocesan, control. After Bishop Kerfoot's death, a special Convention was called to meet at Trinity Church, Pittsburg, October 19, 1881 A.D., to elect a successor. At this Convention, on the fifth ballot, the Rev. Cortlandt Whitehead, D.D., Rector of the Church of the Nativity, South Bethlehem, Pa., was elected by the clergy, and the next day confirmed by a vote of the Parishes.

Dr. Whitehead accepted the election, and was consecrated St. Paul's Day, January 25, 1882 A.D., in Trinity Church, Pittsburg. Under his care the Diocese has kept up its previous progress. It has heartily responded to his efforts for its development and growth, and the statistics already given from the last Journal of the Convention give ample evidence of the success of his administration.

REV. M. BYLLESBY.

Plurality. The holding of one or more benefices. It was an abuse that grew up in the Middle Ages, and has been productive of much evil, since a clergyman sometimes obtained a very large income from the holding of several Parishes the duty for which he had to remit to curates, at insufficient salaries, while he received all the profits without doing the work for them. In this country, however, at present the stipend in many parishes is so small that it is a matter of necessity for a clergyman to undertake the care of more than one to eke out a support.

Polygamy. The marriage by one man of several wives at one time. This was a custom of very early existence. The first instance we have is in Genesis iv. 19, where Lamech took two wives. The reverse also occurs among some rude tribes, where one woman had several husbands. The Law allowed the marriage of several wives. Before this Abraham, Jacob, Esau, and Ishmael had married several wives. Before the coming of our LORD there seems to have been no positive precept against polygamy. It was not only allowed, but in the case of King David taking Saul's wives it was a State act, implying that he had become seized of all the property of his predecessor. So Absalom defiled his father's wives for a like reason. Yet with all this practice the tendency of the Jewish Scriptures was against polygamy. Solomon, with his three hundred wives and seven hundred concubines, yet does not allude to polygamy in his writings. Its evils were then as many and as great as we now see them to be in the modern cases of the Turk and of the Mormon. The moral and the legal consequences are all bad, and must always be so. But beyond this the home life, which is so very important, is injured, if not practically destroyed. After the Captivity the Jews appear to have dropped polygamy. No case is recorded among them in the Evangelists. Our LORD did not have to forbid it directly, since it was not at all common in His day. He assumed that there was but one wife. So too St. Paul. He assumes that there is but one wife. He does not seem to suppose that such a thing is allowable. "Let every man have his own wife, and every woman her own husband," is the rule. His comparison of CHRIST and the Church is upon the ground of the single wife. The Roman civil Law also made polygamy an offense. The heathen Greeks were far laxer. The early Fathers are very clear and pointed, both in stating the prevalence of it, its absolute prohibition by the Church, and the strict enforcement of monogamy.

The evils which are produced by polygamy are destructive of morals, as it ministers to the debasing lusts and passions of our nature. It is based essentially upon them. The average man rises no higher than his moral level, and if by the indulgence of the lower appetites, not only lust, but selfishness, and, together with other and correlated evil habits, a man's character is thus hampered, the development of pure social ethics is also hampered. But not only private morals, but also the legal rights of the offspring are affected by it. The tenure of property, the right of succession, the relation of kindred, and the descent of families would all be affected by it in our present state of complex civilization. And the very source of all the purity and honor of the state, the domestic life, would be polluted by it.

Pontifical. The Pontifical is a book containing the offices peculiar to a Bishop. In the Latin and Greek Churches there are several offices which a Bishop celebrates which are not retained in the Anglican Church. In the Anglican Church the Pontifical is that part of our Prayer-Book (however, not an integral part of it) which contains the form and manner of making, ordaining, and consecrating Deacons, Priests, and Bishops, the Litany and the Communion Service, the Form of Consecration of a Church or Chapel, and the Office of Institution of Ministers. Its offices can only be performed by a Bishop, except the last, which by delegation from the Bishop can be discharged by a Priest. In this Pontifical is not included one other office which pertains to the Bishop, the order of Confirmation, but this office was probably placed where it is to set forth the succession of spiritual acts directly connected with each man's life, and by which offices he receives the gifts the Church has to give him.

Pope (Latin Papa "Father"), was originally the title of all Bishops. There is no evidence that St. Peter was ever Bishop of Rome; in fact, the Roman Church in the year 96 A.D. appears to have had only a college of presbyters at its head. The earliest lists of the Roman Bishops, by Irenæus (202 A.D.), contain names only, no numbers; and the numbers added in the fourth century by Eusebius, Jerome, and the Liberian catalogue of Popes, are contradictory and therefore of little if any value. Various circumstances combined at length to favor the pre-eminence of the Bishops of Rome: the labors and martyrdom of St. Paul at Rome; his epistle addressed to the Roman Christians; the prominence of the city as the metropolis of the world, etc. The first Roman Bishop who claimed authority beyond the confines of his own particular Church was Victor (189 A.D.). In a dispute concerning the time of observing Easter he peremptorily demanded a council to judge the Asiatic Bishops, and threatened or actually pronounced a disruption of all communion with those who opposed his views in the matter. Eusebius (H. E., v. 24) says, "Victor, the Bishop of the Church of Rome, forthwith endeavored to cut off the churches of all Asia, together with the neighboring churches, as heterodox, from the common unity. And he publishes abroad by letter, and proclaims, that all the brethren there are wholly excommunicated."

Leo I. may be regarded as the first Pope, viewed from the stand-point of a later realization of the papal idea in the history of Latin Christianity. Rome had been the capital of the world; her Bishop was the head of the universal Church, and the successor of the chief of the Apostles. As such, he ruled with Apostolic authority, inheriting from St. Peter supreme power. Leo condemned all heretics, and was especially severe towards the Manicheans. In the affair of a sentence pronounced by Hilarius of Arles against the Bishop of Besançon, he addressed a letter to the bishops of the province of Vienne, denouncing the resistance of Hilarius to the authority of St. Peter, and releasing them from allegiance to the See of Arles. Instigated by Leo, the Emperor Valentinian III. promulgated an edict condemning the contumacy of Hilarius "against the primacy of the Apostolic throne, confirmed alike by the merits of St. Peter, the chief of the Apostolic order, by the majesty of the Roman city, and by the decree of a holy council." Through Leo's influence an order proceeded from the same emperor, to the effect that any bishop who refused to attend the tribunal of the Pope, when summoned, should be compelled to do so by the governor of his province. The primacy of St. Peter was boldly asserted as perpetual, the Bishop of Rome being the successor of that apostle through all time. The collected sermons of Leo are the first preserved to us from a Roman Bishop, and besides these discourses, ninety-six in number, we have from him many epistles.

Gregory I., also called "the Great" (590-604 A.D.), while destitute of real scholastic acquirements, was nevertheless the author of numerous writings,—more than any other pope, with perhaps a single exception. He was a rigid ascetic, yet an exceedingly ambitious and persevering prelate, and something of a politician as well. Conspicuous among his productions is his Exposition of the Book of Job,—the work of a devout mind rather than of a profound theologian. His liturgical labors are also worthy of note, as under him the ritual of the Church was greatly improved. The authority assumed to be inherent in the successors of St. Peter, and by so much wanting in the Episcopate, was not only most decidedly claimed by him, but was practically illustrated. He revived the appellate jurisdiction of the Roman see,—e.g., a deposed Spanish bishop appealed to Rome, and Gregory commissioned a legate of his to examine the case and render a decision accordingly. Also, the bishops of France were requested by him, whenever any contention arose, to obey Virgilius of Arles as his authorized representative. The Council of Sardica (347 A.D.), composed of 100 Western bishops, and 73 bishops from the East,—Hosius of Cordova presiding,—had adopted a canon whereby an appellate jurisdiction was conceded to the Bishop of Rome. While yet a monk, Gregory's attention was directed to Britain as a promising field for missionary effort, and after succeeding to the pontifical chair he sent Augustine, a monk, to that country with some thirty assistants,—afterwards increased in France to forty—ostensibly for the purpose of converting the pagans there. Gregory was doubtless actuated by a measure of the same missionary spirit which he manifested earlier, yet there is sufficient evidence of a determination on his part to advance the jurisdiction of the Holy See. The familiar story of his seeing a number of fair captive boys from the distant isle in the market-place of Rome, and thereupon expressing a desire for the conversion of their countrymen,—indulging at the same time in a fanciful play upon words,—should probably be relegated to the legendary. Though according to him considerable missionary zeal, we are compelled to regard in him a degree of ambition for the furtherance of his patriarchal jurisdiction. Augustine was consecrated the first Archbishop of Canterbury by Virgilius, Bishop of Arles, and in due time received the Palium from Gregory, whereby the primacy of the Pope over the Frankish bishops was asserted. In a conference with the British bishops, Augustine proposed that they should conform to the Roman customs in the celebration of Easter; also, in the rite of Baptism, etc. Replying thereto, they declared that they were “obedient subjects of the Church of God, and to the Pope of Rome, and to every godly Christian, to love every one in his degree, in perfect charity, and to help every one of them, by word and deed, to be the children of God. And other obedience than this we do not know to be due to him whom you name to be Pope, nor to be father of fathers; and this obedience we are ready to give, and to pay to him and to every Christian continually.” Besides, they were “under the government of the Bishop of Caerleon-upon-Usk,” the old Welsh archbishopric. In short, the whole history of Augustine’s establishment in Britain represents Gregory in the attitude of attempting to destroy the autonomy of an independent Apostolic Episcopate.

For the next hundred years or more the successors of Gregory I. appear to have gained no considerable increase of their ecclesiastical power. Honorius I. (625–38 A.D.) having declared himself a Monotholite, was condemned as a heretic by the sixth General Synod, convoked by Constantine Pogonatus at Constantinople, 680 A.D. He was not therefore regarded as an infallible Pope. Gregory III. (731–41 A.D.) appealed to Charles Martel (Mayor of the Palace) for protection against the powerful invading Lombards, who, said the Pope, were “ravaging by fire and sword the last remains of the property of the Church, which no longer suffices for the sustenance of the poor, or to provide lights for the daily service” (740 A.D.). The keys of the tomb of St. Peter had already been sent to the mighty Frank as a symbol of allegiance. Stephen II. (752 A.D.) crossed the Alps, visited Pepin in person, and implored his interposition to restore the domain of St. Peter. The king promised the desired aid, and was afterwards anointed by the Pope. After Stephen’s return he sent letters to Pepin beseeching him to save the beloved city of Rome from the unceasingly hostile and thoroughly hated Lombards. A similar request was made by Hadrian I. (772–95 A.D.) to Charlemagne, who having conquered the king of the Lombards visited the Holy City, did homage to the throne of St. Peter, and ratified the donation of Pepin, which is said to have embraced the whole of Italy, the Exarchate of Ravenna, from Istria to the frontier of Naples, including the island of Corsica. Hadrian’s death occurred in 795 A.D., and his successor, Leo III., hastened to recognize the supremacy of Charles by sending to him the keys of the city of Rome, and those of the sepulchre of St. Peter. Charles was subsequently crowned by Hadrian and proclaimed Cæsar Augustus. Thus all Western Christendom became consolidated under one monarchy. During this period the lustre of the Popes was greatly increased by the Frankish alliance, by the munificent donation to the head of the Church, and by the acceptance of the imperial crown from the hands of the pontiff. Charlemagne could doubtless have subjected the papacy to the State had he desired to do so, but he preferred evidently to have an ally in the Pope, such in fact was the position of the latter at this time.

During several centuries it was undecided as to which of the two powers—the secular or the spiritual—should have the supremacy. At length, however, a contest arose which settled the question: a nearly complete victory was gained for the spiritual power, and a full realization of the essential idea of the papacy was the result. Yet this was in substance no new phenomenon if the fundamental principle of the papacy be considered; for long before this it was declared that the Bishop of Rome was the supreme guide and governor, as of the clergy so also in affairs secular. The Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals, which appeared about the end of the eighth century, purported to be the productions of the early Bishops of Rome. According to these false decretals every Bishop was amenable to the immediate tribunal of the Pope, and to that only. To the Church was accorded so exalted a position that to subordinate her to the state seemed highly improper and inadmissible. The spiritual power was to be perfectly untrammelled; but in that the secular and the spiritual could not be definitely separated, and everything secular has its spiritual side, it was natural that to the spiritual power should be given the pre-eminence. Immediately after the death of Pope Alexander II., Hildebrand, an archdeacon, while conducting the funeral ceremonies in the Lateran Church, was proclaimed Pope (1073 A.D.), and was enthroned in the chair of St. Peter as Gregory VII. According to a decree of Nicolas II. (the second Lateran Council, 1059 A.D.), after the nomination of a Pope by the cardinals, and the ratification of the same by the clergy and the people of Rome, it was necessary to obtain the assent of the Emperor. Henry IV. of Germany was now appealed to for such assent, but he dispatched a messenger to inquire why the Romans had proceeded to an election without consulting him. However, his assent was subsequently given. Gregory began at once a vigorous warfare against simony and the marriage of the clergy. "He was no infant Hercules," says Wilman; "but the mature ecclesiastical Hercules would begin his career by strangling these two serpents; the brood, as he esteemed them, and parents of all evil." The decree of a Synod held in Rome within the first year of his pontificate declared invalid all sacraments administered by simoniacal or married priests. To Philip I., king of France, he wrote a letter reproving him for oppressing the Church. "Either let the king repudiate this base traffic of simony, and allow fit persons to be promoted to bishoprics, or the Franks, unless apostates from Christianity, will be struck with the sword of excommunication," and the bishops were instructed to excommunicate him in case he failed to obey their admonitions. Gregory's first intercourse with England was in the form of an arbitrary letter to Archbishop Lanfranc respecting the Abbey of St. Edmondsbury, over which he claimed jurisdiction. In a letter to William the Conqueror he asserted his right to the levying of Peter's pence throughout the kingdom. The claim was admitted, but to the demand of fealty William replied, "I have not, nor will I swear fealty, which was never sworn by any of my predecessors to yours." The kings of Spain were told by the Pope that their entire realm was not only within the spiritual jurisdiction of the Holy See, but was her property. It was with the Empire that Gregory pressed his most significant and far-reaching contest. He exacted a ready acquiescence, on the part of the temporal power, in the prerogative of the cardinals to elect a Pope; and all claims on the investiture of the prelates and other clergy were to be abandoned. Moreover, the Pope was to have and to exercise the right of dictating in matters of State whenever in his opinion there should be cause for his interference. Gregory admonished Henry IV. to rule more wisely, to abstain from simoniacal presentation of benefices, and to render obedience to his spiritual superior. These monitions were well received, and the clemency of the pontiff was sought.

At a Council held in Rome, 1075 A.D., Gregory abrogated the right of investiture by the temporal ruler, and at a Synod held in Mentz, the papal legate displayed the mandate of the Apostolic See requiring the Bishops to compel their clergy either to renounce their wives or to cease from exercising the functions of the ministry. Henry IV. was afterwards summoned to Rome to answer to the charges against him; on the other hand, the king called an assembly of Bishops at Worms, and it was there decided that Gregory should be no longer obeyed as Pope. This was followed by the convening of a Council in the Lateran palace, at which Henry was excommunicated and deprived of his kingdoms,—of Germany and Italy. After this he sought absolution from the Pope, but his military successes strengthened his position, and he was crowned by the antipope Guibert. Subsequently, Gregory repaired to Salerno, where he died an exile. The controlling principle in the pontificate of Gregory was the total submission of the secular power to the spiritual.

The metropolitans, who had been required by the Council of Frankfort (742 A.D.) to seek the pallium at the hand of the Pope, promising obedience to his commands, had now to take an oath of fealty to him as the universal Bishop.

During the pontificate of Paschal II. (1099–1118 A.D.) the question of investiture was especially prominent, and was the cause of a bitter contest between the papacy and the temporal power. Paschal excommunicated Henry IV., who had already been under the ban of Gregory VII. and Urban II. (1088–99 A.D.). Henry's son intrigued against him at the head of a considerable party, and refused to submit unless the Emperor would become reconciled with the Church. No reconciliation was, however, effected, and Henry died excommunicate. "At several Synods held by Paschal, investiture by lay hands was condemned. An attempt was subsequently made to settle the question by a treaty, according to which Henry V. on the day of his consecration was to concede the investiture of all the churches, while, on the other hand, the Church was to surrender possession of the royalties conferred by the empire. The Prince Bishops of Germany objected strenuously to this, and Paschal was compelled to yield,—as he said, to save the city of Rome. A Council at Vienna (1112 A.D.) excommunicated the Emperor, condemning at the same time investiture by lay hands, and Paschal ratified the decrees. Henry afterwards advanced upon Rome, and the Pope died in exile (1118 A.D.). Under Calixtus II. (1122 A.D.) a compromise was arranged in the form of a concordat, whereby the Emperor resigned forever the investiture by the ring and crosier, and recognized the liberty of elections. In return it was agreed that elections should take place in his presence or that of his representatives, and that the new Bishop should receive his temporalities from the Emperor by the sceptre. (See Hallam, Mid. Ages, chap. vii. 1.)

Hudrian IV., Nicholas Breakspeare (1154–1159 A.D.) was the only Englishman elevated to the papal chair, the dignity of which he maintained with the boldness and courage of a Hildebrand. To Henry II. of England he granted the kingdom of Ireland, at the same time holding that all islands when Christianized belonged to the jurisdiction of the Roman Pontiff. In return for this grant Hadrian exacted Peter's pence. The Emperor, Frederick Barbarossa, was solemnly crowned by him at Rome, yet the Pope's imperious attitude towards this warlike and powerful sovereign induced the latter to put forth an edict forbidding the clergy from all intercourse with the Apostolic See. A reconciliation was effected, but it was soon followed by further quarrels. At length Hadrian addressed a paternal and very condescending letter to Frederick, accusing him of irreverence and a disregard of the fealty he had sworn to St. Peter. The strife continued until ended by the death of Hadrian, as he was preparing for more decisive measures, including the excommunication of Frederick.

Innocent III. (1198-1216 A.D.) was one of the greatest of the Popes, second only to Gregory VII., than whom he certainly seems to have been more successful. In his inauguration discourse he said, "Ye see what manner of servant that is whom the LORD hath set over His people; no other than the vicegerent of CHRIST, the successor of Peter. He stands in the midst between GOD and man; below GOD, above man; less than GOD, more than man." Innocent entered vigorously upon the restoration of Italy from the domination of the Germans, and the regaining of the papal territories. In the long, and at times sanguinary, conflict relative to the imperial throne, he interposed as supreme arbiter. He said, "It belongs to the Apostolic See to pass judgment on the election of the Emperor, both in the first and last resort; in the first because by her aid and on her account the empire was transplanted from Constantinople; by her as the sole authority for this transplanting, on her behalf and for her better protection; in the last resort because the emperor receives the final confirmation of his dignity from the Pope; is consecrated, crowned, invested in the imperial dignity by him." Otto IV. became the undisputed Emperor, and was crowned by Innocent in St. Peter's Church, Rome. His subsequent course was, however, such that the Pope excommunicated him, and required the Archbishops of Ravenna, Milan, and Genoa, and all the Bishops of Italy to publish the ban. A fierce and fateful contest was waged by Innocent and Philip Augustus, King of France, who had married Ingeburga, the sister of Canute IV. of Denmark, and had speedily rejected her, taking another for his wife. The matter had been brought before Pope Cælestine, but he had not the courage to deal with it. Innocent, his successor, threatened now to place the realm of Philip Augustus under an interdict—suspending all sacred offices, except the baptism of infants and absolution by the clergy—if he refused to submit to the monitions of the papal legate. The command was unheeded, whereupon the papal legate summoned a council at Dijon, which pronounced the king and his territories to be under the ban,—all religious offices from that time ceasing. Thus, by the imperative order of Innocent thousands of souls were deprived of the means of grace,—to such an extent had the disciplinary power of the Popes been developed. Finally the King was compelled to yield to the demand of Innocent, and several prelates who had favored the obstinate ruler were obliged to seek absolution at the feet of the haughty and resolute pontiff. The arbitrary and fearless spirit of the Hildebrandian type of the Papacy was here displayed. The Church ruled the State.

Gregory IX. (1227-41 A.D.) had a new compilation made of the Papal Decretals, and promulgated them as the great statute law of the Universal Church. Also, for neglecting to undertake a crusade to Palestine, thus to fulfill a condition upon which the imperial crown was bestowed (by Honorius III.), the Emperor of Germany, Frederick II., was excommunicated by the Pope, and his subjects were absolved from their allegiance. Within the next year the Emperor sailed for the Holy Land, but as he was excommunicate, the movement was regarded by Gregory as the profanation of a crusade. In all his quarrels with Frederick the authority of the pontiff was boldly asserted; there was again a fierce conflict, in which the absolute sovereignty of the Church was the governing principle on the side of the successor of St. Peter. Not only did the Popes usurp the rights of bishops, metropolitans, and princes, but they claimed the prerogative of convoking Councils and confirming their decrees. None of the passages from the letters of the Pontiffs and from conciliar acts usually adduced by Roman Catholic writers in evidence of the participation of the Roman See in the calling of the general synods of Christian antiquity are, however, found to stand the test of a thorough examination.* Consequently this favorite theory with the Roman Church turns out to be entirely groundless, and that it is so can excite no surprise when its origin is considered. It originated in the sixteenth century, and essentially in opposition to the Protestantism of that time. Certain Protestants pointing to the calling of the early councils by the emperors disputed the right of the Popes to convoke them. Bellarmine, in his Disputations, endeavored to show that their convocation belonged in fact not to the Emperor but to the Pope, and though some councils had been called by the former, on the other hand several had been convened by the latter; at all events, that no general council had been announced a solo imperatore, that is, without the consent and authority of the Roman Pontiffs; that although the first five general synods in particular had been announced by the Emperors, yet it was only ex pontificum sententia et consensu. In a later period the theory of the participation of the Popes in the calling of synods was invested in somewhat different language only; but its origin certainly does not commend it. It owes its existence to partisan polemics, and to an almost equally partisan apology. True, Bellarmine's procedure is intelligible from the adverse position of Protestantism, but it is not the less without foundation. Instead of simply rejecting the conclusion which the Protestants drew from certain facts, he denied the facts themselves, or at least, endeavored to render them of doubtful authority. Therefore the most of his arguments were rightly abandoned even by those who maintained essentially his view. The other arguments from which support in this regard is usually derived—whether produced by Bellarmine or later writers—are fundamentally unreliable. As evidence that approbation or confirmation has been conferred by the Popes various passages are appealed to, in which no more is really said than that the Roman See accepted the councils. In this wise could the Popes speak, though they had consented to the councils through their legates only. In the same way could all the rest of the Bishops speak, and must indeed have spoken, if they were so situated as to be able to express themselves with regard to their position towards a synod; and as little as we may now be disposed to take the word relative thereto in the sense of a confirmation so little may the latter have occurred. With expressions of this sort neither more nor less is to be shown than that the Roman See simply accepted, that is, did not reject. Non-rejection is, however, very far from being identical with approbation. In short, of the testimony which is commonly brought forward in behalf of the Papal Confirmation of the general councils, nothing can be found which will bear a critical examination. On the contrary, several synods so expressed themselves with reference to their relation to Rome as directly to exclude papal approbation. REV. H. H. LORING.

Post-Communion. That portion of the Communion Office which follows the reception of the elements. It includes the prayer of thanksgiving, the Gloria in Excelsis, the Collects (when they are used), and the benediction. The early Liturgies also dismissed the faithful with an office of prayer, often one of great beauty. But the later the Liturgy the more likely it is that the Post-Communion has been made more ornate. A strict construction of the rubric probably would not authorize the present use of the Collects appended to the Communion Office.

Postil. Homilies, or short expositions, upon the Gospels principally. The word came from the words post illa verba, as the comment followed after the passage of Scripture selected. There were a good many Postils published, some of which are quite valuable. Tavener, a writer of the signet in Henry VIII.'s time, published a volume of them, out of which were taken the Homilies for Good-Friday and Easter-day found in the Book of Homilies. Nicholas de Lyra (1320 A.D.) wrote two series of Postils, which deservedly had great influence. They were printed first about 1471 A.D.

Praise. The bounties of God's Providence and the wonders of His grace call for a return in ceaseless praise. "All Thy works shall praise Thee, O LORD; and Thy saints shall bless Thee" (Ps. cxlv. 10).

Heaven is a place of ceaseless praise. The seraphim of Isaiah's vision, and the living creatures beheld by St. John, were constantly crying "Holy, holy, holy," before God. Though centuries had passed since the Prophet's sight of Heaven, the evangelist hears the same music. The Church on earth joins with angels and archangels in this blessed work. In Psalms and Hymns, in Te Deum and Benedicite, and Gloria in Excelsis, she imitates the heavenly host. The Prayer-Book is a book of praise, and layman as well as clergyman is bidden to honor God with heart and voice. The Family Morning Prayer begs "that we may fervently join in the prayers and praises of Thy Church." Praise is the daughter of gladness. When Creation was finished "the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy" (Job xxxviii. 7). When CHRIST was born the angels sang. When the Wise Men saw the star over CHRIST's cradle "they rejoiced with exceeding great joy" (St. Matt. ii. 10). There must be no thought of self in praise. The song of man to God must be full and free, like that of the bird. It must be universal, as in Ps. cxlviii. 12, 13, "Young men and maidens; old men and children," are exhorted to "praise the name of the LORD." The thought culminates in the one hundred and fiftieth, or closing Psalm, where in six verses the word praise is repeated thirteen times and ten instruments of music are called for, as Bishop Patrick notes. But the last verse widens the command to everything that hath breath, and then makes its application, "Praise ye the LORD."

St. Francis de Sales speaks of the larks who sing louder as they soar higher, so the human soul needs to rise from this earthly atmosphere to lose itself in beholding the glory of God. Even martyrs, dying in agony, have learned to praise God in the fires of affliction, as the tortured Euplius, torn by the cruel rack, could still exclaim to him who attempted to persuade him to abjure Christianity, "I adore CHRIST." Even under the torture he cried, "Thanks be to Thee, O CHRIST. Help me, O CHRIST. For Thee do I suffer thus, O CHRIST." As strength failed he repeated these or other exclamations with his lips, when his voice could no longer utter them. Surely there was a glad burst of praise when that voice was regained in Paradise.

The doxology ascribed to Polycarp as among his last words is another evidence of how the thought of God's glory may overcome human trials. It reads thus: "For this, and for all things else, I praise Thee, I bless Thee, I glorify Thee, by the eternal and heavenly High-Priest, JESUS CHRIST, Thy beloved SON, with whom, to Thee, and the HOLY GHOST be glory, both now and to all succeeding ages. Amen." He who would thus be ready to praise God, even in a painful death, must make his "daily life a psalm." To such this life will be too short to declare all the praises of God.

REV. S. F. HOTCHKIN.

Prayer has always been universally recognized and required as an essential part, and, indeed, the most prominent part, of Divine worship. It is the first suggestion of a sense of God's power and man's dependence on Him, and thus we find that every form and system of religion, however low and imperfect its conception of God may be, makes prayer a necessary feature of all its acts of worship. We must be careful to remember that prayer means a great deal more than the mere asking for something that we want. This is its leading idea, but is really neither the whole nor the highest part of prayer. In fact, the obtaining of our requests must necessarily not be the principal object of prayer, for the reason that there can be no true prayer without a spirit of submission to the wisdom and beneficence of God, which leaves it with Him to grant or refuse our petitions as may be most for our good. If we study our LORD's example, we may from that obtain the clearest and truest perception of what prayer is. We find Him habitually spending much of His time in prayer as a means of communication with His FATHER, asking at times for that which He knew must be His, as when He prays that God would glorify Him with the glory which He had with Him before the world was (John xvii. 5), and again asking in an agony of supplication for that which He knew could not be granted, and which it was not His will to receive, as when He prayed in Gethsemane that the cup of suffering might pass from Him. That these were prayers of His human nature does not alter the fact, since the submission of that nature to His FATHER's will was the object of His assuming it. Hence we learn that one great object of prayer is to bring the human mind into direct communication with God, without reference to the granting of its petitions. Nor must the subjective influence of such an act be allowed to pass out of view, the elevating and calming effects of such august intercourse being one of the most important and valuable objects of prayer. Apart from any direct answer and from any objective influences of the HOLY GHOST, we have thus a most efficient means of cultivating Faith, Humility, Love, Reverence, and many other mental and emotional conditions essential to religious life. Again, prayer is in itself the direct acknowledgment, and the only direct acknowledgment possible to man, of the sovereignty of God, and therefore it is due to Him as an act of homage. It must include praise and even sacrifice, because the very act of offering these to the sovereign implies the request that He will permit and accept them. But necessary as is this aspect of prayer, the whole character of Christianity would be changed if prayer were only homage. The Christian prays as a child to his FATHER, upon whose personal love he relies, and with whom he has no other means of communication. He asks for the rain and the sunshine, which God sends freely to the just and the unjust, the unthankful and the evil alike, because he does not wish to receive them as either the unjust or the unthankful, but as his FATHER's child. He has been taught by his Master to ask God for his daily bread, although he must earn it by his own efforts, because he cannot live like the lower animals on food taken where it is found at the promptings of instinct, but must resort to complex processes dependent upon many laws which he recognizes as made and administered by his heavenly FATHER, whom he recognizes as the source and Giver of even that sustenance which the lower creatures unthoughtfully enjoy. This filial character of prayer is not derived, however, from the broad sense of God's fatherhood as the Creator or the Sovereign, but from the special sonship which comes of union with God's well-beloved and only-begotten Son. Hence all Christian prayer is made in the name and for the sake of JESUS CHRIST our LORD.

The question of how Prayer can be efficacious,—how the will of man can influence that of God, sometimes causes a great deal of unnecessary trouble and confusion. That there is a psychic force through which one human mind comes en rapport with another and influences its action is probably true, and this as yet only suspected law may in some way concern the method by which Prayer is conveyed to God. But the truth is that this is a matter with which we have nothing whatever to do. We know and can know absolutely nothing of God except through His revelation in Holy Scripture. There we find Him revealed as the Hearer of Prayer, and we find Prayer prescribed by Him as an Ordinance, together with His promise to answer it. This puts all such questions upon precisely the same footing as all other revealed Truth, and we might as well attempt to explain the eternity of God or the mystery of the Trinity. The Christian believes Prayer to be efficacious because he believes the Bible to be God's word, and upon all such points he cannot argue with an infidel objector or meet his questions, because they move in entirely different planes. It is this fact which makes absurd and disingenuous all challenges to test the efficacy of Prayer by scientific experiments. "Take," says one, "two wards in the same hospital. Pray for the patients in one, but not for those in the other, and abide by the result." We might as well attempt to measure distance by weight, or test the soundness of a logical proposition by the laws of applied chemistry. Prayer lies entirely outside of science, and has no conceivable connection with its laws and methods. To ask such a test is to demand a manifest impossibility, for the promise of answer is to believing Prayer. "Whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive" (Matt. xxi. 22). Prayer, therefore, cannot, from its very nature, be made matter of experiment. But if it is said, "We ask only Elijah's test," the answer is, "These are not Elijah's days, and Elijah is not here." The question of Special and Direct Answers to Prayer is of far greater practical interest. Are we to expect such, or not? We see at once that this involves the question of Special Providences, and in reply it is sufficient to say that true Christian faith is as far removed from superstitious credulity as from skepticism. A broad-minded heathen poet has said, "I have learned that not every wonder worked by nature is sent from high heaven by the angry gods" (Hor. Sat. i., vi. 102-3), nor does any reasonable Christian believe that the daily bread which he prays for comes as a direct gift from God. But Christianity and reason alike teach the direct personal oversight and administration by God of His own laws and His personal care for the wants of His creatures. No one can expect miracles to be wrought at his request, nor petitions to be granted the consequences of which to others he could not possibly foresee. But no faithful praying man can fail to have experienced the prompt responses which so often come through perfectly natural, though unexpected means, producing the desired result. He asks in full recognition of the element of uncertainty involved, in submission to God's wisdom, and obtaining his desire he gratefully acknowledges it as from his FATHER's hand. But what, it may be asked, of unanswered Prayer, in view of the many and positive promises which the Scriptures contain assuring a certain response? The reply is very simple. God has certainly promised to grant all things which are asked in trusting faith, but He has not promised when or how He will grant them. Times and compensations are alike reserved by Him to be settled by His own wisdom and beneficence, nor must it be forgotten that Prayer belongs essentially to that life which is not limited by time or mortality. As a father may withhold what a son requests in order that his inheritance may be the greater, so God may refuse the perishable good which we ask of Him only to insure a richer heritage of blessing in the life hereafter.

Prayer for the Dead. There is a vast difference between prayer to the dead and prayer for the dead. It was found in all the Liturgies from the earliest date. It was not a prayer for a change from a state of condemnation to one of pardon. There is no intimation that such a change could be effected after death. As the tree falleth so must it lie, but it was believed that living and dead were in one communion, that death was a quickening of the soul into greater life, that the soul could pass from glory to glory, and that it had not wholly dissevered its participation in those gifts which were imparted to it here. So at the solemn celebration of the Holy Communion there was a commemoration of the dead, and a prayer that they might be in the refreshment of joy and bliss, and that they might be sharers in the glory of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Specially in each Diocese, the chief of those who had died, the more noted martyrs, the late Bishops, and then special individuals were named from a roll, and a prayer offered for them and for the whole body of those who had died in the true Faith.

The practice has been defended on very insufficient Scriptural grounds, and many passages have been adduced as indirectly sanctioning it from the New Testament. But the fact that it was used from the first, that there is no intimation in any way that it was doubted as proper, that to be left out of the diptychs was one of the penalties used against some who broke the Church's discipline, all point to the consensus that brings its use up to sub-Apostolic times. It could hardly be called an abuse or an innovation. It must have for its basis, then, something in our own nature. It proclaims that death is not a severance of ties. It is, to say the very least, a pious and comforting use. It is admitted in principle by the closing petitions in the Prayer for the whole state of CHRIST'S Church militant, "And we also bless Thy Holy Name, for all Thy servants departed this Life in Thy faith and fear, beseeching Thee to give us grace so to follow their good examples that with them we may be partakers of Thy heavenly kingdom." In the Prayer-Book of 1549 A.D. this passage closed thus: "We commend unto Thy mercy (O LORDE) all other Thy servauntes which are departed hence from us with the signe of faith, and now do reste in the slepe of peace. Graunte unto them, we beseeche Thee, Thy mercy and everlasting peace, and that at the daie of the general resurrection we and all thy which be of the mystical body of Thy Sonne, may altogether bee set on His right hand and hear that His most joyful voice, 'Come unto me, O ye that be blessed of my FATHER, and possesse the kingdome whiche is prepared for you from the beginning of the worlde.'" This was dropped out (together with some sentences just preceding, which are not here quoted) in 1552 A.D., and the words now in use were substituted only in 1662 A.D. These words, it will be noted, strike the same tone which the closing prayer in the burial service utters, showing that the Church has not lost (if for many reasons she has hitherto chosen to partly lay aside) this ancient custom.

Prayer-Book, The American. It is not the purpose of this article to treat of the sources or the history of the Prayer-Book of the Church of England; it must be confined to an outline of the history of the service-book of the American Church. Until the Revolution, the services used were those of the English Books, and it would appear that very strict conformity to them was practiced, for we read of some who had scruples as to reading the closing exhortation in the office for the Baptism of Infants, on the ground that it was almost an impossibility that the sponsors would ever be able to bring the child to a Bishop to be confirmed. When the war of Independence broke out, some of the clergy persisted in the use of the State prayers until their services were possibly stopped; others omitted them altogether, and others adapted them to the case of the new civil authority, the people sometimes insisting, as did those at New London, Conn., "that no person be permitted to enter the Church, and as a pastor to it, unless he openly prays for Congress and the free and independent States of America, and their prosperity by sea and land." But no other changes were favored in any quarter. In Virginia, where the Church was established by law, the Prayer-Book was altered by the State Convention, on the 5th of July, 1776 A.D., "to accommodate it to the change in affairs," but no other alterations were allowed. Things remained in this condition at the close of the war. An informal convention of delegates from eight different States which met in New York in October, 1784 A.D., agreed to certain "fundamental principles," one of which declared that the Episcopal Church in the United States of America should "adhere to the liturgy of the said Church [of England] as far as shall be consistent with the American Revolution and the constitutions of the respective States;" and it was agreed that a formal convention should be held in September of the next year. Before that time Bishop Seabury had returned from Scotland, where he had received consecration to the Episcopate. He met his clergy at Middletown on the 2d day of August, 1785 A.D., and on the 5th a committee, consisting of the Rev. Messrs. Bowden and Jarvis, of Connecticut, and the Rev. Mr. Parker, of Boston, was appointed to act with the Bishop in proposing such changes in the Prayer-Book as should be thought necessary. Certain alterations were agreed upon, and those relating to the State prayers were published by Bishop Seabury on the 12th day of August. The others were to be reported to the clergy of Connecticut, and also to the conventions of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and New Hampshire; in September the latter body adopted most of the proposed changes, with a few others, but voted that their use should be postponed till it should be seen what the Churchmen in the other States were likely to do; and at last, July 20, 1786 A.D., it was left to the discretion of the parishes to adopt the changes or to keep to the old liturgy. It is sufficient to say of these alterations that they were "in most respects identical with those contained in the 'Proposed Book,'" which will presently be mentioned. The Connecticut clergy were found to be averse to any changes, and apparently they took no action on the proposed amendments. The convention which met at Philadelphia, September 27, 1785 A.D., contained representatives of seven States to the south of New England. The minds of many of the delegates had been turned to the question of revision, and some of them were practically agreed upon the form which it should take. The Rev. Dr. (afterwards Bishop) White presided; but the chief part in the work of revision was taken by the Rev. Dr. William Smith, of Maryland. The convention adjourned on the 7th of October, after attending a service at which "the liturgy, as altered, was read." Yet the changes were not formally adopted, and probably the convention felt that it had no authority in the matter; they were only "proposed and recommended;" and it was left to a committee to edit and print the book. In the following spring (the prothonotary's certificate bears date April 1, 1786 A.D.) the book was published, it being plainly stated on its title-pages that it was "the Book of Common Prayer as revised and proposed to the use of the Protestant Episcopal Church." This is the book now known as the "Proposed Book," though many English authorities—it having appeared in two reprints—quote it as the American Book. It has no more right to the name than that of 1637 A.D. has to be called the Scotch Book, or that of 1689 A.D. the English Book.

Besides alterations made necessary by the change in the form of civil government, and certain verbal amendments, the most important differences from the English book were the following: the Absolution in the daily service was headed, "A declaration concerning the forgiveness of sins;" the Benedictus was omitted, except for discretionary use on the 31st day of the month; the Nicene Creed and the Athanasian were omitted, and the clause "He descended into Hell," was omitted from the Apostles' Creed; the Gloria in Excelsis was permitted to be used at the end of the Psalter for the day; parents were allowed to act as sponsors; the sign of the Cross might be omitted in baptism, if desired; the word "regenerate" was omitted from the latter part of the baptismal office; the marriage service was shortened, as in our present book; the form of committal to the ground in the burial service was altered to nearly its present form; the absolution in the visitation of the sick was given in the same words as in the communion office; a form for the visitation of prisoners was taken from the Irish Book of 1711 A.D.; the answer to the second question in the Catechism was changed to these words: "I received it in Baptism, whereby I became a member of the Christian Church;" the Communion service on Ash-Wednesday was discontinued, and its prayers ordered to be said after the Litany; and selections were made from the Psalms for daily use, omitting (with others) the so-called "damnatory clauses." No sooner was this proposed book published than "it was evident," as Bishop White said, "that, in regard to the liturgy, the labors of the convention had not reached their object." Though some of the Diocesan Conventions approved it nearly as it stood, New York and New Jersey did not accept it; and the English bishops, to whom application had been made for the Episcopates, wrote objecting, with grief, to the omission of two of the creeds, and the excision of a clause from the other. Moreover, the book was very unsatisfactory to the Churchmen in Connecticut. When the convocation of that diocese met on the 22d of September, Bishop Seabury, in his charge, besides expressing an opinion adverse to the merit of the changes in the services, called attention to the fact that they had been made without waiting till action could be had with the concurrence of bishops, as a thing unprecedented in the Church; and he "set forth and recommended" to the use of his people a Communion Office almost identical with that in use by the Scotch bishops, from whom he had received his consecration. A General Convention of the (so-called) Southern dioceses met in October, 1786 A.D., but nothing was done with the proposed book, except to obviate the objections of the English bishops, by restoring the Apostles' Creed, and inserting the Nicene Creed as an alternative for it. At last, October 2, 1789 A.D., the Church in this country was united in one Convention, with the Bishops as a separate house. Action was at once taken in regard to the Prayer-Book. The Bishops (Drs. Seabury and White alone were present) entered upon their work as proposing alterations in the English book. The lower house in theory considered itself as framing an entirely new book; but practically there was no difference in the matter. The Proposed Book was ignored, at least in its objectionable features. The bishops originated the review of some offices, and the lower house that of others; and all was arranged to the decided satisfaction of all concerned. And it is to be remembered that nothing was admitted into the book of 1789 A.D. which was not approved by both Bishop Seabury and Bishop White.

Almost all the changes made show that they were not adopted without consideration; those which were brought over from the Proposed Book seem to have been such as must have appeared to the minds of most men necessary to the times; and many apparently minor matters, such, for instance, as the accurate use of the words "minister" and "priest," witness to much thought before the convention and much carefulness at the time. It is not necessary to note here all the changes from the English Book. The state prayers were, of course, modified; many repetitions were omitted; verbal alterations were made in numerous places; and selections of Psalms were set forth, chiefly, as it would appear, for the relief of those who did not like to use the damnatory psalms in public worship. An alternative absolution was introduced into the daily offices; the Venite was made up of parts of two psalms; the Benedictus was shortened; substitutes for the Magnificat and the Nunc Dimittis were formed from the Psalter; the use of the Nicene Creed was made discretionary with that of the Apostles' Creed, and the Athanasian Creed was omitted; the mediæval form of absolution was omitted from the visitation of the sick, our LORD's summary of the Law was allowed to be read after the commandments in the Communion office; and an alternative Preface was allowed for Trinity-Sunday. Bishop Taylor's works furnished the revisers with the five special prayers which follow that to be used "in time of great sickness and mortality," and with the three last prayers in the office for the visitation of the sick. The service for the visitation of prisoners was taken, as in the Proposed Book, from the Irish service of 1711 A.D., that for Thanksgiving-day, from the Proposed Book itself; the Family Prayers from some which had been drawn up by Bishop Gibson, of London. But by far the most important change was that introduced through the influence of Bishop Seabury, the adoption of the Scotch form of the Prayer of Consecration in the Communion office, with a verbal modification, which was doubtless proposed by the delegates from Maryland. This form, which differs from any ever used by the Church of England, has a distinct and formal Oblation and Invocation following the words of Institution,—the primitive order, first appearing in English in Stephens's service about 1700 A.D., adopted by the Non-Jurors in 1718 A.D., and taken from them by the Scotch Church. Bishop White readily assented to the insertion of this form, and it was accepted by the house of deputies "without opposition, and in silence if not in reverence." It should be noted, perhaps, that there was a misunderstanding as to the printing of the words in the Apostles' Creed about which there had been so much discussion, but it was settled by a vote of the Convention of 1792 A.D. The new book went into use October 1, 1790 A.D. Its standard edition was established by Canon in 1820 A.D., another in 1838 A.D., another in 1844 A.D., after a most careful and valuable report from the pen of the Rev. Dr. T. W. Coit, and another in 1871 A.D., having a large number of minute changes from the former standards. Provision has been made for translations of the book into several modern languages; but the Church cannot yet be said to have a standard edition except in English.

At the Convention of 1792 A.D. an Ordinal was adopted, differing from the English chiefly in having the Litany printed by itself and also the Communion office added, with the word "Bishop" instead of "Priest" in the rubrics, and in the provision of an alternative form in the ordination of priests. In 1799 A.D., the form of consecration of a Church was added to the Prayer-Book, the service being adapted from that drawn up by Bishop Andrewes in 1620 A.D. The Articles were set out in 1801 A.D. In 1804 A.D., the office of Institution (then called Induction) was adopted, being substantially one drawn up by the Rev. Dr. William Smith, of Connecticut, and accepted by the clergy of that Diocese in 1799 A.D. The form of prayer to be used at the meetings of conventions, put into its present place in 1835 A.D., was taken in great part from a paragraph in the homily for Whitsunday. Also, in 1835 A.D., the word "right" was substituted for the word "north" in the last rubric before the Communion Service. The Bishops have from time to time, either of their own motion or at the request of the house of deputies, expressed their opinion as to the meaning of rubrics or the proper method of conducting the service. Thus, in 1821 A.D., they gave, as their interpretation of the last rubric in the Communion office, that the preaching of a sermon did not remove the obligation to read the Ante-Communion service; in 1832 A.D., they gave their opinion as to the proper postures for priest and people in the Communion office; in 1835 A.D., they advised that the customary Collect and LORD'S Prayer before the sermon be omitted, that the General Confession be said by the people with, and not after, the minister; and in 1865 A.D. a committee of their house proposed a rule as to postures in the offices for baptism and confirmation; in 1868 A.D., a like committee recommended that on Sundays being also holy-days, both Collects should be read, with the epistle and the gospel for the Sunday. The first movement in the way of securing shortened services was made by the house of bishops, on motion of Bishop Hobart, in 1826 A.D. The proposed plan was approved by the house of deputies of that year, but it was so strongly opposed throughout the Church, that the next Convention dismissed the consideration of the subject. The memorial of the Rev. Dr. Muhlenberg and others to the Bishops in 1853 A.D. asked for a relaxation for the rubrics in certain cases, and led to a declaration by that house in 1856 A.D., that the Morning Prayer, the Litany, and the Communion Service were separate services, that on special occasions the clergy might use such parts of the Prayer-Book and such lessons of Scripture as they judged to tend most to edification, and that the several Bishops might provide special services for peculiar cases. The memorial, however, led to no legislation on the subject.

In 1868 A.D., the Bishops, in reply to another memorial for greater latitude in the use of the Prayer-Book, unanimously voted that "such latitude" as was asked "could not be allowed with safety, or with proper regard to the rights of our congregations." The matter of shortened services was again discussed in 1877 A.D., and led to the proposal by the next Convention that the ratification of the Book of Common Prayer should be so amended as to give the desired liberty; but the proposal failed of adoption in 1883 A.D. Meanwhile, in 1880 A.D., a committee of seven Bishops, seven Presbyters, and seven laymen, was appointed to consider the question of alterations in the Prayer-Book "in the direction of liturgical enrichment and increased flexibility of use." The report of this committee, embodied in the "Book Annexed," was discussed in 1883 A.D., and as amended then is to come for action before the Convention of 1886 A.D. Into the details of this proposed revision it is beyond the scope of this paper to enter.

A word should be added as to the tables of lessons. Those in the Proposed Book were quite different from those in the English Book, and appear to have been proposed by Bishop White. In 1789 A.D. a new table was adopted for Sundays, but the others were taken with few changes from the Proposed Book. In 1877 A.D., the constitution having been so amended as to allow a single Convention, under certain restrictions, to make changes in the "Lectionary," permission was given to use the table of lessons adopted by the English Church in 1871 A.D., and also during Lent, a specially prepared table of lessons; in 1880 A.D., a joint committee prepared new tables both for Sundays and holy-days, and for the general calendar, the use of which was made discretionary; and in 1883 A.D., these tables, with certain amendments, were adopted in place of those of 1789 A.D.

It may be added that the provision in the Constitution, that any change in the Book of Common Prayer (the Lectionary being now excepted) shall have the approval of two successive General Conventions, having been submitted to the Dioceses in the intervening years, dates from 1811 A.D.

REV. PROF. S. HART.

Prayer, Family. There is no duty which should be more faithfully discharged than this of household prayer. It lies at the root of all household religion. And the home is divinely intended to be the true training-place in devout and holy life. No excuse, then, of inconvenience, and of hurry, and preoccupation should be allowed, but of all the duties the head of a family discharges, this of gathering the members of the household around the home altar should be most rigidly discharged. Its influence upon the household life is very marked, the extent of its sanctifying work can never be known. It sanctifies the head of the House as discharging his priestly office. It consecrates those under him. Every man is a priest in his own house was the true remark of one of our Bishops when he directed his host, a Layman, to fulfill this holy duty. It teaches the children by example and by act to believe that they are bound together in God's household. It conveys to them a part at least of the godly instruction they should receive. So careful is the Church to have this attended to that there was included in our American Prayer-Book an admirable form of Family Prayer, abridged from the Prayers composed by Dr. Gibson, Bishop of London, the famous Canonist. It should be made a conscientious duty in every household of the Church to have family prayer with all due regularity. A blessing rests upon the household whose custom it is.

Preaching. The chief public work of the clergyman as God's ambassador and His Herald. Its outward form may vary as circumstances and the needs of the times vary. But it remains as a permanent duty upon the Herald to declare the will and the offers of the Great King, and it is equally a duty upon the citizens to listen to that will and to heed the offers made to them. There is a good deal of confused and imperfect information about preaching which could be readily placed in right order if we but heeded two or three facts. The right, the duty of the Bishop and the Priest, and by special commission the Deacon also, is inalienable and it is imperative. "For though I preach the gospel, I have nothing to glory of: for necessity is laid upon me; yea, woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel" (1 Cor. ix. 16). This duty was at first exercised by the Bishop, and later by him committed to the Priest, but the responsibility was with him. It was not till much later that the Deacon was licensed to preach. But this duty considered with regard to the Laity places upon them the need of hearing, and being instructed in, the will of God, and also their right to claim this instruction. We have so placed the sermon, which is the usual form which preaching takes, at the close of the service, that its importance is overlooked.

The sermon is no part of the service proper unless there is a celebration. Anciently, while it occupied the same place relatively to the Holy Communion, it preceded all but the reading of Scripture and the few collects which were used for the mixed congregation. Then it was not preceded by a long service. It would be well that some rearrangement could be effected by which the sermon could be separated from the service and be delivered to the congregation as with all authority,—a message to them or a comment upon some part of that message. There is also another consideration: custom has compelled a sermon a Sunday and often a couple of lectures a week. While no Priest should be allowed to shirk his duty, and he would not conscientiously do so, there are frequently so great demands made upon his time and energy by Parochial work that he has no time to prepare himself fitly to deliver the message intrusted to him. Yet it is demanded of him "to say something" when he has had no opportunity to prepare "something to say." The dignity of his office, the respect due to the congregation, the honor of Him whose ambassador he is, demand that he shall take all due diligence to prepare and deliver his proclamation with the effectiveness it deserves. Apart from mere personal ability, the vast difference in the modes with which the same topics are preached to the people lies chiefly in the unreadiness of the preacher. We do not make enough of preaching, and yet we so place it that we belittle it as an office, and its effectiveness does not depend upon the nobleness proper to it as an act, but to the cleverness or ability of the speaker. There should be an effort for a better balancing of the two. This is very much in the hands of the laity, since they can, if they choose, readily have the long service dis severed from the sermon and the sermon placed in the afternoon, leaving a short exhortation—a practical "postil"—for the morning, and so permitting the clergyman to give to each service the proper tone. The accidents of the time may often make it necessary to preach a sermon upon some topic whose proper treatment may be wholly different from the tenor of the service for the day. The effect of a joyous festival service may be neutralized by the delivery of a practical sermon whose drift may be penitential. This, however, is not so generally marked. But when the Priest has to deliver a message and to enforce its commands and only half an hour to do this in, his message can hardly be delivered with full effect. The separation of the two would therefore give more time for a thorough discharge of this duty. Again, it is a matter of great importance that the layman should understand his duty in listening to sermons. At the baptism of a child the charge is to the sponsor, "and chiefly ye shall take care that he shall hear sermons." It is considered a valuable part of the instruction which the Church provides. Our Lord has also given a hint upon this duty of attending to sermons: "Take heed what ye hear. With what measure ye mete it shall be measured to you, and unto you that hear shall more be given." Our spiritual knowledge and, too, our discernment cometh from the heed

we give to our instructors. But it should also be compared with St. Paul's warning upon this very duty of preaching. Urging St. Timothy to greater zeal and thoroughness in preaching, the Apostle goes on: "For the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine; but after their own lusts shall they heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears; and they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables" (2 Tim. iv. 3, 4). An examination of the passage will throw much light upon the Church's principles, which involve both the questions how sermons should be listened to and what teachers should be heard. The Church's law upon this topic is set forth in the XXIII. Article: "It is not lawful for any man to take upon him the office of public preaching or ministering the sacraments in the congregation before he be lawfully called and sent to execute the same, and those we ought to judge lawfully called and sent which be chosen and called to this work by men who have public authority given unto them in the congregation to call and send ministers into the LORD's vineyard." And the convocation of 1571 A.D. enjoined: "In the first place, let preachers take care that they never teach anything in the way of preaching, which they wish to be retained religiously and believed by the people, except what is agreeable to the doctrine of the Old and New Testaments, and what the Catholic Fathers and ancient Bishops have collected from that same doctrine."

Prebendary (Lat. præbenda). A clergyman attached to a cathedral or collegiate Church, who enjoys a prebend in consideration of his rendering stated services. His stall is a prebend's stall, and differs from a canonry in that a canon has a right as a proper officer of the Church to share in its government. But a prebend receives an income for certain duties he is to discharge in the Church. He is appointed by the Bishop generally, but the Queen has also prebends in her gift. (Vide CATHEDRAL.)

Predestination. Election, foreknowledge, and fore-ordination are words which occur very frequently in the writings and speculations of theologians; and the subjects which they denote must occur in some form or other to every one who diligently studies his Bible or thinks on "the ways of God with man." The Bible speaks of God as foreseeing the events of history and showing, to some extent at least, the end from the beginning. It represents Him as determining certain things long before they come to pass. In some cases He has promised what was not to come about for many centuries. At other times the Bible represents Him as threatening certain evils,—as calamities or punishments that are not to be realized for many generations. All this clearly implies foreknowledge, and a purpose with power to contrast events so far and in such a way as to be able to accomplish that which He has promised or threatened. On the other hand, the writers always address men as free agents,—as choosing, or as able to choose, what they will do; they also represent them as held responsible by God for the consequences of their own acts, and thus accords with the belief and consciousness of mankind. Every one feels that he can choose how he will act, can choose the right and avoid the evil, to a large extent. And whether he is able to do in all cases what he sees to be right, and chooses to do, or would choose to do, if he could do it or not, yet he feels responsible for his choice, and experiences remorse or a sense of shame and regret for what he has done that is wrong. And in this way it comes about that there seems to be a contradiction between a doctrine of Revelation and a fact of experience, which fact is also in harmony with much of the most explicit and most emphatic teaching of Holy Scripture.

A moment's consideration must satisfy us that the subject is, in some respects at least, beyond human comprehension. God is a Being of infinite intelligence, and His "thoughts" must in many respects "be far above, out of our sight." He has Himself warned us of the danger of attempting or expecting to comprehend all of His ways, and His reasons for them. Thus He says (Isa. lv. 8, 9), "My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways My ways. For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are My ways higher than your ways, and My thoughts than your thoughts." We see an illustration of the principle, enough both to understand it and to conceive of its truth, in the comparison we can make at any time between ourselves and the children that we have under our care. With immature and undeveloped minds, their intelligence is far below our own. We understand many things that are mysterious and entirely incomprehensible to them. We know the reason for many things that must for them rest entirely upon authority and positive command. We see and know how many things are accomplished that are quite incomprehensible, and some altogether impossible to them. But we must remember that while they are as yet far below us in intelligence and power of comprehension, we ourselves are but as children in comparison of that infinite Mind who ordains and comprehends all things. If we acknowledge God to be infinite in wisdom and in power, we must admit that He has plans, and ways, and means for accomplishing them incomprehensible to us. Hence when speaking of our phase or aspect of them, it must be expected that He will say what is perfectly comprehensible to us, when we look at that aspect of the subject only. While, nevertheless, when speaking of the subject from some other point or with reference to some other phase of it, whether of doctrine or duty, He will say what, though perfectly intelligible and credible in itself, does seem inconsistent with what He had said before or on another occasion with reference to the same facts.

What we are thus expressing in our relations to God and in our study of His word, our children are constantly expressing in our dealings with them. Let us listen to them and study their thoughts and we shall be able, if not to understand the mysteries of His Providence, to reconcile ourselves to the need of walking by faith and trusting that God in His own time and way will make the mystery and seeming contradiction entirely plain. At all events, the study will satisfy us, if we are reasonable in our demands and expectations, that so long as God is in Heaven and we on earth, as He is infinite and we finite in our powers and intelligence, there must be points and statements in His revelations and commands to us that we cannot comprehend, and that if we would walk in the way that leads to God and to Heaven, we must walk in faith and wait for a fuller development and more maturity of our faculties before we can comprehend all the relations and reasons of that rule of life and way of salvation that God has provided for us. There are also several important facts that may be of use to us in our meditations and speculations on this subject. In the first place, mere knowledge of what one is doing is no interference with the liberty of the person who does it. I am writing now, and some one is standing by and sees me doing so. I intend to do something to-morrow, and my friend not merely knows this, but the very way in which the act will be done. But in neither case does his knowledge interfere with my freedom to act or not. But it is said, the future act is not certain. Whereas in the future which God predicts the acts must be certain, and so the freedom of the agent or agents that are to co-operate is so far limited. But by way of obviating this objection two things must be considered. In the first place, it would seem as though the infinity of God would preclude the element of time which comes in to embarrass the speculation as we entertain it. To illustrate what we mean, consider for a moment that each one of us is finite, we see all objects from the point where we are; one thing is on the right, and then on the left, one is before us, another is behind. But now, suppose that God is infinite and everywhere present. He will see all those objects that are around us and which appear to be around us, because we can see them from one point only, from all points at one and the same time. In relation to Him there can be no left, no right; nothing is afore another: all are embraced in His omnipresence. So too with thoughts: we are finite, we have one thought now; we had one a little while ago, and another will follow the present one. We can entertain but one thought in our minds at a time. But for the infinite mind this must be otherwise. All thoughts (for it takes up all thoughts to make up omniscience) are and must be present to His Mind at all times and all at the same time for Him. Whatever is past, present, or future to us must be present in thought or as idea at all times, and the matter of time, and time relations involving foreknowledge, predestination, prediction, and such like phenomena, must be very different in their relations to God from what they are to us, and very different from anything we can conceive or comprehend. Must not their foreknowledge in reference to God be the same as knowledge is in reference to us? We simply ask the question. It does not become us to dogmatize or to assent positively in a matter of this kind. It must be conceded to be one of "the secret things that belong unto God, while only those that are revealed belong unto us" (Deut. xxix. 29).

The second consideration is the fact that in the course of God's Providence He is often seen to work results by means which seem to us most unlikely, and (so far as human purposes and intentions are concerned) by those acts of men which were intended to produce a very different result. Of this the history of the world, as well as our own experience, are full of illustrations. We have the declaration of the Bible that this was the case in regard to the sale of Joseph into Egypt by his brethren. What their motive was we know. But Joseph says (Gen. xlv. 5), "God did send me before you to preserve life." Again, God is represented in Isaiah (x. 5 sq.) as saying of the King of Assyria, he is the "rod of Mine anger, and the staff in their hand is Mine indignation. I will send him against an hypocritical nation, and against the people of my wrath will I give him a charge. . . . Howbeit, he meaneth not so, neither doth his heart think so; but it is in his heart to destroy and to cut off nations not a few." In the case of Judas, the betrayer, and those who conspired with him to produce the Crucifixion of our LORD, we have another example. Without something of the kind the atonement would hardly have been made. But at all events, the result was far from what those who took part in it expected or desired. So, too, when at the time of our LORD's rising from the grave, the enemies of His religion bribed the soldiers that watched the grave to deny that He had risen, and afterwards straitly charged the Apostles not to preach His resurrection. They did the best they could, considering who and what they were, to put the certainty of these facts and the foundation on which the Gospel rests on a sure basis and beyond the possibility of a reasonable suspicion. We may reasonably doubt whether there could anything have been better arranged to unify the testimony of every one in and about Jerusalem in behalf of the fact of the Resurrection,—the testimony of friends and of confessed believers, and those of His avowed enemies, bent to put a speedy end to the proclamation of the Gospel. What has been actually accomplished is to make the basis of testimony on which it rests unassailable; the most certain and the most indisputable of all events that have occurred in human history or in human experience. And yet there was clearly no interposition to change the intentions of the men or to interfere with their freedom of choice; but GOD did use these acts for His purposes, to further the accomplishment of that which He had foreordained should come to pass.

In nature GOD works. From a religious point of view we must regard all its phenomena as the works of His hand, the manifestations of His will and power. He causes the sun to shine, He moves the stars in their courses and the planets in their orbits. He makes the rain to fall and the plants to grow. But in this sphere there is no freedom, no power of choice; all is foreordination. Here we can learn what will take place, and in calling it Science we may obscure, ignore, or deny the fact that it is GOD's work. But in this domain there is no conflict between what we regard as foreordination and foreknowledge; or we seem to understand it is impossible because of fore-ordination, because all things are predestined in the very constitution of physical nature. But with man and in the sphere of human action we meet with freedom and the power of choice. And it seems to us that if there is freedom or power of choice, there can be no precise foreknowledge of the act we shall choose to perform. But I think we have seen that GOD has and exercises a power over the consequences of our acts so He can bring out of them results that are very far from, and very unlike, what we had foreseen or intended they should effect. Shall we say, then, that there is no foreknowledge of the specific acts we shall perform? But only such a foreknowledge of whatever and of all that man does not perform and cannot control that He can foresee, be sure of, and predestinate results and events that make up the prominent and the controlling facts of history, as well as the prominent phenomena of human life. We can hardly venture to do this. Whenever we attempt or ask a complete solution of these questions we are assuming a power of comprehending them which a moment's consideration must show us that we do not possess. It is enough for us to know, and it is perhaps all that we can know, that GOD worketh all things according to His will, and that in doing this He often bringeth the counsel of princes to nought and maketh the wrath of man work to promote His praise. Pre-Existence of Christ. Vide ETERNAL GENERATION.

Preface. The Preface is usually restricted to describe the offering of thanks that precedes the SANCTUS. But it should also include the preceding portions. In the earlier Liturgies the portion extending from the Versicle "Lift up your hearts" (Sursum Corda) to the words "Holy, Holy, Holy," bore the name of the Preface. Taking this extension as then correct, the Versicles are preparatory steps that lift the souls of the worshippers as up the ascent of a glorious temple till the Priest begins the solemn words, "It is very meet and right and our bounden duty,"—the form in use in the East and the West. The Eastern form of the Preface is longer and more rhetorical, and it is invariable in each Liturgy. But the Western form is very short, compact, and stately, and there is a varying Proper Preface for the several great Festivals. These are in the Mozarabic Liturgy very numerous, and often of exceeding beauty; in the other Liturgies, as of Milan and Gaul, they were not so numerous nor so fine. The English Church has only retained five out of the many which originally were in her Missals, and which about the end of the twelfth century were reduced to ten. Three of these five are taken derivatively from the ancient sacramentaries of Gelasius (490 A.D.) and Gregory (596 A.D.), but directly from the Salisbury Missal, the most popular and the best of the Liturgies in use in England before the Reformation,—the Prefaces for Easter-day, Ascension-day, and Trinity-Sunday. In our American Book we have an alternate Preface besides. The Christmas and Whitsunday Prefaces appear to have been written at the time of the Reformation. The alternate form in our Prayer-Book seems also to belong to our American Fathers. They are noble compositions, containing manifold meanings in their pregnant phrases, and replete with the very loftiest spirit of prayer. None can be conceived of as better fitted to be uttered before the glorious words, "Therefore with Angels and Archangels, and with all the company of heaven, we laud and magnify Thy glorious name, evermore praising Thee and saying." Properly, and according to ancient rule, the Priest alone should make this grand oblation of praise, and then at this point the People should make their offering conjointly with him, "Holy, Holy, Holy."

Prelate. A term meaning the office of one having jurisdiction over others. The word now is synonymous with Bishop, but it is not accurate to confine it to this sense. For the authority of a BISHOP, see the word.

Præsanctified, Liturgy of. In some parts of the early Church it was not permitted to consecrate the Eucharist in Lent save on Saturday and Sunday. Therefore, as frequent communions through the week were usual, the consecrated elements were reserved, and hence the name for the service when there was a Communion: the Liturgy of the præsanctified,—that is, a Liturgic form in which the actual consecration of the elements is omitted, since this had already been effected, but in which there is the proper offering of worship, praise, and reception of the elements by the Communicants. The modern Latin practice is to omit only on Good-Friday a proper celebration. But the Greeks continue the older rule.

Presbyter. In the English Version of the New Testament it is always translated Elder. It was used by the Septuagint translators to designate the chiefs of the people, whether of the families, or of the tribe, or of the nation; they also so named the Elders who received the gift of prophecy. The word then passed into New Testament usage. One tradition says that the seventy sent forth by our LORD became the elders under the Apostles. At any rate, the institution of this rank is not recorded as is that of the deacons, but is assumed. They were placed by SS. Barnabas and Paul in every city where they gathered converts. The name Presbyter is literally "the elder;" hence one whose age invests him with respect, thence an officer, because of his experience and wisdom. The word Presbevo meant to be an ambassador (2 Cor. v. 20; Eph. vi. 20); hence the august and weighty officer of an ambassador is attached to the Eldership. It is not that the Presbyter is chosen for his gravity or worth merely, but as fit to share in the noble embassy which CHRIST has given His Apostles, and so to share in their mission. The Presbyter had also in the New Testament usage a second title, Episcopos, which was afterwards transferred and made to denote the Apostolic office of the successors of the Apostles. But there is a glory added to the title, for in the Vision of St. John's Revelation the four-and-twenty Elders crowned and enthroned are sharers with the heavenly multitude in the heavenly worship, and themselves offer a special thanksgiving, as well as join in the praises of the redeemed, and the angels to Him who sitteth upon the Throne and to the Lamb of God. This honor belongs to the order whose title is so glorified. It is by a fit instinct, then, that the word PRESBYTER is retained throughout the Church to denote the officer appointed by the Apostles to aid in their work. It has been contracted into the word Priest (vide PRIEST), but both words are in common use side by side. (Vide ELDER.)

Authorities: Bishop Onderdonk's Episcopacy tested by Scripture, Marshall's Notes on Episcopacy.

Presbyterium. The part in the church occupied by the Presbytery. The earliest arrangement placed the Bishop's throne against the Eastern wall and behind the altar, which was placed farther out. On each side were the seats for the Presbyters.

But when this arrangement was abandoned in the West,—if indeed it ever largely obtained at all there,—the Presbyterium was a part of the choir, or beyond the choir and part of the sanctuary. But in the East it must refer to the part behind the altar.

Presence of Christ. The Presence of CHRIST is manifold. He is in the Presence of Presences, the Holy of Holies, as our Intercessor, and there is His proper seat and presence. But He has promised to be in the midst of the two or three who are gathered together in His name, to be present with His Apostles to the end of the world. He is in His Church as its Head, and is in each member of the Church. In these respects He is present mystically. He is present as the giver of baptism, and as the gift of baptism. For as many as have been baptized into CHRIST have put on CHRIST. There is, then, a presence in this sacramental gift of CHRIST.

Again, He has said, this is my Body, this is my Blood, of the consecrated elements of Bread and Wine in the Holy Communion, and here, in whatsoever way He may be present, it is sacramentally. Then we may define the Presence of CHRIST to be threefold: His Proper Presence, as the SON of GOD, and as Mediator and Intercessor, at the right hand of His FATHER. His mystical presence in His Church, His Apostles, and His members. And His presence in the sacraments. (Vide REAL PRESENCE.)

Presentation of Christ in the Temple. A Feast-day, usually called the Feast of the Purification (February 2); but this is wrong, since the Feast was instituted in honor of our LORD, and so the Greek Church understands it, the title for the feast meaning the meeting,—i.e., of Simeon and Anna with the Virgin Mother and her SON. It was probably instituted by the Emperor Justinian, about 526 A.D., and was received throughout the whole Church. The Collect is from the Gregorian sacramentary, and is worthy of study as presenting so compactly the purpose of the feast. As the Epistle and Gospel are those appointed in the ancient Lectionary, the Church of England has clung closely to the old use. The Scripture for the Epistle is according to the Western use, but the Gospel (practically the same everywhere) follows the Eastern use in reading a longer portion. The change of the title from that of the "Presentation" to that of the Purification may most probably be due to the leading thought of the Purifying that our LORD has instituted here, as set forth both in the Epistle from Malachi and in the words of Simeon. (Vide CANDLEMAS.)

Presentation to a Cure. The right of the Patron, or of the person who has purchased that right, to present a clerk to the Bishop to be instituted in a cure. As parishes are founded very differently in this country, this right resides in the vestry or in those persons of a parish who may be delegated to exercise it. It cannot be too often reiterated that the Office of Institution is the fundamental law, and the proper inferences to be drawn from it, and the circumstances it presupposes, should dictate to the vestry the mode of procedure, which is too often overlooked in the usual way a rector is called and received in a parish.

Now these complex ceremonies did not owe the efficacy they possessed to any value in themselves, but solely to something they as types or shadows represented. The Epistle to the Hebrews clearly sets this forth (Heb. x. 1), and St. Paul thus puts it: "They were the shadow of things to come, but the body is of CHRIST" (Col. ii. 17). He was truly the sin-, the burnt-, and the peace-offering. His blood, shed on the cross, atones for sin; He gave Himself, and with Himself His people, a willing offering entirely to God; "He is our peace," and gives Himself to be feasted on, as the true bread of life, the wine of God; and His intercessions are the true incense offered before the Mercy-seat on High. He is also the true High-Priest, called of God; and as man and in man's behalf offering Himself the victim for man; and taking His body wounded and pierced into heaven before God, presenting it for man in atonement for sin, and therefore He is revealed in heaven as "a Lamb, as it had been slain" (Rev. v. 6). In Him, therefore, all these Mosaic sacrifices find their fulfillment and end. There is no more, i.e., no further sacrifice for sin. None other can be needed. "This man after He had offered one sacrifice for sins forever, sat down on the right hand of God." "By His one offering He hath perfected forever them that are sanctified." "Through the offering of the body of JESUS CHRIST once for all." Not once for all men, but ἐφάπαξ once only "denoting the absolute cessation of an act under the idea that it has been perfectly performed" (Heb. x. passim). In the words of the Prayer-Book: "His one oblation of Himself once offered, was a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world." The substance being come the figures are done away, the old Mosaic sacrifices are ended; they are to us of value as teaching of the true sacrifice.

II. THE PRIESTHOOD.

CHRIST is not only the sacrifice, but also the true High-Priest, "who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens; a minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man" (Heb. viii. 1, 2), "where He ever liveth to make intercession for us." In Him the Aaronic Priesthood is, if we may so say, absorbed. It came in Him to an end, for when no more such sacrifices are required, no such Priesthood is needed. But CHRIST's Priesthood is everlasting. In heaven He is the sin-offering, the whole-offering, the thank-offering, ever presented for man, and which cannot be repeated. The benefits thereof of pardon, acceptance, and communion He as High-Priest ever sent down to man by the HOLY SPIRIT. But His Priesthood is not that of the old, but of the new covenant, or rather it includes the two. "He does all that the old Priesthood could not do for the weakness and unprofitableness thereof." He adds to this the Priesthood of the better covenant in His blood, of which He is the surety; even the eternal Priesthood "after the order of Melchisedec" (Heb. vii. 21, 22), thus described: "This is the covenant that I will make with them after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my laws into their hearts, and in their minds will I unite them; and their sins and iniquities will I remember no more. Now where remission of these is, there is no more offering for sin" (Heb. x. 16, 17). CHRIST, then, is the High-Priest of the Church which is called by His name and is His body. By virtue of His one sacrifice He obtains for it remission of sins. Making it one with Himself, He offers it to God, to do His will. The true peace-offering, He gives it His own Body and Blood, to sustain its new life by this communion with Himself, as He said to His disciples, "He that eateth My flesh, and drinketh My blood, dwelleth in Me, and I in him" (St. John vi. 56).

But in accordance with God's dealings with man, in pity to his weakness, to strengthen his faith and enable him to apply for all these benefits, CHRIST has been pleased in the New Covenant, as under the Old, to appoint means of grace, outward visible signs and proofs of that which He does for us. A Priesthood was needed to minister these on CHRIST's behalf to man, and to act for man towards Himself. A Priesthood, not like that of Aaron, which was fulfilled in CHRIST, but like His own, after the order of Melchisedec. A ministry of Reconciliation, Blessing, and Peace. None the less a real Priesthood because spiritual; therefore, indeed, of a higher order than the old, with real offerings, more real and valuable than those of Aaron, because not shadows of good things to come; retaining such features of the Old Covenant as under the New are needed.

(I.) It is a REAL PRIESTHOOD. "As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you," is its commission (St. John xx. 21). Writes St. Paul: "God hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation. Now, then, we are Ambassadors for CHRIST" (2 Cor. v. 18, 20). And to the Romans he writes: "That I should be the minister of JESUS CHRIST to the Gentiles, ministering the gospel of God, that the offering up of the Gentiles might be acceptable, being sanctified by the HOLY GHOST" (Rom. xv. 16). On which Dr. Bloomfield, in his note, remarks, that he describes his ministry to the Gentiles in "formula derived from the Jewish religion, in order the more strongly to impress on the Jewish Christians the dignity of his Apostleship; calling himself, not διάκονος, a minister, but λειτουργός, a sacred minister; and saying his office is, not κηρύσσειν, to preach, but ιερουργεῖν τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, —i.e., to preach the Gospel as a Priest of the New Covenant (literally, ministering as a Priest the Gospel). So προσφορά and ἡγιασμένη, sacrificing and sanctified, a little after, are likewise terms borrowed from the Temple service."

As Ambassadors for CHRIST, called by the HOLY GHOST, His ministers represent and act for Him; as taken from among men, and chosen by men, they act for men, and thus are as truly Priests as were the Aaronic, according to the word, "For every High-Priest taken from among men is ordained for men in things pertaining to God" (Heb. v. 1).

(II.) IT OFFERS TRUE SACRIFICES. A priest must have somewhat to offer. What offering does the Christian Priesthood make?

(A) Remissory; or the Ministry of Reconciliation.—The Christian Priest makes no typical sacrifice expiatory of sin; nor does he repeat the sacrifice by offering CHRIST to the FATHER in the mass, as the Romanist pretends; but he offers to God for and with the people their confession of sins, and he declares to them officially, as from God, the remission of sins, through the sacrifice of Calvary, which remission is conveyed by the HOLY GHOST to the individual soul, according to the commission of the risen LORD, "whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them" (St. John xx. 23). He administers Baptism for the remission of sins. He offers to God for the people the memorial of the one great sin-offering, with prayer that thereby they may obtain remission of sins. Surely when the Priest, leading the congregation with penitent hearts and lively faith to the throne of grace, offers a confession of sin, and pleads by the memorial of His Body and Blood which CHRIST has commanded to be made, His one sacrifice of Himself for the sins of the whole world, this memorial and this lifting up of hands and hearts is a Priestly act, a true sacrifice, accepted by God for CHRIST's sake.

(B) Intercessory.—The Priest prays for and with the people; this takes the place of the old Incense-burning (Rev. v. 8). CHRIST receives and makes these prayers His own, offering them before the throne. As the frankincense of old accompanied every sacrifice, so the prayer of faith gives value to all Christian ministrations.

(C) Dedicatory.—The Christian Priest not only urges men to give themselves up to God, through CHRIST, but offers the sacrifice on their behalf and receives it officially on God's. This is an important feature of the sacraments. In Baptism, the minister receives the child or person, dedicates to God's service, and on God's behalf announces remission of sin, and a new birth as God's child; this is repeated in Confirmation, and renewed from time to time in the Holy Communion, in which "we offer and present unto Thee, O LORD, ourselves, our souls and bodies, to be a reasonable, holy, and living sacrifice unto Thee." Which sacrifice, we believe, is accepted by God because a voluntary one, and chiefly because presented for us by our great High-Priest in heaven, who has already atoned for its imperfections; and by His intercession makes it worthy to be received. This is a Priestly act of the most solemn nature.

(D) Eucharistic.—This is the peculiar feature of the Melchisedician Priesthood to which all others are preparatory, the offering, consecrating, and giving of the Bread and Wine, for His memorial, who said, "Take, eat; this is My Body. Drink ye all of this; for this is My blood of the New Covenant." "Do this in remembrance of Me." This the true Peace- and Meat-Offering, on which we by faith feed, as on Him, the one sacrifice, and so are in communion with God. This the true Thank-offering, "our sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving." This unites in itself the four acts of the old ritual, Remission, Intercession, Dedication, and Eucharistic,—feeding for Communion.

(E) But there is a higher feature of the Christian Priesthood peculiar to it, unknown to the Mosaic. It is under the dispensation of the HOLY SPIRIT, obtained for it by its ascended Head, in whom His promise is fulfilled, "Lo, I am with you alway." "Wherever two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." It is this gives value and efficacy to all their acts. This the special feature of the New Covenant. This is a gift from God to man, bestowed ordinarily with or by means of the ministrations of the Christian Priest. "Be baptized for the remission of sins and ye shall receive the gift of the HOLY GHOST." Thus it is connected with baptism. "Through laying on of the Apostles' hands the HOLY GHOST was given" (Acts viii. 18). Thus it is connected with confirmation. And it is in the Holy Communion that we receive CHRIST, through the HOLY SPIRIT, and by that same SPIRIT are sanctified.

It remains to show briefly that what has been said of the Christian Priesthood and Sacrifices is in accordance with the teaching of our Church, as set forth in her Communion Office.

(1) We have the humbly presenting and placing upon the Holy Table "the alms and other Devotions of the People." Then the placing upon the same "the Bread and Wine," with the prayer to God "most mercifully to accept our alms and oblations, and to receive our prayers." (2) The confession of sins by Priest and People, with the absolution, denoted a Priestly act because to be said by a Priest only. (3) The song Holy, Holy, Holy, offered by all as a sacrifice of Praise. (4) The Prayer of Humble Access, another Incense-burning. (5) The solemn special Priestly function in the solemn repetition of the LORD's words, "This is my Body," "This is my Blood," and of His acts in the taking, breaking, and blessing of the Bread; and taking and blessing of the Cup, doing this as a memorial of Him, as a showing forth of His death. (6) The oblation or offering of these "holy gifts" thus consecrated to the FATHER, in what we may call sacrificial words, "We, Thy humble servants, do celebrate and make here, before Thy Divine Majesty, with these Thy holy gifts, which we now offer unto Thee, the memorial Thy Son hath commanded us to make;" and again, "And we earnestly desire Thy fatherly goodness, mercifully to accept this our sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving;" yet again, "And here we offer and present unto Thee, O LORD, ourselves, our souls and bodies, to be a reasonable, holy, and living sacrifice unto Thee," "and although we are unworthy, through our manifold sins, to offer unto Thee any sacrifice, yet we beseech Thee to accept this our bounded duty and service." (7) The devout reception by the Priest himself, and then his delivering to the people of the Communion in both kinds. (8) The solemn Benediction in the name of the Blessed TRINITY.

Here are eight ways in which the Church, following the Ancient Liturgies, sets forth plainly the Priestly character and sacrificial acts of her ministers; uniting thus in one the Prophetic and Priestly functions. And it has been shown that for so doing she "Has most certain warrant of Holy Scripture." We are not wrong, then, in calling our Ministers true Priests, and in saying that they offer sacrifices, not figurative, but real, and none the less so because most truly spiritual. "For if the ministration of death. . . was glorious. . . How shall not the ministration of the spirit be rather glorious?" REV. E. B. BOGGS, D.D.

Primate. A synonym for metropolitan. It is a term taken from the civil government, but its bounds of power were slowly defined. The primacy was one at first of honor and of seniority, but as the Church grew and Synods became necessarily more frequent, and the presidency over them, and the right of precedence in them, more important, the Primacy which belonged naturally to the civil metropolis attached to the See of that Capital. In Africa the rule of presiding by right of seniority held, and the oldest Bishop, as in our own arrangement, was Primate of the Province. The East had a slightly different arrangement from the West; the Province was under a Metropolitan and the Metropolitans under a Patriarch. But the West later had Patriarchs distributed as numerous as in the East, and so the Metropolitans were the chief Bishops. The Primacy was created under the Carolingians to supply this defect, and the office became in one sense permanent; but as the Popes who helped to establish it found it in their way, in the matter of appeals, and as the Metropolitans did not like to have any one over them, the Primacy became but little more than titular. In the English Church the title was but little more than titular when, as a settlement of the quarrels between York and Canterbury, the Pope gave to York the Primacy of England, and to Canterbury the Primacy of all England. But latterly this Primacy of Canterbury has given the Archbishop a great deal of weight, both in England and elsewhere, and he is looked up to as the first Clergyman in England, and as having the Presidency in all gatherings of the Bishops of the Anglican Communion. But a Primacy is far different from a Supremacy. So far as the West is concerned the Primacy of the whole Church in the West could be in the Bishop of Rome, but his usurpation of the title and creation of the powers of Pope, and a consequent claim to Supremacy, has led to the forfeiture and loss of his Primacy. Papal Supremacy is inconsistent with and condemned by all the facts of a true Apostolic Primacy.

Prime. The service said at the first hour,—at sunrise. The Monastic service of the English use contributed to the office of Daily Morning Prayer the Creed, the short Litany,—O LORD, shew thy mercy upon us, etc. O LORD, save the King. R. And mercifully hear us when we call upon thee. V. Endue thy ministers with righteousness. R. And make thy chosen people joyful. V. O LORD, save thy people. R. And bless thine inheritance. V. Give peace in our time, O LORD. R. Because there is none other that fighteth for us, but thou only, O LORD. V. O God, make clean our hearts within us. R., etc. The restoration of the Versicles and Responses here given into our American Service is one of the proposals now before the Church from the Committee on the Enrichment of the Prayer-Book.

Primer. A book of Elementary Instruction. In the history of the Prayer-Book it means an elementary book upon the main points of the Faith. Several such books were published from 1527 A.D. to 1564 A.D. A very early English Primer dates from 1390 A.D., but the first that really entered into the Reformation work was Marshall's, 1535 A.D., which was apparently a private venture. It contained expositions of the Creed, LORD's Prayer, Commandments, and the Ave Maria. It also contained the offices and Hours, the Seven Penitential Psalms, the Dirige, and the commendations taken from the Roman offices. But the next Primer, "The Godly and Pious Institution of a Christian man," was a step forward, both in contents and in authority (1537 A.D.). It was called the "Bishop's Book," being authorized by the King, and having the signatures of the two Archbishops and 19 Bishops, 8 Archdeacons, and 17 Doctors of Divinity and Law. It went much further than Marshall's, though containing still some matters on Purgatory. The Primer of Bishop Hilsey, though published after his death, in 1539 A.D., had also a by-part in the coming work of preparing a New Use. It gave the basis of our present Calendar of Lessons for Sundays and Holidays, and too, so far as modifications were admitted, for our Epistles and Gospels. The King receded somewhat from the position in the Necessary Doctrine and Erudition for any Christian man (1543 A.D.). But in 1545 A.D. the King's Primer, which incorporated the Litany, which (1544 A.D.) had been ordered in English, though formed upon the model of the previous Primers, was still greater advanced, though much was yet to be effected. In the reign of Edward VI., the King's Primer was reprinted 1547 A.D., and in 1553 A.D. there was a new Primer of Private Prayers issued. This King's Primer was also the basis of Queen Elizabeth's first Primer (1559 A.D.). A second (1566 A.D.) was a good deal changed from this; altogether the Primers had a good deal to do with the instruction and preparation for the work of Reformation. They taught a far more correct doctrine, still, fell short of what was needful, and they put forth what might be called tentative forms, which paved the way for the use of the Prayer-Book. Those of Elizabeth's reign had, of course, not so much influence. After the one put forth in 1571 A.D. no more were issued. This form of instruction has since been done by the very common books of Devotion, which under other names have practically carried on the work begun by Marshall's Primer.

Primitive Church. This phrase, which is rather indeterminate, may be taken to refer to the period from the close of the Apostolic age to the holding of the Sixth General Council, 680 A.D. But in a narrower and more correct sense it may be taken to only include the Council of Chalcedon, 451 A.D. Reference is constantly made to this early period of the Church for several reasons. The government of the Church as then carried out must have been according to the establishment of it by the Apostles. Therefore all the writings of the sub-Apostolic Church are of great value in this respect. What Clement, the companion of St. Paul, and Ignatius, the convert of St. John and friend of SS. Peter and Paul, held and wrote, must much more really reflect the mind of the Apostles, and more accurately report what they did for the organization of the Church, than any inferences we can make from the letter of the New Testament. For Church polity the writings of those who conversed with the Apostles and of those of the second generation must be of far greater value than our speculations at present. Again, in doctrine, the fierce persecutions the first Christians had to endure were of service in making them cling but the more tenaciously to the doctrines of the Faith once delivered to the Saints. So what the ante-Nicene Fathers held (before 325 A.D.), their clear, simple statements and the defense made by the great doctors of the Church down to the Sixth General Council against heresies and false teaching, the writings of the great leaders in the contests of the Church, must be of worth to us in determining how Holy Scripture is to be understood. It is clear, of course, that the Fathers are valuable to us as unbiased, honest witnesses of what was held and taught and defended by them as of vital importance to the Church. They cannot dictate to us their private opinions, some of which were untenable, but wherever they consent together in testifying that such were the doctrines of the Church, they are of great value. Again, in practice, what they concur in testifying to be of Churchly practice in their day is of great importance to us.

Their mention of what the Liturgies were, how they conducted the services, how they observed Feasts, and Fasts, and Holidays, casts a good deal of light upon our own Prayer-Book, and guides us into a better appreciation of that beauty of holy worship which is our inheritance,—a historic inheritance we may not lightly part with. These great facts about the early Church, its government, its faith, its practice, enable us to judge whether what we now hold in government, in faith, in practice, is an innovation, something of a later age, an invention for convenience, or was from the first. For it is clear that any Body of co-religionists to claim to be a part of the Church Catholic must show that it has a historic continuity, that it is descended from the Church our Lord established at His Resurrection. For if it has broken the government He gave to the Apostles, or has lost the Faith He has deposited with them, it has forfeited its claim. Or if it has been formed and organized in these latter days, it is not of the ancient Faith. It has no links that bind it to the Cross of CHRIST. It has but a mushroom growth. Its definitions are only upon the basis of modern opinion.

The appeal that the Episcopal Church makes to the New Testament and to the Primitive Church is free and honest. It challenges an examination by them. What does the New Testament teach? How did Clement, and Ignatius, and Polycarp, and Irenæus, and Cyprian, and Athanasius, and Jerome, and Augustine, and Cyril receive and transmit, the one to the other, the Doctrines, and the Government, and the Worship of the Church? Upon their usages, upon their Faith, historically the English, and then her daughter, the American Church, rest their claim to a part, a living, continuous part, in the Holy Catholic Church of CHRIST. What they showed that the Church held then we hold now, what they taught as the Church's doctrine we teach now, and we do not fear the closest scrutiny into our claims by this test.

More, we desire it, we urge it. Those who have thrown away Apostolic government cannot endure it. Those who have added to the Faith shrink from it. Of all bodies of the Christian world now, the Anglican Church and her daughter Communions alone can abide by the test of the Primitive Church. She therefore makes great use of it in her controversies, and she must, upon every legal maxim, demand that Her Organization, and Her History, and Her Standards of Faith be judged by this touchstone.

Procession. It meant generally in the ante-Nicene days the going to church. But later, when Litanies were more common, the procession to the church in solemn state was used. In this the early Christians revived a custom from the pagan processions, which they did not deem contrary to their Faith.

In the church, the clergy always left the vestry in order of rank, and so formed with their attendants a procession into the Sanctuary. But these processions in use in the Church service in the East were at the reading of the Gospel, which was carried in state from the Holy Table through the side chapel round into the Sanctuary again; and also at the bringing in of the oblations which are to be used at the celebration. The Deacon has the paten placed upon his shoulder by the priest, who then takes the cup himself, and so they move out of the side chapel, which corresponds to our Vestry room, and pass through the church into the Sanctuary. In our own Church, processions in the church are directed at the consecration of a church and at the institution of a minister.

Procession of the Holy Ghost. The doctrine of the Third Person of the HOLY TRINITY regarding the mode of His Being. It is well to begin all statements of doctrine upon the HOLY TRINITY by saying that, no matter what deductions may be drawn from what we are taught, the doctrines themselves rest only upon revelation. Antecedently to revelation we can know nothing. Therefore to attempt to explain how the HOLY GHOST from all eternal proceeded from the FATHER is mere folly. "If thou dost curiously inquire how the SON is begotten and how the SPIRIT proceedeth, I will inquire of thee as curiously how the soul and the body are conjoined." (St. Gregory Nazianzen, Orat. xx.) It is a part of the Nicene Creed, being set forth and appended to it by the General Council of Constantinople, 381 A.D.: "Who proceedeth from the FATHER." In a Creed, or rather statement, of doctrine set forth by St. Epiphanius a little earlier, the same words occur: "We, therefore, believe in Him, that He is the HOLY GHOST, the Spirit of God, the Perfect Spirit, the Paraclete Spirit, the Creator, proceeding from the FATHER, and received from the SON, and to be believed." Again, the same Father saith, "Always hath the Spirit proceeded from the FATHER and received of the SON; for He is not different from the FATHER and the SON, but is from the same essence, from the same Deity, from the FATHER and the SON, with the FATHER and the SON" (Hær. 62, c. 4). The reverence of these quotations sets forth the spirit in which we must receive the statements of our LORD upon this revelation. "But the Comforter, which is the HOLY GHOST, whom the FATHER will send in My name, He shall teach you all things" (St. John xiv. 26). "But when the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the FATHER, even the Spirit of Truth, which proceedeth from the FATHER, He shall testify of Me" (St. John xv. 26).

In these texts the LORD declares the mode of the subsistence of the HOLY GHOST. But He further declares the work of the HOLY GHOST in the economy of man's redemption. He shall guide you into all truth. He shall receive of mine and show it unto you. And the HOLY GHOST, therefore, is sent by the SON. The doctrine of the Eastern Church, that He proceedeth from the FATHER and is sent by the SON, is more close to Holy Scripture. Though indeed proceeding eternally from the same self-existent FATHER, as the SON is the only-begotten of that FATHER, we may well say that they are consubstantial with the FATHER, and therefore that, as of the same eternal essence, the HOLY GHOST proceedeth from the SON also. Still, this is not so close to the Scriptures, but an inference from them, since He receives of the FATHER and the SON. This, however, does not justify the interpolation of the words "and the SON" in the Creed (vide FILIOQUE), though it does make the imploration, "O God the HOLY GHOST who proceedeth from the FATHER and the SON, have mercy upon us miserable sinners, a most proper and prevailing intercession, since by His mission from the SON He shares in our redemption. The doctrine, then, of the HOLY GHOST proceeding from the FATHER (and, too, in a Divine sense, also from the SON) is of the Faith, and is to be most religiously believed. (Vide HOLY GHOST, FILIOQUE, SPIRIT.)

Proctor. (Lat. Procurator.) An officer who represents in judgment the parties who empower him (by warrant under their hands, called a prozy) to appear for them to explain their rights, to manage and instruct their cause and to demand judgment.

The Proctors of the clergy represent them in Convocation. The Deans, Archdeacons, and Proctors of the several Chapters sat in it ex officio, but the Parsons, Vicars, and perpetual Curates in each Diocese, who alone had the right of being represented, chose two Proctors to represent them. This is in the Convocation of Canterbury. But in the Convocation of York two Proctors are sent from each Archdeaconry.

The title Proctor is given also to certain officers of the colleges who have a care over the morals and quiet of the universities.

Procuration. A compounding by a payment of money for the charges due for entertainment of a Bishop when upon a Visitation. The Procuration was not due without an actual Visitation.

Prophecy. The general meaning of the word is the foretelling events by the revelation or inspiration of the HOLY GHOST,— "who spake by the Prophets." Prophecy was a part of the economy of God the Father in teaching, first, men in general, then the Patriarchs, then by special Messengers, His chosen People, and, lastly, ourselves by the One great Prophet, JESUS CHRIST. So a prophecy was given by GOD Himself of the Deliverer, "Enoch, the seventh from Adam, prophesied" (Jude v. 14). So Noah in his blessing Shem and Japhet and in cursing Ham acted as a prophet. Abraham received direct revelations of Him who should be the Heir of the world. Isaac and Jacob were inspired with the spirit of Prophecy, in delivering their several blessings. The prophetic word was withheld till Moses was endowed with it. But through him it took a wider and deeper tone. The Spirit of prophecy gave present instructions, as in the case of the Seventy, who prophesied, but to him it was reserved to foretell the future. And here, singularly as in our LORD's own prophecy of the end of the world, Moses' direct prophecy was of the destruction of Jerusalem. With him ceased again the spirit of prophecy till the time of Samuel. In the sense of prophetic teaching there had been no great interruption, but in the higher sense of the word the gift was restored in Samuel. The power of prophecy was a gift which depended wholly upon the wisdom and purposes of the SPIRIT. The subjects of prophecy were the most varied, as may be well supposed of HIM for whose care nothing is too minute and for whose might nought is too great. They were all intended to have one aim, the preparation of the world for the coming of CHRIST, and according to the exigencies of the time in which they were delivered, so were ordered the minor accessories to this main theme.

Egypt, Assyria, Greece, and Rome, the greatest kingdoms, were prophesied of. The Edomite in his stronghold, the Moabite beyond Jordan, were warned in prophecy of their coming fate. The household of the King, the birth of a son, were all included. Wider than these was the prophecy of the last great Kingdom,—the Kingdom of the Messiah and the ingathering of the Gentiles. This we are now aiding to fulfill. The effect of prophecy upon the mind of men is deepened rather than lessened by Christianity. Few prophecies yet remain unfulfilled, but the study of prophecy and its fulfillment has but confirmed our faith in the certainty that those prophecies yet to be accomplished will not fail of a complete and literal fulfillment. The study of the prophecies has also another result. They have been so minutely carried out, even in cases where it was not apparently necessary to do so, that the devout student is led to believe in something more than the mere general inspiration of the prophet. Take Jeremiah's prophecy (Jer. li. 27-58), uttered seventy years before it was fulfilled, of the destruction of Babylon, and read it carefully and compare it with the secular accounts, and the reader will see how literally it was carried out.

The minuteness, too, of the prophecy of Isaiah of Cyrus, who was to fulfill the prophecy of Jeremiah, "That saith of Cyrus. He is my shepherd, and shall perform all my pleasure, even saying to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built, and to the temple, thy foundations shall be laid,"—for by the decree of Cyrus the work on each went so far,—is remarkable. The subject is too broad for so small a space as is allowed here. But a law of prophecy may be noted at this point.—The manifold application of prophecy. The seventy-second psalm was of Solomon, but it passed behind him and depicted the Messiah. Out of Egypt have I called my Son, was of Israel in the first place, but of CHRIST afterwards. Of Judah's blessing the full meaning could only enter in the Lawgiver SHILOH, the LORD JESUS CHRIST. And through this predictive element comes the secondary, but no less important, one of establishing our faith in the moral government of God, as well as in His ordering all things according to His purposes. For it is one thing to admit His sovereignty, and another to acknowledge the moral law of this sovereignty.

Prophecy ceased with the Revelation of St. John the Divine, and the gift has not been bestowed since upon men, nor is there any real need of it, as there is no real need now of miracles. We are now fulfilling prophecy, aiding in completing it. As our Faith is founded upon a completed prophecy for our strengthening, so for our trial, it involves a yet incomplete prophecy, which is also a part of our prayer. "He shall come to judge the quick and the dead," sums up the limit of prophecy, and the petition, Thy Kingdom come, is essentially the same thing. But there are yet several unfulfilled predictions before this consummation. The conversion of the Jew, the practical unity of the Church and the gathering of all people into it, and, it may be added, the restoration of Jerusalem to the Jew, are main points of prophecy that lie yet in the history of the future. That they may be at hand no one can assert who reads the surface signs of the times, and yet, beneath the outward course of the political and the religious world, we see and feel deeply that there is at work the power of God's Spirit, which at any time can bring about their completion. And, too, it must be remembered that He who combines all things to work together for good, doeth it for the greatest good of the greatest number, and, too, knoweth when men's hearts are best prepared to receive His acts. There is a mercy in the very delays in the accomplishment of the prophecies.

Prophecy. In the New Testament this word usually means the public instruction and the worship rather than prediction. There were prophets, of course, in the Apostolic Church endowed with the knowledge of the future. Such was Agabus. It was more nearly our modern idea of preaching than that which we understand by Apostolic preaching. The Apostles were heralds, and so proclaimed the Gospel to all men,—its terms of mercy and its grand inclusiveness. But other subordinate officers could very properly resume these subjects and enforce them in the congregations of the faithful, and could urge the obligations of that holy religious life and the lofty morality of the Gospel. Prophecy was a gift, a charisma, and treated as such, as being especially suited to the needs of a new work. The possessor of it was treated with special consideration, and yet it happened that his conduct would lead to others slighting the usefulness of the charisma. Directions upon this are given very fully by St. Paul in the fourteenth chapter of 1 Corinthians and elsewhere. It is extended by some expositors to include the singing of the worship.

Prophet. The prophets of the Old Testament were nearly all in some way or other prophets of CHRIST. If not in word yet in type, as in the case of Jonah, whose prophecy is yet a history, whose history was a type of our LORD, and whose sole prophecy in the short sentence, "Yet forty days and Nineveh shall be destroyed," led to that repentance on the part of the Ninevites which has become the pattern of all preaching of repentance. Some of the prophets only appear once and then disappear from the sacred record,—a single message apparently, and then the messenger is discharged. Others again, as Elijah, bore a very prominent part in the political history of the nation. Elijah was the type of St. John the Baptist, who came in the power and grand sternness of the older prophet. But it is true that nearly all of those of whom any continuous account is given were in some way instruments in the preparation of the nation for the coming of the MESSIAH. Of these, the leading prophets, Moses, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, are the chief. Isaiah is indeed so full that he is called the Evangelical prophet. Next in extent of the prophecy, but not by any means less important in the contents of his prophecy, comes Daniel, then Jeremiah, and then Ezekiel, and, lastly, Moses. But it is to be understood that this ranging of them is only in the number and extent of their prophecies, for we may note that Moses gave but one principal prophecy of CHRIST, and that one which only describes his prophetic office; and yet so deep was the prophecy fixed in men's memory, that when St. John the Baptist began his preaching he was asked, "Art thou Elijah, art thou that prophet?" and of CHRIST, very many rightly believed that He was that prophet. They exercised a general advisory power. Ahijah, Elijah, Elisha, Isaiah, Jeremiah, are notable instances of this, and this office of advice, warning, and of authoritative interference was very seldom resented. The career of Elijah was very remarkable, as exercising a singular influence at a marked period of the history of Israel.

Was it necessary that the prophet should know the full extent and importance of his prophecy? That could hardly be. He was but the messenger, and did not need to know the import of his message. It was enough if he delivered it accurately, and in fact, there were many things to prevent his full conception of the prophecy. It was not in the Jew to realize all that was meant by the reception of the Gentile into the Covenant. He could not realize the conditions under which it afterwards became possible and passed into history; as now we cannot realize how the Jew is to be restored, for we cannot forecast accurately the political conditions under which alone it can be effected. All we know is that it surely will be. Again, while the prophets all contributed to the sum of the prophecies on the Messiah, they did not do so in sequence. After the prophecy of the person of the Messiah was clearly established, then each of the prophets had some special trait in His mission or person to describe. One gives one point, another a different one, but they all spake as that one HOLY SPIRIT gave to them, who was at the same time ruling and overruling the political and social development of men. They spake not of their own will, nor proclaimed their message as they pleased, but with a wisdom given from the HOLY GHOST they unfolded for us visions of the things yet to be, speaking only of those things which were revealed to them alone by God for our sakes.

The Jews grouped their prophets in the second of the triple division they made of the sacred books, the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms. It is well worth adding that there can be no parting asunder of these as if they had no bonds. The Law contained prophecies, the Prophets illustrated and enforced the Law. The Psalms, in the service of the Law, repeated the Prophecies and offered them in solemn worship to God. Comparing several accounts and only giving central dates, we may suppose that the prophets would fall into something like this order: Hosea, 740 B.C. Joel, 800 B.C. Amos, 787 B.C. Obadiah, 877 B.C. Jonah, 840 B.C. Micah, 722 B.C. Isaiah, 758 B.C. Nahum, 660 B.C. Habbakuk, 630 B.C. Zephaniah, 630 B.C. Jeremiah, 600 B.C. Ezekiel, 580 B.C. Daniel, 580 B.C. Haggai, 520 B.C. Zechariah, 520 B.C. Malachi, 430 B.C. This is probably as nearly correct as any arrangement that can now be made of them, since for two or three of them there is not sufficient indication or allusion to enable us to ascertain more than the approximate date at which they prophesied.

We must refer to the Commentaries and to Smith's Bible Dictionary for more extended information upon this most deeply interesting subject, since the questions that could be discussed are too many, and would lead us too far aside our purpose to permit them to be introduced here. (Horne's Introduction, Fairburn's Prophecy: its Nature, Functions, and Interpretation, Lee on the Inspiration of Holy Scripture, Keith on the Prophecies,—a good book, but needing revision and addition.)

Propitiation. The word occurs but twice in the English version (Rom. iii. 25; 1 John ii. 3). But the doctrine is of the foundation of our Faith. It means "the price of expiation," the "expiatory offering," and perfectly represents the verse in Hebrews, "He entered in once into the Holy Place, having obtained eternal redemption for us" (Heb. ix. 12). St. John uses the Greek word signifying Propitiation, the act or effective cause of God's being appeased, twice: once in the Comfortable words, and again in 1 John iv. 10, putting there the act for the actor, and so identifying, as is often done in Holy Scripture, the responsibility of the actor for the act. But St. Paul uses the word that signifies the mercy-seat, which word is of the same root as the one St. John uses. And St. Paul, by this word official, technical, identifies our LORD's entrance into the Presence of Presences with the sacrifices of the day of Atonement, and with the entrance of the High-Priest into the Holy of Holies, and the sprinkling of the mercy-seat beneath the Cherubim with the blood of Atonement. In CHRIST is our covenant. His Law of Liberty is the interpretation of the Law on the Tables (2 Cor. iii. 3), and He is our Mercy-seat (cf. Rom. iii. 25, with Lev. xvi. 12, 13). Those types, then, that had to be themselves separated were combined by ritual into one act, as Aaron the Priest, with the Blood of the sin-offering, made atonement upon the mercy-seat. All these separate types meet in CHRIST, who is our High-Priest forever, making an atonement with His own blood, and is the Mercy-seat, the Propitiatory from which forgiveness is given to us. All these ceremonies centre upon Him who is our Advocate and our Propitiator.

Prosa. Upon the close of the singing of the Alleluiah the voice dwelt upon and prolonged the cadence; this cadence later had words placed to the notes, and hence these were called a Sequence, or a Prosa. This custom dates from the ninth century. The words which were set to these cadences were often very beautiful and noble hymns. The Veni Creator Spiritus, Lauda Sion, and Dies iræ, are Sequences, since they were written to the music of the prolonged cadence of the Alleluia.

Protestant. The word Protestant came from the Protest of those Princes who protested at the II. Diet of Spire (1529 A.D.) against the revocation of a resolution of the I. Diet of Spire (1526 A.D.), which had granted to each Prince authority to regulate the ecclesiastical affairs of his jurisdiction until a General Council could be summoned. They protested against the breaking of the agreement, and warned the Emperor of the troubles which would follow. This is the origin of a term which has been wholly changed in its application to modern Christian bodies. If used simply to declare that the Church protests against error of every sort, it is proper enough. The Church of God protests against sin. She protests against heresy. She protests against false doctrine. She protests against usurpation. She protests against innovation. In this sense the Church must be protestant, and in no other. But when the term is made to include all who may be protestants against some doctrine they may fancy is wrong, and who claim it simply because they are not Romanists, then the term is misleading at least. Any body, of those who profess and call themselves Christians, that chooses, may protest against true doctrine, against ancient practices and worship, and claim to be Protestant. The Church cannot permit herself to be herded with these. The word is so extended as to mean principally those who hold mere negations of the Faith. It does not mean now an intelligent repudiation of Roman error and Papal usurpation, and an equally intelligent and earnest defense of the Catholic Faith and the Divine institution and authority of the Church. In these things the Church stands upon essentially different ground from the Protestant bodies around her, and Her position, which is perfectly clear and sound, seems to many even of Her own members to be anomalous and contradictory. It is not so, but it is rather the reverse. Under the title CHURCH the foundation of the Church has been set forth, and to that we refer for information, and it must follow that to be true to Her LORD, to the deposit of the Faith He has given Her, and to Himself as His Body, she must teach positive truth. Therefore, as controversies and attacks upon Her vary, so Her position, ever the same, needs varying defenses. The protest against Rome has given Her Her title; but she as truly protests against the negations, now popular, the paring away of the faith, the shrunken defenses of doctrine, the casting away of ancient rites and worship among those who delight to call themselves Protestants.

Protevangeliion. An apocryphal Gospel attributed to St. James. It was brought from the East by Protulus, who translated it from the Greek.

Prothesis. In the Eastern Church, (a) the room in which the elements are prepared for the Celebration. It is partly a vestry room and partly a chapel, and varies in the different churches. In some it is really the Credence-table of the Western. In more costly and magnificent churches it is a chapel.

(b) The office of the Prothesis. It appears that the idea of the office was taken from the Tabernacle service, when the Table of the Shewbread was ordained. It is a solemn preparation of the elements in the Chapel, or at the Side table, in quite a long service, after which the elements are taken in procession through the holy doors to the Altar. This service is of great antiquity, as it is alluded to in St. Cyril's Catechetical Lectures delivered in 380 A.D. in Jerusalem, as if then it was a customary part of the service.

Prothonotary. The chief of the notaries or scribes, the ecclesiastical officers who had various duties connected with collecting and registering the facts of Church affairs, often the recording the acts of the martyrs, the notes to be made of synodal decisions, the transcribing and preserving records, and similar functions. They were chiefly attached to the Church at Constantinople. They often discharged the double function of Registrars and Historiographers.

Prototype. The pattern upon which a thing is formed. Moses received the prototype of the Tabernacle from heaven. But the term has a theological sense, which removes it far above such a material use.

Adam was formed upon the prototype of the image of God. It is, then, a very important term, since it relates to our redemption in CHRIST. It has a bearing upon our LORD'S Human Nature, upon our Likeness in soul and body to Him, upon His restoring us, broken and tainted with sin, to His own likeness and righteousness, upon our immortal condition hereafter. How far have we fallen from that form in which we were created? What gulf lies between us and that prototype, the Image of God? and has that gulf been bridged by our LORD? The Scriptures are very explicit on some points, but totally silent on others. Man was formed after God's image. But in what way we wear that glorious Image we cannot now know, for God is a Spirit, and the conditions and Image of a self-existent Spirit we cannot understand. But as to our restoration in CHRIST the Scriptures are equally explicit, and it was their purpose and office so to be. CHRIST is the very Image of God, in the form of God, the Image of the Invisible God, and took upon Himself the form of a servant for our sakes. He became man, and the prototype became a partaker of the nature of the type, and He by this act bound Himself to us and us to Him for our restoration. He is in us, in a real, true, restoring sense. By our transfiguration (cf. Rom. xiv. 2, and St. Matt. xvii. 2d) we are restored to that archetype, a restoration which will not be completed till the body and soul shall be re-joined at the resurrection. But the means thereto given us are many, and pertain to every form of our bodily and spiritual life. Our baptism is a new birth. Our confirmation is the sanctification of our bodies and souls as Temples of God. Our Services in His House place us in the gleam of His glorious presence. Our absolutions are constant restorations to His favor. Our communions the medicine of the soul and body now, and the food for our future restoration. Our benedictions put His holy name upon us. So that in the Holy Church we have the means and graces given us for a renewing, a remoulding, a transforming of ourselves in heart and will, in soul and body, till we be completely restored to that prototype in the splendor of the Image of God in which we were created.

Proverbs. The collection of pithy, wise sentences into a single book. The word proverb has several meanings, of "by-word," "sharp saying," often witty, sometimes sarcastic, always containing a practical truth. Some proverbs have grown up among the people, some have been framed as maxims by men having deep insight and knowledge of human nature. Some have been framed of utterances which had originally no connection with proverbial wisdom. The proverb may contain a half truth and so mislead, were it not counterbalanced by some other proverb which contains its correlative.

PROVERBS, the Book of Proverbs, is usually and hastily attributed as a single composition to King Solomon. The express statements in the thirtieth chapter, "The words of the son of Jakeh," and in the thirty-first chapter, "The words of King Lemuel, the prophecy that his mother taught him," at a glance show that it must have received at least these two appendices; but turning to chapter twenty-five we read, "These are also the proverbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah, King of Judah, copied out." And again, the tenth chapter begins briefly the Proverbs of Solomon. We find, then, at least five collections of proverbs, made at different times,—the first (ch. i.-ix. 18) claimed by Solomon; the second (ch. x.-xxiv. 34) briefly headed as his; the third (ch. xxv.-xxix. 27) collected by the men of Hezekiah, and so far the whole bears Solomon's name, but the other two appendices (ch. xxx. and ch. xxxi.) are by different men. Who Agur and King Lemuel were cannot be known, whether mere names placed there by the composer, or whether they were men living later than Hezekiah. But it is far more devout and reasonable to suppose that they were really men, for Holy Scripture does not need to borrow fictitious names to commend its writings. The Rabbins say that these were pames of King Solomon. It has also been claimed that only the second section (ch. x.-xxiv.) can be Solomon's, since it is in a different style from the first. But the first verse is decisive of this, and the argument from style is a very doubtful one. There may be such marked disagreements in style that we cannot certainly know that the composition under criticism could have been the work of the alleged author, but there is always something in and under the style itself, the tone of thought, which is determining. Hence from the very variety of the subjects discussed no such criticism can hold good. The Book of Proverbs, then, is principally by King Solomon with these additions. Its contents, then, can be grouped into the five divisions pointed out above. The first is a description of true wisdom, beginning with the precept which runs through the whole of the Bible, "The fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge" (Prov.), "of wisdom" (Psalm), and ends with a splendid description of wisdom, which can only have its personification in CHRIST, and points in the closing verses with a terribly significant warning against the strange woman whose guests are in the depths of Sheol. The second section is made up of sententious, pithy verses, short, pointed, and clear, composed in the style of poetry, so common among the Jews, which brings out the antithesis of the thought, for example:

"A wise son maketh a glad father:
But a foolish son is the heaviness of his mother."

These proverbs are so simple and transparent in language that they seem as though they need hardly to be uttered, yet in their very simplicity there is a depth of insight which can only come from one who, however he misused it for himself, yet had received wisdom from on high. There are half truths uttered here and there, but there is always its correlate at hand in an apparently contradictory proverb. As in the well known proverb (Prov. xxvi. 4, 5), "Answer not a fool according to his folly, lest thou be also like unto him;" which is balanced by "Answer a fool according to his folly, lest he be wise in his own conceit." There are other contradictory proverbs, which led some of the Rabbins to doubt if the books were canonical, but the decision was characteristic. And even the Book of Proverbs they sought to make apocryphal because its words were contradictory the one to the other. And wherefore did they not make it apocryphal? The words of the book Koheleth (Ecclesiastes) are not apocryphal, we have looked and found the sense: "here also we must look." It is a mark of the Solomonic writings that they are contradictory. But is not that the result of his strange contradictory career? Wise above all others, and using his divine gift wrongly, plunging into all human knowledge, and so into the depths of the double sins of pride and idolatry, his proverbs must have the same contradictory nature in them. It is objected that some proverbs are those of a man of business, or of a householder, or of an ordinary citizen, of a keen observer of, but not participant in, politics, and surely a king could not so write. The objection is strange, for if there are given proverbs upon all these ranks and businesses, they should be in the true line of the character represented, and one like King Solomon, able to stand apart and criticise himself as in Ecclesiastes, could surely write wise sayings from these several stand-points.

There are about fourteen quotations in the New Testament from this book. Our LORD quotes it once, but in a form which also occurs in the Law; St. Paul seven times, with probable allusions elsewhere. St. James four times; St. Peter four times; St. John once, in his first epistle. For us this establishes the authority of the Book upon indisputable grounds. It was read in the public services of the Church; and in the Calendar of our own Prayer-Book it is read both through the month of August in the daily service, and it is appointed for the Sundays after Trinity, beginning with the twenty-third.

Providence. Providence means foresight. The term is generally used in a religious sense to signify God's care over all things which He has made. The idea was not unknown to the heathen world. We see it in Homer's golden chain reaching from heaven to earth. Cicero speaks of the providence of the gods. While Natural Religion gives some idea of the providence of God, His care, as opposed to blind Fortune and mere accident, is especially shown in the Word of Revelation. God controls all things so as to promote the highest good of the whole.

"The Providence of God displays omnipresence, omniscience, omnipotence, holiness, justice, and benevolence." The telescope shows God's wonder-working power in the heavenly bodies, while the microscope discloses new beauties in the vegetable kingdom and "the insect world." If nature could work of herself, then, as Sir Thomas Browne says, "let our hammers rise up and boast that they have built our houses, and our pen receive the honor of our writings." The mechanic preserves the object of his skill, the parent guides the child, so God preserves the universe. "By the word of the LORD were the heavens made" (Ps. xxxiii. 6). "The LORD looketh from heaven; He beholdeth all the sons of men" (ver. 13). The regularity of the seasons shows a governing Mind. In moral life, the blessings of the righteous and the punishments of the wicked display the working of God's hand. The final result will be seen at the Judgment-day. God's care over the preservation of His Sacred Word and His Holy Church, and His dividing the nations of the world according to His will, and then condescending to number the hairs of man's head, and watch the sparrow's fall, and paint the lily, are indications of the extent and minuteness of His Providence. The xci. Psalm narrates how God specially watches over the righteous, and gives them in charge of His angels. In the magnificent civ. Psalm all creation waits upon Him, and He opens His hand, and fills all things with good. In God "we live, and move, and have our being" (Acts xvii. 28). In Hebrews i. 3, we behold God in the Person of CHRIST, "upholding all things by the word of His power." St. James in his Epistle (chap. i. 17) assures us that "every good gift and every perfect gift is from above." Even afflictive dispensations may be a part of God's providence, and end in good, as seen in the cases of Job, and in the history of Joseph's humiliation and exaltation. In losses by death, where human judgment is puzzled.

Even handicraft is to be traced to God's providence. Bezaleel was filled "with the spirit of God, in wisdom" to do the work of the Tabernacle, as well as his companions (Ex. xxxi. 1-6). Of the plowman it is said that "his God doth instruct him in discretion" in breaking the clods and casting in the wheat (Isa. xxviii. 24-29).

The Christian idea of Providence is that all things, great and small, are under the ceaseless care and guidance of God. That while He calleth the stars by their names (Isa. xi. 26), and hath established the earth (Ps. cxix. 90), still, He humbleth Himself to hear the prayer of every fainting heart, and even the cry of the young raven (Job xxxviii. 41).

If God guides great events, small affairs must be also in His hand, for from apparent trifles great things proceed. The doctrine of a general Providence must imply that of a special one, though man is not always able to trace the "footsteps of God marching through time."

Provinces. When our LORD ascended up on high, He did not leave His entire authority with St. Peter, telling all the other Apostles that they should render implicit obedience in all things to him,—which is the Papal theory; but He said, "As My Father hath sent Me, even so send I you" (in the plural); and "Lo, I am with you (plural again) always, even unto the end of the world." The entire Episcopate, therefore, could it be assembled and speak unitedly, would be to us as the Voice of the HOLY GHOST Himself ("it seemed good to the HOLY GHOST and to us." Acts xv. 28). The definitions of the undisputed General Councils are substantially such utterances, and therefore they are of œcumenical and perpetual authority. Now there are only three possible theories in regard to the exercise of Episcopal power: 1st. That the Pope is the sole real Bishop, the others being only his deputies, and subject to his arbitrary power. 2d. That each individual Bishop has all power within himself, with no liability to correction or restraint from any other; which would make as many Popes as Bishops, and render real unity impossible. 3d. That the power is in the Order, the authority of each individual being inseparable from that of the Order, and every official action, therefore, being amenable to the superior authority of the Order, whenever called in question by any. This is simply St. Cyprian's famous rule: "Episcopatus unus est, cuius a singulis in solidum pars tenetur." In matters of ordinary occurrence it would be entirely impracticable to get the judgment of all the Bishops in the world, and therefore the Catholic Church has, from the earliest antiquity, been subdivided into portions of convenient size, so that, in each, there might easily be joint action in the ordinary administration of Church discipline. In ascertaining the boundaries of these, the Church—having exactly the same reasons as the State for seeking convenience of action—uniformly accepted the State division of Provinces, conforming her ecclesiastical organization to the lines laid down by the civil government. Each Province had a number of Bishops and Dioceses,—seldom less than four or five,—often as many as fifteen or twenty. They were numerous enough to continue the Apostolic Succession of the Bishops in case of any vacancy; and, to show their essential equality, it was the rule that whenever there was a vacancy in their chief See, the other Bishops of the Province should unite in consecrating their own Metropolitan.

The chief Bishop of the Province was, almost without exception, the Bishop of the Metropolis, or chief city, and therefore he was styled Metropolitan. The assembled Bishops of the Province represented the original College of the Apostles, and there was no ecclesiastical matter whatsoever, arising within the Province, which might not be appealed to their decision, from any part of the Province whatsoever. And no question could be carried out of the Province, to be settled elsewhere, unless perchance it was a question of Faith. Moreover, the assembled Bishops of the Province formed a Provincial Synod, with power to make Canons (subject to those of National or General Councils); and no single Diocese had any power of the kind. Where a nation was of small extent, or few in population, there might not be room for more than one Province within its bounds; and in that case the Province and the National Church were identical. But when the Nation was larger, it was subdivided into two or more Provinces, and all these Provinces, united, formed the National Church. And each National Church was organized under its own Chief Bishop, in accordance with the 31st of the Apostolical Canons:—"It is necessary that the Bishops of every Nation [ἐκκλησιῶν ἑθνῶν] should know who is chief among them, and should recognize him as their head by doing nothing of great moment without his consent," etc. In the Church of Scotland, which is small, there is only one Province, and that Province is therefore the National Church. In England there are two Provinces, Canterbury and York, and it takes both of these, united, to make the National Church. In this country we began, like Scotland, with Church people few and feeble. Our one Province was our National Church. As a Province of the Holy Catholic Church, our Provincial Synod (which we call the GENERAL CONVENTION) has all the powers belonging to the ancient Provincial Synods, which it may choose to exercise. As to Doctrine, it is bound to accept, and does accept, the definitions of the Faith as set forth by the undisputed General Councils. As to Discipline and Worship it inherits, through the English Branch, the entire system of the Holy Catholic Church, with the alteration of such minor details as local circumstances may require; but its decisions on these points are not subject to the revision of any other authority. The erection and subdivision of Dioceses, the election and confirmation and consecration of Bishops, the ordination of Priests and Deacons, the entire legislation on Worship and Discipline,—this, or as much of it as may seem advisable, is inherently in the hands of the General Convention, as being a Provincial Synod and a National Church, all in one. Our Presiding Bishop is recognized as our Chief Bishop, in full accordance with the 34th of the Apostolic Canons.

But as our one Province has grown till it covers the immense territory of the United States, with sixty or seventy Bishops in the Provincial Synod, the conviction is being forced upon the minds of thoughtful men that we must have something intermediate between the General Convention and the single Diocese. Parts of the ancient work of a Province have become impossible with us. Anciently, the Provincial Synod was required to meet twice a year, so as to hear promptly all appeals from any quarter that might be sent up. But our General Convention, having associated large numbers of clergy and laity with the Bishops, for better legislative action, has, from the first, felt itself disqualified for the exercise of Appellate powers, and we have been without any appeal whatsoever. Moreover, at first, the territory of an entire State was included in each Diocese. This was in accordance with the general practice of the Catholic Church, in accepting civil divisions as the proper boundaries of Ecclesiastical jurisdictions. But as the larger Dioceses have needed subdivision, this original principle has been unwisely departed from. New York has now five Dioceses, each of which is as independent of the other four as if New York had been subdivided into five separate States. The proper remedy for this is, not to abandon the subdivision of our larger Dioceses,—which is becoming more necessary every day,—but to understand that, with a National Church so extensive as ours is now, our original identity of a National Church with one single Province is outgrown: and while our General Convention remains as the voice of our National Church, we must have the organization of many separate Provinces in subordination to that chief authority. This cannot be done by one sudden, transforming act: it must come by gradual growth. It cannot come by arbitrarily binding together a number of Dioceses, each (from its foundation) embracing an independent State. In their Ecclesiastical arrangements of Provinces (or what occupy the practical position of Provinces) State lines have been ignored by Roman Catholics, Presbyterians, Methodists, and others. But that which is so peculiar and indestructible a feature of our National life must not be disregarded by the Church of America. The true remedy, therefore, is to look forward to the time when each State (with perhaps two exceptions) will become a Province. Illinois, with its three Dioceses of Chicago, Quincy, and Springfield, has already become a Province, name and thing, with its Provincial Synod and Court of Appeal. New York and Pennsylvania show that they are contemplating something of the same sort. In this form the change will be gradual, one State after another coming into line, as it is ready. The easiest way to accomplish the result will be for a State Diocese to subdivide, at the first, into three or four Dioceses, continuing over its Diocesan Convention with only one change in its Constitution; and that is, that whenever a question is taken "by Orders" the Order of Bishops—of whom there will then be three or four—shall have a separate and coordinate vote.

The entire power of legislation (subordinate to that of General Convention) should eventually be left in the hands of these Provincial Synods. The legislation of one small Diocese is so commonly the reflection of the peculiarities of its own Bishop for the time being, that it cannot win a sufficient solidity for permanent effect. But legislation by a group of Dioceses, all springing from a common source (the original State Diocese), and with a separate approval of the Bishops as an Order, and with a Provincial Court of Appeal to enforce that legislation by a consistent treatment in actual cases: all this would add effectiveness and stability to every part of our Church system. When there was a cheap and easy remedy provided (in the Court of Appeals) for any possible abuse, it would be safe to trust the Bishops with much more of administrative power. Until then it would not be safe. Let us look ahead a few years, then, and see how a proper Provincial System would appear in action. Each large State (at least) would be a Province, having four or more Dioceses,—some, perhaps, from ten to twenty Dioceses. Each Diocese would have all the rights it has at present, except that of making and altering Constitution and Canons. It would elect its own Bishop, Secretary, Treasurer, Standing Committee, Deputies to General Convention, etc., and conduct its own Diocesan Missions. The Provincial Synod, containing all the Bishops of the Province, and clerical and lay members in proportion to the numbers of clergy and communicants in the Dioceses respectively, would have the sole power of legislation, subordinate to that of General Convention. The support and government of Educational and Charitable Institutions, and some organization by which the weaker parts of the Province might be helped by the stronger in the work of Home Missions, would also form subjects for Provincial action. The Court of Appeals would furnish a ready remedy for any grievance or abuse occurring anywhere in the Province. For all purposes except legislation, there might be a temporary union of State Dioceses to form a Province. But it should be essential to any such temporary arrangement that any State Diocese should, ipso facto, become a Province as soon as it had three or four Dioceses of its own. In each Province, the Bishop of the chief city—consecrated by the other Bishops of the Province—would be the Metropolitan or President of the Province; and when the Dioceses in a State were sufficiently numerous, the rights of confirming and consenting to the election of a Bishop, and the erection of new Sees, now exercised by the entire American Church, should be secured solely to the Province concerned. The General Convention should be left undisturbed just where it is now. Once in three years is not too often for it to meet. And every Bishop should attend, and every Diocese should be represented in both orders. In all probability by that time each Diocese would be content to send only one or two deputies, instead of four of each Order. And the General Convention might, of its own accord, reserve to itself all legislation on intercommunion with other branches of the Church, all decisions on Doctrine, all legislation on the Prayer-Book and Ritual, and some chief points of Discipline, leaving all other matters to the Provincial Synods. But even these possible changes are no necessary part of the Provincial System, which might be carried into effect, leaving General Convention entirely unaffected. The change needed is to be wrought by elevating the State Dioceses into Provinces, and not by interfering with General Convention in any way.

Provision. A usurped intrusion of the Pope upon the right of patronage to Ecclesiastical Benefices in England. It was an arbitrary intrusion, placing Italian clerks into English cures which they never saw, but from which they drew the revenues. It was stoutly resented by the Laity, and the statutes of provisors made under Edward III. (1355 A.D.) and Richard II. (1385 A.D.) followed with some success the ingenious devices for evasion by the Canon lawyers of the Roman Curia. Still, the Pope retained the power to set aside the canonical rights of the Ecclesiastical patrons, and to present to Benefices in their gift mero motu. Of course all this was stopped at the Reformation.

Psalms, The. The Psalms are sacred poetry, although they do not have the poetical form usually recognized in modern times. They have the peculiar form of Hebrew poetry, which contained what may be styled "thought rhythm" or "parallelism."

The sentiment is so distributed that, as thought succeeds thought, it is connected with what precedes. Sometimes the links of connection are arbitrary, and sometimes they depend upon the repetition of a word or its antithesis.

The use of poetic imagery is common as in modern poetry, and the language of emotion largely prevails.

The Psalms treat of a great variety of topics. They were written not all at once nor by one author, but during a period of some centuries. They reflect the sentiments of their authors in that they were the outpourings of their hearts. It is this latter quality which makes them so well suited for the expression of our own religious feelings. Love, joy, hope, trust, sorrow for sin, fear, and some others are common, or may be common to all, and hence a man to-day may adopt the expressions used by him who lived many centuries ago.

They are especially valuable now in the expression of Christian experiences, inasmuch as they are the productions of men inspired by the HOLY GHOST, and were designed to be of permanent value and of lasting use. While they were true as the outpouring of the soul's emotions when written by David, or Ethan, or Asaph, they are equally true if they become the soul's expressions to-day. They set forth such and such things as true and in the connections when they were first composed, but beyond this they have a meaning which they were intended to have for later generations of men.

Many versions of the Psalms have been made. The most prominent are the Septuagint, the Vulgate, the English, and the German, besides the translations into all the dialects of men. Vast stores of learning have been used in the elucidation of their meaning, and in the tracing up of their history, and with many a devotional writer they have been the favorite study.

They have helped to quicken the devotions of the private Christian, and to swell the praises of the great congregation. The most earnest and pious students of sacred lore have regarded them as a treasury whence may be gathered precious truths concerning CHRIST and His Church which GOD the HOLY GHOST has inspired. Many holy and learned expositors have striven humbly, but earnestly, and with deep faith to search the Psalms for the things which speak of the Heavenly Bridegroom and His Bride, and have found beneath the references to Israel and David, and the most common things, hidden allusions to One greater than all, and have brought sweetness out of the carcass of the lion slain by the wayside.

Among the many questions of interest which are suggested by the study of the Psalms are those which relate to their Canonical Position and Titles, their Authorship, their Occasions, their Use in the Jewish Service, their Exegesis, their Prophetical Character, their Poetical peculiarities, and the Musical references attached to them.

Of their use in Christian Worship, and their Christian Adaptations, something will be found under the heading "THE PSALTER."

The Psalms may be grouped under six general heads. Below will be found the names of the groups, with some illustrations under each.

1st. Prayer and Penitence.—Psalms vi., xlv., cxlvi., cxlvii., cxlviii., li., lxi., lxv., cii., cix., cxl.

2d. Thanksgiving.—ix., xviii., xxii., lxxv., cxxiv., cxxix., cxxxv., cxxxvi., cxlix.

3d. Adoration.—xxiii., xxxiv., c., civ., cxl., cxxxix., cxlvii., cl.

4th. Instructive.—i., v., vii., ix., lxxxiv., cxix., cxxviii., cxxxiii.

5th. Prophetical.—ii., xvi., xxii., xl., xlv., lxviii., lxxii., lxxxviii., cx.

6th. Historical.—lxxviii., cv., cvi.

Commentaries upon the Psalms are numerous. Among the most valuable are Bishop Horne's, Isaac Williams's, "The Psalms interpreted by CHRIST," and Lange's Commentary. While the scholar will of course study them in the original Hebrew, the English student will find valuable help by comparing the King James' version with the Prayer-Book version; the latter being smooth and expressive, retaining with singular force the meaning of the original. Still further help will be found by examining some of the translations in which the peculiarities of Hebrew poetry are retained by means of Parallelisms, although no translation can preserve fully the distinctive traits of the original poetic form.

Psalter, The. The common name for the collection of Psalms as they are used in divine service is the Psalter. They are frequently spoken of as The Psalms of David, because David composed the larger number of them. The other authors to whom some are ascribed are Solomon, Moses, Hezekiah, Ezra, Ethan, and Asaph. The authorship of others is unknown.

Many of them were used in the Temple service of the Jews, while Solomon's Temple was standing, but others came later, after the return from the captivity. All of the 150 were used in divine worship by the Jews during the four centuries preceding the coming of CHRIST, and were at once adopted as part of the ritual of the Christian Church when it was established, and have continued in use in the Church during all these eighteen Christian centuries.

The Psalter was early divided into five parts, as may be seen by the doxologies at the end of the 41st, 72d, 89th, and 106th Psalms, but the principle upon which the division was made by the Jews is not very evident.

In the Christian Church this division was disregarded, and there grew up various modes of using them. In later ages some were appointed for certain days and seasons, and finally, in the English Church, they were distributed through the month for Morning and Evening Prayer, beginning with the first on the first day of the month and ending with the last on the thirtieth day, with special selections for certain seasons. There are various modes of saying or singing them in divine service. Sometimes they are sung as a chorus, by the choir and people, but as often sung antiphonally. In places where they are not sung they are read responsively by the minister and people.

The Prayer-Book version of the Psalter is not the same as the King James' Version as found in our Bibles. It is taken from the first authorized version of our English Bible, put forth in 1540 A.D.

The use of the Psalms in Christian worship has always been a very marked feature. The Psalter is the great Song Book of the Church. There are some general principles worthy of note, and which will show the fitness of the Psalms for use in Christian assemblies. The first of these is the fact that God designed the Jewish Church to be in many things the type of the Christian Church.

In the history of the Jewish Church we have accounts of its deliverance from bondage, of its being led through the wilderness, of its crossing the Red Sea and the Jordan, of its settlement in Canaan, of its conflicts with the people of that land, and of the gradual development of its ritual and laws.

In each of these particulars it typified similar things pertaining to the Christian Church. There are deliverances from bondage of sin and the world, wearing marchings through trials, feeding upon food from heaven, conflict with foes, and the growth of the divine life and energy in the souls of believers.

Transfer, then, much of what is said about Israel to the Christian Church, and it will be found to be as true as if written only to-day.

The second principle is that Moses, David, and Solomon were in some particulars types of Christ. Moses was the leader from bondage, David the founder of the prosperity of the kingdom, and Solomon the wisest of kings and the man of peace.

In whatever there was of excellence in these works, and in the character of the workers, there are contained predictions of Him who is the leader of His people, the Wisdom of GOD, and the Prince of Peace.

The third principle is that some of the Psalms are direct prophecies of Christ and His Church, and others have a double fulfillment, first in the things near at hand, and then in those under the Christian dispensation.

This application of the Psalms was made by CHRIST and His Apostles on various occasions. Thus, for example, He predicted the treachery of Judas in words from the 49th Psalm, while on the cross He poured out His lamentation in words from the 22d. When St. Peter spoke of His resurrection he quoted from the 16th Psalm.

The fourth principle is, that the Psalms are the expression of the religious experiences of men in general. They are the outpourings of the heart in gladness and in sorrow, in penitence and in faith, in hope and in fear.

A very simple adaptation of the Psalms to Christian uses may be made by transferring mentally the figures used to their present Christian equivalents, thus:

Afflictions of David = Afflictions of CHRIST.

David by name and Character = Type of CHRIST.

Enemies of the King = Enemies of CHRIST.

House of Aaron = Christian Ministers.

King's daughter = The Church.

Moab, Edom, and others = Enemies of the Church.

Sanctuary = The Christian Church.

Sacrifices = CHRIST's one offering.

Sins of Israel = Sins of Christians.

REV. G. W. SHINN.

Public Worship. The desire to worship pervades the heathen as well as the Christian world. So strong is it that men have adored gold and silver images, the work of their own hands, or even animals and vegetables. The first idea of worship in a proper sense is that of the individual communing with God. Adam in Eden, Moses on Mount Sinai, Abraham in the starry night (Gen. xv.), are examples of primitive religion. The mountain-top, the sea-side, or the arched grove are fitting places to adore the Creator. But men must associate for such a purpose to quicken each other in devotion. They must be sheltered from the weather, and it is desirable that beautiful buildings should be erected to the honor and glory of God. Plutarch says, "It is possible to find cities without walls, without letters, without kings, without wealth, without coin, without schools and theatres, but a city without a temple, or that useth no worship, prayers, and so forth, no one ever saw." He believed that a city might more easily be built without a foundation than a community of men retain any cohesion without religion. The worship of Moses is shared by others when they see God (Ex. xxiv. 9, 10). Common, public worship is a duty and a privilege. The children of God's family come before their Heavenly FATHER for absolution and benediction, and for receiving spiritual food, and acknowledging benefits received. Public service should be formal and orderly, decent and reverent (1 Cor. xiv. 40). Each one should be early at church, if possible, to get the full benefit of the service. There should be no whispering. A Jewish teacher taught this in a comparison: if a man were presenting a petition to a king he would not be talking to his neighbor, much more should we come reverently before God. Worship implies self-abasement, confession, supplication, contemplation of God, and desire for communion with Him through CHRIST, by the aid of the HOLY SPIRIT. As frequent taking of bodily food is necessary, so frequent worship is needed to renew spiritual life. It was our SAVIOUR's custom to worship in the Jewish Synagogue (St. Luke iv. 16, 43). On the Mountain of the Transfiguration He prayed with His disciples, (St. Luke ix. 28, 29; see also xi. 1). He promises His presence where two or three worship Him (St. Matt. xviii. 20). The Apostles combined in worship (Acts i. 13, 14, 24, and ii. 1, and St. Luke 24, 53). At Pentecost the HOLY SPIRIT descended among faithful worshippers. Not to forsake assembling ourselves together is a Scripture injunction (Heb. x, 25). St. Paul wills "that men pray everywhere" (1 Tim. ii. 8). Public worship is an open profession of faith in CHRIST, and love for Him. It keeps up a sense of religion. It is a means of receiving instruction and partaking in worship, and receiving the Holy Sacraments, and it is a good example to others.

Proper teaching influences unbelievers to join in Christian worship (1 Cor. xiv. 25). The service should be solemn: God is "greatly to be feared in the assembly of the saints and to be had in reverence" (Ps. lxxxix. 7). Public worship is to be cheerful "with gladness" and "singing" (Ps. c.). It must be spiritual, as "God is a Spirit" (St. John iv. 24). The humble soul is the temple of God (Isa. lvii. 15; 1 Cor. vi. 19). God is to be worshiped "in the beauty of holiness" (1 Chron. xvi. 29; Ps. xxix. 2, and xcix. 9). Gold, and silver, and brass, and stone were marvelously wrought together in the Jewish Temple to make it a suitable place for the worship of the all-glorious God. To it the longing eye of the Jew turned in prayer wherever he might be (1 Kings viii.; Ps. v. 7, and xiii. 8, 2). A picture of united worship before the building of the Temple, but when it has been prepared for, occurs in 1 Chron. xxix. 20. Josephus says that the Jew would sooner cease to breathe than to worship. In the Tabernacle service the thought of a present God was ever before the Israelites, "as at the moving of the ark Moses prayed, Rise up, LORD. . . . And when it rested, he said, Return, O LORD, unto the many thousands of Israel" (Numb. x. 35, 36). In the Jewish worship the children were not forgotten, they heard the prayer of the Tabernacle service, and they also stood in the courts of the sacred Temple. They were "planted in the house of the LORD," and so they flourished "in the courts of our God" (Ps. xcii. 13). So should they "bring forth fruit in old age" (v. 14). Would to God that the children of Christian parents were all to-day found with their fathers and mothers in the Church of God, then might we hope the early habit would breed a life custom, and they would "dwell in the house of the LORD forever" (Ps. xxiii. 6). The great day of early Christian worship was the LORD's day (Acts xx. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 2). Wednesday and Friday became special Church days, the former in remembrance of CHRIST's betrayal, and the latter of His crucifixion. Saints' Days keep in remembrance the dead in CHRIST. Pliny in describing primitive Christians says, "that they affirmed of their worship that they met in the early morning, and sang a hymn by turns to CHRIST as God." The poor persecuted saints kept up their responsive worship when death stared them in the face. When persecution ceased, the anthem and prayer rose in vast cathedrals, and kings and queens were nursing fathers and mothers to the Church. So the song begun in Eden has floated through ages, and Tabernacle, and Temple, and Synagogue have given way to the Christian Church, and we hope for a time when every knee shall bow to CHRIST, and a redeemed world shall praise Him as God.

Such is heaven's worship as seen by St. John. The Lamb of God is its centre (Rev. v. 5, 6). An inner circle of worshippers is formed by the four living creatures and the four-and-twenty elders with harps and "golden viols" filled with "the prayers of the saints." They sing the new song to the glorified CHRIST. Outside of this circle is another of thousands of angels, singing "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power." Beyond these is a "third sphere," containing all created living things "in heaven and on earth, and under the earth, and in the sea," and they join in praising the Lamb of God. If such is the occupation of heaven, those who hope to enter that blessed abode should learn the divine song on earth, "When ye exalt Him (God), put forth all your strength, and be not weary; for ye can never go far enough" (Ecclesiasticus 43, 30). An ancient writer declares that the responses of the primitive Church sounded like thunder. Bishop White in his lectures on the Catechism (Dissn. 13) shows how favored we are in a service which gives the people so much Scripture reading, and a responsive service, and a proper bodily worship. Let us rightly use our good heritage.

Pulpit. The first mention of a pulpit is in Nehemiah viii. 4, from which Ezra read the book of the Law to the people. In the early Eastern Church the Ambon was the pulpit, at least St. Chrysostom used it so, though the Bishop usually preached sitting in his chair. Later it became more common. The word Pulpit came to the Church from the theatre. It was the stage on which the actors performed their parts. This would indicate to us the raised platform, whether of wood or of stone, which is now in use, is of Western origin; and since the arrangement of the Eastern Churches was so different from those of the Western Basilicas, it is very probable that it was so, the Eastern Church using a movable frame (analogieon), which apparently was the proper place for the Epistle and Gospel. Often there were two analogeia,—one for each Scripture. The pulpit is usually upon the Gospel side, though not necessarily so.

Purgatory. The Roman figment of a purgatory has had its rise first in an opinion which some of the Fathers held that there was a cleansing from all but mortal sins, either by death itself, or after death, and this was based upon a deep sense of the loathsomeness of sin and our own imperfect efforts at repentance, and upon the obscure words of St. Paul in 1 Cor. iii. 13-15, but it was only an opinion. St. Augustine (398 A.D.) expressed it very cautiously, giving the opinions of some, and goes on to say, "I will not argue about it, for perhaps it may be true." He treats it as a mere opinion and no more. St. Chrysostom thinks the fire St. Paul speaks of is of trial and not of cleansing, and so it is destructive. But Gregory I. (590 A.D.), in his dialogues upon the dead, gave form and popularity to the opinion which grew up vaguely in this interval of two hundred years. The opinion never got a foothold in the Eastern Church, and when in 1439 A.D., at Florence, the Greek Bishops in their political distress, being pressed by the Turks, and needing Western aid for their defense, were induced to agree to the doctrine of a purgatory, but had first to ask what it was. The reply, asserting the efficacy of prayers and intercessions for the dead, went on to say, "But whether purgatory is a fire, or a mist, or a whirlwind, or anything else, we do not dispute to." Vague as this was, when the action of the Bishops was called home, it was indignantly repudiated by the whole East, with the other definitions which the Bishops had agreed to. The XXII. Article rightly calls it "a fond thing, vainly invented, and grounded on no warranty of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the word of God." (Vide Browne, XXXIX. Puritans. The Novatians of the third century were styled Cathari or Puritans, on account of their strict discipline and high requirements as to the excellence of Christians. While such a Purist spirit may be traced in the history of the Church, in modern times the name Puritans has been given to a party in the English Church in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries which tried to introduce Genevan doctrine and Calvin's discipline in place of the system of the English Reformation. The name was first used about 1564 A.D. (Fuller's Ch. Hist., ix. 63) for a party in the English Church, but afterwards it was applied to the Separatists, who left her fold. These Separatists afterwards took various names, Independents, etc. The Puritan idea was a floating element in the Church of England for two centuries before the name was given. In the latter part of the reign of Henry VIII. the Calvinistic system was arranged. Calvin had some influence in England in the reign of Edward VI., and some of his followers obtained positions in the English Church, viz., Peter Martyr, Martin Bucer, and others. The Puritans desired to overthrow Episcopacy and alter the Prayer-Book. They objected to Church vestments, and sponsors and the sign of the cross in Holy Baptism, and the wedding-ring, and the observance of Festivals or Holy-days, and the Cathedral worship and antiphonal chanting and responsive service and the use of organs and Confirmation. Hooker's great work on Ecclesiastical Polity was drawn out by the Puritan controversy. The Jesuits are said to have officiated as Puritan preachers to sow discord. In the reigns of Queen Elizabeth and the Stuarts the troubles were much mixed with governmental affairs. The Long Parliament abolished the use of the Prayer-Book, but after the Puritan triumph they were broken by Sectarianism into various bands. They highly appreciated their own tunes, but despised much that was ancient, and destroyed "national heir-looms."

The "joyful noise" and "pleasant harp" of Ps. lxxxi., the praise of "young men, and maidens, old men, and children" (Ps. xiv. 8), and the "trumpet" and "high-sounding cymbals" (Ps. cl.), hardly describe a Puritan service. God's natural works in the beautiful sky, and varied landscape, the singing birds, the motion and rejoicing of young animals and children show that the CREATOR made a glad world. Joy is to be a ruling power in religion, even in affliction. "Rejoice in the LORD alway, and again I say rejoice" (Phil. iv. 4). While the Church has her Ash-Wednesday and Good-Friday, she must also sing her glad songs on Christmas and Easter. While a system may be condemned noble men in that system must be honored, and Coleridge rightly says, "The diffusion of light and knowledge through this kingdom by the exertions of Bishops and clergy, by Episcopalians and Puritans, from Edward VI. to the restoration was as wonderful as it is praiseworthy, and may be justly placed among the most remarkable facts of history." The stanch Churchman, Dr. Johnson, pronounced all of Baxter's works good, and John Howe, the author of the "Living Temple," has no mean standing in the Christian world to-day. We have reason to thank God that in this new world the civil differences in governmental matters have disappeared, and that the descendants of Cavaliers and Puritans are combining to build the walls of the American Church wide and broad. The Dioceses of Massachusetts and Connecticut show that the differences of past ages may be forgotten, and that men of various forms of thought and education may kneel at a common altar, and the union is strong, for the Church's commission is to bring all men into one mind and into one household.

Pyx. As in the early Church consecration of the elements was made only in the Church, and from thence it was taken or sent to the sick if need be, or was carried to the Hermits and Monks in the desert, reservation of the Consecrated Bread and Wine was common. This necessitated a fit receptacle for their proper conservation. (Vide RESERVATION.) Such vessels have been preserved which date back to the fourth century. Their shape was various, as probably some costly carved case made for other purposes was afterwards set apart for this. These were called pyxes, from pyx, a fist. Where there is no reservation allowed, and where consecration of the elements is allowed in a sick-room, there is no need of a Pyx.

Q.

Quadragesima (or Τεσσαρακοστή), meaning forty days, is generally used to signify the whole period of Lent, but often used for the first Sunday in Lent, from analogy with the three Sundays preceding it. As Sundays were omitted from the number of fasting days, the six weeks preceding Easter were reduced to thirty-six days of abstinence, so that to make up the number of forty days, which Origen declares in the third century to have been consecrated to fasting before Easter, four days from the week preceding have been added, and Lent begins on Ash-Wednesday.

Quicunque Vult. The first words of the Psalm which is generally known as the Creed of St. Athanasius. It is rather a strong formula of the Faith than a Creed; and as it is constructed in a series of rhythmic sentences, it has been called a Psalm. It has been claimed for Hilary of Arles (440 A.D.) by Dr. Waterland, but later researches have shown that while some of the terms can be traced to Augustine (400 A.D.), and fragments of it were in use as a theological formula by 700 A.D., yet its present form appears practically about 870 A.D. Its date may be placed as between 813 A.D., when a portion now incorporated into it was used by Paulinus of Aquileia, and 870 A.D., when we find it publicly used. It passed into daily use at one time in England. It must be used on certain special feast-days, Christmas-day, Epiphany, St. Matthias, Easter, Ascension, St. John Baptist, St. James, St. Bartholomew, St. Matthew, St. Simon and St. Jude, St. Andrew, and on Trinity-Sunday. The American Church removed it from the Prayer-Book principally because of the strong clauses with which it begins.

Quincy. The Diocese of Quincy, one of the three constituting the Province of Illinois, is small in area and young in history. It embraces that part of the State lying west of the Illinois River, and south of the counties of Whiteside and Lee. There are 13,700 square miles and a population of 750,000. Up to the year 1877 A.D. it was a part of the Diocese of Illinois. Division of the old Diocese had long been a subject of anxious solicitude on the part of both Bishop and Convention.

At the thirty-third Annual Convention, in 1870 A.D., Bishop Whitehouse pointed out the need for division, and a committee of thirteen was appointed, who presented two resolutions, which were adopted, requiring, first, that two new Dioceses should be erected according to bounds intimated in the Bishop's address, and, secondly, that the matter be referred to the next Convention for the necessary action to accomplish it. Of this committee the Rev. Samuel Chase, D.D., one of the earliest and strongest friends of division, was chairman.

At the next Convention a plan for division was proposed for dividing the State transversely into three Dioceses. These might be called, geographically, northern, middle, and southern.

This action was reported to the General Convention of 1871 A.D., and consent asked. The House of Bishops declined to give their consent, and the request was withdrawn, by permission, from the lower House.

Though no definite action was taken, the subject of division found mention in each succeeding Convention and Bishop's address up to 1874 A.D. In August of this year Bishop Whitehouse died, and the whole attention of the Diocese was turned to the securing of a successor in the Episcopate. In September Dr. McLaren was elected. The same Convention re-expressed the determination of the Diocese for division, and appointed a committee "to prepare plans, or such modifications of existing plans as should seem most expedient."

The Convention of 1876 A.D. continued the committee, reaffirming the old resolutions, with the additional clause, "It is the sense of this Convention that one new jurisdiction should be erected within the present limits of the Diocese at the earliest practicable day."

At the Convention of 1877 A.D. the Committee on Division having reported their inability to come to any satisfactory conclusion, a series of resolutions was offered calling for division into three Dioceses and fixing bounds nearly as at present established. These were readily adopted, and for the second time the Diocese of Illinois had arrived at a definite plan for division.

The chief difficulty all along had been the matter of Episcopal support for the proposed two new Bishops. The difficulty in the Diocese of Quincy was met in this way. In the city of Quincy were two parishes, one of them having a large stone church. These two congregations by formal action bound themselves to furnish $3500 annually to the Bishop and to an assistant clergyman. The congregation of St. John's Church further deeded all their Church property to the Bishop and to his successors for Cathedral purposes. Both congregations also bound themselves to give to the Bishop all their revenues, to be used by him, with the advice of his Chapter, in the furtherance of Church work in the Diocese and city of Quincy.

Following this action in the proposed See-city, a meeting of clergy and laity was held in September at St. Mary's School, Knoxville, and an additional pledge of $1000 made.

When the General Convention of 1877 A.D. met, the proposed new Diocese of Quincy had the following showing to present:

Consent of the Diocese of Illinois and of its Bishop; population, 700,000; communicants, 1300; clergy, 20; Parishes, 15; Missions, 8; average annual assessment for four years, $1131; contributions the last year to Diocesan Missions, $680; pledges for the Episcopate, with a cathedral property $60,000 in value, $3500.

After the case was understood—it was presented for Quincy by the Rev. Dr. Leffingwell, of St. Mary's School—little or no difficulty was encountered. On the 10th day of October, the seventh day of the session, the matter came up for decision. After reading the papers in the case, and the message of the House of Bishops giving their consent to division on the lines imposed, on motion of Mr. Burgwin, of Pittsburg, the lower House concurred; thus the long-sought-for division was at last accomplished.

The Diocese of Springfield was set off at the same time. By this action Illinois was divided according to her original wish into three separate jurisdictions, though with different lines of division from those first proposed; Illinois (Chicago in 1883 A.D.), lying north, Springfield south, and Quincy southwest.

The Bishop of Illinois at once issued a call for a Primary Convention for the new Diocese of Quincy, and on the 11th day of December (in the proposed cathedral and See-city) the Convention met. At the opening service Bishop McLaren celebrated the Holy Communion, and the Rev. Dr. Chase preached the sermon. At the organization thirteen clergy were present, and fifteen parishes represented. The first act was formally to determine the name of the new Diocese; this was declared to be "the Diocese of Quincy." A standing committee was elected, the Diocese placed under the oversight of the Bishop of Illinois, and then the Convention adjourned to the next day with a special order, after opening, for the election of a Bishop. On the following day, by a unanimous vote, the Rev. Dr. Harris, the present Bishop of Michigan, was elected.

Intimately associated with the project of division, all along, had been the idea of the establishment of an Illinois province formed from the jurisdiction contained in the old Diocese. As soon as Dr. Harris had been elected, this first Convention, in its new relations, re-expressed the old conviction as to the desirability of the Province. The Convention then adjourned.

Dr. Harris having declined his election to the Episcopate, a special Convention was called for February 26, 1878 A.D., to elect again.

The Convention met on the day appointed at the Cathedral, Quincy, and the Bishop of Illinois not being present, the Rev. T. N. Benedict was elected President. Dr. Chase had died on the 15th of January. Thirteen clergy were present and 16 parishes represented. Four names were put in nomination, those of the Rev. Dr. Leffingwell, of the Rev. Cyrus F. Knight, Lancaster, Pa., of the Rev. Cortland Whitehead, Bethlehem, Pa., and of the Rev. Dr. Locke, of Grace Church, Chicago.

Twelve ballots were had without result; on the thirteenth the Rev. Mr. Knight was nominated by the clergy. The laity failed to confirm, and after a long series of ineffectual ballots the Convention adjourned to the next day. On reassembling, balloting continued to the forty-fourth ballot, when the Rev. Alex. Burgess, S.T.D., was nominated by the clergy and confirmed by the laity. Resolutions in reference to the death of Dr. Chase were passed, and the Convention adjourned.

Dr. Burgess, in due time, signified his acceptance, and was consecrated first Bishop of Quincy, in Christ Church, Springfield, Mass., May 15, 1878 A.D.

The first Annual Convention, the new Bishop presiding, was held in the Cathedral, Quincy, on the 28th of May following. Beside the regular routine business the chief matter of record was the appointment of a committee to act with similar committees from the other Dioceses in the State in establishing the proposed Province.

The second Convention, which met on the 27th of May, 1879 A.D., adopted the canon establishing the Province and elected delegates to the preliminary council. At this Convention the organization of the Cathedral and Chapter was also announced.

In the year 1880 A.D. the Rev. T. N. Benedict died. In the fall of this year the General Convention granted most of the powers asked for by the Province of Illinois. In December, at Springfield, Ill., the Diocese of Quincy, through its representatives, entered into full Provincial relations with the other Dioceses in the State. In the three years succeeding the Diocese has gone on with its work. No marvelous things have been done, except as the Lord's doings are always marvelous. Following is a contrasted statement of statistics and a list of the present officers of the Diocese:

	1877 A.D.	1883 A.D.

Quinquagesima Sunday. The Sunday before Ash-Wednesday. How early the three Sundays before Lent were set apart before the time of Gregory the Great (596 A.D.) it would be difficult really to determine, since he reformed the previous practice. The present collect for this Sunday superseded the ancient one in the Salisbury use in 1549 A.D. It is a noble proof of the devout temper of the Reformers and the thorough appreciation they had of what constituted the proper contents of a collect. The Epistle and Gospel are the same as those used universally throughout the Western Church.

Rationalism. One of the most attractive of modern heresies. It is an attempt to account for the supernatural, whether in Revelation, Religion, or natural phenomena, by explanations which debase them to the level of each man's reason. It is the pride of human understanding. In denying revelation or the necessity of it, it practically denies God, for such is ordinarily the conclusive result for men, for if God does not communicate with us why need to heed Him? It denies religion, for if we are not to believe in the supernatural, of what use is Faith to the mass of men? It denies God in nature and makes all things the result of a vast chance, that by chance hit upon a chance law and property of natural things, and so chanced to fall into the chance of some order. Its canons of investigation and criticism are all based upon the fundamental rule that nothing is to be accepted unless it can be reduced to the grasp of the searcher's reasoning power.

And the applications of this law lead to the wildest criticisms and to the vaguest of speculations which in daily life would be called utter folly. If reason alone can furnish us with all knowledge, and revelation is condemned as absurd, yet, rationalism can never be rid of the knowledge which Revelation has given, or of the influences it has introduced, or of the discipline it has given to human capacity. But it is evident that reason cannot reach to subjects not within its sphere, which yet are known to exist beyond and to rest upon a different basis. Rationalism ignores the limitations of the law of reasoning from similars when the elements of the second are indicated, but as parallel only in given points, and claims that there must be either absolute parallelism or there is no existence in the second subject. So far as parallel reasoning can carry us, Revelation is consonant in its proportions. When we cannot reason by comparison, positive revelation tells us what God would teach us. Rationalistic criticism having a low, imperfect canon of investigation, becomes but a destructive criticism it cannot replace.

Indirect replies to the assaults of this criticism as applied to the Sacred Canon are given in the introductions to the several books, but a noble defense of Revelation is found in the Letter of the Bishops on Rationalism, issued in 1877 A.D. It is well worth a careful study, as well as are the remarks upon it that are scattered on the pages of other earlier and later Pastorals. The attacks made by it upon the evidences of Christianity and the defenses are rapidly reviewed in that article to which we refer. But Rationalism is not wholly occupied with the Sacred Canon or with evidences. It would drag down to its level the fairest hopes of men which are formed upon the Incarnation and the Revelation that CHRIST our LORD has made. If the restless, ever-inquiring reason could be contented with only the material world, possibly we would be able to avoid all speculations.

But the whole range of topics which attract the reason includes so many which pass beyond the things seen to the unseen, which cannot be shunned, that those which relate to divine things follow by natural sequence from apparently mere material things. No scientist worthy of the name but at once ranges himself either for or against the validity of a revelation with more or less eagerness. It is the result of our very nature, and should be a full refutation of the claims for the sufficiency of mere reason. For if the denial of the fact of a revelation were valid, why should the scientist trouble himself further with the visions of those who believe in divine communications? But rationalism, however speciously veiled, has for its main objects the getting rid of the responsibilities that a revelation and the doctrine of a superintending care of God involves, the destruction of the demands of conscience, and the indirect relaxation of those strong social bonds religion makes imperative, and which curb mere willfulness. More or less clearly these results are placed before them as the ultimate result of their work. Its fruits are a ghastly infidelity, which would deny all accountability; a credulity in other things far more absurd to the reason than the objects of faith can possibly appear to it; a crude speculation irresistibly forcing itself into and dictating upon subjects which God alone has revealed; a system of philosophy more fatal to human hopes than even the heathen had framed; a creed which has for its main formula, "I do not know."

Honest and sincere inquiry and a reverent spirit must always be welcome. Revelation has nothing to fear from it. More truly it has naught to fear from any speculations whatever, but those who accept it and are bound up in the welfare of those near and dear to them fear for their peace and happiness who are caught in the meshes of such a rationalism. There are many topics in the range of such sacred subjects as involve the gravest consequences by their rejection, upon which a free and searching, but just and reverent inquiry would be very welcome. But hasty and rash conclusions, and immature theories and irreverent and scoffing inquiries, awake but aversion in the mind of the reverent and thoughtful believer. They react healthily upon the mass of thinking men, for there is a deep element of religiousness in us, but they do not serve any good end, but rather destroy unwary souls. Parts of this topic have already been discussed under the heads of AGNOSTICISM, and DOUBT, and PENTATEUCH, and indirectly under numerous other titles throughout this work.

Rate. There is much confusion in the popular mind as to what are meant by the Church rates in England. All property at first had a lien upon it for the repair of the Parish church and the kindred costs under that head. This is also a rebate upon the salable value of that property. It comes, therefore, under the same head as taxes in estimating the value of an estate, therefore a church rate which is publicly assessed after due notice at a public meeting, and is laid by the Church-wardens, is as honest a claim upon it as are the taxes due the town, and the county, and the State. To reclaim against them is simply to seize upon so much additional property, for the estate is valued at a given sum, less the principal, of which the rate is the interest; precisely as if men were to refuse to pay taxes and so raise the market value of their estates. The details of the levy for these rates and the different items for which it is raised are of no importance to us here.

Reader. In the early Church the reader was a regular officer in the Church. He was set apart for his office, after a nomination by the congregation testifying to his fitness, by imposition of hands. This was in the hands of the people. The Bishop accepted and set apart the man the congregation chose for themselves. The office is accounted a minor office, not one of holy orders. (Vide ORDERS.) In the English Church the public official appointment by the Bishop has been revived in the present day, but while the office has been generally laid aside there, it was never wholly lost. In our own Church the necessities of the time have brought out and established a modification of the office, and it is recognized in the Canons, but there is no public appointment as in the ancient Church, a ceremony which is desirable, since it would give that sanction and authority to the office which really belongs to it, and which is disregarded too much by the congregation. The Canon is very clear and precise as to the Duty of the Lay-reader.

"OF LAY-READERS.

"§ i. A Lay Communicant of this Church may receive from the Bishop a written license to conduct the service of the Church in a Congregation convened for public worship as a Lay-Reader; but such license shall not be granted for conducting the service in a Congregation without a minister which is able and has had a reasonable opportunity to secure the services of an ordained minister. Such license may be given by the Bishop of his own motion for service in any vacant Parish, Congregation, or Mission; but where a Rector is in charge, his request and recommendation must have been previously signified to the Bishop. Such license must be given for a definite period, not longer than one year from its date; but may be renewed from time to time by the Bishop's indorsement to that effect. The license of any Lay-Reader may be revoked at the discretion of the Ecclesiastical Authority.

"§ ii. A Lay-Reader so licensed shall not act as such in any Diocese other than his own, unless he shall have received another license from the Bishop of the Diocese in which he desires to serve. If he be a student in any Theological Seminary, he shall also obtain the permission of the presiding officer of such institution.

"§ iii. Every Lay-Reader shall be subject to such regulation as may be prescribed by the Ecclesiastical Authority. In all matters relating to the conduct of the service and to the Sermons or Homilies to be read, he shall conform to the directions of the minister in charge of the Parish, Congregation, or Mission in which he is serving, or when there is no minister in charge, to the directions of the Bishop. He shall not use the Absolution, nor the Benediction, nor the Offices of the Church, except those for the Burial of the Dead and for the Visitation of the Sick and of Prisoners, omitting in these last the Absolutions and Benedictions. He shall not deliver Sermons of his own composition, but he may deliver addresses, instructions, and exhortations in vacant Parishes, Congregations, or Missions, if he be specially licensed thereto by the Bishop. He shall not assume the dress appropriate to clergymen ministering in the Congregation. He shall not without urgent reason read any part of the Service except the Lessons when a clergyman is present. This Canon shall not prevent students in any college or seminary from reading such parts of the Chapel Services as may be assigned to them from time to time by the Presiding Officer."

The Lay-Reader of the present day is merely intended to serve only under some stress, but anciently the Reader had his appointed place and share in the Services, the Psalms, and Lessons.

Real Presence. A phrase used to express the special Presence of CHRIST in the Holy Communion, in distinction from those who hold that there is no such special Presence, but that the Communion is in memory of the death of CHRIST, who Himself is not present, but is in heaven. Those who hold this view are called Zwinglians from the Reformer of that name, though it is doubtful if Zwinglius so taught.

While the great number of Christians believe in the Real Presence, there is a very wide difference of opinion as to the manner and nature of such Presence. These may all be classed under three divisions.

1. Transubstantiation.—The change of the substance of the Bread and Wine into the natural flesh and blood of CHRIST, the same body that was born of the Virgin Mary. This is the doctrine of the Church of Rome. The term transubstantiation was not used before the twelfth century; and the doctrine it teaches was unknown before the ninth century. About the year 831 A.D. a Monk, Paschasius Radbert, appears to have been the first writer who taught it. It was violently denied by other writers, especially by Ratram, whose book is still extant. But the doctrine suited the superstitious spirit of the Middle Ages and the metaphysical refinements of the schoolmen, and gradually obtained favor. The term and the full formula of the doctrine were first authoritatively expressed by the Council of Lateran, 1216 A.D., and so became an Article of Faith of that Church; and by the famous Council of Trent was finally set forth in these words:

"If any one shall say that in the very holy sacrament of the eucharist the substance of the bread and of the wine remain together with the body and the blood of our LORD JESUS CHRIST; and denies that wonderful and singular conversion of the whole substance of the bread into the body, and of the whole substance of the wine into the blood, till only the form (or appearance) of bread and wine remaining: which change the Catholic Church very fitly calls transubstantiation, let him be anathema." (Conc. Trid., Sessio. xiii., cap. viii. Canon ii.)

A subtle distinction was made by the schoolmen between the "substance" and the "accidents," by which latter they meant the touch, taste, smell, the "form or appearance," which they held were distinct from the real substance of a thing; so that while the latter might be essentially changed the former might remain the same. Thus they accounted for the undeniable fact: that to the senses, in outward form of taste, touch, look, the bread and wine were unchanged. These they held were mere accidents and could remain the same; while the reality of the substance was truly changed into the corporal body and blood of CHRIST.

This doctrine of Transubstantiation was not held by the early Church, though some figurative expressions of certain writers have been quoted as teaching it, contradicted, however, by other words of the same authors. It was repudiated at the time of the Reformation by the Church of England, and is in Article XXVIII. declared to be "repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, overthroweth the nature of a sacrament, and hath given occasion to many superstitions." This Transubstantiation, then, is not the true doctrine of the Real Presence.

(2) Consubstantiation.—This is called the Lutheran doctrine. It denies any change in the substance of the bread and wine, but teaches that with and in these elements are the natural Body and Blood of CHRIST, not spiritually, but corporally present. It was illustrated thus: That as in hot iron there is the nature both of iron and heat, each remaining unchanged, so in the Eucharist there is both the bread and wine and the Body and Blood of our LORD. The objection to this doctrine of the Real Presence is that it makes that presence a corporal one. But the Corporal Body of JESUS ascended to heaven and there remaineth.

(3) The Spiritual Real Presence.—This is the teaching of the early Church and of the Church of England and of our own: "The Body of CHRIST is given, taken and eaten, in the Supper, only after a heavenly and spiritual manner, and the mean whereby it is received and eaten in the Supper is faith" (Art. XXVIII.). If "given, taken and eaten," it must be present; that which is absent cannot be "given and taken." In the Communion Service we return thanks that we have been fed "with the spiritual food of the most precious Body and Blood of Thy SON our SAVIOUR, JESUS CHRIST." He must, then, have been present: we could not feed on an absent body and blood; but it is not corporally, but spiritually and sacramentally, i.e., mysteriously, present. None the less real because spiritual; spiritual as not corporal. The promise is, "where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them" (St. Matt. xviii. 20). This must be especially true when the disciples are gathered together to do that which CHRIST commanded to be done in memory of Himself, and to receive that which He declared to be His Body and His Blood. And this can be nothing less than a true real presence. We believe, then, that there is such a Real Spiritual Presence of our blessed LORD at the Holy Communion. But here we reverently pause. We may not pretend to explain the how, the when, the where of that presence, we may not define or localize it as some vainly pretend to do; some holding that the Presence is after consecration on the altar with the Elements, others that it is, as Hooper says, "in the worthy receiver of the Sacrament." The Scriptures, the Early Fathers, our own Liturgy, have not attempted to solve this mystery; let us imitate their wise reserve and confess that it is a holy mystery above our comprehension. We cannot do better than to use the words of Hooker: "What these elements are in themselves it skilleth not, it is enough that to me which take them they are the body and blood of CHRIST, His promise in witness hereof sufficeth, His word He knoweth which way to accomplish; why should any cogitation possess the mind of a faithful communicant but this, O my God, Thou art true, O my soul, thou art happy?"

Eucharistic Adoration.—This is a fitting place to speak of what is called Eucharistic Adoration, or the worship of CHRIST as present on the Altar in the Eucharist. There are objections to this way of putting it. That there is with the Holy Communion the highest act of worship may not be doubted. But it is not to be addressed to CHRIST as then lying on the Altar, for that is nowhere commanded nor taught by Scripture or the Church. When the LORD instituted this Sacrament, He does not say, This is My Body, worship it, or Me in it, but, "Take, eat; this is my Body," and so of the cup. Says St. Paul, "as oft as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do shew the LORD's death till He come" (1 Cor. xi. 26). They do not say worship, but eat. For CHRIST is present to give Himself to the faithful soul, with all the benefits of His passion. Yet it is very true that, as St. Augustine writes, "No one eats that Flesh except he first adore." Adore the Holy Trinity, not CHRIST alone as locally there present in the flesh, but FATHER, SON, and HOLY GHOST. And it is worthy of special notice how in the Liturgy of our Church, founded as it is on the ancient ones, there is no special adoration addressed to the Presence of the SON. It is all to the FATHER, through the SON, by the HOLY GHOST. A careful examination of the Communion Service is very instructive, as showing how entirely what is called Eucharistic Adoration is avoided. Sursum Corda, "Lift up your hearts," is the ancient cry. "We lift them up unto the LORD," is the response. The Tercius which follows is addressed "Unto Thee, O LORD, Holy FATHER, Almighty, Everlasting God." The Prayer of Humble Access prays the gracious LORD, to grant that we may "eat the flesh of Thy dear SON," etc. The Consecration Prayer is offered to the Heavenly FATHER, and He is invoked to so bless and sanctify with His Word and Holy Spirit, His gifts and creatures of bread and wine, as to make us, receiving them according to His SON's institution, partakers of His most blessed Body and Blood." And finally, after reception, it is GOD we thank for feeding us "with the spiritual food of the most precious Body and Blood of Thy SON, our SAVIOUR, JESUS CHRIST." There is not in the whole service one Act of Adoration or one prayer addressed to CHRIST as being in the elements or present on the Altar. The Gloria in Excelsis does, indeed, invoke the SON as the Lamb of God; but it is addressed to Him, "Thou that sittest at the right hand of GOD the FATHER." The negative testimony of the Church is very strong, that CHRIST is really spiritually present in the Eucharist to be received; but not to be specially and separately adored.

It may be well to insert here from the English Prayer-Book a part of "The Declaration on Kneeling," or "Black rubric," as it is generally called, because, though not found in our book, it sets forth the doctrine of that Church on this subject; "and this Church is very far from intending to depart from the Church of England in any essential point of doctrine, discipline, or worship" (Preface to Prayer-Book). "It is here declared, That thereby (i. e., in receiving the communion kneeling) no adoration is intended, or ought to be done, either unto the Sacramental Bread or Wine there bodily received, or unto any Corporal Presence of CHRIST's natural Flesh and Blood. For the Sacramental Bread and Wine remain still in their very Natural Substances, and therefore may not be adored (for that were Idolatry, to be abhorred of all faithful Christians), and the Natural Body and Blood of our Saviour CHRIST are in heaven, and not here; it being against the truth of CHRIST's Natural Body to be at one time in more places than one." REV. E. B. BOGES, D.D.

Realism. "Realism, as opposed to Nominalism, is the doctrine that germs and species are real things, existing independently of our conceptions and expressions; and that, as in the case of singular terms, there is some real individual corresponding to each, so in common terms also, there is something corresponding to each; which is the object of our thoughts, when we employ the term." (Whately, Logic, Bk. iv. ch. v. 71.)

"Realism as opposed to idealism, is the doctrine that in perception there is an immediate or intuitive cognition of the external object, while according to idealism our knowledge of an external world is mediate and representative, i. e., by means of ideas." (Sir Wm. Hamilton, Reid's Works, note C, Edin. Rev., vol. iii. pp. 175-181.)

Recantation. Vide ABJURATION.

Reconciliation. In a former article on Atonement, the Justice of GOD, His Truth, the establishment of the Law, and the Powerlessness of man to recover were set forth, the Atonement of our dear LORD as a satisfaction for sin, and the majesty of a broken Law, and as an at-one-ment, between the offended Creator and Sovereign and His disobedient subject, was shown. In speaking of our Heavenly FATHER as an offended Creator we lose sight of the fact, that He so loved the world that He gave His only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life. The eternal Counsel of redemption was framed in love, the execution of it in Mercy and Love. In the Sacrifice upon the Cross, in the Blood of CHRIST shed for our souls, the perfect redemption of the human race was effected in Him who became our second Adam. And the reconciliation, the power for which was granted because of His Atonement, gives to our LORD a direct power of Lordship over those who are His brethren. GOD was in CHRIST reconciling the world unto Himself. Our LORD stands forth as the Second Sinless Adam. And as in the first Adam all die as a race penalty, so by the spiritual birth of baptism into CHRIST all live, for GOD the FATHER doth not impute to them their trespasses; for He hath made Him to be sin for us who knows no sin that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him. In this new Covenant our LORD, then, becomes our new head. He is our bondsman. He is the Maker-at-one, and Intercessor. He takes us under His protection, and our reconciliation is made through Him and by Him. To Him we are bound. Therefore our Baptism though in the Name of the HOLY TRINITY yet is in CHRIST. We become new creatures therein. We have put on CHRIST. We are named with the new name of Christians. We are no longer under an attainer, but have the rights of citizenship and the liberty of freemen in Him. No longer strangers, but of the Household of God. Not mere servants no matter how fully cared for, but Sons of God, and therefore we receive no wages as servants, but as sons we inherit. In this first act of reconciliation Our Blessed LORD stands forth as the Reconciler of those who humbly sue for pardon, with the outstretched hands of repentance and Faith, with a loving FATHER whose Justice and Majesty inflicted a righteous penalty for a broken Law, but who was ever ready to receive with outstretched arms, yea more, to plead with us that we His lost sheep might return, and prove that He was more than willing by the sending, the giving of His only Son, our loving LORD. It was with this plea the Apostles went forth to all nations: "We are ambassadors for CHRIST, as though God did beseech you by us: we pray you in CHRIST's stead, Be ye reconciled to God" (2 Cor. v. 20).

The whole series of acts from the Atonement on the Cross to the Covenant made and sealed by His Resurrection are set forth again in the weighty words of the Apostle in Rom. v. 8-10: "But God commendeth His love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, CHRIST died for us. Much more, then, being now justified by His blood, we shall be saved from wrath through Him. For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of His Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by His life." Then our Baptism effects this reconciliation, which is also an adoption (vide ADOPTION), and bringing us into this membership of CHRIST, places us in His Kingdom, which is His Church, which He purchased with His precious blood. Our membership in His Church is the pledge of His having effected a reconciliation in our behalf. It is our election which we have to make sure (2 Pet. i. 10). It is this joyful reconciliation that forms the Good News, the Gospel of CHRIST. It was prepared for by the sacrifices given to Adam, to the Patriarchs, to the children of Israel. It was typified and taught in the many acts of God to His people, in the rest of the Seventh day, in the presence of His Glory with them, in the cleansing from pollution. It is urged again and again by the Old Testament Prophets as the plea for the return of Israel to their Faith. But this leads to the further consideration: This reconciliation is a permanent fact unless we cast it away; but its joy ("And not only so, but we joy in God through our LORD JESUS CHRIST, by whom we have now received the reconciliation." Rom. v. 11) may be marred, and we become finally estranged by carelessness, willfulness, over-confidence, and the manifold temptations to which we are exposed. To meet this danger our LORD gives us the HOLY GHOST in Confirmation to be His Advocate with us, and our Leader, Guide, and Consolator. He has left the restorations of the Holy Communion, the Absolutions of His Church, and He has also committed to Her the discipline by which we may be reconciled to Him. This danger of breaking this peace, the trials and temptations to which we are exposed, the warnings against the seductions to evil, the examples of the past, the holy virtues to be gained, the grounding of our souls in the faith and love of CHRIST, our being in a constant state of Conversion, all these are the subject of the pleading, the urging, the counsel, the warning of the Apostles, with which they all close their several Epistles, and not only of the Apostles, but of the LORD Himself.

Rector. There is a legal difference in the English Church between a Parson, a Rector, and a Vicar. The Parson is the representative of the Church in her corporate capacity. He performs all spiritual functions in her name; he can sue and be sued as Parson. He claims all temporalities as Parson. (Vide PARSON.) A Vicar "is one who hath a spiritual promotion or living under the Parson, and is so denominated as officiating vice ejus in his place or stead, and such promotion or living is called a Vicarage, which is a part or portion of the Parsonage allotted to the Vicar for his maintenance and support." (Burn, Eccl. Law, sub voce.) But a rector appears to be but another name for a Parson. And in this country the assistant minister is somewhat in the position of the Curate or Vicar in the degree of the work in the parish assigned to him. But in the Parish there is only the Rector, and according to Blackstone the title Parson is more honorable, and beneficial, and legal. Our Canons have these titles for the spiritual head of the Parish: Rector, Minister, Stated Minister, but minister is the usual term used there. The title clergyman is also used, but apparently (as is the case with the word minister) to designate one in his spiritual office, and not generally the holder of a Parish.

Recusant. The term used to describe those who refused the ministrations of the Church of England. But it was usually employed to describe the Roman schismatics in England.

Redeemer. The full force of our LORD's title is lost to us by the secondary use of it, or rather the overlooking of the type of it in the Jewish Polity. The Redeemer had a twofold function. (a) He was the redeemer of forfeited family estates, the next of kin who could take when the next heritor declined, as Boaz did for Ruth when the next of kin refused to marry Ruth, that he might hold the estate. (b) The same nearest of kin or of blood was also the avenger of blood, according to the early institution which Moses regulated and confined. (Mozley, Ruling Ideas in Early Ages.) This is not the place to carry out the application of this type to our LORD's redemptive act and the beautiful type of the provision of the City of Refuge, but in these provisions of the Mosaic law we find active energizing powers in the national life, whose term of Redeemer (Goel) kept before the minds of the people that the MESSIAH was the next of kin to redeem us from sin and the avenger of the blood of the Saints and the City of Refuge and the High-Priest who ever liveth and under whom we have an eternal security. (Vide JESUS.)

Redemption. It covers the whole series of redemptive acts, but means chiefly the ransom of sinners from the consequences of sin, by the humiliation, sufferings, and death of CHRIST, who is hence called our Redeemer. I. The idea of redemption is therefore that of buying back again from a condition of slavery. That condition has come upon mankind universally by original sin and is perpetuated by actual sin. For both original and actual sin entail ties of obedience to the tempter. "Know ye not, that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey; whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness?" (Rom. vi. 16.) It is from such a bondage that CHRIST has redeemed and is redeeming sinners, REDEMPTION from original sin and pardon from actual sin being each accorded on account of the Ransom which He has paid. II. Hence the idea of redemption contains also that of claim to the service of the redeemed on the part of the Redeemer. "Being then made free from sin, ye became the servants of righteousness" (Rom. vi. 18). He that is called, being free, is the servant of CHRIST. "Ye are bought with a price; be not ye the servants of men" (1 Cor. vii. 23). The Redeemer has not only redeemed us to freedom by His Ransom, but has also bought us for His own Service, that bondage which is perfect freedom. (Blunt's Dict. of Doct. and Hist. Theol., sub voc.)

Reformation, The. The Reformation of the Church of England was not the mere isolated movement of an insular kingdom. It arose from a feeling of abhorrence and of passionate opposition to the frightful corruptions and abuses of the Papacy in the fifteenth century, which pervaded the minds of many holy men in all those countries in Europe which were subject to the Roman obedience. That feeling found energetic and simultaneous expression on the Continent and in England. It was felt as a power in the partial Reformations effected, and the still greater ones attempted in the Councils of Pisa, Constance, Basle, and Florence. It spoke with clear and trumpet tones in the works and the preaching of Miltitz, Conrad of Waldhausen, and John Huss, their disciple, on the Continent, at the same time that the intrepid and gifted Wiclif translated the Bible into English for the people, and dealt his powerful blows against the intolerable domination of the Papacy in England. These "Reformers before the Reformation" did not limit their efforts to the removal of the external evils under which the Church and the kingdom groaned. They labored to promote an inward and spiritual life of love and devotion to God as the necessary condition of all moral improvement and reform, and as the only effectual power by which both doctrinal corruptions and practical abuses could be removed. Although they did not discard all the dogmas of Rome which were subsequently rejected by the Reformers in the sixteenth century, nor claim complete exemption from its authority, they had adopted some doctrines whose logical result would be to undermine the whole Papal system.

The corruption of doctrine and discipline, which had been increasing in the Western Church since the transfer of the Papacy to Avignon, culminated at the close of the fifteenth and the beginning of the sixteenth century. It might seem that England, farthest removed from Rome, and with the advantage of occupying an insular position, would have been better able than the other Kingdoms of Europe to resist the encroachments of the Papacy upon her national and ecclesiastical immunities and rights. But in truth, although from time to time her Kings, and some of her best Bishops, lifted loud protests against the exactions of the Pope, no country in Europe came more completely under the Papal domination than England, and in none were the Bishops and clergy more thoroughly secularized. "At this period [the beginning of the sixteenth century] perhaps more than at any other, the clergy in England were completely occupied with secular employments. The Archbishop of Canterbury was Lord Chancellor until relieved of that post by Wolsey. Wolsey held together, or in succession, the sees of Tournai, Lincoln, York, Durham, Winchester, while all the time he was acting simply as a lay statesman. The Bishops of Bath, Worcester, Llandaff, and Hereford were foreigners and non-residents. Fox, Bishop of Winchester, was Lord Treasurer; Ruthall, of Durham, Secretary of State; Tonstal, of London, Master of the Rolls. And among the lower clergy, a great proportion was employed in diplomatic or civil offices. These being for the most part near the source of preferment had accumulated a great number of benefices. A list of twenty-three clergymen of this period had been drawn out, who on an average held eight benefices apiece. In addition to these ecclesiastical abuses, the social state of England at the beginning of the sixteenth century was thoroughly rotten. Executions for robbery were constant, and mendicancy prevailed to such an extent that statute after statute of the most terrible severity was needed to check it." (Perry's History of the Church of England from the Reformation, etc., p. 5.)

In the fall of 1511 A.D. a memorable sermon was preached by Dean Colet, of St. Paul's Cathedral, before the Convocation of Canterbury, in which he exposed with great fidelity and earnestness the dreadful abuses which prevailed in the Church, and traced them directly to the faithlessness and vices of the clergy. His own pure and lofty character rescued this representation from the charge of presumption. He warned them plainly that unless a reformation were first wrought in the character and lives of the Bishops and clergy, no increased stringency in applying discipline would avail to remedy the crying evils of the time in Church and State. He presented a vivid picture of the utter and shameless secularity of all orders of the clergy. With unsparring fidelity he exposed their "greediness and appetite for honor and dignity in the Church," their "stately countenance and high looks and lordly living," their devotion "to sports and plays and banquets and hunting and hawking," their absorption in secular pursuits, their nepotism, simony, and non-residence, and the corruption of the Bishops' Courts and the Provincial Councils. In short, in his arraignment of them he seems to describe the presence of all possible clerical vices and the absence of all clerical virtues. Like priest like people! He tells them that they are largely responsible for the prevailing vices of the laity. "Forsooth, if ye keep the laws, and if ye reform first your life to the rules of the Canon laws, then ye shall give us light, that is to say, the light of your good example, and we seeing our fathers so keeping the laws, will gladly follow the steps of our fathers. The clergy and the spiritual part once reformed in the Church then may we with Just order proceed to the reformation of the lay part; which truly will be very easy to do if we be first reformed. For the body followeth the soul; wherefore if the priests who have charge of the souls be good, strait the people will be good. Our goodness shall teach them more clearly to be good than all other teachings and preachings. Our goodness shall compel them into the right way, truly more effectually than all your suspendings and cursings. Wherefore if you would have the lay people to live after your wish and will first live yourselves after the will of God, and so (trust me) ye shall get in them whatever ye will." (Blunt's Reformation, vol. i. 14, 17.)

In the early part of the reign of Henry VIII. there were some eminent men who deeply felt that Church and State were in a process of disintegration, through the intolerable corruption and tyranny of the Church of Rome, and that some remedy must be found or anarchy and ruin would ensue. They are sometimes called Reformers, but may more truly be designated as the forerunners of the Reformation. For none of them aimed at the source of the prevailing evils, which was to be found in the constitution of the Papacy, but labored only to check the exorbitancies of her admitted prerogatives and powers, and encroachments upon those national rights in Church and State which were fundamental, and had been claimed and enforced through successive centuries, and had never been officially surrendered by the nation during the darkest period of the Roman domination. Of those forerunners of the Reformation there were several classes. Warham, Archbishop of Canterbury, was a representative of that class of devout prelates who were devoted to the Roman see, and who were at the same time vigilant to check any attempts to reform its doctrines or to repress its practical superstitions, and only anxious to introduce disciplinary reforms, and to bring the administration of the Papal power within limits which would be consistent with the national liberties and rights. There was another class of eminent scholars, called the humanists, devoted to the revival of classical learning and to educational reforms in the curriculum of studies prescribed in the Universities. They were men of great cultivation and refinement, to whom the superstitions of the vulgar, and especially of the monks, were repulsive, because they were gross and offensive to their tastes, rather than shocking to their religious sensibilities. The most celebrated of these were Dean Colet, Erasmus, and Thomas More. Erasmus did immense service to literature, but from his timid and compromising temper rather hindered than helped the more earnest spirits in Germany and England, who were laboring for doctrinal Reform and for the revival of spiritual life and earnestness in the Church. Sir Thomas More in his earlier years, when he wrote the "Utopia," strongly advocated religious toleration; but later in life he became a thorough advocate of the supremacy of the Pope, and died at the stake for maintaining it; and so earnestly did he repent of his youthful speculative toleration that he directed that the following sentence should be engraved upon his monument: Furibus, homicidis, hereticisque molestus. Dean Colet, like Erasmus and More, a thorough scholar, was far more earnest in character, and in his lectures upon St. Paul's epistles animadverted so plainly upon the departure of the Church of Rome from the theology of St. Paul as to have incurred suspicion of Lollardism, and to have awakened anxious misgivings in the mind of his friend Warham, the Archbishop of Canterbury.

But the most conspicuous of all those who have been called Educational Reformers was the great Cardinal Wolsey. There can be no doubt that Wolsey, a scholar, a lover of learning and of learned men, was thoroughly in earnest in the work of intellectual reform. But that his zeal in this cause was entirely apart from any intention or expectation or hope that it would influence the doctrine, or curtail the power of the Papacy in England, is equally clear. It was with the eye of a statesman rather than of a theologian that he looked upon the degraded condition of the Church of England. There is no evidence of religious motive in the large foundations and endowments for learning which he established. As the virtual administrator of the government, the abuses that prevailed in the Church seemed a reflection upon his statesmanship, as their removal he knew would be accounted to his honor. He would lift the Church out of intellectual debasement in order that its revived intelligence might be employed in its own vindication. He would cleanse the Church from some of its external defilements, but he would not change its structure. He would allow all the superstitious symbolism and paraphernalia and ceremonialism of the Roman worship to remain, but he would have the dust and cobwebs brushed off from the statues of the saints, and the faded letters of their legends gilded anew, and would give increased pomp to their services and processions, by clothing their priests in new robes of glory and beauty. All this fresh lustre given to the unchanged Church would be reflected upon himself. It is incredible that one whose master-passion was the love of power, and whose plans had been steadily directed to the one object of securing the triple crown, would at the same time labor to limit the abuses which gave it supremacy over all thrones and kingdoms and churches, and made it the highest prize which it was possible for human ambition to obtain.

How much of latent Lollardism survived the persecution of Henry V. and subsequent kings until Henry VIII. it is difficult to judge. From the number of enactments passed against them from the death of Wiclif it is natural to infer that they were numerous. A contemporary chronicler, Knighton, gives decided testimony to their rapid increase after the death of Wiclif. He affirms that "Wiclif's followers were multiplied like suckers from the root of a tree," and "that a man could scarcely meet two people upon the road without one of them being a Wiclifite." "There was a third party in the country," says Mr. Froude, "unconsidered as yet, who had a part to play in the historical drama composed at that time merely of poor men; poor cobblers, weavers, trade apprentices, and humble artisans, men of low birth and low estate, who might be seen at night stealing along the lanes and alleys of London, carrying with them some precious load of books which it was death to have, and giving their lives gladly, if it must be so, for the brief tenure of so dear a treasure." (Froude, vol. i. 168.) It is not from this class that leaders of a religious Reformation could be looked for in a kingdom so aristocratic as England. While it was much less dependent upon the personal passion and will of King Henry than it has been represented by Roman historians to have been, it is no doubt true that the proceedings of the King rallied and extended the latent opposition to the Papacy which had existed in England for the previous two hundred years. And no doubt, also, the Reformation gained ascendancy all the sooner because of the King's opposition to the Pope, and because it enlisted the higher and governing classes in its support. In Germany it originated from below and worked its way upward. In England, on the contrary, it originated from above and worked its way downward. Hence, also, we may perceive the reason why in the one case Episcopacy went down and in the other was retained. The hierarchy in Germany, possessing more than anywhere else privileges and temporal immunities and advantages which were dependent in large measure upon the Papacy, threw themselves in opposition to the Reformation. In England, Bishops found it to their interests to adhere to the crown; and a sufficient number of them were found to throw themselves into the Reformation to save the order and perpetuate the succession. (Dr. C. M. Butler, Ecclesiastical History, vol. ii. p. 390.)

Henry VIII. ascended the throne with such personal and political advantages as soon gave him an immense popularity. His political position, through the skillful management of his father, was secure. His title was undisputed. He inherited no wars. He succeeded to the immense treasures accumulated by his penurious father. He had no hatreds, public or private, to gratify, no injuries to avenge, no feuds to cherish, no onerous benefits to repay, no clamorous partisans to satisfy. It is difficult to conceive a more auspicious succession to a crown.

Nor were his personal advantages and his apparent merits less. The brutality of his character in later life makes it difficult to conceive of him as he was in his bright youth. For he seemed to possess all the characteristics and accomplishments which give the promise of a glorious reign. His education was far in advance of most of the princes and nobles of his time. He was but eighteen years of age, a pattern of manly beauty, expert in all athletic exercises, and with a frank and bold address, a ready wit, and a bluff humor, which often passes for goodness of heart, when it may be in fact nothing more than the expression of self-complacency. The Italian and Venetian envoys at his court enlarge with enthusiasm upon the beauty of his person and his varied acquirements. The Venetian ambassador, Giustiniani, writes, "He is not only very expert in arms, but gifted with mental accomplishments of every sort. He speaks English, French, Spanish, and Latin; understands Italian well; plays on almost every instrument; sings and composes fairly; is prudent and sage, and besides, is so good a friend to the State that we consider it certain that no Italian sovereign ever surpassed him in this respect." We cannot wonder at the high anticipations which were entertained of his future when we read such eulogies from a foreign envoy, whose duty it was to present a faithful portrait to his government of the new king, that they might know precisely what sort of a man he was with whom they would have to deal. "Such was the man," says Geikie, "whom Wolsey at more than double his age had in his hands to make or mar."

But these bright anticipations were soon dispelled. In no true sense was he found to be "sage." He soon squandered the enormous treasures left by his father in every species of luxury and extravagance, and especially in play. He began early to play the part of despot, and recognized no limitations to his power in his Parliament or privy council. They were both regarded as merely his counselors and agents; and by the pressure of his arbitrary will he reduced them in a few years to that position. As neither he nor Wolsey undertook any remedial legislation for the benefit of the people, their condition became, or rather continued to be, deplorable. Henry VII. reached no higher wisdom than that of plundering his subjects under the forms of law; and Wolsey and Henry pursued the same policy of plunder without the sanction of law; and neither of them learned that even if the highest aim of government were to secure large revenues from the people, the surest way to secure this result would be to leave to them at least the instruments by which wealth was to be produced.

The first prominent event of interest in the reign of Henry in the way of Reformation was a bill which was passed in Parliament in 1513 A.D., subjecting all robbers and murderers to the civil power, and exempting from it among the clergy only Bishops, Priests, and Deacons. The bill created the most violent excitement among the clergy. Although it subjected only the four lower orders to the civil law, it was loudly clamored against as a breach of immemorial and legalized clerical privilege. The question was argued before the king and council with great heat on both sides; but no change was made in the provisions of the statute (Burnet, pp. 10, 11.)

It was when this question was angrily discussed that the case of Hunne, a citizen of London, greatly increased the excitement. Hunne was a merchant tailor of London, whose infant child died in the parish of Whitechapel, where it had been put out to nurse, and the priest of that parish and the priest of his own both demanded a "mortuary fee."

This was the name of an oppressive claim for the second best horse or other animal belonging to a dead person, if he had been rich, or the clothes which he had worn, if he had been poor. In the case of an infant the demand was for "the bearing-sheet," and as two were demanded in the present instance, one was justly refused. Being cited to appear before the spiritual court, Hunne sued the priest under the statute of premunire. Upon this, Hunne, who had given expression to violent feelings towards the clergy, was accused of heresy. The Bishop or his Commissary could in a charge of heresy proceed without any previous proof of its probability or certainty, and accordingly he was committed to the Lollard's tower, and was soon after found dead in prison. The finding of the coroner's jury was to the effect that he had been made away with, and afterwards hanged, and that Dr. Horsey, chancellor of the Bishop of London, was accessory to the murder. But the Bishop of London, in contempt of this decision, ordered Hunne's body to be burnt for heresy. Dr. Horsey was put on trial, but as no positive proof was given of his complicity in the crime, he was allowed to escape. But the incident was significant and memorable for the amount of bitter feeling against the clergy which it revealed. An appeal was made by the Bishop of London to Wolsey that the trial might be removed from London to some impartial place, "for assured I am," he adds, "that if any chancellor be tried by any twelve men in London, they be so maliciously set in favorem hereticæ pravitatis that they will condemn any clerk though he be as innocent as Abel."

St. Paul's Cross was used as an ecclesiastical rostrum from which sermons having a political bearing were often preached. A similar question arose in reference to the relation of the civil to the ecclesiastical power as that which was involved in the case of Hunne soon after the liberation and acquittal of Dr. Horsey. While Parliament was in session in 1515 A.D., the Abbot of Winchelsea preached a sermon at the Cross, in which he denounced the act by which the four lower orders of the clergy were made amenable to the temporal courts in civil causes. He added that all who had assented to that act had incurred the censures of the Church,—a reckless statement, which involved in his condemnation the King and Lords and House of Commons. The lay members of both houses petitioned the King to repudiate the principle proclaimed by the Abbot. Henry accordingly held a special council at the Blackfriars in order that the subject might be discussed before him and his councillors. Dr. Standish, Warden of the Franciscans in London, contested the position of the Abbot. Some time after this the Convocation was reported to have called Dr. Standish to account for what he had said before the King. It was a rash proceeding, for such communications were always held as privileged, and to question them or reprove them when the King had not done so was regarded as both unbecoming and an infringement of the Royal prerogative. The answer of the Convocation is obscure and equivocal; but in the midst of much subservient verbiage and many protestations of fidelity to the king, it is seen that the Convocation adhere to their contention that "the punishment of clerks should not appertain to secular Judges." Accordingly, the King answered in a formal and stately speech, the purport of which could not be misunderstood. "By the permission and ordinance of God we are King of England, and the Kings of England in times past had never any superior but God only. Therefore know you well that we will maintain the right of our crown and of our temporal Jurisdiction, as well in this as in all other points, in as ample manner as any of our progenitors have done before our time. And as for your decrees, we are well assured that you of the spirituality go expressly against the words of diverse of them, as hath been showed you by some of our council; and you interpret your decrees at your pleasure, but we will not agree to them more than our progenitors have done in former times." This incident is important as foreshadowing that discussion respecting the Royal prerogative which ended in the clergy's Act of Submission." (Blunt, Ref., vol. i, 395-400.)

It does not appear that up to this period of Henry's reign there was anything in the king's views, or in those of his powerful minister, Wolsey, to incline either of them to measures favorable to Reformation. The former had just won the title of defender of the faith from the Pope for his work against Luther, and the latter was laying his plans with a view to succeed to the Papal chair. Fuller expressed his doubts of the King's giving himself time from his pleasures for so elaborate a production, and attributes the work to Bishop Gardiner. "Some other gardener," he writes, "gathered the flowers, while the King wore the posey." No doubt the King would save himself much of the drudgery of investigation; but that he arranged the materials and constructed the argument has not been questioned. Henry was much gratified with the commendations of the Pope, and boasted that he had called it "a certain admirable doctrine sprinkled with dew of ecclesiastical grace." (Strype's Memorials, vol. i. pt. 1, p. 55; Collier, iv. 81, 88, an abstract of the King's book.)

King Henry's book not only revealed the fact that there was no little Lutheranism in England, but awakened curiosity to read works which had enlisted a Royal antagonist for their confutation. It is evident too that before the writings of Luther were disseminated in England, or were written,—as early indeed as 1511 A.D.,—a number of poor people were called upon to abjure certain opinions as to the necessity of sacraments, the power of the priesthood, the efficacy of pilgrimages, and the worshipping of saints. After the dissemination of Luther's works, Warham writes with much anxiety to Wolsey (1521 A.D.), concerning the spread of Lutheranism in some of the colleges of Oxford. He fears that both the Universities are contaminated. Longland also, the King's confessor, writes earnestly to the Cardinal on the same subject and in the same vein. The Cardinal sends for a certain number of Oxford divines to come to him in London. They agree upon a solemn paper of condemnation of Luther's tenets, and it is affixed on the dial of St. Mary's Church. A more impressive ceremony followed. The Cardinal prepared a solemn holocaust of heretical books, to which he gave every possible accessory of publicity and pomp. Attended by thirty-six abbots, mitred priors, and Bishops, he repaired to St. Paul's and heard a sermon from Fisher, Bishop of Rochester. Then the condemned books were ranged before him in baskets, and a huge fire having been lighted, the baskets were emptied into the flames. But books were not exterminated by fire. They were more multiplied and disseminated than before. Soon was added to them the most valuable of all books, the New Testament, translated by Tyndale, and printed at Worms. Although the price of the book was necessarily high, numbers of the working classes became possessed of it. So that it would seem from these facts that a large number of doctrinal dissentients from the Roman Church in the year 1527 A.D. were to be found in England. The fact is exceedingly important in connection with the statement so often ignorantly or maliciously made, that there would have been no Reformation of England but for the love of Henry for Anne Boleyn. It is perfectly clear that there was a strong, deep, underlying opposition to the Papacy, and an earnest desire for Reformation, long before Henry's feelings were enlisted,—not in the desire to reform the Church, but to break away from thralldom to the Papacy, and become himself in effect Pope in his own dominions.

Into the details of the long and tangled proceedings connected with Henry's separation from Queen Catherine and his marriage with Anne Boleyn, it is not possible, in this brief sketch, to enter. The main facts of the case are well known; but upon their significance and effect there was at the time, and there still is, much and wide difference of opinion. The undisputed facts are these. After the death of Arthur, King Henry VII.'s eldest son, the marriage of his widow (Catherine of Arragon) to Henry, then in his fourteenth year, was authorized by the Pope. But Henry protested against the marriage, either from the prompting of Archbishop Warham or from his own scruples. But by this proceeding on the part of Henry the way was prepared in advance for the subsequent movement of separation from the Queen. But, notwithstanding these avowed scruples, Henry was married to Catherine, under what influences does not appear, six weeks after his accession to the throne. It was on the occasion of the negotiations for the marriage of the Dauphin of France, and subsequently of the King of France himself, with the princess Mary, that the question of the validity of Henry's marriage was revived; and it was while these negotiations were in progress that his scruples were, or professed to be, renewed. Even if Henry felt no real scruples of conscience, he must have been not a little annoyed by having the question raised whether he had not been living in adultery for nearly a score of years, and whether his only surviving child were not illegitimate. Atrocious and brutal as was the conduct of the King in the progress of the transactions which ended with his marriage to Anne Boleyn, it is but historical justice to admit that it was before he had known her that these scruples, real or feigned, arose. The King himself declared four years after, to Simon Gryneas, that he had entertained these scruples for seven years, and had abstained for three years from conjugal intercourse with his wife. He professed to consider the death of his male children a judgment on him for his marriage with Catherine. He communicated his doubts and scruples to the Pope. But Clement VII., being then virtually a prisoner of Charles V., was not prepared to give an unequivocal answer to the King. After a study of Thomas Aquinas, Henry's doubts, real or assumed, were increased, and he required the Archbishop of Canterbury to obtain the opinion of the Bishops of England as to the lawfulness of his marriage. With the single exception of Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, they all declared that the marriage was unlawful. The King solemnly declared subsequently to the Legatine court that neither Cardinal Wolsey nor Longland had suggested these scruples, but that they had arisen unprompted in his own mind. He had indeed urgent political reasons to wish to have the affair settled and to have a male child. For, if Mary should be married to the French King, then, in case of his death, his Kingdom would revert to France, or become a prize struggled for by the French King and the next heir to the throne, the King of Scotland.

The vacillating conduct of the Pope on this occasion was the result of political rather than of religious considerations. He was trammelled in his relations to the Emperor Charles V., the uncle of Queen Catherine, and favored or discountenanced the divorce according to the varying interests and necessities of his position. There never had been, on moral or religious grounds, any difficulty in obtaining from Popes dispensations to marry within the prohibited degrees, nor even for obtaining divorces for personal or political purposes. At this very time Catherine's sister, Isabel, was wedded to Manuel, King of Portugal, although she had been previously the wife of Don Alphonso, his brother, and although all the parties were within the prohibited degrees. When Clement was a prisoner in the hands of the Imperialists at Rome, he would commit himself to nothing which would seem to favor the cause of Henry. But after his escape to Orvieto he reluctantly consented to appoint a commission to investigate the case. Cardinal Campeggio was sent to England, authorized to decide the question in conjunction with Cardinal Wolsey, also appointed a legate by the Pope for that purpose. Campeggio brought with him a bull to confirm the sentence of the Legates. But it was necessary to proceed with great circumspection with regard to the bull of dispensation by which Henry had been authorized to marry Catherine. It would not do to invalidate the Papal authority in the past by the mode of exercising it anew. Hence it was necessary to make it out to be a case in which the Pope, in granting a dispensation, was taken by surprise, and upon a misapprehension of the facts. The Pope's complications with the Emperor made it necessary for him to prevaricate and delay. Hence, although he had intrusted Campeggio with a bill of divorce, which he was to show to the King and then to destroy, he was in an agony of anxiety until he learned that it had been burned.

The Legatine court for the trial of the case was not opened until the 1st of May, 1529 A.D. After the refusal of the Queen to acknowledge its authority, or to appear before it a second time, it was adjourned until October. The Cardinal Campeggio in vain endeavored to persuade the Queen to retire to a convent. Six months passed away in fruitless consultations, purposely protracted by Campeggio, as to the course that should be pursued. But the King became exceedingly impatient at these delays. He now made no secret of his purpose to wed Anne Boleyn when the divorce or act of separation should be pronounced. His dissatisfaction with Wolsey because he had not succeeded in procuring his divorce led to that great minister's dismissal and disgrace. He was deprived of his chancellorship, and most unjustly subjected to the penalties of the statute of premunire for acting as legate for the Pope, although he accepted that office with the King's consent, and Henry had acknowledged the authority of that court by personally submitting himself to its jurisdiction. After discharging the duties of Archbishop of York for about a year, he was arrested for high treason, and on his journey to London to be committed to the Tower he sickened upon the way and died at Leicester. His memorable saying, "that if he had served God as he had the King, he would not have given him over so in his gray hairs," is one of the most impressive testimonies in history to the fact that of guilty greatness the root is rottenness and the blossom dust. He was a man of magnificent talents, of splendid tastes, of large designs, but the attempt to make him out in any true sense a Reformer, and to have been moved in all his grand undertakings by noble and unselfish motives, can be made plausible only by assertions which deny facts, and by omissions which would overwhelmingly confute this new reading of his life. The futility of higher education, to which Wolsey devoted so much energy and such munificent gifts, as a means of moral and spiritual reform was evident, from the fact that the greatest corruptions and abuses prevailed in the highest places among men—and he was the most conspicuous of them all—who were highly endowed and educated.

It was at this period, when all the King's efforts to bring about his separation from Queen Catherine had failed, that Cranmer's agency in the matter was invoked by the King. It seems that Cranmer was employed at Waltham as a tutor to the sons of a Mr. Cressy, when the King was making a progress through the kingdom, and that he paused for a few days at that place. Bishops Fox and Gardiner, in the suite of the King, called upon Cranmer, and the conversation naturally fell upon the subject that was then agitating all England,—the King's divorce. Cranmer suggested that the question should be referred to the foreign universities, and (which was far the most important part of his advice) that it should then be acted upon and decided by holding a Court in England. The King was delighted with the suggestion, and sent for Cranmer, and, pleased "with the modesty and learning of the man," ordered him to present his views in writing. This work was done by Cranmer in the house of the Earl of Wiltshire, the father of Anne Boleyn. In that paper Cranmer contended that if the universities and divines should declare in favor of the divorce, the Pope would find it difficult to avoid giving a decision in accordance with that judgment; or if he should still refuse, the marriage would then be proved illegal and void, and could be so pronounced by a national tribunal. It was bold ground to take, for there was involved in it the assumption that the voice of the Church, represented by the universities and the divines, was of higher authority than that of the Pope. When the question was thus referred to the universities, it was found that Oxford, Cambridge, the Sorbonne, and nine other foreign universities, returned a favorable answer, and declared that marriage with a brother's widow was contrary to the law of God, and therefore null from the beginning. It having proved impossible to procure from the Pope a bull annulling the marriage, Henry acted upon the suggestion of Cranmer and the universities, and was married to Anne Boleyn in the autumn of 1532 A.D.

Just at this juncture Archbishop Warham died, and the King at once appointed Cranmer to the vacant see. When he was consecrated he swore obedience to the Pope, with the proviso that this oath should not affect the duty which he owed to his God, and King, and Country, nor prevent him from attempting such a Reformation as it should appear to be his duty to promote. This oath, with these conditions, he solemnly repeated three times,—at the chapter-house of the cathedral, at the high altar, and when he assumed the pall. These conditions were added evidently in view of the measures to which, by the expression of his opinions, he was virtually committed. The sentence of divorce which he pronounced was not without its serious logical difficulties. If the marriage of Catherine had not been null from the beginning, then Henry by his marriage with Anne Boleyn before the divorce was pronounced was guilty of bigamy. If the marriage of Catherine had been null from the beginning, there was no occasion for a decree of divorce.

This oath of Cranmer to the Pope in connection with reservations which seemed to nullify it, has been severely censured. But though it may not be considered in itself a manly and ingenuous proceeding, yet when it is looked at in the light of the circumstances in which the Archbishop was placed, it will appear to be capable of extenuation, if not of complete vindication. At first Cranmer strenuously declared that he would not take the oath. "But," says Burnet, "this having been communicated to some of the Canonists, they found a temper which agreed better with their maxims than with Cranmer's sincerity." This temper, or reconciling expedient, was the protest which they persuaded Cranmer to make at the time of taking the oath. Here we see that Cranmer was determined not to take the oath, but that the Canonists and Casuists persuaded him that he might take it with a good conscience if he would accompany it with a protest. We may say truly that he ought not to have taken the oath with the protest, because by the former he assumed obligations which he could not discharge in consistency with the latter. But in estimating the moral quality of the act as performed by him, it must be remembered that he at first refused to take the oath; that he was persuaded by others eminent for their character and knowledge that he could do it with a good conscience; that his age and his studies had familiarized his mind to such casuistical reconciliation of conflicting duties; and that he made not a secret and mental, but an open and emphatic protestation. At the most and worst it was a weakness, and not a baseness nor a crime.

The divorce pronounced by Cranmer constituted a direct rupture with the court of Rome. It was followed by a bill which abolished the supremacy of the Pope and asserted that of the King, and declared that the children of Anne should be heirs to the throne. The title "head of the Church," even with the explanations attached to it, was not granted without some hesitation. When the King demanded a subsidy of the Convocation in 1531 A.D., the document which named the amount which it was proposed to grant to him contained this expression: "of the English Church and clergy of which the King alone is protector and head." This expression was offensive to the Lower House. Their objection was thus expressed: "Lest perchance after a long lapse of time the terms so generally included in the Article might be strained to an obnoxious sense." They begged that the expression might be modified. The King being consulted proposed this form: "He alone is protector and supreme head after God of the English Church and clergy." The clergy still objected, and at length the King sent down another form: "of the English Church and clergy of which we recognize his Majesty the singular protector, the only and supreme Governor; and, so far as the law of CHRIST permits, the supreme head." This was accepted and adopted. This title, explained by contemporaneous expositions, such as that of "the necessary erudition of a Christian man," goes much further than a mere claim of jurisdiction over spiritual persons and causes in civil cases. The act itself, in direct terms, appears to be a transfer to the King of supreme spiritual authority, and to obliterate all distinction between his civil and spiritual jurisdiction. It is as follows: "The King shall have full power and authority to visit, repress, redress, reform, order, correct, restrain, and amend all such errors, heresies, abuses, whatsoever they be, which by any manner of spiritual authority ought or may be reformed or redressed." It should be added to this statement that by no monarch of Great Britain has a claim like this to full spiritual authority been subsequently made, nor would such a claim have ever been admitted by any divines of the Church of England, except perhaps by a small group in the reign of Charles I.

But the most portentous stretch of power was made by the King, on the suggestion of Cromwell, who had taken the place of Wolsey in the confidence of the King. Cromwell represented to him that the clergy, by accepting Wolsey's acts, had become accessory to them, and thus subjected themselves to the penalties of premunire. By the decision of the judges it was actually decided that all the laity and clergy of the kingdom had forfeited their lands, their goods, their liberties and lives, by their sanction of the proceedings of Wolsey. As the clergy were wholly in the power and at the mercy of the King, the Convocation, at the suggestion of Cromwell, was invited to sue for pardon and offer a composition. The Convocation of Canterbury on the offer of £100,000, and that of York on a compromise of nearly £20,000,—enormous sums for that period—were, by an act of Parliament, called the "Clergy Submission Act," graciously pardoned by the "King's mercy and tenderness." The acknowledgment of the King's supremacy and the offer of this large sum of money secured the King's gracious forgiveness. It was a shameless specimen of rapacity on the most unreal pretenses. For when the clergy acquiesced in the proceedings of Wolsey, in the Legatine court, they did thereby but acquiesce in the will of the King. The King then held all their lives and possessions forfeit for acting in accordance with his own will and after his example. By the principle on which this decision was based Henry himself would have forfeited all his possessions, for no one of his subjects had more distinctly acknowledged the Pope's supremacy than himself. He allowed himself to be arraigned and to have his case pleaded in the court of Campeggio, to the disgust of his subjects for his unkingly self-humiliation. This treatment of the clergy was an act of baseness, tyranny, and hypocrisy which even he himself in his long and cruel reign never surpassed.

"The clergy's Act of Submission" which soon followed (25 Henry VIII., chap. xix., 1533 A.D.), has probably had more influence in placing the clergy in a humiliating position, and in limiting the legitimate power of the Church as an independent national Church, than any other or all others in the long list of the enactments of the British Parliament. While it does not take away the power of the Church in convocation, it enables the King to prevent the exercise of that power. For the convocation can assemble only on the King's writ; it can legislate only on points specified or approved by him; and its canons are void of authority unless they receive the Royal sanction.

After this period, until the adoption of the Six Articles, the King and Kingdom's independence of the Pope continued to be claimed and sustained, although no advance was made in doctrinal reformation. The great Sir Thomas More and the saintly Bishop Fisher were executed because, though willing to acknowledge the King's supremacy, they were unwilling to declare the marriage of Anne legal, and that of Catherine illegal. The effect of this was to make the children of Anne illegitimate and incapable of succession to the throne. Other executions for heresy speedily followed. Bilney, a clergyman of Cambridge, Byfield, a monk, Tewksbury, a citizen of London, and Bainham, a lawyer, were burnt as relapsed heretics. The most distinguished clerical victim to this persecution was Frith, a young man of great learning and piety who had successfully maintained a contest with Sir Thomas More on the doctrine of the Eucharist. The chief resistance to the King's supremacy was on the part of the friars. In consequence of their persistent and outspoken opposition a general visitation of the monasteries was instituted, and Lord Cromwell was appointed at first "Vicar-

General," and afterwards "Lord Vicegerent," to carry out this decision. The King on this occasion acted upon the theory of his absolute spiritual supremacy, which, as we have seen, was proclaimed in the Act. He suspended the exercise of the Episcopal authority of the Bishops during the visitation, and afterwards restored it to them in words of which the following is the purport: "Since all authority, civil and ecclesiastical, flows from the Crown, and since Cromwell, to whom the ecclesiastical part has been committed, is so occupied that he cannot fully execute it, we commit to you the license of ordaining, proving wills, and using other ecclesiastical jurisdiction; and we allow you to hold this authority during our pleasure, as you must answer it to God and to us." No King or Queen of England would now use such language; but the warrant for it still remains in the act of supremacy. (Short, § 201.)

During this period there were publications and controversies which proved that the principles of the Reformation and opposition to the doctrines of the Church of Rome were making progress among the people. In the year 1528 A.D., "The Supplication of the Beggars," a violent attack upon the superstitions of the Papacy, and especially of the doctrine of purgatory, appeared in England. It was the production of Simon Fish, a gentleman of Gray's Inn, who had incurred the resentment of Wolsey and taken refuge abroad with Tyndale. It referred to the doctrine of purgatory as that by which the religious houses, monasteries, and chantries were sustained. It aims to be a witty and satirical production, and presents a frightful picture of the licentiousness, drunkenness, and degradation of the clergy and the monks; and its invectives against them are so savage that its attempts at wit are quite stifled by them. Yet its influence on the public mind was so great that it was answered by Sir Thomas More, in a work entitled "The Supplication of Souls." As "The Supplication of Beggars" had represented them as making a lamentable cry for alms, of which they had been defrauded by the monks and clergy, so Sir Thomas makes "the silly souls" in purgatory send forth a lamentable cry lest Christian people should cease to pray and offer alms for them; and thus leave them forever in their dreary and painful prison. Another work, "The Practice of the Papistical Prelates," unfolds the story of the oppressions, worldliness, and impurity of the higher clergy. Other controversies in a more doctrinal vein were carried on by Tyndale and More, and by Cranmer in his "Book of Directions." But this progress of the spirit of doctrinal Reform was offensive to the King. A dreadful example and warning of the danger of holding heretical opinions was given in the trial and execution of fourteen Anabaptists, two of whom were burned at Smithfield, the remaining twelve being sent to be executed in the chief towns in England, to give a striking proof of the orthodoxy of the King and of the fatal results of heresy. Thus did the King press his rebellion against the Pope to its utmost limit, while he attempted to hold the people back from a revolt against the doctrines of the Roman Church.

In addition to Tyndale's translation of the New Testament, the whole Bible, translated by Coverdale, was published in 1535 A.D., and put under his Majesty's protection and allowed to be circulated. In the same year the first Reformed Primer, or book of private devotions, appeared. It contained, besides its implied positive teaching of the truth, a condemnation of some of the superstitions and popular practices of the period.

Something has been said of Cardinal Wolsey's great endowments for the promotion of learning. The dissolution of the minor monasteries in 1525 A.D. furnished him with the means of rendering this, his one great service to the Church and the realm of England. At the close of Henry's reign, chiefly through the agency and example of Wolsey, who began the work, about eleven hundred of the twelve hundred religious houses which were in England at the accession of the King were dissolved. The visitations of these houses revealed a condition of revolting immorality in most of them, the disgusting details of which are recorded in Strype's memorials and Fuller's history. It was the design of Cranmer that the revenues of those houses which were dissolved after the fall of Wolsey should be devoted to the endowment of Bishoprics and free schools of learning; but this design was very imperfectly realized. A large part of these revenues was squandered among the courtiers, and much of them was applied to the current expenses of the government. But that which was accomplished shows how much might have been done if this fund had been sacredly applied to the objects for which it was pledged. Six Bishoprics and fifteen chapters were established and provided for, and several hospitals and twelve colleges were built and endowed. Successive dissolutions of different classes of monasteries were made in 1525, 1535, 1536, 1537, 1540, and 1545 A.D.

It is not practicable in this sketch to describe in detail the remaining events in the reign of Henry; nor is it necessary in order to understand the position of the government, the clergy, and the people in reference to a Reformation of the doctrine and discipline of the Church. The cause of Reformation no doubt met with a blow by the death of Queen Anne. She was first condemned for adultery, and then divorced on the ground of precontract with Lord Percy,—decisions which are contradictory of each other. The almost universal verdict of history upon Queen Anne acquits her of guilt, but not of indiscretion and levity and familiarity with persons of the other sex of high and low degree unbecoming a Queen, or any woman of dignity and virtue. After the King's marriage with Jane Seymour, Parliament passed an act of succession, which made the children of Queens Catherine and Anne illegitimate; but in case of no issue by Lady Jane, left the King at liberty to designate his heir by letters patent or by his will. By the convocation, which met June 9, 1536 A.D., "Articles of Religion were agreed upon, which Fuller calls a draught of twilight religion." In them the Scriptures and Creeds were declared standards of the faith, the operation of saving faith was truly stated, Purgatory and the worship of images and saints were proscribed. "The Pilgrimage of grace" (1536 A.D.) was a formidable insurrection which occurred in the North of England. It professed to be a religious movement, and was excited by Priests in consequence of the Anti-Papal policy of Henry, and especially by the dissolution of the monasteries. The insurgents numbered 20,000, and were with difficulty put down by the Duke of Norfolk. Under the continued reaction of the mind of Henry and the influence of Papistical divines the Six Articles were enacted, which reaffirmed all the chief Papal dogmas, except that of the Pope's supremacy. The dogma of transubstantiation was announced in its most stringent form, and the penalty of death denounced against the denial of it. Cranmer refused to sign these Articles, and was protected from suffering the penalty of his refusal by the interposition of the King. And then followed the death of Queen Jane, the marriage of Henry to Anne of Cleves, from whom he was soon separated because she did not please his taste, the fall of Cromwell, because he had brought about this marriage, and the subsequent marriage of the King to Catherine Howard, and her speedy execution because of her previous licentious life; and finally, his union with his last wife, Catherine Parr, who narrowly escaped death for her suspected heresy.

Henry died January 16, 1547 A.D. The chief points of Reformation gained through his reign were: 1. The destruction of the Pope's supremacy. 2. A restraint upon some of the grosser idolatries of the people. 3. The Bible and the Creeds declared to be the rule of faith. 4. The translation of the Bible and its use authorized by the government. 5. The dissolution of the monasteries.

REV. PROF. C. M. BUTLER, D.D.

Regale. The royal privilege in France to enjoy all revenues from vacant Bishoprics, and to present to such cures and dignities as were without an incumbent during such vacancy. This vacancy could occur by conviction of crime as well as by death, and lasted till the new Bishop took the oath of allegiance. If a Bishop were created Cardinal, then, too, his revenues accrued to the King till the new Cardinal repeated the oath of allegiance. Again, this privilege lasted thirty years in the right of patronage, so that if the Bishop appointed to a vacant cure or dignity, yet the King could within that time remove the incumbent and substitute his own nominee, and this was absolute. The regale was finally, after many struggles, curtailed as to the right of patronage.

But as this right was, in the Tridentine Churches, the subject of concordats between the Papacy and Crown, so in England and in all independent Churches it was vested in the Crown, and formed the basis of the royal supremacy. It must be understood that it was the principle, not the detail of French usage, which is here referred to.

Regeneration. A new birth, or being born again, or from on high, which our LORD told Nicodemus, is necessary for entrance into the kingdom of God. And He connects it with Baptism as the means, adding, "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God" (St. John iii. 3, 5). Its nature cannot be better set forth than in the words of the Catechism, "It is as death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness, for being by nature born in sin, and the children of wrath, we are hereby made the children of grace." By the natural birth we are the children of Adam, inheriting a fallen nature; by the spiritual birth we are made the children of God, adopted into His family, brought in His Church under the influence of His Holy SPIRIT, then given us; a new spiritual life begins in us, with the certainty, if it be nourished and rightly developed, that it will grow up in holiness into the life everlasting. Regeneration means, therefore, a change of condition, a being "called to a state of salvation through JESUS CHRIST our SAVIOUR." It is not a moral change, for the sinful nature "doth remain, yea, in them that are regenerated." But it makes man capable of a moral change and spiritual growth in holiness. By it God "hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of His dear Son" (Col. i. 13). "Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever" (1 Pet. i. 23).

Of this new birth, or REGENERATION, Baptism is the Sacrament, for it was "ordained by CHRIST Himself as a means whereby we receive the same, and a pledge to assure us thereof."

That the Church so teaches the quotation from the Catechism, given above, shows. Also, in the Baptismal Office, we are taught to pray for the child or person, that "he coming to Thy holy Baptism, may receive remission of sins by spiritual regeneration," "that he may be born again." After the Baptism, the minister is instructed to declare that "this child or person is regenerate, and engrafted into the body of CHRIST's Church;" and to return thanks to the merciful FATHER "that it hath pleased Thee to regenerate this infant with Thy HOLY SPIRIT, to receive him for Thine own child by adoption, and to incorporate him into Thy Holy Church." And Article XXVII. declares that "Baptism is a sign of Regeneration or New Birth, whereby, as by an instrument, they that receive Baptism rightly are grafted into the Church; the promises of the forgiveness of sin, and of our adoption to be the sons of God by the HOLY GHOST, are visibly signed and sealed."

But is the Church justified in using such language? The word "Regeneration" is found only twice in the New Testament. Once it refers to the second coming of CHRIST (St. Matt. xix. 28); the other is in Titus iii. 5: "Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to His mercy He saved us, by the washing (or laver) of regeneration, and renewing of the HOLY GHOST." Here it can mean nothing but Baptism, for there is no other washing with water for remission of sins. But though the exact word be so seldom used, that which it means is frequently expressed in other language in connection with Baptism. Our LORD said to Nicodemus, a man must be born of water and of the SPIRIT. St. Paul writes: "Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into JESUS CHRIST were baptized into His death? Therefore we are buried with Him by Baptism into death; that like as CHRIST was raised up from the dead by the glory of the FATHER, even so we also should walk in newness of life" (Rom. vi. 3, 4). "Buried with Him in Baptism, wherein also ye are risen with Him through the faith of the operation of God" (Col. ii. 12). "By one SPIRIT are we all baptized into one body;" "Now ye are the body of CHRIST" (1 Cor. i. 12, 27); "As many of you as have been baptized into CHRIST have put on CHRIST;" "For ye are all one in CHRIST JESUS;" "And if ye be CHRIST's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. iii. 27-29). These quotations suffice to show that the LORD and His Apostles regarded Baptism as conveying regeneration. Other passages will be found under the head of BAPTISM.

The testimony of ancient writers is to the same effect. Justin Martyr, one of the earliest of Christian writers, thus describes Baptism in his Apology to the Emperor Trajan. After mentioning the preliminaries of instruction, of faith, of prayer, of fasting, he proceeds: "Then they are taken by us where there is water, and are regenerated after the same manner in which we ourselves were regenerated. For in the Name of God, the FATHER and LORD of the universe, and of our SAVIOUR, JESUS CHRIST, and of the HOLY SPIRIT, they then receive the washing with water." (Apol. i., cap. 61.) So Hippolytus, another early writer, says, "Do you see, beloved, how the prophet spake before-time of the purifying power of baptism? For he who comes down in faith to the laver of regeneration and renounces the Devil, and joins himself to CHRIST, . . . he returns a son of God and joint-heir with CHRIST."

(Discourse on the Holy Theophany, 10.) It would be easy to give a long list of quotations to the same effect, but these suffice to show that the Prayer-Book re-echoes the voice of Holy Scripture and of the early Church.

It may interest some of our readers to know that the Anglican Church is not the only Reformed communion which teaches this doctrine. The Westminster Confession of Faith, which is the standard of Presbyterians, in chapter xxviii., Of Baptism, declares: "Baptism is a Sacrament of the New Testament, ordained by JESUS CHRIST, not only for the solemn admission of the party baptized into the visible Church, but also to be unto him a sign and seal of the covenant of grace, of his ingrafting into CHRIST, of regeneration, of remission of sins, and of his giving up unto God through JESUS CHRIST, to walk in newness of life." So also the Confession of Faith of the Synod of Dort, which is that of the Reformed (Dutch) Church: "As water washeth away the filth of the body, when poured upon it, and is seen upon the body of the baptized, when sprinkled upon him; so doeth the blood of CHRIST, by the power of the HOLY GHOST, internally sprinkle the soul, cleanse it from its sins, and regenerate us from children of wrath unto children of God." (Article xxxiv.) And in their Catechism the question is asked, "Why, then, doth the HOLY GHOST call baptism 'the washing of regeneration,' and 'the washing away of sins?'" "Answer: God speaks thus not without great cause, . . . but especially, that by this divine pledge and sign He may assure us that we are spiritually cleansed from our sins as really as we are externally washed with water." (xxvii.)

But though Scripture and the Church thus testify that this is the proper use of the word regeneration, some good Christians have been greatly offended at it. One great reason for this is, that they understand the word in a different sense from that received by the Church. They confound "regeneration" with renovation, and "Conversion," or "Change of heart," as they call it, and some, even with "Sanctification." But there is a great difference. The new-born child has in him all the faculties of the man, both mental and physical, but unless these are nourished, educated, developed, by the use of the proper means, it would practically be as though he had them not, and the new life would soon die out. So the new spiritual life may be given to the child, but unless nourished by the use of the means of Grace, and if neglected by a renewing through repentance and Conversion, it will avail nothing. To use the words of another, "Regeneration and Conversion are two distinct things. Regeneration is God's act, whereby He takes man out of his merely natural position and places him in a new and spiritual one. Conversion is God's work in the man's soul, whereby he either prepares the man to accept Regeneration, or enables him to preserve the gift when given, or to recover it when the blessed privileges of it have been lost. Conversion is necessary either as the preparation for, or completion of, or restoration to, the state of Regeneration. Regeneration is necessary either as the completion of, or preparation for, Conversion." (T. J. Ball, Commentary on the XXXIX. Articles.)

The Church by no means teaches that all baptized persons are thereby saved, or that the grace of baptism works altogether ex opere operato,—i.e., by inherent virtue in it, entirely independent of all co-operation on the part of the recipient. The new birth is indeed entirely the gift of God, in which the person has no more efficient part than has the new-born child in its birth. But God has chosen to annex to it certain conditions, as of Faith and Repentance, which in the Infant must succeed, in the Adult precede, the Sacred Rite; and unless these be present the life given is, so to speak, dormant, to be called into activity by their exercise. In the case of Infants these are promised for them by their sureties, whose duty it is to nourish and care for this spiritual life, so that as soon as possible the child may itself perform them both, and so receive the full benefit of the divine gift, for which provision is made in CONFIRMATION. But if they neglect to do this, "to work out their own salvation," then the spiritual life will pine away and become almost, though perhaps never entirely, extinct, and Conversion and renewing of the HOLY SPIRIT are necessary to restore its vitality.

In the case of Adults baptized, they previously profess these, repentance and faith, and an intention to lead a new life; and it is on the charitable assumption that they are sincere the Church declares them regenerate. That the Church requires in all her members a true turning of the heart to God, a continued repentance, an earnest seeking after holiness, and all in humble dependence on the aid of the HOLY SPIRIT, is shown in numerous passages of the Prayer-Book. Thus the Collect for Ash-Wednesday: "Create and make in us new and contrite hearts," in that for Christmas: "Grant that we being regenerate, and made Thy children by adoption and grace, may daily be renewed by thy HOLY SPIRIT," and again: "Grant us the true circumcision of the Spirit; that our hearts and all our members, being mortified from all worldly and carnal lusts, we may in all things obey Thy blessed will." No one who will study the Prayer-Book can misunderstand the teaching of the Church as to the necessity of a spiritual change of heart in all her members.

The importance of the subject must excuse the length of this article. In conclusion, we repeat, that much false teaching would be avoided by not confusing different terms and by putting things in their proper order. Repentance, Faith, Conversion, may precede or follow Regeneration; Renovation and Sanctification must follow it, and are the proper result of the new life given in Baptism.

REV. E. B. BOGGS, D.D.

Register. The keeping of a Parish Register dates back only to the injunction of Lord Cromwell, in 1538 A.D. It was taken up by Edward VI. and Queen Elizabeth, in whose reign each minister at his induction had to make this formal pledge (among others): "I shall keep the Register book according to the Queen's Majesty's injunctions." By late statutes the older statutes have been modified, but the Canon (70th) is still in force. The Register must contain all Christian weddings and burials. It must be kept in a Coffer provided with three locks and three keys, one to be the Rector's, the other two to be given each to the two Church-wardens severally, so that all three have to be present at the opening of the Coffer; and entries were to be made in their presence and subscribed by the three together. The Register has always been of great value as evidence in the Courts. The provision in our own Church is clear and precise, but it is not hedged with a penalty, so that it is but little better than a strong recommendation, though a minister is bound in all honesty by his profession of obedience to obey its instructions. As the country grows in population the value of these registers increases. The Canon is as follows: Tit. i., Can. xiv., § v. "(1) Every minister of the Church shall keep a Register of Baptisms, Confirmations, Communicants, Marriages, and Funerals within his cure, agreeably to such rules as may be provided by the Convention of the Diocese where his cure lies; and if none such be provided, then in such manner as in his discretion he shall think best suited to the uses of such a Register. (2) The intention of the Register of Baptism is hereby declared to be for other good uses, so especially for the proving of the right of the Church membership of those who may have been admitted into this Church by the holy ordinance of Baptism. (3) Every minister of this Church shall make out, and continue as far as practicable, a list of all families and adult persons within his cure, to remain for the use of his successor, to be continued by him and by every future minister in the same Parish." There is a further duty (Tit. i., Can. xvii.) of compiling from the Register and the companion lists and parochial notitia the full statistics of the Parish, to be presented at the next Convention. The different Dioceses supply the blank forms for such lists and reports.

Relics. The remains, or portions of them, of deceased saints, or something which belonged to and was used by them, which were reverently kept at first, but which afterwards were superstitiously revered. The early Christians took up the remains of the martyrs, and laid them away with reverent care, and they held their religious meetings in the cemeteries where these bodies were laid. But they did not go beyond this apparently. But after persecution ceased, then a superstitious care for the relics of those who had suffered for the faith sprang up. But it was constantly protested against from St. Augustine's time to our own, and imaginary miracles which were reported added greatly to this evil. Relics soon came to be highly valued, and to be eagerly sought after, and after a while relics were invented to suit the demand. It is too much aside from the plan of this work to do more than mention the subject. The discussion of it has formed a large literature. In nearly every mediæval writer, and in almost every chronicle of any length, some reference to relics and the transference of the remains of saints from their first resting-place to some church is made; and at last it grew to such a pitch that no church was properly equipped unless it had within its precincts the relics of some saint. This led to many impostures and to relic-mongering and to the stealing of them. There is still in the churches under the Roman obedience a great use made of relics.

For curious details, see Smith's Dictionary of Church Antiquities; also Littledale's Plain Reasons against Joining the Church of Rome, where the references give the literature upon the subject.

Religion. It is perhaps best defined by an old definition which is not etymologically correct,—The bond which binds us to God. The later and correct derivation,—The pondering on holy things, states only part of the truth. It does not cover the lofty aims of RELIGION. For it is the glory of our manhood to be religious. It is a trust not always recognized. It is a right to appear before God, which is broken by sin. To repair it is the fruitless act of man, is the merciful gift of God, given as a trust, increasing in elevating, ennobling power as its extent and fullness has been added to from the time sacrifices were given to Adam till CHRIST brought in the last and perfected bond in Himself. In the Incarnation of our LORD religion is perfectly restored to us. He is our peace, He is the days-man who stands able to lay His hand upon both. In this view this bond is restored as of original right to every man who is baptized in CHRIST JESUS. The Religion of CHRIST perfects, and so supersedes all other forms of faith towards God. Our LORD is not merely our Mediator, not only our Atoner, but as God was in Him reconciling the world, so we by being baptized in Him have, as one of the restored rights once forfeited by sin, the right of being bound to God, having Him as our protector, and appealing to Him for aid, and endowed with the right to come before Him when we choose. Then Religion involves all the spiritual life, as so referred to God. It is the life hid with CHRIST in God. It requires of us the careful use of all the means of grace, of all the acts which bring us to God, which strengthen our souls, which nourish us in all goodness, since we have not passed from the probationary condition of the present, which involves Freedom of will. Whatever helps to holiness of living, whatever places us into closer relations with our God, whatever repairs the sin-frayed life in us which CHRIST has given us, that is of religion. All inner spiritual training, all sacramental approaches to God, all the outer defenses and guidance that the visible organization of the Church can give, the public services, the sermons and catechising, the exhortations, the receiving of His doctrine and the confession of our faith in Him, all are needed.

For in all these CHRIST appears, in all these we through Him enter upon the joyful and blessed discharge of our religion. In Him it is a perfect act, and as more closely we draw to Him so more perfectly we live in new religion. Then holiness and religiousness are our true and noble condition. We are, then, only rising to the true level of our blessedness in CHRIST. To relax any effort on our part and to reject any part of His teaching or of His work for us and in us, is an injury to our spiritual life. Religion, then, requires the careful development of all the details relating to these three chief points, Sacraments, Inner Life, Public Worship; they are directly interrelated, and the minor details which gather round each may be likened to the complex system of arterial circulation and of muscles and of nerves, which bind brain, heart, and lungs together as the essential points of where life resides and which must be sedulously guarded. Religion gathers into the proper discharge of its function all the powers and capacities of our nature. It receives and distributes to our spiritual wants all the gifts of God, manifold, subtle, and varying, from the secret unconsciously felt influence of His Holy Spirit to the public and open ministrations of His sacraments. In these things we live in our LORD, and by these we grow in grace and have our bounden duty and service accepted. It should take away willfulness, repress spiritual pride, stimulate us to greater activity, strengthen us to be mightier athletes in the spiritual contest. It follows that the perfectly religious life is one of intense activity, in the membership of His Visible Church, in the unity of the faith, in the use of the Sacramental Life, which binds us to Him. Less than this is so far defective. More than this is impossible, for the servant cannot reach to his LORD, much less pass beyond Him. But each in his rank and station of life can attain far more of it than we ever have done.

Religious. It once meant all in holy orders,—i.e., vowed to a life of extraordinary religious devotion. But it has lost that breadth of usage in a measure, and refers now only to those under monastic vows in the Roman Church, as monks and nuns, while the clergy not belonging to some order are called secular Priests.

Renovation. As Creation is of the FATHER, Regeneration of the SON, so we can also say Renovation is of the HOLY GHOST. It is the summing up given in the Catechism: "First, I learn to believe in GOD the FATHER, who hath made me and all the world. Secondly, in GOD the SON, who hath redeemed me and all mankind. Thirdly, in GOD the HOLY GHOST, who sanctifieth me and all the people of GOD." So St. Paul writes to Titus: "He saved us by the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the HOLY GHOST." It is again set forth in the Epistle to the Romans (ch. xii. 2): "And be not conformed to this world, but be transformed by the renewing of your minds." It is, then, the daily operation of the HOLY GHOST upon the heart of the regenerate, renewing it by the willing co-operation of the will: "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling, for it is GOD who worketh in you both to will and to do, of His good pleasure." This renovation proceeds, is checked, or lost, as we will to speed or to hinder or to cast it away, for GOD does not compel salvation, but urges, pleads, waits, and by all means short of taking away the responsibility of our will, brings us to a better estate of grace. Then the renewal is progressive, as growth after birth is progressive. It is of GOD, yet by misuse, by vice, neglect, imprudence, the health of the body is often lost, and the growth and development checked, and death ensues. The case is parallel in the spiritual life. The same heed to the use of means, the same dependence upon the HOLY GHOST, the LORD, and GIVER of Life, the same watchfulness over ourselves, the same care for our souls that we bestow upon the development of our intellect and education of our faculties, would strengthen and develop by the grace of the Spirit that renewed mind. The importance of Confirmation is infinite to the soul. It is the sum of all the gifts that our LORD gave His Church. The Gifts which He obtained for us by His Atonement and Resurrection are given by the HOLY GHOST, and in this connection the latter part of the 18th verse of the lxviii. Psalm is very forcible, when we remember its use by St. Paul: "Thou hast gone up on high, thou hast led captivity captive, and received gifts for men; yea, even for thine enemies, that the LORD GOD (i.e., the HOLY GHOST, whom I will send from the FATHER) might dwell among them." It is, then, bound up in the renewal of our spiritual life, and it is a fatal loss to reject it willfully.

This renewal, as has been shown, we are to share in by our co-operating efforts, and we are to confirm by the use (through the HOLY GHOST) of all the means of grace given to us. It is starving the soul to refuse them. It is destructive of life to reject them, since they are offered by Him who is sent to be our Sanctifier. In this connection occur to the memory the two passages in the Epistle to the Hebrews. I. (ch. vi. 1-6.) In this, as the laying on of hands refers to Confirmation, the public open gift of the HOLY SPIRIT having been made, so the partakers of the HOLY GHOST must refer to it also. The Apostle clearly states that the soul loses the power of renewal to repentance when it deliberately rejects, or rather throws away, the graces offered and once enjoyed. He does not say that there is no hope, but that the soul has lost the power of co-operating by repentance and a living Faith, and it is a distinct act of long-suffering and mercy if the sinner is brought back to a state of repentance. II. (ch. x. 26-29.) Here, again, it culminates in rejection of the Holy Communion, and in doing despite to the SPIRIT of grace. In this also we must remember that willful sin paralyzes the spiritual Life, and so as we go on in the rejection, so we will become more and more dead. For there is a loss of spiritual desire for holy things, though an intellectual appreciation of them may remain in the soul.

But turning away from this too imperfect a hint upon a danger ever overhanging every soul, we revert to what was said before upon renovation. It is a part of the dispensation of our LORD by His gift of the HOLY GHOST for our growth and development here in all spiritual graces, that we may be fit for the spiritual places He has prepared for us. The viii. chapter of Romans, then, sets forth the work and power of the SPIRIT involving our Resurrection by Him. The Epistle to the Galatians sets forth the fruits of the SPIRIT which are consequent upon a walk in the SPIRIT. The iv. chapter of the Second Epistle to the Corinthians declares that "though the outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day," and this line of thought recurs on through the Epistle.

The Church's doctrine, then, of the renewal of our spiritual Life by the ever-present grace and help of the HOLY GHOST, is but the orderly statement in one form of the many shapes in which the Scriptures teach it. It is correlated to the teaching upon the reconciliation which our LORD has made for us through Himself. For the HOLY GHOST, the Paraclete, i.e., Advocate and Leader and Guide whom He sendeth, is the One who keeps our feet from falling. The Collect for Whit-Sunday, the prayer in the Institution Office, and the third prayer in the Visitation of the Sick, together set forth the devotional use we may make to our great profit of this work of the Sanctifying SPIRIT.

Renunciation. A giving up, a renouncing of something that was either believed or practiced before this abandonment of it. The chief renunciation is in the Baptismal Vows. Wherein the Person, or the Sponsors for the Child, if he be an Infant, renounce the devil, the world, the flesh, and promise to serve God faithfully all their days. For it is a principle of our nature that if a renunciation leaves a void in our thoughts or habits, there must be a filling up from some other source. Therefore we promise to serve Him for the rest of our life, for the renunciation is to be final, and any reverting to these sins after baptism must be heartily repented of and the life amended. These renunciations are of very great antiquity. They can be traced back to Tertullian's age (177 A.D.), and they are probably alluded to by St. Peter in the text, "The like figure, whereunto even Baptism doth now save us" (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer, i.e., the reply to the question, of a good conscience towards God), by the resurrection of JESUS CHRIST. Renunciation applies to the abjuration of heretical or schismatical tenets. (Vide ABJURATION.) It is also used in the Canons of one who abandons the ministerial office. (Title ii. Canon v.)

Re-Ordination. The receiving of ordination a second time. It is not possible to receive orders a second time, any more than it is possible to receive baptism a second time. Baptism is a spiritual birth, and so cannot be reiterated. Orders convey an indelible character (vide CHARACTER), which cannot be taken away. A person can renounce the Ministry, can abjure the Faith, can, for himself, abandon all previous position. But he cannot be rid of the impression upon his life, nor of the authority once committed. The Church has the disciplinary power of depriving a person of exercising the powers she has conferred, but only the Giver of these powers, CHRIST Himself, can finally annul the grant. The Church's authority extends only to discipline, not to entire abrogation. Therefore a person, if he has been ordained by Bishops of the Apostolic Succession, cannot be re-ordained. If he has not been so ordained, he has not received the authority which CHRIST left in His Church, and to confer this authority upon one already exercising a ministry is not re-ordination. For we must carefully distinguish between the authority a congregation gives to a man to offer prayers and intercessions for them and the authority from CHRIST given only by the Apostles and their successors, to minister to their congregations in the things appertaining to God. Therefore it is not a re-ordination to confer orders upon one not Episcopally set apart for the ministry. But it is re-ordination to do this to one previously so ordained. If it is done at all it is a mockery, and the actors in it are guilty of a profanity. When, therefore, any minister of any one of the Christian bodies without the Church desires to take up the ministerial work, he has to receive ordination. The weighty Preface to the Ordinal sets forth these principles in compact and clear language.

"It is evident unto all men diligently reading Holy Scripture and ancient Authors that from the Apostles' time there have been these Orders of Ministers in CHRIST'S Church,—Bishops, Priests, and Deacons; which offices were evermore held in such reverend estimation that no man might presume to execute any of them except he were first called, tried, examined, and known to have such qualities as are requisite for the same; and also by public Prayer, with imposition of Hands, were approved and admitted thereunto by lawful Authority. And therefore, to the intent that these Orders may be continued and reverently used and esteemed in this Church, no man shall be accounted or taken to be a lawful Bishop, Priest, or Deacon in this Church, or suffered to execute any of the said Functions, except he be called, tried, examined, and admitted thereunto according to the Form hereafter following, or hath had Episcopal Consecration or Ordination."

The conclusions that are to be fairly drawn from this quotation are all in accord with the principle of the Nicene Canon on the ordination of those who came to the Church from the bodies who had parted from Him. Those who had no Apostolic orders in their organization were treated differently from those who, separating, yet kept the same orders, though schismatically used.

Repentance. Repentance is called by the Fathers one of the two hands we stretch out to God to implore His mercy and to receive His gifts. It presupposes some thing to be repented of. It presupposes a Person having a right to receive repentance and to grant pardon. The whole Christian doctrine upon Sin, its nature and power, and upon God's love and mercy in forgiving this sin and removing its power and repairing its consequence, also demands the doctrine of repentance. The heathen did not fairly apprehend the power of sin and the horror of sinfulness, though they knew what was sin, and felt its power; consequently, the words which we have freighted with a deeper meaning had only a surface application to the doctrine. "To change one's mind," "to change one's care," "to change from shame or fear of punishment," were their chief words, and had no exclusive reference to a repentance from sin such as Christian theology has given them. The Greek words come into the Gospels by the Septuagint Version of the Old Testament, which gave them to the writers of the New Testament.

But it is necessary to examine the facts with regard to Repentance. First note that the LORD preached repentance because of His Church. "Repent, for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand." This the Twelve and the Seventy were sent forth to preach; for though the word Repent is omitted, yet the order to them to preach that the Kingdom—the Church—was at hand, involved this repentance, as we see by His own words, and the same account in St. Mark. Again, St. Peter proclaiming the Kingdom to the audience on the Day of Pentecost repeated the LORD's command: "Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the Name of JESUS CHRIST for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the HOLY GHOST" (Acts ii. 38). So St. Paul to the Athenians, "but now [GOD] commandeth all men everywhere to repent" (Acts xvii. 30). The contact of the Church with men in heathendom requires of them Repentance. It is evident that this means something more than what we now understand by Repentance, and yet something less. That they should at once comprehend it and discharge it in all its parts, as one within the Church should comprehend it, is not at all likely. It retained, then, its primitive sense more largely. Change the desires of your cares, change the objects filling your minds, the relation to your GOD is changed through the Atonement of CHRIST. The Kingdom of Heaven, the visible Church of GOD, receives you into covenant relations, the assurance of Immortality is held out to you. That He calls you through it, changes all things for you.

That these things would be so a little consideration of the position of the Church to the world, and of relation of Him upon which she is built to the world, will show. So in these public addresses the Apostles did not define the fullness of repentance. But her work here is much confused because, having a mixed multitude in her audiences, now the second kind of repentance is brought more prominently forward, since this is the repentance demanded of a mind aroused, of a conscience quickened, of a soul that grasps something of the vastness of the salvation GOD has prepared in CHRIST. The Repentance of the unbaptized man who is drawn to the Church is mingled with an imperfect yet trusty Faith. If not as fully dwelt upon here, yet the truth that a deeper faith is developed step by step with a greater and more earnest repentance is not to be overlooked. For a repentance looketh towards GOD, for he that cometh to GOD must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him. But to him believing this and received into His Body, there is a shrinking, yet a longing. "Peter fell down at JESUS' knees saying, Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O LORD." The soul cannot go away, it must come, but it shrinks back and feels its sinfulness in the glorious power of GOD. But what are the steps of the repentance acceptable to GOD? First is always placed a Fear of consequences and a compunction of conscience. This, indeed, is natural and one that we must feel; a fear of Him is a motive, for if we did not fear we could not be persuaded. Our LORD Himself uses this as an argument for obedience, cleansing of soul, and Faith (Luke xii. 5). This fear is the beginning of wisdom, but it may not pause there. Compunctions of conscience rest in part upon memory, and these recall the past, and sorrow for the evil, bring this first step of a true repentance. "The sacrifices of GOD are a broken spirit,—a broken and a contrite heart, oh, GOD, Thou wilt not despise." Fear, then, that is only a sorrow of the world is not a true fear. It must be a sorrow after a godly sort. It worketh carefulness, cleansing of the soul of evil habit, indignation against oneself for being so stained, fear that hath love in it, vehement desire, zeal, revenge against oneself. So far a true contrition has all these mental stages,—more or less eager in different characters, but to be a true contrition equally real and influential, according to the capacity for and insight into spiritual things each soul possesses.

But this contrition is not perfect if it does not renounce evil habits and false principles of action. This renunciation while resolved upon at once is not effected at once. A single resolution, however firm and persistently carried out, cannot undo at one stroke the education of the past, and unloose the habits that have twined themselves into the character, and besides, the evil of some habits lies not so much in the habits themselves as in the consequences they produce, and this is not always evident. Renunciation must, to be rightly carried out, be done with honest self-examination and a right valuing of self before GOD. Again, renunciation must go down into the selfishness of the heart. It must learn the hatefulness not only of actual sin but of sinfulness, and so it must go to the root of the evil. The last step is restitution. It is a giving back to GOD by confession of the fault what we have taken from Him, and also, which is really less costly but far harder to do, a confession of and an effort to restore so far as we can what we have deprived our neighbor of. Restitution is the test of the moral courage of the man, and the measure of the depth of his repentance, and the proof of the power of GOD over his heart and will. These, then, form the parts of a true repentance. Fear, and compunction, and sorrow for the past leading to Contrition. Contrition bringing out Renunciation and self-examination, and these producing Confession and Restitution. As was said, the increase of Faith is not dwelt upon, nor, again, the increase of love to GOD through our LORD, and a greater thankfulness as the person learns better what repentance means and how GOD's mercy and love overshadows all his acts and he knows that the HOLY GHOST is leading, quickening, renewing him in grace. We do not all follow out equally the steps here described, since the protection thrown over some is greater than over others; nor do the complex influences at work always permit every one to apprehend them; and without guidance morbid minds have passed into despondency over their states. Many, too, brought up in godly Christian lives have not that to repent of that stains others' souls. In all these cases, wherever there is earnestness and willingness, we may well believe that the HOLY SPIRIT who divides severally to every man as He wills and who maketh intercession for us will bring each to a peaceful issue. We should remember St. Augustine's prayer that God would reveal to him his state that he might repent aright, and lest he should despair, that God would reveal His mercy also. But the results of a true repentance for sin must be permanent. Repentance is a principal part of Conversion, and this Conversion is a state so largely in our power. Therefore we should try to live in a repentant state, for so long as we live we are subject to the attacks of sin from the triple forms in which it approaches us. We are ourselves sinful and weak, and therefore stained daily with petty and corrosive frets and failures; these things wear away the spiritual life, and therefore we are taught in the beautiful prayer in the Visitation of the Sick, "Renew in (me), most loving Father, whatsoever hath been decayed by the fraud and malice of the devil, or by (my) own carnal will and frailness." The Services of Daily Prayer, and of the first part of the Communion, and of Ash-Wednesday, are all framed upon the deep and devout apprehension of the doctrine of Repentance. There is a healthiness and honest manliness in them that should show every one how manly and noble an act in CHRIST's religion Repentance is. And by her constant public use of the Confessions in these offices sets forth two grand facts of the Gospel committed to her: I. The parts of a true Repentance, so that every one of her children shall be instructed in it. II. The state of Repentance and of Faith in which we must each live,—i.e., the true converted life to which the means of grace are life-giving. So her Doctors have ever called these two, Repentance and Faith, the hands of the spiritual life. They are the conditions upon which we are received into the state of grace and by which we can cling to the Cross of CHRIST.

Again, it is necessary to note that though, of course, Remission of sin and restoration is promised by our LORD upon repentance, and is surely given, yet there is no necessary inherent connection between the two; and this is necessary to note, for many have said, "Since pardon is given upon repentance, I will wait and repent later, for I will be sure of forgiveness;"—a fatal error, for this principle defeats any true repentance, and so deludes itself to hope for a pardon that will be denied to a selfish mockery of sorrow.

There are so many books of sermons and of devotion which set forth this whole doctrine of the Gospel upon repentance, that it is needless to give references. But, probably, it may be well to refer to Taylor's "Holy Living" and "Holy Dying."

Reprobation. The teaching held by some, that by the eternal council or decree of God a part of mankind are given over to all evil and doomed to eternal death. While it is a most sorrowful fact that some will reject His mercy, and, dying unrepentant, will suffer for their sins forever, yet it is against the express words of Revelation to suppose for an instant that this is by a foredoom, but only by a consequent of their action. Compare 2 Pet. iii. 9, and Rom. xi. 32, for this.

Reredos. In many churches a screen is raised behind the altar, which is called a reredos. It is frequently carved and adorned with great magnificence. In England there are many very fine examples of the Reredos.

Reservation, Mental. There was at one time, under Jesuitical teaching, a pernicious doctrine of "Mental Reservation;" that is, that a promise, pledge, or other agreement or a statement could be made with a "mental reservation," which would make it, if under oath, tantamount to perjury. This was the teaching of a "mental reservation." If this had gained currency it would have been subversive of all honor and trust. But, happily, it was refuted and exhibited in its true colors. It was condemned in Euripides by even the lax morality of the heathen, and it certainly could not be tolerated in a Christian.

Reservation of the Consecrated Elements of the Holy Communion. It was the custom of the early Church to consecrate only in the church, so the Communion had often to be given to the sick and to others, as martyrs, hermits, and distant members of the Church, who could not be present to receive. Those of the ordinary communicants who desired also could reserve a part of the Holy Bread and carry it home with them. (Vide Blunt and Smith's Diets.) This reservation was a necessity, then, from such a law, but it led to abuses from an at first over-reverent, and next from a superstitious use of the consecrated Bread as an amulet or protection, and latterly because it was carried about in procession. The English Church at the Reformation forbade this reservation. A rule which, as having authority in all rites and ceremonies within her jurisdiction, she had a right to make, and this rule has been perhaps as faithfully observed as any other. And there is no real cause for reservation of the consecrated elements, since she consecrates on any or every day of the year (vide PRÆSANCTIFIED), and orders it in private houses for the sick or permits it when otherwise necessary.

Reserve. In the divine communication of the Truth it was always as men could bear it, yet the briefer or more elemental revelation contained within it the ground of the larger and fuller declaration of the same truth. As children are taught the elements of knowledge and these elements in a crude form, yet the child is not mistaught, but prepared for a fuller explication of them and their application in a more developed form. So too our catechism gives the minimum of what the child is to know of Church truths. A larger and fuller statement is taught him as soon as he is able to bear it. We must act upon this law in mission work. In statement of elemental principles it is proper and only honest to declare the truth and the whole truth, but we may doubt the propriety of descending to minute particulars which could not be comprehended without previous training. With this law of applying elementary instruction we can compare God's dealings with men. Take but the Law of development of the great revelation of the MESSIAH, the central fact of the world's history. Given to Eve in a hidden form, developed still more to Abraham, repeated still more fully to Moses, brought into prominence by the prophets, placed as a part of the confession of faith in the Temple worship by the use of the Psalms, it was only gradually brought forward, till in the ripeness of the time CHRIST came, born of a woman that He might redeem us all. So in our LORD's own teaching He used a wise and just reserve, till the proper time should come to bring it forward. This principle must run through all our teaching, but a wise and well co-ordinated plan of instruction will always permit the clergyman to bring forward and develop some fact or doctrine of the Church of which he had previously given the elementary instruction.

Residence. The requirement that a Parson should live in his Parish, or the cathedral official in the precincts, or the Bishop in his Diocese seems needless, but there have been so many examples of non-residence that the Canons had to take notice of it. From the Council of Sardica (347 A.D.) on this evil has forced itself upon the Church's notice. The English Canon Law is clear and copious upon it. So far in our own Church there is in the Canons but the single enactment (Tit. i., Can. xv. § xii.), "It is the duty of every Bishop of this Church to reside within his Diocese."

Resignation. The surrender of a trust or a charge, in due form, as of a Rector resigning a parish or a Bishop his Diocese. The Rector's resignation should be made both to the Bishop and to the vestry (vide charge in the Office of Institution, since the fact that the Office of Institution is in the Prayer-Book should make it in every Diocese where it is used the ruling authority in such a matter). The Ordinary is properly the authority to whom the resignation should be sent first, and then it should be sent to the Vestry. No resignation should take place without good reason on each side, since a hasty, unconsidered resignation may be followed by unforeseen and injurious consequences to either party. But the Church has ever been still more chary in accepting the resignation of a Bishop. It was a mode of describing the indissolubility of the bond into which the Bishop had entered towards the Diocese by saying He has married his Diocese. The Canons do not permit him to resign upon his own motion, but upon examination of the circumstances by his brother Bishops. If his resolution has been made during the six months previous to the session of the General Convention he is to submit it to the House of Bishops, who are thereupon to examine the case and to vote upon it. But if not within this time, then he shall inform the Presiding Bishop, who shall convene a majority of the House of Bishops after three months' delay, and this majority of the whole house can determine the case, and the Presiding Bishop shall, if the resignation be agreed to, notify each Bishop of the Church of the said resignation. And the Bishop so resigning cannot be chosen to any Diocese, whether an old one or one erected after his resignation, and forfeits his seat in the House of Bishops. But he may perform Episcopal acts under authority of any Bishop who may choose to ask him to act for him in his Diocese. But his resignation does not release him from the authority of the General Convention or from obedience to the Canons.

Responds. The Psalms or portions of Psalms between the lessons of the various offices of the Church. They were so called from being antiphonally sung. They were at first sung by single voices, with a response from the whole choir. As these responds became very complicated they were cut off in Edward VI.'s Prayer-Book. The responses to the Commandments are properly responds, and the only ones retained from the old system.

Responses. The public worship of God, from the time of Moses, has always been responsive. Miriam's story of triumph upon the shore of the Red Sea was responsive. The system of Psalms and Hymns of the Jewish worship was responsive. It was an integral part of all Liturgic worship, and is, in fact, after the pattern of the Heavenly worship (Is. vi. 3). This Liturgic Law passed into the Christian use from the Jewish services, and must necessarily have done so as soon as the Psalms were taken into public use. But it was very early placed in the Liturgy, especially in the versicles of the Communion Service. "Lift up your hearts." "We lift them up unto the LORD." "Let us give thanks unto the LORD." "It is very meet and right to do so," have an antiquity and sacredness of use which can be traced to the days of those who had seen the Apostles of the LORD. But this Liturgic Law is itself founded upon the priesthood of the Laity. There is a mutual benediction in the versicle and response "The LORD be with you." "And with thy Spirit." There is a common sacrifice of praise in the antiphonal reading of the Psalter. There is a common act of intercessory prayer in the Litany. So that most fully are the people taught that they are priests with the offering from pure lips of holy inspired words. The priestly act of the people being thus acknowledged, used, made the corner-stone of a large part of the worship, and so insisted upon, creates a responsibility that rests upon the congregation to discharge. We are bound, then, as a people with a priesthood, to use the responsive worship of our Prayer-Book. Nowhere else in the whole Church is this so fully recognized and carried out as in the English Communion. So that a congregation in its official capacity, if we may so term it, in its holy relation to our LORD, in its position in the community, by using such intercession, and in its offering of praise, is bound to respond. Responses are not appointed merely for beauty and to heighten our devout feelings, and kindle our enthusiasm, and to keep a congregation ever in a living sense of worshipping, though these are all of them results from its use, but as the worship is representative of ourselves, souls, and bodies, and representative of the people's office in the community in which they are placed, responses become acts of the highest and most solemn import.

The responses are often divided into four classes: I. Amen. II. The responses to the Versicles. III. The responses in the Litany. IV. The responds to the Commandments.

Restitution. That part of a true repentance which requires probably the highest moral courage to carry out. "Behold, LORD, the half of my goods I give to the poor," was easy compared to the other part of Zaccheus' pledge, "If I have taken anything from any man by false accusation, I restore him fourfold."

Resurrection of Christ. The Vth Article of the Apostles' Creed, "The third day He rose again from the Dead," and the Xth in the Nicene Creed, "And the third day He rose again according to the Scriptures," declare sufficiently the Faith of the Church upon this her challenge to the whole world. For if CHRIST be not raised our faith is vain, we are unforgiven; more, we believe and proclaim a lie, we mortify ourselves and ask others to do so upon a miserable delusion. "But now is CHRIST risen from the dead." His Resurrection was in a true sense the inevitable completion of His incarnation as well as the central fact of the world's history. It was the miracle of all miracles, compared with which all others are of less wonder; for all others lead up to it directly or indirectly. It was prepared for by type, though men lost the meaning of the types. It was foretold, though the predictions were misunderstood. It was asserted by Him who was to accomplish it. And in His Person who did so accomplish it, and in the results which follow through all time for all men from this Resurrection, results for good or for evil as men choose. It stands forth pre-eminent. These statements are not perhaps arranged in their historical order, but rather in the order in which we can best apprehend them. It will be the purpose of this brief article to show these five facts.

A. It did complete the purpose of the Incarnation, for blessed as His presence even for the short public ministry of three and a half years was for men, yet it would have been most apparently as aimless, as inconsequent, as those who deny the Resurrection are forced to admit our life to be. To be heralded by prophecy, to be announced by an Angel, to be borne sinless of a pure Virgin, to be welcomed by Angels, to be a wondrous blessing to those about Him, to wield the mighty Power which was His as the eternal Son of God and then to die a felon's death,—the very statement of these facts can but compel us to say, that if CHRIST be not risen, then a vast combination, effected by Divine powers upon stubborn wills made to serve for His coming, was for a comparatively petty end. But His Resurrection perfected with immortality the sinless body He had taken and the Human Soul He had joined to His Divine Essence, so that the Human Nature which He assumed and wore and died in, He by His Resurrection made immortal, and so joined indissolubly to His Eternal Nature that it can never more be disjoined, but the Eternal Son of God becoming immortal Son of man is now but one sole Person, the LORD JESUS CHRIST. So in a true sense His Resurrection perfected His incarnation.

B. It was the crowning miracle. It was the true answer to the challenge, Physician, heal thyself. He needed no healing, but our nature which He took did, and He healed it by this Resurrection, as well as redeemed us by the Atonement, the Resurrection the Three Persons of the Glorious Trinity shared in. His soul truly leaving His body at His death upon the Cross, went into that place of departed spirits whither we all go, and there remained till the FATHER raised Him again (Gal. i. 1). And, too, "Whom God hath raised up, having loosed the pains of death: because it was not possible that He should be holden of it" (Acts ii. 24). He raised Himself as He foretold. "Destroy this Temple and in three days I will raise it up" (St. John ii. 19); and again, "Therefore doth My Father love Me, because I lay down My life that I might take it again" (St. John x. 17). "I have power to take it again" (St. John x. 18). Then the HOLY GHOST is also present in the Act of Resurrection, as St. Paul saith joining our Confirmation to our hope of Resurrection. "But if the Spirit of Him that raised up JESUS from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up CHRIST from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by His SPIRIT that dwelleth in you." Then the HOLY GHOST by whom the Virgin became the Mother of Him who is our God, fashioning His mortal body, dwelling in Him, abiding with Him, was also the quickener of the Body of our LORD, "who was quickened by the SPIRIT" (1 Pet. iii. 18). It was the Crown of all miracles, as it surpasses all precedent, not that a dead man should be raised, but that he should raise himself. Other miracles led up to it, as preparatives. Elijah and Elisha restored by prayer the souls to the bodies of children. The corpse that was cast into Elisha's tomb revived upon the touch of the bones of the Prophet. Our LORD not only raised the dead (not merely in the three recorded instances, but in numberless others also), but gave the power to His Apostles when He sent them forth. They prepared men's minds to receive the fact that He did raise Himself from the dead when this action was announced. If we accept this miracle, then we must accept all others. If we reject this miracle we more than reject all others, we reject CHRIST, we reject our own future Resurrection; we have no right to believe, but can only imagine the joys of a disembodied existence; we practically reject a judgment, and so reject all future retribution; we live unrepentant, die unforgiven.

C. The Resurrection is not bound up merely in our hopes, but it had a wondrous retrospective power. It was prefigured in type, and so was taught, it may be dimly, still enough to show that they who lived before it were to be participants in it. The Ark of Noah was a type of the Resurrection (1 Pet. iii. 21). The sacrifice of Isaac was an act that not only typified the future giving of God's SON, but also His Resurrection. The release of Joseph from prison and his exaltation, Samson bearing the gates of Gaza, and the miraculous restoration of Jonah were also types. The effects of the sacrifices of the Law were the continuous types of a restoration that was only to be fully realized in the Resurrection of CHRIST. The Fathers, then, before the Incarnation had a living hope in the Resurrection of our LORD. To this end, too, pointed that mysterious preaching to the souls in prison. Not only was He witnessed to before His coming, but these witnesses had a share in the hope for which they testified.

D. It was foretold. It seems strange that Christian Doctors should deny that passages in Holy Writ which can fairly bear such a meaning do not do so because they who uttered them did not so apply them. If this were a true exegesis few passages could be applied to our LORD. But they are all pregnant with meaning concerning Him. Job could say, "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that He shall stand at the latter day upon the earth" (ch. xix. 25). But we are not allowed to believe that this involves that CHRIST must first rise, for Job may not have known who that avenging next of kin—the Redeemer CHRIST—should be. St. Peter has given the definite interpretation to the words of David: "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt Thou suffer Thy holy one to see corruption." But we may well claim the words of Micah: "The Breaker is come up before them: they have broken up, and have passed through the gate, and are gone out by it: and their king shall pass before them, and the LORD on the head of them" (Micah ii. 13). And the Psalm that saith, "But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave, for He shall receive me" (Ps. xlix. 15; cf. v. 7-9), and the prophecy of Hosea: "I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death. O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction" (Hos. xiii. 14).

E. It has a very solemn relation to ourselves and our hopes. For since by His Incarnation He became man, by the new creation and the perfecting of His Human nature the Resurrection. He has become the Second Adam, the quickening Spirit in whom we re-live here and shall perfectly live hereafter. He made it the critical test of belief in Him. It was after His Resurrection that no more doubt or questioning was permitted. It has to be accepted or rejected completely. Upon it He has founded His Church. It demands obedience, love, purity, and self-denial. He has not received unless it bear this fruit in the believer. And since the Person who accomplished it demands worship because of it, then it requires faith in Him. This is not upon the mere act, as though because it has been done it will be again, and He is only the first fruits; but also because He has power to give this immortal life in and after the Resurrection He offers; and He sends His Heralds to proclaim before all men the conditions, the love, and the mercy of them, and the terrible consequences He cannot avert from those who reject Him and His Act. Therefore the Resurrection of CHRIST JESUS our LORD, on which so many doctrinal truths (as of Justification and Sanctification, Grace and Election) turn, is a Fact accomplished by a Person who is the Eternal Son of God and Immortal Son of Man, and who personally bestows the gift of it and its manifold glories upon him who believeth in Him.

Revelation. The one prophetic book of the New Testament. Its history may be shortly stated. It was written by St. John on the Isle of Patmos, when an exile there for the word of God and the testimony (i.e., martyrdom for the sake of) of JESUS CHRIST. He was banished there, it is said, by Domitian, probably about 96 A.D. An earlier date has too many difficulties in it to be tenable. Its style, its quiet, unassuming supposition that the writer is so well known as to need no other words of introduction than "His servant John," "John to the seven Churches," "I, John," the position of the writer as one having authority in the Asian Churches, all point to the Apostle St. John as the author. The book was so received and so spoken of generally in the Church, till the wild fantasies of the Gnostics seized upon its prophecy of the thousand years' reign, and distorted it so successfully that some pretext was sought by many to reject its authority; and in the Greek Church many felt towards this book as the Latin Church did towards the Epistle to the Hebrews,—regarding it as inspired, but not the work of St. John. Its proper place was indicated for it in time, and since the fifth century has never been disturbed till recent critics have tried to attack it on very insufficient grounds.

The Apocalypse is a very mysterious and wonderful volume. It may be roughly divided into two parts. After the introductory verses, the first part is the Vision of the glorified LORD and His message to the seven Churches of Asia, part of the field of the Church where St. John had recently labored, and in which he was the last surviving Apostle. Each Angel of the Church is addressed by our LORD, who gives it some token of Himself with the significant formula, "I know thy works," and then each has his responsibility set forth, and his failure or success in his work pointed out. Of these Angels we can very probably identify two,—Timothy at Ephesus and Polycarp at Smyrna,—and in both cases the admonition sent to each fits in well with what we know of their characters. This first Vision closes very abruptly with the last message, and the second part opens with a vision whose splendor and pomp are only to be paralleled with the Visions of Ezekiel. The Door opens in heaven, and after a glorious revelation of the Throne, and of Him that sat thereon, of the Living Creatures around it in sleepless worship, of the four and twenty elders who adore Him, follow a series of visions of what was to be. The Lamb of God as it had been slain, standing in the midst of the glorious service of heaven, can alone unseal the mystic book of seven seals; and as each of the first four seals was opened there went forth a rider upon a horse with a special mission, the first conquering and to conquer, the second to take peace from the earth, the third to bring famine, the fourth wore the dread name of Death, and Hades followed with him.

The fifth seal was a vision of the souls under the Altar. The sixth brought an earthquake. In the long pause that followed the redeemed were gathered. The seventh seal is not described, only an awful silence ensues. Here it is impossible to attempt any interpretation further than to state that these seals extend (according to the soundest interpreters) from the resurrection to the end of time; some having a longer duration than others. The first seal referring to our LORD is not recalled, the other riders had orders given them; they probably were withdrawn with the fall of the Roman empire. The sixth seal refers to the work of the Church and the ingathering of all nations. The subjects of the seventh seal are still hidden. Then followed the vision of the seven trumpets. These are held to be parallel to the seven seals, but not necessarily beginning and ending each with the like seal. They display the history of the Church and the world from another point. Before the seven Angels sound their trumpets (ch. viii.) the Angel at the Altar (CHRIST the LORD) offers up the prayers of the saints in his golden censer, and after this offering, filling the censer with fire from the Altar, He casts it to the earth, and voices and thundering and lightnings and an earthquake follow. In the Trumpets the imagery of the plagues of Egypt are partly used. The blast of the first Trumpet brings hail and fire mingled with blood upon the earth. The second Trumpet is followed by a burning mount cast into the sea, the third part of which became blood. The third Trumpet sounded and the Star Wormwood fell from heaven, embittering the third part of the waters. The fourth Trumpet brings such darkness upon sun, moon, and stars that not a third of the day shone upon the earth. A pause again, that the voice of these woes may be uttered over the earth. Then the fifth Trumpet was blown and a star fell (ch. ix. 1-11), to whom was given the key of the bottomless pit, and the first woe was loosed therefrom, the terrible plague of locusts,—which is generally interpreted of the Mohammedan power. The sixth Trumpet sounded (ch. ix. 12-21), and the four mysterious Angels which were bound in the river Euphrates were loosed, with power to slay the third part of men; a vast army is given to them, and they execute their dread mission, and yet those spared repented not of their sins. Ch. x. places a pause in the series by intercalating these two visions. First, the Angel vociferating the seven thunders, whose utterances St. John recorded and sealed. The little book in the Angel's hand the Apostle was bidden to take and eat.

Next follows the Vision of the Temple which he was directed to measure, and was shown the two witnesses, whose mission, career, and the glorious power given them, and their final triumph, is recorded. In these two visions is included the second woe. And now the peal of the seventh Trumpet is the victorious proclamation that the kingdoms of the world are become the kingdoms of our LORD and His CHRIST. GOD is worshiped by the Elders, and adorations are paid. The temple of GOD opens, and therein is seen the Ark of the Testimony. The series of visions (ch. xii.-xiv.) which follow are upon the Church of GOD and her fate here, the opposing powers that arise, and their final fall. These visions are also in some measure parallel to the Seals and Trumpets already recounted, and to the outpourings of the seven Vials that are to follow immediately after. They exhibit especially the history of the Church as warred against by subtle spiritual powers of evil. The vision of the crowned angel, like to the SON of man, who was bidden to reap the harvest of the Earth, is synchronous with its whole history, till the Angel with the sharp sickle reaps the vintage of judgment. The Seven Angels with the seven cups of GOD's wrath (ch. xv.) were preparing, but the Apostle has a preparative and comforting vision of the victorious redeemed. To the Seven were given the cups by one of the Living Creatures, and the glory filled the Temple, so that no man could enter in till the plagues were accomplished. These two begin with the other seven, and recount but another side of the spiritual history transacting in the world. The first cup poured a noisome boil upon those who bore the mark of the beast; the second cup turned the waters of the sea into blood; the third also transmuted the waters of the springs and rivers; the fourth cup poured upon it gave scorching power to the sun; the fifth brought darkness, the biting of the tongue with pain upon the unrepentant blasphemers against God; the sixth was poured out, and the river Euphrates was dried up, and three unclean spirits having power to work miracles went abroad deceiving and gathering the Kings of the Earth together for the great battle of Armageddon; the seventh cup closed the series with the sound of the great Voice saying, It is done. And now the Vision of Babylon, the counterfeit Church, is unrolled before us (ch. xvii.). Her power to deceive, her vast political power, and her terrible destruction by the horns of the beast upon which she rode. The majority of commentators, both ancient and modern, interpret this of Rome. The fall of Babylon (ch. xviii.) is then recited, with a glowing imagery which recalls the diction of Jeremiah and Ezekiel.

Here the Visions of earthly temporal transactions cease. The next is the Vision of the triumph of CHRIST and the preparation for the marriage of the Lamb, and the glad summons to the wedding. But the Vision of Him that rode forth conquering and to conquer from the first seal is resumed, and the Word of God, the King of Kings, the LORD of LORDS, is revealed as leading the Hosts of heaven to the final Victory over all His enemies; the binding of Satan, and the thousand years' reign upon the earth, and destruction of all foes are recounted. Then St. John in the last two chapters (xxi. and xxii.), with a beauty of language and a wondrous tone of love and triumph, recites to us the descent of the Bride of the Lamb from heaven. The holy eternal city is measured, its glory and magnificence are recounted, and in the last chapter he carries us back to the Garden of Eden, from whence four rivers issued, but now one upon whose bank grows the tree of life, of which they who keep the commandments alone can have a right to eat. Then our LORD speaks as at the first, and this strange and wonderful prophecy closes with the words that express the yearning of every Christian heart: "Even so, come, LORD JESUS."

It is difficult to say any more with the scanty space allowed. But it may be added here that it seems strange that any Christian believing that the HOLY SPIRIT speaks as He wills by man, can ever read this book without feeling its thorough inspiration. It cannot be entirely interpreted. Part of its fulfillment we, each in his place, are aiding to bring about now. There may be doubt about the accuracy of some of our interpretations of what we feel must have been fulfilled already. But deeper than these doubts is forced upon us the conviction that its very difficulties are of GOD. Its abrupt transitions, the resumption of, as it were, unfinished visions, the gathering into this book the diction of the Hebrew prophets and using it for nobler prophecies, the testimony of other earlier prophecies woven into this, is beyond human skill. And again, to make so prominent the history of God's Church, its struggles, its open humiliations in the world, and, too, its secret triumphs in the souls it gathers in, the spiritual comfort of those in tribulation, the messages from the glorified ascended LORD to His Church by His Apostle, a continually recurring subject until it reaches the culmination in the marriage of the Lamb and His Church, is a proof of its inspiration. As a master-musician who has a solemn hymn, a victorious anthem, and a lament to weave into one symphony, takes these themes, develops them each in part, and as the symphony broadens and deepens, ever recurs to, resumes, and interweaves triumphant fears and sad wailings and glorious adorations into one perfect whole and makes his work of human hopes reach holier aspirations, so there is no note in the scale of human feeling from despair and utter agony to the loftiest and finest raptures that the sanctified heart can feel towards its REDEEMER but the Apostle has been taught by the HOLY SPIRIT to touch it for our comfort and strengthening. The Book is sadly neglected both in public and private reading, yet it is the only book which has a blessed promise to its reader: "Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things which are written therein: for the time is at hand" (Rev. i. 3).

Rhode Island, Diocese of. The history of the Church in Rhode Island naturally divides itself into three periods:

1. The Unorganized Period (nearly coincident with Colonial times), extending from the founding of the first parish, in 1698 A.D., to the first Diocesan Convention, in 1790 A.D.
2. The Incompletely Organized Period, from 1790 A.D. to the election of the first particular Diocesan Bishop, in 1843 A.D.
3. The Completely Organized Period, from 1843 A.D. to the present time.

The Colonial Church.—The advent of Episcopacy in Rhode Island was nearly, if not quite, coincident with the settlement of the State, in 1635 A.D. Probably somewhat previously to the arrival of Roger Williams, the Founder, or certainly not materially later, came the Rev. William Blackstone, a regularly ordained clergyman of the Church of England, and settled on the bank of the river, still bearing his name, a half-dozen miles north of the present city of Providence. It is recorded that he "used frequently to come to Providence to preach the Gospel." But as Mr. Blackstone died in 1675 A.D., leaving no organic result of his labors, we must look to a later date for the true founding of the Church.

The earliest enduring work was that which led to the formation of Trinity Church, Newport, and was begun in 1698 A.D. by the preaching there of the Rev. Mr. Lockyer. The first principal patron and original founder of Trinity, and therefore the one entitled to the honor of being considered the Founder of the Church in Rhode Island, was Sir Francis Nicholson, successively royal governor of New York, Virginia, Maryland, Nova Scotia, and Carolina.

Previously to the close of the seventeenth century there were but two organized bodies of Christians in Newport, the Baptist and the Quaker, the same being substantially true of the other parts of the State. But it was found that the leading gentlemen of the town were favorable to this new undertaking. A considerable parish was soon gathered, and, by the aid of Governor Nicholson, a "handsome, but not beautiful" church was completed, not later than 1702 A.D. While this enterprise was under way, in the year 1701 A.D. was founded, in England, the association since long known as the venerable Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, and Trinity Church, Newport, was destined to be apparently the first point in New England to enjoy its fostering care and to become its largest beneficiary within that territory.

On the solicitation of the wardens, through the Bishop of London, recognized as having jurisdiction in the colonies, the Rev. James Honeyman was appointed a missionary and sent over to Newport, in 1704 A.D., being accompanied by a valuable library of the best theological books of the day for the use of the church. Mr. Honeyman lived nearly a half-century as rector of Trinity, and was so fortunate as to see it grow large and flourishing. In 1709 A.D., Queen Anne presented the church a bell. In 1724 A.D. there were about fifty resident communicants. In 1726 A.D. a new church—the one still standing—was completed, "acknowledged by the people of that day to be the most beautiful timber structure in America," and the adherents of the Parish had increased to fourfold the number of the original promoters. In 1729 A.D. came Dean (afterwards Bishop) Berkeley to Newport, where he resided for several years, frequently preaching in Trinity, bestowing upon it several gifts, and, in general, exercising a powerful and salutary influence upon the young Church of Rhode Island. The venerable Society continued its stipend to the rectors of the church in Newport until 1772 A.D., sixty-seven years. From 1698 to 1785 A.D. there were 2722 baptisms, 485 marriages, and 861 burials.

The second foothold of the Church in Rhode Island was gained in what was known as the Narragansett country, in the southwestern portion of the State. Previously to the year 1700 A.D. a number of families attached to the Church of England had settled in the region, and were accustomed to hold occasional worship in private houses. In 1706 A.D. the Rev. Christopher Bridge became their regular pastor, and continued to officiate among them for a year or more. The first church edifice, still standing, although not upon the original site, and not in present use, was erected in 1707 A.D. In 1717 A.D. the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts appointed the Rev. William Guy missionary over the Narragansett parish. The most distinguished of all the early ministers of St. Paul's Church was the Rev. James McSparran, settled in Narragansett in 1721 A.D., on the urgent petition of the parish to the venerable Society, and judged to have been "the ablest divine that was sent over to this country" by that body. For thirty-six years he continued to preach the Word and break the Bread of life to this people with great faithfulness and acceptability. During his pastorate he baptized 538 persons, besides admitting to membership in the church a considerable number already baptized. The successor of Dr. McSparran was the Rev. Samuel Fayerweather, who remained until the Revolution.

The third parish founded in what is now Rhode Island, although not so at that date, was St. Michael's, Bristol. Feeble efforts towards the establishment of Episcopal services had been made in the early part of the eighteenth century, but it was not until 1719 A.D. that they became effective. In response to an application to the Bishop of London and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, the Rev. James Orem was sent out as missionary, and found a comfortable wooden church already nearly completed, at a cost of fourteen hundred pounds.

In the year 1722 A.D. the Society again provided a missionary in the person of the Rev. John Usher, who completed a fruitful ministry of more than a half-century in Bristol, dying there in 1775 A.D.

Mr. Usher baptized 713 persons, officiated in the marriage service 185 times, and attended 274 funerals. In the earlier history of the Bristol church, before the town was set off from Massachusetts to Rhode Island, in 1746 A.D., it is repeatedly recorded that men of the Church of England were imprisoned for refusing to pay towards the support of the Presbyterian pastor of the town.

The fourth and last colonial church of Rhode Island is St. John's, Providence, known previously to 1794 A.D. as King's Church. The Rev. Mr. Honeyman, of Newport, had preached repeatedly in Providence from as early a date as 1720 A.D. to 1722 A.D., when, at one time, "in the open fields," he addressed "more people than he had ever before seen together in America." The erection of the first church was begun upon St. Barnabas' Day, in the latter year. In 1723 A.D. the venerable Society supplied this infant parish with the Rev. George Pigot as a missionary, transferring him from Stratford, Conn. After several short pastorates, in 1739 A.D. the Rev. John Checkley, having just been ordained by the Bishop of Exeter, at the age of fifty-nine, became rector, and so continued until 1753 A.D., being a missionary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts.

Mr. Checkley was followed by the Rev. John Graves, another missionary of the Society, who remained through the troublesome times of the Revolution, refraining, however, from officiating after the Declaration of Independence, because not permitted to offer prayers for the king.

Services were held, during this period, at several other points, and especially at Cowesett, in Warwick, where the first Newport church was re-erected in 1728 A.D., and remained standing until about 1764 A.D., Dr. McSparran, Mr. Fayerweather, and Mr. John Graves often officiating in it, but no other permanent parish was formed. Among the names to be honored as those of powerful friends and promoters of the Colonial Church is that of the distinguished Huguenot, Gabriel Bernon, the first signer of the petition for Trinity Church, Newport, one on the earliest list of vestrymen of the Narragansett Church, in 1718 A.D., and one of the first wardens of King's Church, Providence.

Another signal benefactor was Nathaniel Ray, Collector of the King's customs at Newport and one of the Vestry of Trinity, as early as 1720 A.D. In addition to liberal gifts during his lifetime, he made large bequests, at his death in 1734 A.D., to that parish, as well as to St. Michael's, Bristol, for the foundation of parochial schools. Although the long withholding of Bishops from America, on the part of England, left the Church in Rhode Island in a grievously imperfect condition, yet it is not to be overlooked that her forced dependence upon the old country for ordination and oversight, and her continued allegiance to the Bishop of London, served to perpetuate a closer intercourse than would otherwise have prevailed between the mother and the daughter.

Nor is it possible to overestimate the value of the aid and sympathy afforded by the venerable Society for the better part of the eighteenth century,—an aid without which the four feeble churches in this embryo Diocese could not have survived. In estimating the influences which prevailed at the birth of the Church of Rhode Island, we should not, likewise, forget the principle of religious liberty on which the State was founded, and by which the Church was to such an extent inspired as never to have violated it in her treatment of other Christians.

The general condition of the Church at the close of the Revolutionary war was most pitiable. Trinity, Newport, was for years without a pastor, her property in a state of dilapidation, her people discouraged, party spirit raging even within the parish, the edifice itself being occupied for several years by a minister of the "Six-Principle-Baptist Society" and his congregation.

The Narragansett Church was unopened for worship for a dozen years or more, being used as a barrack for the American soldiery during the war.

St. Michael's, Bristol, was in ashes, having been burned in 1778 A.D. by a band of the British. King's Church, Providence, after having been served by a number of clergymen and laymen, among them a Baptist minister, was closed against its regular rector, the missionary still paid by the Society, who desired, at the restoration of peace, to resume his public ministrations. To the human eye the Episcopal Church in Rhode Island seemed ready to die, if not already dead.

The Organization of the Diocese.—The natal day of the Diocese of Rhode Island was November 18, 1790 A.D. By that time the parishes had begun to revive from the depression of the war, all having, for several years, enjoyed the services of a rector except Bristol, which, although the church had been already rebuilt, was still served by a lay-reader, the son of the faithful old rector. On the above-mentioned day there met in Newport the first Diocesan Convention, consisting of two clergymen and five laymen, representing all the parishes save St. Paul's, Narragansett. The first business of the Convention was to constitute the new Diocese an integral part of the National Church by a resolution of adherence to the canons passed by the General Convention of 1789 A.D., and by another adopting the Revised Book of Common Prayer, whose use had become obligatory only the preceding month. The Rt. Rev. Samuel Seabury, D.D., Bishop of Connecticut, was, by vote, declared Bishop of the Church in Rhode Island. Already, however, had he, soon after his return from his consecration in Scotland, in 1784 A.D., officiated in Rhode Island by an ordination in Newport and a confirmation in Providence. The Diocese continued under Bishop Seabury until his death, in 1796 A.D. In 1798 A.D., Bishop Bass, Diocesan of Massachusetts, was elected Bishop of Rhode Island, accepting the position and holding it until his death, in 1803 A.D. Bishop Benjamin Moore, of New York, was next elected, in 1806 A.D., to the Episcopate of Rhode Island, but whether or not he accepted and exercised the trust does not seem to be recorded. In 1810 A.D. the Convention elected delegates to represent it in the proposed Convention of the Eastern Diocese, and to take part in the election of a Bishop who should have jurisdiction also in Rhode Island. This election resulted in the choice of Alexander Viets Griswold, at that time rector at Bristol, who was consecrated in 1811 A.D., and continued to exercise the bishopric in a most meek and gentle spirit until his death, in 1843 A.D., having, however, removed to Massachusetts in 1829 A.D.

The first parochial reports of which a record is preserved were presented to the Bishop at the Convention of 1813 A.D. The baptisms in the three parishes, at Bristol, Newport, and Providence, had amounted during the preceding year to 137, and the communicants numbered 312. Although the four Colonial parishes had all been established by the close of 1722 A.D., yet it was not until 1816 A.D. that a fifth (St. Paul's, Pawtucket) was added to the list, if we except the Tower Hill Church, which failed to become a permanent organization. St. Paul's was thus the only parish founded for more than a century,—from the establishment of St. John's, Providence, in 1722 A.D., to that of Grace Church, in the same city, in 1829 A.D. Henceforth, however, for the next ten years, there intervened a period of extraordinary growth, such as the Rhode Island Church never saw before, nor has ever seen since, as far, at least, as the number of new organizations is concerned, averaging three in each two years. At the time of Bishop Griswold's death, in 1843 A.D., there were twenty-one parishes, of which four have since become extinct. In fifteen parishes (two or three of the largest, however, not reporting) the baptisms that year were 238, and the communicants numbered 1276.

The Completely Furnished Diocese under Bishops of its own.—After the decease of Bishop Griswold, it was felt that the time had come when Rhode Island should enjoy the exclusive services of a Bishop. A special Convention was accordingly called to meet at St. Stephen's Church, Providence, on April 6, 1843 A.D., for the election of such an officer. It consisted of 80 members, of whom 21 were clergymen, being nearly twelffold as many as took part in the first Convention a half-century before. The almost unanimous choice of the Convention fell upon the Rev. John Prentiss Hawley Henshaw, D.D., rector of St. Peter's Church, Baltimore, who was consecrated during the ensuing August. Bishop Henshaw served the Diocese with eminent ability, energy, and devotion until his death, in 1852 A.D. His Episcopate was a period of large missionary interest and activity, many new points, especially in the manufacturing districts, being occupied; not less than six, which grew into parishes, surviving to the present time as permanent stations of the Church.

In addition to his Diocesan duties, Bishop Henshaw was also rector of Grace Church, Providence, an elegant edifice of stone, being one of the first fruits of his labors.

The present Bishop of Rhode Island, the Rt. Rev. Thomas March Clark, D.D., was elected to that office at a special Convention, on September 27, 1854 A.D., there being 21 parishes represented, and 95 members, of whom 24 were clergymen, being present. During his Episcopate the number of parishes in Rhode Island has doubled, and the number of communicants nearly trebled. It has been a period of solid growth, not only in numbers, but in public estimation, until the Episcopal Church in Rhode Island, in influence and dignity, stands second to no other religious body, in marked contrast to its lamentable condition a century since.

Another feature of the present administration has been the marked decline in party spirit in these latter years, and the attainment of a high degree of charity and tranquillity. On the 6th of December, 1879 A.D., there was held in Grace Church, Providence, amidst the most inspiring associations, the Twenty-fifth Anniversary of the consecration of the Bishop. Almost the only element marring the pleasure of the occasion was the reflection that so many of those who participated in the election, a quarter-century before, had already passed from the earth, notably, among the clergy, the Rev. Dr. Crocker, long rector of St. John's Church, Providence, the Rev. Dr. Taft, similarly identified with St. Paul's Church, Pawtucket, the Rev. Dr. Crane, rector of St. Luke's, East Greenwich, and the Rev. Dr. Waterman, rector of St. Stephen's, Providence. Only three out of the twenty-four remained alive and connected with the Diocese. One of the auspicious enterprises of this Episcopate has been the raising of so large an Episcopal fund as now, for several years, to have freed the Bishop from the necessity of serving a parish as rector, and thus enabled him to devote himself exclusively to the prosecution of his proper office. At the Annual Convention of 1854 A.D., the year of Bishop Clark's accession, there were reported, parishes, 23; clergy, 27; baptisms, 228; communicants, 2446; marriages, 141; burials, 291; teachers and scholars in Sunday-school, 2363; offerings and contributions for religious purposes, $6711.31.

The statistics of the present year (1882-83 A.D.) are: Parishes, 44; churches and chapels, 49; clergy, 46; baptisms, 815; confirmed, 412; communicants, 6995; marriages, 297; burials, 566; officers, teachers, and scholars in Sunday-school, 7361; contributions for missionary and charitable purposes, $55,722.14, for parish purposes, $112,209.74; total of contributions, $167,931.88.

Righteousness. The Hebrew verb from which the Old Testament idea of righteousness is derived means to be right or straight, "as if spoken of a way." In Ps. xxiii. 3, we have "the paths of righteousness," and in Isa. xxxiii. 15, the good man is "He that walketh righteously and speaketh uprightly." Such an one "shall dwell on high: his place of defense shall be the munitions of rocks : bread shall be given him ; his waters shall be sure." His "eyes shall see the King in his beauty" (vs. 16, 17). As righteousness signifies being righteous, it is most naturally an attribute of Almighty God. Abraham exclaims, "shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" (Gen. xviii. 25.) And Elihu says, I "will ascribe righteousness to my Maker" (Job xxxvi. 3). Righteousness in man consists in a proper relation towards God, who is the Fountain of Justice. The man who "shall abide" in God's "tabernacle," and "dwell" in His "holy hill," is "he that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart" (Ps. xv. 1, 2. See Isa. lxiv. 5). Of the CHRIST the psalmist sings, "Thou lovest righteousness, and hatest wickedness, therefore God, thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows" (Ps. xlv. 7). While God commands that "Just balances, just weights, a just ephah, and a just hin" (Lev. xix. 36) shall be used by His people, these things are but outward, and a person may use them from expediency, therefore true righteousness must go deeper than the outward act, and stimulate the soul and direct the motives. Isaiah speaks of the people "in whose hearts is" God's "law" (li. 17). When David hopes to behold God's "face in righteousness" (Ps. xvii. 15), he must refer to something higher than a mere policy of honest living. True righteousness, then, must have relation to God. He sits "in the throne judging right" (Ps. ix. 4). "Righteousness and judgment are the habitation of His throne" (Ps. xevii. 2). If a man is conscious of his obligation to be like a righteous God, then his treatment of his neighbor will display a character which naturally results from such a sense of duty. Achan says to David, "Thou hast been upright" (1 Sam. xxix. 6). David's prayer to God is, "Judge me, O LORD, according to my righteousness" (Ps. vii. 8). A part of righteousness is to honor father and mother and to love one's neighbor as himself (St. Matt. xix. 19). Man has gone far away from original righteousness, he has broken God's law, and robbed God by using his body and his goods contrary to the will of the Giver (Mal. iii. 8). The "tithes and offerings" have been wanting, and the spiritual service which gladly gives the outward offering has been lacking. But in robbing God we rob ourselves, for true happiness lies in religion. Not doing our duty towards God we are maimed in our feeble attempts to do our duty towards our neighbor, and have not the ability to give rights due to others because we are unrighteous ourselves. The sinfulness of man is, however, to be met and overcome by the sinlessness of CHRIST. "And this is His name whereby He shall be called, THE LORD OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS" (Jer. xxiii. 6). "CHRIST JESUS, who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption" (1 Cor. i. 30).

Man broke the law of GOD, CHRIST has fulfilled that law, and the second Adam has thus atoned for the sin introduced by the first Adam. CHRIST now stands as our sponsor, and we are accepted in Him and for His sake. "God was in CHRIST, reconciling the world unto Himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them" (2 Cor. v. 19). The whole Christian idea of righteousness, therefore, relates to the believer's position towards the SAVIOUR. Jeremiah and St. Paul, guided by the same HOLY SPIRIT, point to one Redeemer, "The LORD our Righteousness." REV. S. F. HOTCHKIN.

Ring. A wedding-ring was made use of by Romans, and to some extent by Jews, and it was adopted by Christians, who, however, in ancient times used it at the espousals, and not at the marriage.

The Hebrew's ring contained his seal, and so the signet-ring was a symbol of authority, as in the case of Joseph (Gen. xli. 42. See also Esther iii. 10; 1 Mac. vi. 15; St. Luke xv. 22; Jer. xxii. 24; Hagg. ii. 23; Eccles. xlix. 11). Rings used by women (Isa. iii. 21). Presented by men and women for the service of the Tabernacle (Ex. xxxv. 22). The signet-ring was worn on the right hand (Jer. xxii. 24). From Ex. xxviii. 11, it is thought "that the rings contained a stone engraven with a device, or with the owner's name." Massive Egyptian rings have been discovered, most of them of gold. The Greeks and Romans had an abundance of rings. They were worn particularly by men.

In St. James ii. 2, the term translated "with a gold ring" means "golden-ringed," implying "the presence of several gold rings."

In the use of a ring in the investiture of a Bishop, it was a symbol of his espousals with his Church in CHRIST's stead.

Ritual. Modern scientific investigations show more clearly than ever the close connection between the body and the soul of man. It has always been found by experience that each constantly influences the other, but it is only of late years that real scientific proof has been given of the perpetual action and reaction of soul on body, and body on mind and soul. God is a Spirit, and is to be worshiped in spirit and in truth; but, since He is the God of Nature, and the God who, having wrought out salvation through the Incarnation of His Son, now applies the benefits of that salvation to men through the Sacraments, it is not surprising that the worship due to God is most effectually rendered by the soul when it is associated with an outward and bodily service; that is, with a certain amount of Ritual.

The details of the Jewish Ritual were all laid down by God's Revelation, but under the free dispensation of the Gospel. The working out of the minutæ of Christian Ritual has been left to the practical experience and wisdom of the Church, as she spreads from one continent to another, from the warm south to the cold north. The ideal of the Church's unity is well shown, not by an iron uniformity in small matters, but by the substantial identity of things important, and a diversity in ceremonial law and usage. The XXXIV. Article well expresses the judgment of the Church that it is not necessary "that Traditions and Ceremonies be in all places one and utterly like, for at all times they have been divers, and may be changed according to the diversity of countries, times, and men's manners, so that nothing be ordained against God's Word."

The Ritual of public worship concerns three things: first, the divisions and arrangements of the church edifice and the character and position of the different articles of church furniture; secondly, the dress of the various ministers and the adornments of the building and its contents; thirdly, the postures of the officiating clergy and of the congregation, the manual acts of the Sacraments, and the proper and orderly rendering of the words appointed for the different services, or the performance of Divine worship as it affects the eye and the ear.

The ritual law as to the "Ornaments" of minister and church will be discussed under the article on VESTMENTS. The divisions and arrangement of the church edifice have varied considerably at different periods, but have in the main always exhibited a threefold division corresponding to the nave, or place for the congregation, the choir, or place for the inferior ministers and for the performance of the less sacred portions of the service, and the Chancel or Sanctuary, where the most solemn portions of the Liturgy, and in particular of the Holy Communion, were celebrated. The questions raised by the third class of things included under the head of Ritual are so numerous and so various that it is obviously impossible to discuss them, except in a very general way, in a work of this description, but for the investigation of any detail certain general principles may be laid down.

In the first place, it may be said that public service is primarily commanded, not so much to benefit men by instruction or prayer as to do homage to God by worship and praise, though, of course, the secondary blessing is obtained if the primary duty is rightly performed. All the acts of the officiating clergyman are therefore divided into two great classes: first, those where he stands as the representative of the one great High-Priest, and, secondly, those in which he is the leader of the people in their adorations and devotions. In the celebration of the Eucharist it is evident that the Priest, in the teaching of the Sermon, in the reading of Scripture, in the Epistle and Gospel, the Commandments and Comfortable words, in speaking the words of pardon, in the Absolution and of blessing in the Benediction, stands as the representative of God, and so turns towards the people, while during the Collects, the prayers of Consecration, Oblation, and Invocation, the prayers of Intercession, the commemorations of the special and common Prefaces and the Thanksgivings, he stands as the leader of the people, who in their corporate capacity as the Church offer together their prayers and worship to God, and that he, therefore, turns his back to the Congregation as an officer turns his back to the men whom he leads into battle.

In the second place, it is easy to see that the rubrics of the American and English Prayer-Books are very far from complete, are very much less complete than those of the Roman Missal or the Greek Liturgy of St. Chrysostom. To take a few simple examples to show this, no directions whatever are given as to the position of the font in the church, the attitude of the congregation during the Epistle, the part of the church where the Confirmation service shall take place, the posture of the Celebrant while he administers the Communion to himself, the time at which the Priest shall return the baptized infant to the parents or godparents, the place where the Litany shall be said or sung, or the taking of the privately baptized child into the Minister's arms when he is publicly signed with the mark of the cross.

If, then, the Prayer-Book is so defective in Ritual directions, where are we to look for information to enable us to carry out the details of divine service properly? In the American Church seven sources of information are open to us:

First. The explicit directions of the rubrics of our own Book of Common Prayer.

Second. The explicit directions of the English rubrics where they have not been obviously and designedly corrected by our own Church.

Third. The implied directions of rubrics, as, for example, that contained in the concluding direction of our Communion Office, which commands the reverent consumption of all that remains of the consecrated elements. This rubric, on the one hand, plainly forbids Reservation, and when taken in connection with the known practice of the English Reformation period, and the practical difficulty of consuming all the consecrated wine, implicitly orders the cleansing of the Chalice by the introduction and drinking of a little water.

Fourth. The directions and recommendations of the American Canons, and the English Canons in force at the time of the American Revolution. It is under this authority that we practice the bowing of the head at the mention of our Lord's name in the Creed.

Fifth. A careful consideration of the historical circumstances under which any given direction was inserted in the rubrics;

a thorough knowledge of the position of the Altar during the time of Charles I. and Charles II. would have prevented all controversy as to the "Eastward position."

Sixth. The rubrics and customs of the Pre-Reformation Liturgies of England, where they have not been corrected or abolished by the successive editions of the reformed Prayer-Book.

Seventh. Continued custom and usage.

It is obvious that these different means of information vary greatly in value, and that to balance the evidence on any point not decided by either the first or second source of information requires extended knowledge, ample time, good judgment, and freedom from prejudice. Church history during the sixteenth century shows repeatedly that a considerable amount of ritual not provided directly by the Prayer-Book was taken for granted, but after the interruptions of the Civil War of the next century, and the long-continued disuse of various customs, it is practically necessary for the ordinary Priest or Layman to accept on any particular point the general judgment of those who have made Ritual a special study. Passing over more technical and unattainable works, an excellent popular manual will be found in the little pamphlet "Ritual Conformity," published by Parker & Co., London, an interpretation of the rubrics drawn up by a conference of some of the best authorities of England, or, as in the case of Vestments, the reader may be referred to Blunt's "Annotated Book of Common Prayer" and other commentaries on the Prayer-Book.

Canon xxii., Title i., of the Digest of our National Canons provides that on the complaint in writing of any two Presbyters of the Diocese that "ceremonies or practices not ordained or authorized in the Book of Common Prayer, and setting forth or symbolizing erroneous or doubtful doctrines, have been introduced by any Minister during the celebration of the Holy Communion, it shall be the duty of the Bishop to summon the Standing Committee as his Council of Advice, and with them to investigate the matter." If this investigation justifies the complaint, the Bishop is directed to admonish the Minister in writing, and, if he disregard this admonition, it shall be the duty of the Standing Committee to cause him to be tried for a breach of his ordination vow."

Rochet. Vide VESTMENTS.

Rogation Days were instituted, it is said, by Mamertus, Bishop of Vienne, in France, 452 A.D., upon the calamities which were said to have befallen his diocese,—an earthquake, fire, and an incursion of wolves. The Bishop set apart the three days before Ascension-day as a solemn fast, during which processions, with Litanies, were to be made throughout the diocese. This custom was taken up by other dioceses, and became common throughout the West. While the old Collect, Epistle, and Gospel for Rogation days were not retained, they were themselves kept in the Calendar as private fasts, and a Homily "for the days of Rogation week" in these parts is in the Book of Homilies. Hooker, in his "Ecclesiastical Polity," has a fine section (Book v. § 41) upon the whole subject of Litanies and Rogation days.

Romanism. The word "Romanism," when correctly used, designates those erroneous views and practices which the Roman Church has engrafted upon the Catholic Faith.

Sometimes the word is incorrectly employed by ultra-Protestants to indicate views and practices which, however primitive and Catholic, are no longer retained by them. Thus at one time Liturgical worship and Episcopacy were spoken of as parts of "Romanism."

We must therefore be careful to distinguish between the correct and the incorrect use of the word. The best help to ascertaining what are the errors which the Roman Church has engrafted upon the primitive and Catholic Faith is found in the study of the XXXIX. Articles of Religion of our Church.

These Articles were framed to set forth the doctrinal views of the Church in England after the Reformation, when that Church was purged of Roman errors, and restored to the primitive simplicity of the Faith as held in England long before Romanism became dominant.

The Errors protested against in the Articles are as follows:

1st. That the Church may set forth new Articles of the Faith. Of late years the dogmas of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary, and the infallibility of the Pope "docens ex cathedra," have been set forth. Against all of this this Church protests in her VI. and XX. Articles.

2d. That the Latin language alone shall be used in public religious services. Article XXIV. declares that "it is repugnant to the Word of God and to the custom of the primitive Church to have public Prayer in the Church, or to minister the Sacraments in a tongue not understood of the people."

3d. That there are seven sacraments,—Baptism, the Supper of the Lord, Confirmation, Penance, Orders, Matrimony, and Extreme Unction.

This Church declares that there are only two Sacraments ordained by the LORD,—Baptism and the Supper of the LORD. The five called Sacraments by the Roman Church "are not to be counted Sacraments of the Gospel, they have not like nature with these two, for that they have not any visible sign or ceremony ordained of God."

4th. That the substance of the Bread and Wine in the LORD's Supper are changed into the veritable Body and Blood of CHRIST. This doctrine of Transubstantiation is denied in Article XXVIII., where it is declared that "the Body of CHRIST is taken and eaten in the Supper only after a heavenly and spiritual manner," and by faith. The same Article condemns the reservation, carrying about, lifting up, and worshiping the consecrated elements.

5th. That the lay-people should not receive the wine in the Sacrament of the LORD'S Supper. Article XXX. declares that both the parts of the LORD'S Sacrament by CHRIST'S ordinance and commandment ought to be ministered to all Christian men alike.

6th. That in the Mass the priest offers CHRIST for the remission of the sins of the living and the dead. Article XXXI. declares that this is a blasphemous fable and a dangerous deceit, for the one offering of CHRIST on Calvary was a perfect redemption, propitiation, and satisfaction for all sins.

7th. That the clergy must not marry. Article XXXII. says that it is allowable for them to marry at their discretion, as they shall judge the same to help them lead godly lives, there being no command in Scripture to marry or to abstain from it.

8th. That the clergy should not be subject to civil law. Article XXXVII. declares that the power of the civil magistrate extends to clergy as well as to the laity in all things temporal, but not in things purely spiritual.

9th. (1) That the souls of the dead are helped through Purgatory by the prayers and gifts of the living; by the intercession of the saints in heaven; and by the sacrifice of the mass. (2) That the treasure of merit stored up in the Church may be applied by the Pope to redeem souls from Purgatory and from temporal punishment. This is usually called the doctrine of Indulgence or Pardons. (3) That images and relics may be worshiped. Against all three of these errors Article XXII. is directed, and speaks of them collectively as a "fond thing, vainly invented, and founded upon no warranty of Scripture."

What this Church, then, formally condemns as "Romanism" may be briefly stated as inventing new dogmas, using a tongue which the people do not understand, multiplying Sacraments, Transubstantiation, denying the cup to the laity, declaring that CHRIST is offered in the Sacrifice of the Mass, forbidding the clergy to marry, declaring the clergy free from obedience to civil law, Purgatory, Indulgences, and the adoration of images and relics.

REV. G. W. SHINN.

Romans, Epistle to. It was written in the spring of 58 A.D., when the Apostle deferred his intended visit to carry the alms of the Churches in Macedonia to Jerusalem (Acts xx. 16). It is remarkable for its tact, delicacy of tone, courtesy, and for the great exposition of the doctrines of grace, justification, and election. It was addressed to a congregation which had not yet received the visit of any Apostle; which was composed of a large proportion of Jewish as well as Gentile converts; and which contained several of the Apostle's kinsmen and many personal friends. He knew much of its condition from the constant intercourse which was natural between the Capital and all parts of the Empire, and, too, because of the several expulsions of the Jews who had settled there. These claims upon him led the Apostle to write to the Christians at Rome this noble Epistle. In a Church not founded by any Apostle, but composed of the different Christians who from various causes dwelt there, some of whom were of the three thousand converted at the Pentecostal outpouring of the HOLY GHOST, some of evidently later conversion, Jews, Proselytes, and Gentiles together, there was much that would attract the Apostle, and would call forth his best skill in correcting erroneous doctrines and presenting the truth, especially as he had no authority over them as a founder. He would have to state to both the Jew and the Gentile the meeting-point, and common ground for them in the Gospel. This is done with great ability and without withholding a jot of the whole truth. The analysis of the Epistle which follows is not as close as it would be could more space be devoted to it. The main divisions are six, and extend somewhat as follows:

I. After his salutation the Apostle naturally speaks of his desire to preach the Gospel in Rome, because he is a debtor both to Jew and to Gentile as the Apostle to the Gentiles. This Gospel is one to be received by Faith, since all are guilty before God; then follows the most remarkable outline of the great sins of the heathen world traced by a master's hand, truthfully, but with great delicacy. This leads him to show how all are concluded under the sentence of death, conscience proving this, since it proves that we all have sinned whether under the law or without the law. He pauses here—if it be a pause—to show the advantages of the Jew as the chosen of God, yet that all have transgressed (ch. i.—iii. 20).

II. He then shows the preparation for restoration in the mercy of God through the redemption of CHRIST, and our acceptance by Faith in His Atonement, that God might justify all alike through Faith in the Blood of Jesus, excluding the claim of wages for works, for no work can be done acceptable to Him (ch. iii. 21–31). Abraham's example was shown by Faith, not of works; so too David's forgiveness was of God's mercy. Abraham's Faith was shown in his trust before circumcision, so that the Gentile too might heir through him (ch. iv.).

III. The Apostle can now come back to the Justification in CHRIST. It is His love, His mercy, to us, "for when we were without strength, in due time CHRIST died for the ungodly." The Atonement is the source of our joy in God, and we have peace in CHRIST. For sin from Adam on to ourselves is condoned and forgiven in Him in whom is righteousness unto eternal life (ch. v.). So far the Apostle leads us without any but the most general terms. But now he changes to a narrower but far more personal application. The sixth is the crucial chapter.

IV. This justification by Faith, this righteousness which is granted to faith in the Atoning Sacrifice of CHRIST which gives us life, is conveyed to us by BAPTISM, whereby we die to sin (ch. i.-vi.) and live unto GOD. Dead to the world, risen in CHRIST. This release from sin is as a release from slavery; it is as a woman married to a brutal husband from whose power death has freed her, so that she can be married holiy to one who would care for her rightly. So CHRIST has bought us and made us free, so CHRIST has released our souls from sin by destroying it and married us to Himself by BAPTISM (ch. vi.-vii. 6).

V. Yet, as we are in the world, we must be struggling with the power of sinfulness, left as a probation and a discipline. We are, as it were, in the body of this death, from which CHRIST can and does free us (ch. vii. 7-25). But there is aid given.

VI. There is the gift of the Spirit to the Baptized, for CONFIRMATION must follow Baptism. This ch. viii. is one of the most magnificent chapters written by the Apostle. The SANCTIFICATION by the HOLY SPIRIT, in whom we have our Resurrection, by whom we can only pray aright, through whom cometh the restoration of all things, by whose working in our hearts is the call, the justification, the sanctifying glory. And here we have a glorious description of our closeness to GOD and His SON through the HOLY GHOST, whereby, more than conquerors in Him, naught of this world can separate us from the love of GOD which is in CHRIST JESUS our LORD (ch. viii.).

Here ends the proper doctrinal part of the Epistle, but St. Paul had in view the congregation he addressed, and he turns to his kinsmen according to the flesh. He would gladly perish for their sakes.

VII. Why is the Jew rejected and the Gentile taken in? It would be enough to reply, GOD according to His sovereignty could choose as He would His instruments, so He can do as His Wisdom overruling and as in man's sinfulness may direct. If the chosen seed did not believe in later days, they would be put aside, as preparation had been made by prophecy for such a contingency. Therefore the righteousness by the law failing, the righteousness which is by faith must be accepted. So, then, the Jew is put aside till he will turn, and the Gentile accepted. But the Jew is not wholly cast off, but will be received as soon as he is willing to have the veil removed. The Apostle touches upon the mystery of Predestination, and shows how GOD's purposes cannot fail, and His instruments must obey Him (ch. ix.-xi.).

VIII. He now leaves off these high themes and proceeds to urge that if these are true and we live by them, then our lives must be a holy sacrifice unto GOD. In a series of very practical suggestions and advice upon the holy life, he introduces maxims and principles which are of universal obligation and apply to all times (ch. xii.-xv. 4).

IX. He closes with a reference to the mingled congregation, not advising, but speaking of their mutual relations, because of the thanksgiving the Gentiles owe to GOD because of His mercy to them. And now, as he is hindered for the present in his purpose to visit them, he alludes again to his Apostolic mission to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles, and beseeches their prayers, that he may be delivered from the dangers he is about to encounter from unbelieving Jews when he returns to Jerusalem (ch. xv. 5-33).

X. The last chapter (xvi.) is filled up with courteous salutations and messages to friends and kinsmen in Rome, and with a beautiful and characteristic ascription to GOD he ends the Epistle.

It is a wonderful composition, whether we consider its grace and skill, or its doctrinal teachings, or the broad sweep of the lofty thoughts and of the revelations given us through the Apostle. It is of value, too, as telling the fact that the Roman Church had no Apostolic founder, and must have been only strengthened by the later presence of St. Paul, and possibly of St. Peter, who at this date was in the East. There are many questions that grow out of side statements of the Apostle, such as were pertinent to, but not involved in, the main links of his argument,—those chiefly relating to election and grace,—which we have not room to discuss, but only mention; thus we may also note that whereas this Epistle is often used now to defend extreme statements upon these topics, the Church used it for a general defense of the doctrine of the freedom of the will, and of the broad and full gifts of GOD's grace. Much of the matter in this Epistle is related to the arguments in the Epistle to the Galatians.

Rood. A cross (rod). The Rood was the Cross placed upon the beam or across the arch of the Choir, or surmounted the Screen or lattice-work of the Chancel, which was carried up quite high. This was then called a Rood-Screen, for it was the carved screen-work which was finished by the Cross placed upon it.

Rood-Loft. Often the screen was given more weight, was made of stone, and was turned into a gallery, gained by a well staircase. It still, of course, bore the Cross, carved prominently upon it. It was large enough to be turned into a chapel with an Altar in it in some churches, and is now, wherever it has been preserved, made use of as an organ-loft. It is claimed that there are no instances of the Rood-Screen or Rood-Loft earlier than the twelfth century.

Rubric. Literally, a direction or remark written in red letter. The word is borrowed from the phraseology of the old Roman Law-books, in which the titles, remarks, and sometimes the leading decisions were written in red ink. In the same way the regulations for the manner of performing the sacred offices of the Church were called rubrics, and were commonly written in red characters to make them easily distinguishable from the text of the office itself. (Smith's Dict. of Christian Antiquities, sub voc.) The body of the rubrics formed a compilation at first separate from the Liturgy, which contained comparatively few rubrics. There were regulations in force at one time ordering the Priest to report what ceremonial he used in the several offices of the Church. The office-books, however, gradually introduced more rubrics, and they were often so elaborate as to be confusing and contradictory. The mass of rubrics was constantly increasing, and the various Diocesan usages were adding to the confusion. In England, the uses of Bangor, Hertford, Winchester, Lincoln, Durham, and others clashed with the more popular use of Sarum; and the Roman use, though not in force, also was used. So that there was, as the Preface to the First Prayer-Book of Edward VI. declared, "more business to find out what should be read than to read it when it was found out." And one of the ends sought to be accomplished by this Book was that it should be a complete directory. "Furthermore, by this order, the curates shall need but none other books for their public service but this book and the Bible; by means whereof the people shall not be at so great charge for books as in time past they have been."

It was therefore to supersede all other preceding uses. All other rubrics were abrogated, and these only were to be in use. And proper provision was made for the due interpretation of any doubts,—“And forso-much as nothing can almost be so plainly set forth but doubts may rise in the use and practicing of the same, to appease all such diversity (if any arise), and for the resolution of all such doubts concerning the manner how to understand, do, and execute the things contained in this book, the parties that so doubt or diversely take anything shall always resort to the Bishop of the Diocese, who, by his discretion, shall take order for the quieting and appeasing of the same, so that the same order be not contrary to anything contained in this book.” And the Prayer-Book of 1552 A.D. adds: “And if the Bishop of the Diocese be in any doubt, then he may send for the resolution thereof to the Archbishop.” (Preface to the English Prayer-Book.) This, then, cuts off the authority of all previous orders, ceremonials, or Pontificals, and makes the Prayer-Book the sole source for rubrical information and direction in understanding, doing, and executing the offices of the book. No rubrics from other sources can be introduced. Still, since these rubrics are in nearly every instance either translations or modifications of the older ritual, it follows that, to explain them, recourse must be had to these rituals, but simply as illustrating or correcting our apprehension of the application of our own Rubrics. For Rubrics have a very peculiar position in the great body of Church Law. They are inherited; they cannot be changed without much delay, a thorough sifting, and by constitutional enactment. Other Laws and Canons are applicable only either to certain circumstances, provide for certain contingencies, enact penalties for certain offenses, or supply remedies for certain defects, and therefore receive special attention only upon given occasions. But the Rubrics are of unceasing use and practice in the solemn public and constantly recurring worship of the Church. They are prominently before every congregation in the land. They demand constant observance in what they prescribe, and they presuppose a proper preparation for their fulfilment. They may be classified as (a) those concerning the general but positive directions for the service, e.g., the Rubrics for Morning and Evening Prayer; (b) those of the less frequent offices, or private offices which allow some liberty, e.g., those of the Visitation of the Sick and Prisoners and Family Prayer, Offices at Sea, and (c) those directions which concern the general conduct of the people as members of the Church, e.g., those who shall be admitted to Confirmation and Communion, the disciplinary Rubrics prefacing the order for the Holy Communion: the Rubrics upon the Catechism put at the end of it. Nearly every Rubric will fall under one or other of these divisions. Those concerning the public worship and the administration of the Sacraments and the several offices that may be demanded upon occasion, as those of Confirmation, Institution, Ordination, form upon these respective topics as nearly complete directions as in the nature of the case could be required. There are gaps and deficiencies in the code of Rubrics, it is true, but some of these will be accounted for farther on. (vide also RITUAL.)

It must be here noted that these Rubrics form a complex but beautifully compacted Order of Service upon certain clear and well-defined principles, which set forth through them a harmonious order of worship. They thus form the Law upon the highest spiritual acts which Priest and people can join in, and so are of the strongest obligation. We should feel ourselves bound to carry them out strictly, and to provide such arrangements of the House of God, and such furniture and other conveniences that may enable us devoutly and reverently to celebrate our Public Worship according to their directions. Since, then, so many are concerned in their punctual discharge, and they form so much of our spiritual training, their observance or neglect or transgression is keenly felt by most, and in the last two instances is of positive loss and detriment to all concerned. For the minister is under solemn promise to obey them, and the people receive the Prayer-Book as a part of their spiritual inheritance. For us in the American Church the Rubrics are of the revision of 1789 A.D.; but while omission of a rubric in a deliberate revision like this must be equivalent to repeal or abrogation, we can go for explanation of things not supplied, or for illustration or other guidance, to the English Revision of 1662 A.D., and thence to that of 1552 A.D., and thence to the First Prayer-Book of 1549 A.D. These are our guides in the study of our rubrical Law, and for historical data we should apply to the older body of Rubrical Observances in the pre-Reformation period. It is not possible here to go into any full discussion of the Rubrics, but it should be pointed out how materially the care for the proper arrangement of the Church gives point and sense to the Rubric, and how flexible in many regards they really are. The Rubric for the saying of Morning and Evening Prayer does not prescribe, but takes for granted that there is all proper provision of stalls and of seats made (vide DESK, LITANY-STOOL, STALL), and of a Lection for the Bible a proper place, whether a pulpit or desk, for the Sermon a credence-table in the chancel, and so of other necessary and accustomed furniture, vessels, and vestments. (Vide ORNAMENTS.)

But in every code of Rubrics there is an amount of omission which requires some living authority, which shall decide what things are to be supplied or what are prohibited. In our own case, while the omission of specific Rubrics in the English Prayer-Book amounts to a prohibition, the omission to enumerate what is not enumerated in the English Prayer-Book cannot be construed as a prohibition, but rather the contrary. Again, there is a minimum below which disobedience asserts itself, and a maximum beyond which observance of the Rubric ceases. What these limits are and how far the place, the congregation, and the means for the due conduct of divine service modify use, and what interpretation should be put upon the Rubrics, belong to the Ordinary to decide. But it is by no means within the power of the Bishop to add to or to diminish the Rubric, nor can he set it aside. Again, the right interpretation of the Rubric is parallel to the like interpretation of an ambiguous Canon or an ambiguous Law. The history and scope of the Rubric must be considered. And, as in the matter of godly admonitions (q. v.), the Bishop has no right to forbid a practice proven to be strictly rubrical, simply because it does not coincide with what he deems fit and reverent. And again, non-usage or contrary custom cannot stand for a moment against a plain Rubric. But he has a right to enjoin a cessation of practices that are yet in doubt till such doubt is resolved, and to forbid all strange and intrusive practices interpolated into the service and which are injurious to or subversive of the Catholic doctrines of the Church. Obedience to such injunctions is a mark of a true love for CHRIST His Church. The Preface of the English Prayer-Book contains these pregnant words: "And although the keeping or omitting of a ceremony in itself considered is but a small thing, yet the wilful and contemptuous transgression and breaking of a common order and discipline is no small offence before God."

The missionary character of the Church in this country and the exigencies of the hour, as well as our colonial history, have affected the tone and spirit of our rubrical observances. When the work is wholly missionary and the services cannot be rendered, no rubrical observance is possible. But the instant a congregation is formed the authority of the rubrical Law asserts itself, and the Laity are bound as parties to its observance and as holders of the means therefor, to supply all due and proper furniture, vessels, and vestments for carrying out its provisions in the several services and offices of the Prayer-Book, and for the enforcement of such of its directions as the congregation or the several members thereof can and ought to observe, both in the regular services and in the cautionary and disciplinary Rubrics. In too many instances the Laity have taken no notice of their obligations, and have allowed or even forced usages to arise which are contrary to this part of Church Law and order. A better knowledge and study of the Rubrics will always lead to a better observance of them.

Rule of Faith. By this is meant that measure of indubitable truth by which all statements in religion are to be tested.

There may be opinions, fancies, views, interpretations, but nothing is to be set forth as absolutely essential in religion which is not according to the Rule of Faith.

The principle laid down by Vincentius of Lerins, 434 A.D., is a safe one for all Churchmen. It is this: "We must be peculiarly careful to hold that which hath been believed in all places, at all times and by all the faithful." It is often quoted in its briefer Latin form thus: "Quod ubique, quod semper, quod ab omnibus creditum est." According to this principle we may determine the Rule of Faith by looking for universality, antiquity, and consent.

Whatever thus gained the assent of believers must have been based upon the teachings of the Master, whose command to the Apostles was: "Go ye, therefore, teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the FATHER, and of the SON, and of the HOLY GHOST; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you."

In the effort to teach others what the LORD had commanded them there grew up of necessity a Creed, not formally set forth, or issued by Apostolic authority formally given, but a form of sound words which in its essential features has been accepted by Christians in all the ages all along as the Rule of Faith in the essential doctrines of Christianity.

Irenæus said, "thus the Church; scattered though it be throughout the whole world, hath received from the Apostles and their disciples faith in one God," and then follow the several terms of the Creed, and he adds, "the faith of the Church is in accordance with it, her preaching and instruction and tradition are in harmony with it." Tertullian says the rule of faith is altogether one, it alone is invariable and unalterable, namely, "of faith in one God, the Creator of the world," etc., and he goes on to enumerate the other articles of the Creed.

For some years after the establishment of the Church there were no written records such as now constitute the Canon of New Testament Scriptures. The Faith was taught orally from one to another. It may be that the first records were liturgies in which the form of some words was preserved. Fragments of these "liturgical germs," as they may be called, are preserved in the Epistles of the New Testament.

It pleased GOD, the HOLY GHOST, to inspire men to write accounts of the life and sayings of the LORD JESUS, of the planting of the Church, and to compose letters to the Churches. In these various compositions there were preserved the truths which had formerly been taught orally. The Church did not grow out of the Scriptures, nor did it gain its Faith primarily from them. The Church was founded, with its ministry, sacraments, ordinances, and doctrines, before a line of New Testament Scripture was written.

The Canon of the New Testament Scriptures was determined by the application of the simple principle to each book, Does this writing contain what is agreeable to the Faith which the Church has received? The Canon being once established, Holy Scripture was thenceforth to be appealed to as containing whatever was essential in Christian doctrine, and hence our Church in the VI. Article of Religion declares that "whatsoever is not read therein nor may be proved thereby is not to be required of any man that it should be believed as an article of the Faith, or be thought requisite or necessary to salvation." No part of our belief, therefore, is to rest upon mere tradition. We are to appeal to the infinitely superior authority of Scripture, and to make it the only final resort. It is there that we can find the sure means of ascertaining the Rule of Faith, the teaching of CHRIST and His inspired servants.

A division may be made between what is the Rule of Faith with reference to essentials, and what has been the common belief of the majority of Christians in the ages all along with reference to points not essential to salvation.

Sometimes this latter classification is confounded with the former, and points are pressed as included within the Rule of Faith which really do not belong there. They may be agreeable to it, but not included within it, as essentials.

The need of giving attention to this point is shown by considering the position of the Roman Church on the one hand, and modern denominations of Christians on the other. Rome widens the Rule of Faith by adding to the teachings of Scripture the traditions which had their origin in obscurity, and the decisions of Popes whom she declares infallible. Hence the Rule of Faith may be different (according to this view) from age to age.

Modern Christian sects, on the other hand, deny, obscure, belittle, or omit portions of the Faith, and consequently do not present before us that indubitable truth by which all views are to be measured.

It is the glory of our branch of the Christian Church that in its ministry, sacraments, ordinances, creeds, and liturgy it aims to preserve the Rule of Faith as it was received everywhere, by all and in every place before there were divisions in the Body of CHRIST. REV. G. W. SHINN.

Rural Dean was at first the same as the Archpresbyter; but he obtained his title of Decanus ruralis about the time of Charlemagne (800 A.D. circ.). The office was introduced into England about 1052 A.D., in the days of Edward the Confessor. Its development into the present office and functions of the English Rural Dean followed as the Church's needs and work developed. The functions of the office are well set forth in the oath of office, which was in some Dioceses anciently administered: "I, A. B., do swear diligently and faithfully to execute the office of Rural Dean within the Deanery of D. First, I will diligently and faithfully execute, or cause to be executed, all such processes as shall be directed unto me, from my Lord Bishop of C., or his officers, or ministers by his authority. Item, I will give diligent attendance by myself or my deputy at every consistory court to be holden by the said reverend father in God, or his Chancellor, as well as to return such processes as shall be by me or my deputy executed; as also to receive others there unto me to be directed. Item, I will from time to time during my said office diligently inquire, and true information give, unto the said reverend father in God, or his Chancellor, of all the names of all such persons within the said deanery of D. as shall be openly and publicly noted and defamed, or vehemently suspected of any crime or offense as is to be punished or reformed by the authority of the said court. Item, I will diligently inquire, and true information give, of all such persons and their names as do administer any dead man's goods before they have proved the will of the testator or taken letters of administration of the deceased intestates. Item, I will be obedient to the right reverend father in God, J., Bishop of C., and his Chancellor, in all honest and lawful commands; neither will I attempt, do, or procure to be done or attempted, anything that shall be prejudicial to his jurisdiction, but will preserve and maintain the same to the uttermost of my power." They convened rural chapters of all the instituted clergy or their curates as proxies for them, and presided as Prolocutors. The office of Rural Dean has only within the last forty years been revived in England. His powers are simply of inspection. It has been partially imitated in several Dioceses in this country by giving this title to the president of Convocation. It has always in its past history been found to be a convenient rather than a necessary office. It has a good deal of interest attached to it, since it appears that at one time the Rural Dean was made a Chorepiscopus—or country bishop—with restraint, but this delegation of Episcopal powers was inhibited by Alexander III., 1089 A.D. But Archbishop Ussher in his scheme for a "Moderate Episcopacy," which he propounded just before the great rebellion (1640 A.D.), proposed to erect the rural Deaneries into Sees. The office, were it generally revived, could be made a very important adjunct to the work of the Church in this country. But in order that it should be efficient and obtain that weight which would make it influential, it should be instituted by a common consent of the Bishops and Dioceses. The observation of the old canonist Lindwood upon Rural Deans in his day was, that they were rather after the custom of the country than founded by Canon Law. (Magis nituntur consuetudini patriæ quam usui communi.) And this will probably belong always to the office. (Burn's Eccl. Law, vol. ii. p. 120.)

Ruth. The short book of Ruth is perhaps one of the loveliest idyls extant in any language, apart from its canonical authority and from its historical importance in the Christology of the Old Testament. It is the record of the heathen ancestress of our LORD introduced into the line of His forefathers after their settlement in Canaan. The migration of Naomi and Elimelech to the land of Moab because of the famine, the marriage of Mahlon to Ruth, his death, and Naomi's desire in her widowhood to return to Judah, all are told with the utmost simplicity and directness. The touching devotion of Ruth, "Whither thou goest I will go, and where thou lodgest I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God; where thou diest I will die, and there will I be buried. The LORD do so to me and more also if aught but death do part me and thee" (Ruth i. 16, 17), reveals the depth of loving character that fitted her to be taken into the chosen people. The narrative that follows, of Boaz and his generous treatment and protection of the homeless widow and her daughter-in-law, is in perfect keeping with the time, the customs, and usages of the age to which it refers. But still more important is the record of the steps by which, upon the surrender of the nearest of kin, Boaz secured the right of purchase of the inheritance which belonged to the family. It is a type of the Redeemer; the "Goel" which, as Boaz became by the plucking off the shoe, CHRIST became by His redemption. "Over Edom will I cast out my shoe: Philistia, triumph thou because of me" (Ps. lx. 8).

The Book was most probably written during David's lifetime, certainly not earlier than the latter days of Samuel. The customs and slight notes of manner, the absence of any prejudice against a stranger, the straightforward character of the narrative, the slight details that are preserved, all attest to its genuineness.

S.

Sabaoth. A peculiar title of JEHOVAH. The Anglicized word occurs only twice in King James' Version, but it is a frequent appellation of God. The LORD of Hosts is His Name. It was the ascription of the Seraphim, Holy, Holy, Holy is the LORD of Hosts. It has become a familiar title from its use in the TE DEUM, but in its translated form it is also in the preface in the Communion Service. The LORD of all the hosts of heaven and of earth, it is our LORD's title, for He whose vesture was dipped in blood, whose name is the Word of God, upon whose vesture and thigh is written KING of Kings and LORD of Lords, leads the armies which are in heaven.

Sabbatarians. Those who observe the Sabbath-day because they allege that there is no sufficient proof to them that there is any authority to change from the Sabbath to the first day of the week. They have but little foothold in this country.

Sabbath. The Jewish day of rest. It was peculiarly so called, for it was doubly typical: I. As of the ceasing from the creation of this world. II. As of the day when God gave His people rest from their bondage in Egypt. Both of these arguments are given each in the separate forms of the Covenant as recited at Sinai, and as repeated by Moses in the Book of Deuteronomy. It is, then, no light thing for the Church, guided by the HOLY GHOST, to have changed from a day of rest so impressively commanded to the LORD's day. (Vide SUNDAY.) The Sabbath, as a sacredly observed day, was probably, though not certainly, older than the Mosaic age, and came of the Patriarchs. In fact, upon the general ground of regularity in the offering of worship, it becomes very probable, and we know that the period of weeks was used. But the institution of the Sabbath is founded not merely on Jewish needs; it is of the highest human observance also, as it meets the needs of man both in the offering of worship and in the necessity of rest from manual and secular occupations. The name itself gives the reason of its recurrence,—rest. Its place on the Tables of Stone gave it a rank that was beyond other ritual enactments of the Mosaic Law. It was made a part of the Covenant. It was put as an observance ever to be kept in mind. Its pollution was one of the grave charges against the Nation. It was a day far above all but the great feasts in the strictness in which it was to be observed, and the trials of the Maccabean Kingdom stamped its full ritual, even burdensome, observance upon the Nation.

Our LORD's own observance of the Day and His protests against its abuse, are well known. But all allusion to it ceases in the Epistles. In the Acts we trace a change by the reference to the first day of the week, and in the Apocalypse to the LORD's day. The tracing of the change will be found in the Article SUNDAY. But here it is noted that Sunday being the equivalent and so accepted of the Sabbath, the covenant to observe the LORD's day as our LORD has taught us is obligatory upon us. And so as the prosperity of the Jew rested in part upon the sanctity with which he observed the day, so the Christian observance of the day is a part of our national prosperity. It is evidently so, even upon the low ground of the perpetually recurring instruction on that day in morals and in general religious instruction, not to dwell upon the worship due to our God. The Sabbath was invaluable as a means of instructing the people who were gathered into the synagogues. But the Sabbath took in a wider range, also founded upon the use of the number seven. The seventh day for rest and worship; the seventh week after the Passover brought the Feast of Pentecost; the seventh year was the year of rest for the ground,—the Sabbatical year—the non-observance of which regulation brought upon the people their seventy years of captivity; then the year of the seven times the Sabbatical year,—the Jubilee, which was the year of release of all hired servants sold for debt, and of release of all estates that had been sold for various reasons. The year of Jubilee was the year of restoration. It was in itself a wise provision, which recent political disturbances, based upon tenure of land, has brought up into discussion. But beyond this thought of its political importance, there is also the spiritual significance as a type of the great day of redemption and of release in the Kingdom of CHRIST. The Sabbath, then, was a part of the Covenant made with men as fundamental. Its change to the Sunday will be traced elsewhere, but its sanctity, so defended and so insisted on, is given as a guide to us for our observance of the LORD's day. The due observance, which was a blessing in the one, is a blessing in the other also. But it is not proper to give the name of the Jewish Sabbath to the LORD's day, and Churchmen should be very careful not to confuse the two in ordinary conversation.

Sacrament. A Latin word, not found in the New Testament, meaning a solemn oath, originally a judicial phrase, afterwards applied to the oath taken by soldiers to the government. Ecclesiastical writers used it as a translation of the Greek word μυστήριον, mystery (though it does not seem to express the same idea), and so finally it came to be applied only to certain rites and ceremonies which under some external form set forth spiritual truths. In this sense it had a very wide application, so that nearly every religious act or doctrine was called a sacrament; even the creed was so styled by a Latin writer. (See Smith's Dict. Christian Antiq.) The Church of Rome eventually, by a decree of the Synod of Trent, limited the number to be called Sacraments to seven; viz., Baptism, the LORD's Supper, Confirmation, Penance, Orders, Matrimony, and Extreme Unction, pronouncing Anathema on those who say there are more or less than these seven. In the lax sense of the word noted above it may be applied to these, but need not be confined to them. The error is in declaring all the seven, as that Council does, to have been instituted by CHRIST Himself, which is not true of five, and also making them all necessary for salvation, which they are not. Article XXV. declares of these, that they "are not to be counted for Sacraments of the Gospel, being such as have grown partly of the corrupt following of the Apostles, partly are states of life allowed in the Scriptures." By the phrase "corrupt following" we are to understand incorrect, mistaken; as, for instance, the putting Confirmation, an Apostolic rite, to be a Sacrament of the Gospel, on the same footing as Baptism and the Eucharist, which were appointed by CHRIST Himself.

To place these, too, in their proper position as distinguished from all others, and superior to them, the Church has given a strict defi-inition of the word Sacrament, limiting its use to these two. In the Catechism it is declared to mean "an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace given unto us; ordained by CHRIST Himself, as a means whereby we receive the same (i.e., inward and spiritual grace), and a pledge to assure us thereof." Three things, then, are necessary to constitute a Sacrament according to the Church's definition: 1st. The Outward Sign. 2. The Ordinance of CHRIST appointing this to be. 3. The means and pledge of receiving an Inward and Spiritual Grace. And under this definition it is declared there are "two Sacraments only as generally (i.e., universally) necessary to salvation, that is to say, Baptism and the Supper of the LORD."

The other five, though some of them may partake of a Sacramental character, yet are not by our Church called Sacraments, for they have not visible signs, appointed by CHRIST Himself, to convey the corresponding spiritual grace. Confirmation is a complement of Baptism, of Apostolic ordinance, but not appointed by CHRIST Himself. Penance, a word not found in the New Testament, if it simply mean repentance, is indeed required, but has no divinely appointed outward sign of remission of sins. Orders is not generally necessary, but is only for those specially called by the HOLY GHOST and the Church, nor did our LORD appoint any special outward sign to be used in conferring it. Matrimony has been in the world from the creation of man, and is not a special Gospel means of Grace. And as for Extreme Unction, for which is quoted the word of St. James, v. 14, it is not now given for the healing of the sick, but to fit the passing soul for death. Our LORD never appointed the use of oil for such purpose, neither indeed did His Apostles.

It is better for all good Churchmen to be guided by the teaching of the Church, and use the word Sacrament, as she does, only of the two appointed by our blessed LORD Himself, viz., of BAPTISM and of the SUPPER OF THE LORD.

"The Sacraments were not ordained of CHRIST to be gazed upon, or to be carried about, but that we should duly use them. And in such only as worthily receive the same, they have a wholesome effect or operation; but they that receive them unworthily, purchase to themselves damnation, as St. Paul saith." (Article XXV.) The Church teaches that the Sacraments do not work like charms or magic, but their efficacy depends upon the state of mind of the recipient. The Inward Grace indeed always accompanies the Sacrament duly administered, but operates savingly only when received in the heart by Faith and Repentance. (Vide BAPTISM and LORD'S SUPPER.) REV. E. B. BOGGS.

Sacrilege. The sin of sacrilege has a far wider reach than the enumeration of those acts which are classed as sacrilegious.

It is as well to avoid too close an enumeration of what might be turned into a sin, but we too may be unconsciously guilty of sin when we do not know it. A sacrilege is the violating a sacred place, or applying to profane and secular uses things which have been set apart for a holy service. Care must be taken, then, to see that we do not so misuse for selfish ends what is God's. Much of the old classification of sacrilegious acts is now obsolete, since decency and custom have prevented their recurrence. But to appropriate what has been given to His Church for sacred use is a sacrilege that is sometimes now committed. To use the Church building for secular and unhallowed purposes is a sacrilege. To interfere with and affront the minister in the services is a sacrilege. To plunder graves is a sacrilege. But if to profane anything consecrated is in degree sacrilegious, it is plain that we may be guilty of the sin, though avoiding overt criminal acts. So if we would train ourselves in devout and reverent recognition of what is God's, and endeavor not to misuse what is given to Him for His worship and for our honoring Him, we will be exceedingly careful not to fall into this sin.

Sacristan. The treasurer of the vestments, vessels, and other valuables of the Church. He is usually confused in ordinary usage with the Sexton. In the older Churches the sacristan was also a dignitary.

Sacristy. The Vestry-room of the older Churches where the vestments and vessels were placed. Sometimes under other names it was a large room often large enough to hold meetings of the Diocese.

Sadducees. The Sadducees of our LORD's day were a wealthy, powerful party, not very large, but apparently numbering among themselves the family of Aaron. Their truths were apparently to hold as of Faith as little as possible. They rejected all oral tradition outside of the Law; denied the Resurrection and the existence of all created spiritual beings. They were cold, cool, worldly, full of political wisdom, and with little religious enthusiasm. It is to be noted that our LORD was not resisted by them so vehemently and openly as by the Pharisees. It is not therefore recorded in the Gospels that He publicly denounced them, except once, when they joined the Pharisees in asking for a sign (St. Matt. xvi. 5), though they were faulted for their denial of the Resurrection. "Ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures." They lent themselves to the purposes of the Pharisees in the movement against our LORD, but, except as they felt that their power was at stake, they did not seem to care. So after the Resurrection it was because of the courageous, outspoken conduct of the Apostles that the chief priests who were of the sect of the Sadducees began to persecute them. They disappeared as a party after the destruction of Jerusalem.

Saint, from sanctus, holy. Hence the name is given to those eminent in holiness, and perhaps the idea of purity in doctrine may be implied. In the early days of Christianity, according to the Epistles of the New Testament, the word seems to have been used in a more general sense than now, and as nearly equal to the term "Christian," or in extraordinary cases to "Reverend." "All that be in Rome" are "called to be saints" (Rom. i. 7). "Without holiness no man shall see the LORD" (Heb. xii. 14). Therefore all must be saints in the widest sense of the word, if they expect to enter Heaven. St. Paul writes "to the saints which are at Ephesus" (Eph. i. 1). In our LORD's day the Essenes and Pharisees were esteemed saints by the Jews. In Ps. cvi. 16, Aaron is styled "the saint of the LORD." (See Dan. viii. 13, and vii. 18, 21, and 27.) "Ten thousands" (Deut. xxxiii. 2); congregation (Ps. lxxxix. 5, 7); bodies of saints arose (St. Matt. xxvii. 52); Saul persecuting saints (Acts ix. 13, and xxvi. 10); collection for saints (1 Cor. xvi. 1); saluted (Rom. xvi. 15); saluting (2 Cor. xiii. 13). The title of saint is given to such of the worthies in the Old and New Testament who have been holy in life and death, or were dedicated to God, as the Israelites (congregation of saints), and Christians ("churches of the saints") (1 Cor. xiv. 33); "a peculiar treasure" (Ex. xix. 5, and Ps. cxxxv. 4); "a peculiar people" (Deut. xiv. 2; Tit. ii. 14; 1 Pet. ii. 9), intended for a specially near relation to God, the Fountain of holiness. St. John, in the Revelation, applies "saint" almost exclusively to martyrs, and calls CHRIST "the King of Saints" (Rev. xv. 3). In later ages the word was used to designate martyrs. The "Communion of Saints," in the Greek, has a general meaning. Saints' Days were for a Eucharistic commemoration of martyrs; there were so many martyrs that All-Saints' Day was added. Thus, even before CHRIST's second coming, "the King of saints" is "glorified in His saints" (2 Thess. i. 10). Their "virtuous and godly living" is an example, and a "vivid sense is kept up of the 'communion and fellowship' which, in God's 'elect,' are 'knit together' in the 'mystical body' of CHRIST." If these blessed examples are followed, the believer may come to the "unspeakable joys" of Heaven. (See Collect for "All-Saints' Day.") While the primitive Church honored saints, it condemned the worshiping of them. The undue elevation of saints occurs especially in dark and ignorant ages. When lights are lit before the evening comes on they attract little notice, but when the darkness closes in they are very conspicuous.

REV. S. F. HOTCHKIN.

Saints' Days. The days set apart for the commemoration of the several saints of the Christian Church. The principle upon which these Feasts are instituted is that they who by their lives and death illustrated the power of our blessed LORD over the hearts of men, and the purifying and strengthening of the Faith and the might of GOD the HOLY GHOST in the triumph over all foes, should be held in remembrance by us, thanking GOD for their good examples, and evermore ourselves endeavoring to follow in their holy footsteps. It is a very useful and beautiful regulation in the Church, restricted as it is to the commemoration of those only whose sanctity is in the Holy Scripture. While the blessed lives of later holy followers of the saints are not to be doubted, still, as names were formerly added year by year, till the number of those commemorated was vastly larger than the number of days in the year, it was a wise decision which led the English Reformers to drop out all names but those of the holy Apostles, the commemoration of the Holy Innocents, of St. Stephen the Proto-Martyr, of the Evangelists, of St. John Baptist, and of All Saints; with the Feast of St. Michael and All Angels. The day appointed for each was the day of his death or martyrdom, for that was called his proper birthday, as born into everlasting life. It was a point on which great stress was laid by the Primitive Christians to ascertain correctly the day upon which the Martyrs suffered, that they might be remembered yearly at the recurrence of the day in the Holy Communion. It was out of this usage that Saints' days were set apart. The Church of England retains upon her Calendar, but orders no service for, a number of saints whose names are printed therein in "black letter." They were many of them Saints and holy men who lived and labored in Great Britain, but some others are also admitted to the list, as St. Augustine, St. Lawrence, St. Cyprian, and St. Clement of Rome. Their names were kept there partly as being popular and having reference to the history of the Church, and partly in honor of the men themselves, being all eminent doctors or laborers in the Faith, or signalized their devotion by a martyr's death; but there was no service provided, and those only were to be accounted holy-days—i.e., of Legal and Canonical observance—which had respect to our LORD and to His blessed Mother, to the Apostles, to the Evangelists and Martyrs of Holy Scripture.

Salutation. The salutation of the angel to St. Mary the Virgin (St. Luke i. 28): "Hail, thou that art highly favored, the LORD is with thee; blessed art thou among women." This was the salutation to her who was chosen to be the Mother of our LORD.

Salutations, in a Christian sense, involve the principles of either blessing or of praying for a blessing. As the "LORD be with you" is a blessing, so "And with Thy spirit" is as much a blessing, and is so to be considered.

Salvation. The putting a person in a state of safety. It is so used in the Catechism: "And I heartily thank our Heavenly Father that He hath called me to this state of Salvation, and I pray unto God to give me His grace, that I may continue in the same unto my life's end." In this place it means the redemption in JESUS CHRIST our LORD. In some places in Holy Scripture the term is used of national deliverance only from foes or calamities, but its usage is generally only in a spiritual sense. And this salvation of man is confessed in the Creed to be the object of the mightiest act ever done on the earth: "I believe in one LORD JESUS CHRIST; . . . Who, for us men, and for our salvation, came down from heaven, And was incarnate by the HOLY GHOST of the Virgin Mary, and was made man." The salvation or deliverance, not only from the evil and the taint of present sin, but also from the terrible end of the second death and to give the blessedness of eternal life, is the salvation He offers. It is a double salvation, as it were, that is offered. Therefore our LORD prayed, and "this is eternal life to know Thee, the only true God and JESUS CHRIST, whom Thou hast sent" (St. John xvii. 3). For this knowledge "makes us wise unto salvation" (2 Tim. iii. 16). The redemptive acts of our Redeemer are set forth elsewhere, but here we will dwell upon the extent of the salvation. He is the Author and the Captain of our salvation. It is entire and complete. From sin, for the remembrance of which will be blotted out; from its taint and stain, for that we are washed clean in the blood of the Lamb; from its consequences of second death, for He hath destroyed him who hath the power of death, and He hath put it under His feet. He giveth us life: "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly." Peace: "Peace I leave with you, My peace I give unto you." Joy: "Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing." It is given to confession of the lips. It is the work of a godly sorrow. It is the end of Faith. It is the free gift for the Christian's work. It is bound up in grace. It is the long-suffering of the LORD. It is the end of His appearing. It is the inheritance of the Saints. It is, then, one of the terms which includes as a result all the acts, gifts, graces, and blessings of the Gospel. And it is of God, through God, and in God. Salvation becometh unto God. Therefore, in the highest sense, God is our salvation. The FATHER hath made the SON unto us "Wisdom and Righteousness, and Sanctification and Redemption." And therefore the heavenly hosts ascribe Salvation, as well as Glory and Honor, as among the titles of God.

Samaritans. The Samaritans were the descendants of those tribes which Shalmanezar, or Esarhaddon, placed in the depopulated country of Samaria fifty years after he had stripped it of its Israelitish inhabitants. They were heathen, but when they were plagued by the wild beasts which had overrun the long desolated land, the superstitious colonists sent to the King for some priests of JEHOVAH to teach them "the manner of the God of the land," that they might be protected from the ravages of the wild beasts. This was taught them by a priest who was sent them, but they still retained their old heathen worship, beside this, persisting in their idolatry. Therefore the Jews, when restored by Cyrus, would have nothing to do with the Samaritans, and utterly refused all intercourse with them. The Samaritans retorted with equal bitterness. It was owing to their influence that the rebuilding of the Temple was hindered. They had a Temple worship on Mount Gerizim, they kept a Passover, they tried to keep the Law. In this state, when every Jewish feeling of national and religious pride was inflamed and the stubborn temper inflamed by the infliction of so much hardship, the Samaritan came in for a full share of hatred and scorn. In our LORD's time this was not lessened, and to those around Him His conduct must have seemed inexplicable and even disgraceful. His love, care, and tender treatment of them, His abode in their villages, His teaching among them, His healing of the Samaritan leper, seemed so contrary to Jewish self-respect. The noble parable of the good Samaritan was all the more pointed because the chief personage in it was of the hated intruder into the Holy Land. He forbade the Twelve when first sent out (St. Matt. x. 5) to enter into the Samaritan villages, but that had a special significance in their mission work. Afterwards He sketched out for them their widening labors thus: They were to preach first in Judæa, then in Samaria, then to the uttermost parts of the world. The Samaritan may fitly be used as the type of the mixture of modern religious feeling. It is now as it was at first: "They feared the LORD and served their own gods,"—the observance of religious ceremonies and ordinances with the selfish indulgence in all manner of sin.

Samuel. The most remarkable of the prophets after Moses and Elijah. Standing between the two, acting with great sagacity both as a Priest, as a Prophet of God, and as a Judge over the people, he was able to restore the Israelitish strength in a great measure. The terrible defeat and the loss of the Ark at the rash battle at Ebenezer had thrown the nation into despair; twenty years of waiting, of grief, and of national stagnation followed, while Samuel was gaining the religious confidence of the nation. At last, as Prophet and Priest unto God, he brought the people before JEHOVAH at Mizpah. There he wrought a religious reformation and a civil reorganization. It took some time, at least long enough for the Philistines to gather their forces and to try the conclusions of a battle at Ebenezer, the scene of their old victory. The LORD utterly overthrew them, and Israel smote them so that for the rest of Samuel's lifetime they were not able to attack Israel. Against his earnest advice the people, taking his organization as a hint, demanded a king. He was grieved at it, but as he was divinely directed he yielded, and presented to the people Saul of Benjamin. Samuel loved Saul and tried to guide his willfulness. Saul's imperious conduct and his disobedience, both as to the Amalekites and by arrogating to himself the right to offer sacrifice, and consequent forfeiture of the Kingdom, saddened the last days of the Prophet. He had a singular fortune. The child given to earnest prayer, devoted to the LORD, before he could know a mother's love and the sweets of home sent to the Temple, consecrated to GOD's service, growing up in favor with the throngs of worshippers at Shiloh, as the sins of the sons of Eli had horrified them, known to be in the favor of GOD, the chosen messenger to Eli, who had nurtured him, of the doom passed upon his family, the accepted prophet to the people, the religious reformer and civil magistrate, then the anointer first of Saul, then of David, and, finally, after his death summoned by his loved Saul from the rest of Paradise only to pronounce against him the sentence of outlawry from GOD's favor. He was the third in rank of might and the second in influence of the prophets the LORD sent His people. He was the type of our LORD in these things, as patient, self-sacrificing, in favor with GOD and man, and as organizer of a system. It indeed passed out of Samuel's unwilling hands to take a breadth which was not foreseen and to produce results, both for good and for evil, which were beyond all human power to anticipate. Our LORD, on the other hand, committed the organization of the Church to His Apostles to the infinite blessing of the world. His was, as our LORD's own mission, a mission in a time of transition, though we must never forget that Samuel was raised up to meet the emergency; but our LORD came to fulfill His own mission, to complete the past and to mould the future of the whole world.

Samuel, the Books of. The four chief books of Israelitish history are all linked together in so much, that the title given to the first two books, though representing an early division,—in the Septuagint—is not a fair one. The writer of the first book must be unknown. But we may very safely assume that he was the Prophet who would record the main facts of his time, and that the later chapters were added by Gad and Nathan, who most probably wrote the second book. It is a special mark of the historical books of the Old and New Testament that the author never gives his name. Only once is this broken,—Nehemiah names himself as the author. The material was from Samuel's hand at least (1 Chron., ch. xxix. 29). The books were probably compiled out of this earlier material than the separation of Israel into the two kingdoms. The canonical authority of the books has always been admitted, and the references to it in the New Testament by our LORD, St. Peter, St. Stephen, and St. Paul, seal it for us. Its minute historical accuracy is evident upon any fair examination, and shows that the work was compiled from notes by an eyewitness. The first book contains the history of the close of the Theocracy and of the rise of the Monarchy. Samuel, the last Judge, the Prophet of GOD, effects that religious and political reformation which becomes afterwards the basis of the Monarchy. The first seven chapters, then, are a distinct section, giving an account of Samuel, his training, the calamity of Israel, the abeyance of religious observances for twenty years, then his Judgeship. The eighth chapter opens with the sinfulness of Samuel's sons, and the restlessness of the people; then follow (ch. ix.-x.) the election of Saul; Saul's reign till his rejection (xi.-xv.); recounting his military achievements, his unification of the people; his royal character in many things marred by his arrogance, selfishness, and demoniac possession. This brings on the substitution of David for Saul by GOD's appointment (xvi.-xxiii. 9). Saul growing jealous of David and seeking his life (xxiii. 10-xxvii. 12). Lastly, Saul's death (xxviii.-xxxi.).

The second book is wholly occupied with David's life from the date of Saul's death. This book also parts into two sections. His reign over Judah, and then his reign over the whole kingdom. David did not at first succeed to the whole sovereignty, but the claims of Ishbosheth were maintained by his uncle, Abner. Joab had begun already to wield an interfering power in David's career, and feared that David would be rid of him. When, therefore, Abner abandoned Ishbosheth's cause, and offered to David to bring all Israel under his sway, Joab assassinated him. But David's reign over Israel was itself to be shaken to the foundation by his sin. After the removal of the Ark (ch. v. 17-vii.), and vow to build a temple to ЖЕHOVAH, and the blessing promised him, came his fall in the matter of Bathsheba. This was grievously punished in his family troubles (ch. x.-xix.), by Absalom's rebellion and death, and in Sheba's insurrection. The sword was not to depart from his family. It hung over it, and fell so often for the sins of his descendants. The famine that desolated the land (xxi.), the sin of taking the census (xxiv.), and the plague that followed, show the greatness and the weakness of the King's character.

A King after a right royal sort, David was yet in so many things an undisciplined man. He was a soldier of fearless stuff; a King having political insight and management; a man possessed of magnetic attractiveness; a man full of religious earnestness and enthusiasm, one whom all loved, yet tempted to pride and to sensuality, and by these led to commit acts whose consequence fell not on himself alone, but on his people also. One proof, and no mean one, of the veracity and the authority of the second book of Samuel lies in the fact of the plain, simple statement of facts, without extenuation, or exaggeration, or explanation. Whatever Canonical authority belongs to the first book must also belong to the second, since they were not divided in the Hebrew till after they were translated into the Greek, and were then divided.

See for these two books the Speaker's Commentary, the Cambridge Bible for Schools, Smith's Bible Dictionary, and the authorities cited there.

Sanctification. It is a state or a condition of grace and holiness from the power of the HOLY GHOST in our hearts. We can never too clearly recognize that it comes from Him co-operating in our hearts and with our wills to produce that fruit unto holiness. It must, therefore, be a growth, a state, a condition, and the two co-operating forces are the Spirit of God and the will yielding to His guidance. Without holiness we cannot see God. This holiness, which is our own co-operating work, must be founded upon the redemption of CHRIST and our baptism in Him, and so our receiving His righteousness (justification, the being made or declared righteous): "but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the LORD JESUS and by the Spirit of our God." Sanctification, then, begins with baptism as a part of its manifold gifts, or more truly, as a power of many of its graces it confers. As we put on the LORD JESUS and all grow in that new creation, so we have as the accompanying state holiness, and though holiness is no part of our unregenerate state, since it was of the original creation, a growth in holiness is, as it were, a gradual recovery of our original condition, and becomes ours as we work together with the HOLY SPIRIT. It is a restoration to our nature of the first condition. It is, then, as Hooker (Serm. on Justification) states it, inherent. "Concerning the righteousness of sanctification, we deny it not to be inherent; we grant that unless we work we have it not, only we distinguish it as a thing different in nature from the righteousness of justification; we are righteous, the one way by the faith of Abraham, the other way, except we do the works of Abraham, we are not righteous. . . . St. Paul doth plainly sever these two parts of Christian righteousness, one from the other, for in the sixth to the Romans thus he writeth: 'Being freed from sin and made servants to God, ye have your fruit in holiness and the end everlasting life.' 'Ye are made free from sin and made servants unto God,' this is the righteousness of justification. 'Ye have your fruit in holiness,' this is the righteousness of sanctification. By the one we are interested in the right of inheriting, by the other we are brought to the actual possession of eternal bliss, and so the end of both is eternal life." Then as we grow in grace, in spiritual strength, in the use of that knowledge and wisdom given to us by the HOLY GHOST, we grow in Sanctification, and so far as it enters into our life and our character, it is ours.

Our LORD in His Intercessional Prayer (St. John xvii.) prays both for the Apostles, "sanctify them through Thy truth," and of Himself He saith, referring to His perfect humanity and to its discipline, "and for their sakes I sanctify Myself that they also might be sanctified through the truth." Not only the discipline He underwent (Heb. ii. 10, 11), but also as Victim He sanctified Himself. And in the unity of His Holy Body are we made Holy, Sanctified. So we may say that (this having a bearing upon the article of the Creed "the Communion of Saints") He hath sanctified Himself for the Church's sake that He might sanctify Her, that He hath given to Her the Sanctifying Spirit, that as children in the Church growing up into the manhood of the Christian life, we have given to us the Sanctification of the Spirit through JESUS CHRIST. Therefore all the exhortations with which St. Paul closes his Epistles (and more markedly that to the Galatians) are to this end, our Sanctification. The old controversies upon Sanctification and Justification have died out; a deeper, truer sense of the living power of the graces of the HOLY SPIRIT and the need to live and grow in them, has made them needless. We are called to be saints, let us make our calling and election sure. This is our co-operation with the Spirit of Holiness, and in Him we shall surely be Sanctified.

Sanctuary. The word correctly belongs to the Jewish ritual, meaning the Holy Place, which was properly of two parts. I. The Holy of Holies, and then without this veil that concealed its contents from view, II. The Holy Place in which the Priests ministered unto God in the Sacrifices. In this Holy Place, the outer Sanctuary, were the ever-burning Lamp, the Shew-Bread, the Altar of Incense. None but the priests trod there, as none but the High-Priest ever entered into the Holy of Holies.

The corresponding place in the Christian Church, the place where the Holy Table or the Altar stood, was also treated with great reverence, as the Screen and the Holy doors before it in the Eastern Church show, but it was not called the Sanctuary till comparatively late. It was, however, always surrounded with a general sense of its holiness. In the West, the Sanctuary is the chancel, though it sometimes also included the choir. It was not, however, so sacredly guarded from intrusion as in the East.

But the Churches had early given to them the right of asylum. It had existed in the Temple. The right of asylum was conceded to heathen temples. It was attached to the Christian temples also as soon as the Emperor Constantine, becoming Christian, recognized and conceded it. The right of asylum at first apparently was intended only to give such delay as would prevent injustice being done to the person obtaining it. This right of asylum, at first belonging only to the Church building, afterwards was extended so as to include the precincts also. But after a while it became an obstruction to justice. In wild times, as during the transition from the Roman civil power through the turbulence of the Middle Ages, it served a very useful purpose, but on the settlement of the peoples into something like order and the proper discharge of justice, this right became an evil. In England it was abolished in the twenty-first year of James I.

Sanhedrim. The Jewish Judicial Court which tried our LORD, and before which, afterwards, the Apostles were brought several times. The date of its origin is uncertain, and, indeed, if it existed before, it does not come prominently forward till the time of the Maccabees. It had then and afterwards the power of Life and Death. Its chief jurisdiction was in minor cases, however. Heresy and blasphemy were the higher subjects upon which it passed sentence. The Sanhedrim was deprived of the power over life by the Romans. Therefore our LORD was taken by the High-Priest and a hastily-gathered part of the Sanhedrim to Pilate. St. Stephen's martyrdom by the Sanhedrim was most probably a sudden, unpremeditated act. But after this the Sanhedrim sat upon the heresy of the sect of the Nazarenes, and used all its influence at home and abroad among the Jews to check its rising power. Therefore St. Paul asked leave of the Jews at Rome to defend himself before them. It arrested St. Peter and St. John. St. Stephen was taken before it. St. Paul was examined by it, and was in danger of his life in the angry debate which followed his appeal upon the hope of the Resurrection. Its later history recounts its wanderings, till at last it was permanently settled at Tiberias, where its labors were upon the Talmud and on the text of Scripture. It finally disappeared, it is said, before 300 A.D.

Sardica. A Council was held at Sardica in the year 347 A.D., though later authorities prefer the date 343-44 A.D. The occasion appears to have been the differences and irregularities arising out of the Arian Schism, and its continuation by the Semi-Arians or Eusebians. As these grew more and more scandalous, the Emperors Constans and Constantius, of the West and East respectively, joined in summoning a Council of the whole Church at Sardica (now Sophia), in Illyricum, on the borders of the two Empires. Bishops assembled from all quarters to the number of 100 from the West and 76 from the East. The venerable Hosius of Cordova presided, and among other noteworthy men present were St. Athanasius, Marcellus of Ancyra, Stephen of Antioch, and Asclepias of Gaza. The Pope, Julius, was represented by two priests and a deacon. The Oriental Bishops at the outset protested against the admission of Athanasius, Marcellus, and other deposed Bishops; but when they found that matters were to be freely discussed, and that no violence would be allowed, they withdrew to Philippopolis, in Thrace, and there held a separate synod under Stephen, Bishop of Antioch, in which they drew up a new creed, deposed the most conspicuous members of the other Council, and forbade communion with many others, and especially Pope Julius. They were accompanied by five Bishops from the West, while two Eastern Bishops remained at Sardica. After the departure of the Easterns, the Council proceeded with its business; they declared it unnecessary to reopen questions of faith, the Nicene Creed being sufficient; they deposed many Bishops of the Easterns; they declared Athanasius and Marcellus innocent of the charges brought against them, and restored them to their Sees, so far as their decision could do it. They addressed a letter to the Emperors invoking them to interfere in behalf of the oppressed, and they wrote to Pope Julius, to the clergy of Alexandria, and to all the Bishops of the Church to urge them to unity and adherence to the faith of Nice. They also passed a number of Canons, some of which became of the greatest importance. These Canons were drawn up in the form of motions put by various members of the Council, and voted on by all.

Canons 1 and 2 forbid the promotion of Bishops from one See to another.

"Canon 3. Hosius made two propositions: first, that no Bishop should be permitted to enter another province unless called to assist at some judgment; and, secondly, that for the honor of St. Peter's memory it be ordered that if a Bishop, condemned in his own province, maintain his innocence, his judges might write to the Bishop of Rome, in order that he might determine whether the Bishop's cause required a fresh hearing; that if he and the judges whom he should nominate agreed in deeming a new trial requisite, it should be entered upon at once; but if not, the original sentence should stand good."

"Canon 4. Bishop Gaudentius submitted to the Council an addition to the last Canon, to the effect that care should be taken that the Bishop so condemned in provincial synod, and appealing to Rome, should not be deprived of his See, nor a successor be appointed, until the cause should be entirely concluded by the Pope."

"Canon 7. Hosius proposed that in the case of a Bishop condemned by the synod of his province and appealing to Rome, if the Bishop of Rome should decide that it was necessary to have a new trial, it should be lawful for him either to delegate the cause to the Bishops bordering upon the diocese of the accused Bishop, or to send delegates to the spot to take cognizance of the question." (Landon's Manual of Councils.)

Canon 5 forbids consecrating Bishops for insignificant places. Canon 8 forbids Bishops going to the Emperor's Court except when called by the Emperor. Canon 13 forbids ordinations per saltum. Canons 14 and 15 forbid Bishops absenting themselves from their dioceses. Canon 17 provides for appeals by priests or deacons from the decision of their own Bishop to the other Bishops of their province. It is on Canons 3, 4, and 7 that the claim made by Rome over the other branches of the Church is based; but against this assumption it is argued that the council was a local one; that the limited authority is conferred as a new thing; that the Bishop of Rome had no power to evoke a cause from before another tribunal; nor any personal voice in the decision; but could only receive appeals on application of the Councils from which they were made, the power of such appeals being limited to Bishops; and also that the power conferred was temporary and personal, being given to Julius by name, without any reference to his successors. Nevertheless, the Canons of Sardica were received by the whole Church.

Sarum Use. The Liturgy according to the use of the Diocese of Sarum (Salisbury) was one of the most influential and important of the many Uses (i.e., Liturgies in use) in England. The Sarum Missal was itself the outcome of Bishop Osmund's reformation of the Older Uses which had obtained and which (from his being a Norman over a Saxon Diocese) he would wish to modify. He composed a Custom-Book which it is claimed became the Sarum Missal (1085 A.D.). The later Sarum Missal, which was so freely used for material and guidance in the formation of the Prayer-Book, probably had by this time received many additions. It was the leading Use in England at the time of the Reformation, though the Dioceses of Lincoln, Hereford, and Bangor had their own, and the province of York had also an Older Use, dating in part from 700 A.D. Durham seems also to have had a separate Use. (Vide Use.)

Satan. "The first that sinned against God was Satan. And then through Satan's fraudulent instigation man also. They 'kept not their first estate' because 'they stood not in the truth,' from which it may be very probably thought that infidelity through pride was their ruin, the too great admiration of their own excellency having made incredible the truth revealed to them: the truth of that personal conjunction which should be of God with men. As also envy maketh them, ever sithence the first moment of their own fall, industrious to work our ruin." (Hooker.) Under the names and titles of Satan ("the Adversary"), the devil ("the accuser"), the Tempter, the Evil One, Beelzebub, the prince of demons, the serpent, there is set before us in the Scriptures, and especially in the

New Testament, one whose awful personality only Christian faith can face without flinching. Unbelief has no refuge but to deny his existence. Believing in CHRIST the Saviour from sin, we can without shrinking accept the facts of sin, Satan, and death, and without attempting to be wise above what is written, receive what is written concerning Satan and his work in the world in its literal plain meaning.

The history of mankind has hardly begun, and the first pair are just created and placed upon the earth, righteous, wise, and happy, when there comes upon the scene one who in the form of a serpent, with fair promises and bitter taunts against God, induces first the woman and then the man to transgress the one prohibition that had been laid upon them, and fall into sin. So "sin entered into the world, and death by sin" (Rom. v. 12). We accept the record of Genesis iii. as simply and literally true. But it perhaps makes but little difference in the result, as it makes little difference in the "difficulty" of the record, whether we understand that the full meaning of the events recorded in Genesis iii. is hidden under the form of the words or under the form of the acts, if we only understand that what is recorded is essential truth, and that whether Satan is concealed under the form or under the name of the serpent, here is the account—and the only explanation in the world—of the introduction into the world of sin and death. We find later additions, which tell us about him who was the means of the beginning of evil in the world, but here at first is no word to explain how God could permit evil in His universe, no word of its origin, but only a simple statement of the facts of the creation and then of the fall, and not even the name of the evil agent is given, nor a hint of his high spiritual origin and character. What is made evident is, the subtle personal character of the tempter of men.

It is a serious error that "devil" is in an English authorized version made the translation of two words of entirely distinct meanings, with the natural result of misleading and confusing the ordinary reader. One is the word diabolos, the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew Satan, and of which "devil" is a transfer into English rather than a translation. The other, which under some form occurs about twice as often in the New Testament, the word daimon, which the same treatment would render "demon." (Vide DEMONIACS.) That is, in the New Testament, when the word "devil" is used, only in one-third of the cases is the reference to Satan himself, in the other cases to his subordinate evil spirits.

As a proper name Satan is found but in three places in the whole Old Testament (1 Chron. xxi. 1, where alone the article is wanting). "Satan stood up against Israel, and provoked David to number Israel" (Zech. iii. 1, 2). "He showed me Joshua the high-priest standing before the angel of the LORD, and Satan standing at his right hand to assist him, and the LORD said unto Satan, The LORD rebuke thee, O Satan" (Job i. 6-9; ii. 1), when Satan "came also to present himself before the LORD," and received permission to afflict Job. In the books called apocryphal, once, the equivalent, "the devil," "through envy of the devil came death" (Wis. ii. 24). But when we enter the field of the New Testament we are conscious of an entire change in this respect. St. Matthew uses the name of Satan three times, once identifying him with "the devil" of the temptation (ch. iv. 10), once with "Beelzebub the prince of demons" (ch. xii. 26), and once recording our LORD's application of the name to St. Peter. "The devil" he uses six times (ch. xvi. 23), four times of the six in the narrative of the Temptation, once in the Parable of the Sower, and once in the prophecy of the judgment-day. His title of "the evil one" St. Matthew uses several times, notably in the LORD's Prayer (ch. vi. 13), and the parable of the tares (ch. xiii. 19). St. Mark names him Satan three times (St. Mark i. 13; ii. 23; iv. 15). St. Luke as "the devil" twice, in the Temptation and in the parable of the sower, as Satan four times, "falling from Heaven," the captor of the woman "bowed with a spirit of infirmity," "entering into Judas" (who was "a devil"), "desiring to sift Peter as wheat" (St. Luke iv. 8; x. 18; xiii. 16; xxii. 3, 31). St. John three times as "the devil," two of the three in reference to Judas, once as "the evil one" (St. John vi. 70; viii. 44; xii. 2; xvii. 15), three times, repeating our LORD's words, as "the prince of this world" who "shall be cast out," who "cometh and hath nothing in me," and who "is judged" (St. John xii. 31; xiv. 30; xvi. 11). In the Acts twice as "the devil,"—"them that were oppressed of the devil," and "thou child of the devil." As "Satan" twice (Acts x. 38; xiii. 10), he filled the heart of Ananias with a lie (Acts v. 3), and it is "from his power" that the Gospel turns men (Acts xxvi. 18). In St. Paul's Epistles repeatedly as "the devil" (Eph. iv. 27), whose opportunity is hoarded anger, his methods of attack wiles (ch. vi. 11), pride the cause of his fall (1 Tim. iii. 6) and his snare (ch. iii. 7); who enslaves the will of his captives (2 Tim. ii. 26); who has the power of death, but this death the Saviour of men (Heb. ii. 14) conquered and spoiled him, "the strong man despoiled by one stronger than he" (St. Luke xi. 22). As Satan whom "God shall bruise under our feet shortly" (Rom. xvi. 20), but to whom the Apostle delivers over the incontinent sinner of Corinth "for the destruction of the flesh that the spirit may be saved" (1 Cor. v. 5), who tempts this lust and pride (ch. vii. 5), who transforms himself into an angel of light (2 Cor. xi. 14), who hinders the LORD's servants in their work (1 Thess. ii. 18), who "works in the lawless one, the man of sin" (2 Thess. ii. 9), to whom near the close of his ministry the Apostle once again "delivers" men "that they may learn not to blaspheme" (1 Tim. i. 20), but apparently, in the case of one of them at least, not with any good result (2 Tim. iv. 14). As "the evil one" "from whom the LORD will guard you" (2 Thess. iii. 3), and whose "darts the shield of faith shall quench" (Eph. vi. 16).

He is "the prince of the power of the air who rules the course of this world, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience" (Eph. ii. 2). He is one who is set over the "principalities, powers, rulers of the darkness of this world, spiritual wickedness in high places, against which we wrestle" (Eph. vi. 12). He is "the power of darkness from which we are delivered" (Col. i.). He is "the god of this world who hath blinded the minds of those that believe not" (2 Cor. iv. 4). St. James bids, "resist the devil and he will flee from you" (St. James iv. 7). St. Peter warns against "your adversary the devil, who goes about seeking whom he may devour" (1 Pet. v. 8). St. John tells us that sin is the business of the devil and the sign of his children, and "for this the Son of God was manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil." He images them that "have overcome the wicked one," "of whom" was Cain the envious murderer, but who shall not touch the child of God to hurt him, albeit "in him the world lieth" (1 John ii. 13; iii. 12; v. 18, 19). St. Jude shows him contending against the archangel about the body of Moses and receiving his rebuke (Jude 9). It is left for the last books to enlarge upon the words of our LORD concerning both the fall and of the destiny of Satan and his angels. "The angels," writes St. Jude, "which kept not their first estate, but left their own habitations, He hath reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the judgment of the great day" (Jude 6). And St. Peter, "for God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment" (2 Pet. ii. 4). In the Letters of the Apocalypse, the contentious Jews are "the synagogue of Satan" (Rev. ii. 9, 13, 24), the dwelling of the Angel of our church is where the throne and dwelling of Satan are, of another, where "the depths of Satan" are the doctrines taught, and "the devil" is about to "cast some of them into prison" for their trial. In the vision (Rev. xii. 7-9), "there was war in heaven: Michael and his angels fought against the dragon; and the dragon fought and his angels, and prevailed not; neither was their place found any more in Heaven. And the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent called the Devil, and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world: he was cast out unto the earth, and his angels were cast out with him." And later on, "I saw an angel come down from Heaven. . . And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent which is the Devil, and Satan, and bound him a thousand years" (Rev. xx. 2). And then later still, "the devil which deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, and shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever" (Rev. xx. 10). Of all the writers of the New Testament St. Paul in his letters is fullest in the instruction which he gives concerning the present work of Satan in the world. It is for others to prophesy concerning his eternal destiny.

From this examination of the teaching of the Scriptures, it is plain that while we are made acquainted with the presence of Satan in the world, with his power and his character from the outset, the Holy Scriptures are satisfied for a long time, and until a certain definite time, to add but little to that knowledge. It is never lost, never questioned, but held in abeyance. When that time does come, the fullness of knowledge concerning the prince of evil, his authority, his rules, his kingdom, is opened to us all at once. And finally, to the instruction concerning him which is given in the New Testament all the world's wisdom has never added a particle. It has denied him and his work, as it denies the LORD his Conqueror, but it has taught, and has pretended to teach, us nothing positive even in the place of what it has denied. Of the problem of evil it has no solution. The close connection between the world's dealing with these two beliefs—in the LORD and about His enemy—is suggestive, for it is indeed a connection which exists between these two and all that belongs to them respectively from the beginning.

The fall of man through the agency of Satan was closely followed by the promise which was to undo that fall,—“Her seed shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel.” From that time, if evil was in the world, there was the knowledge of God in the world also, and a definite faith in His promise, a definite expectation of a Deliverer, divine and human. The exclamation of the first mother was, “I have gotten a man, the LORD.” The work of evil went on in God's world, and prevailed over the good; but the hope and faith was never lost. It was renewed to Abraham and preserved in his family, and repeated and defined. It is the key to the history and prophecy and the whole system of Israel. The LORD was in the world, and the world and His own people were being prepared for the keeping of His promise. When His appointed time came, the promise was kept.

With the coming of CHRIST there is a loosing of Satan and his angels for a time, as appears by the demoniacal possessions which were so frequent just at that time, as well as in the intensified badness of the world, and with the revelation of CHRIST comes a revelation of knowledge of Satan and his works such as had never been made before. The mystery of the eternal purpose of GOD was revealed in CHRIST (Eph. i. 9;

2 Thess. ii. 7), the “mystery of iniquity” had its own revelation in the work of the devil and his angels. The two great enemies met in the Temptation, and the victory over one man in the Garden was more than reversed. The world is Satan's organized kingdom. In it the LORD planted His kingdom to leaven and absorb it. The angels of GOD are the ministers of CHRIST their LORD. Satan has his angels, the fallen evil spirits. “Of thrones and dominions and principalities and powers CHRIST is head” (Col. i. 16), and “principalities and powers and rulers of darkness, spiritual wickedness in high places,” are those against which we wrestle. Men are citizens of one kingdom or the other, servants of one master or the other. The two kingdoms exist side by side and so near that we are “translated out of darkness into the kingdom of His dear Son” (Col. i. 13). While Satan and his emissaries of evil angels and evil men are on the watch to snare and destroy those who err from the right way, and the casting out from the communion of the Church is the “delivering over to Satan.” Righteousness is the business of the kingdom of CHRIST. Sin in every form, of the devil and his children. The name of the promised one is JESUS, for He shall save His people from their sins and destroy the works of the devil. In other words, the contrast and opposition which exists between evil and good, right and wrong, sin and righteousness, is no contrast between abstractions, and is not limited to things which we might name by these terms. Evil, like good, is the character of an organized system which extends through all the world, and which has its centre and its king in the person of Satan. The contrast and the contest is between these two kingdoms and between these two kings, a contrast and a contest that goes on whenever anything exists which belongs to either, and will go on till one or the other is destroyed.

Which shall prevail we know. Which is prevailing, and has been ever since the LORD came. Every Christian life that is lived, every act of righteousness and charity that is done, scores a victory. The advance of the Church is a course of victory. And victory on one side means defeat on the other, a lessening of the kingdom of Satan, a binding of him and his power. The end will not be till he is finally cast down. It is not coming as rapidly as we would desire. But it will come, for He has come who came to destroy the works of the devil, and the will of GOD will be done.

REV. L. W. GIBSON.

Satisfaction. The term “satisfaction” is properly a legal term that comes to us from the Roman Law, and as a theological term was not used till St. Anselm of Canterbury employed it, but it has passed into use, but much modified from his teaching. It is probable that from him came the use of the word in the Canon of our Liturgy “who made there (by His one oblation of Himself once offered) a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world." The doctrine of satisfaction simply for sin by a sacrifice is found in Holy Scripture from the very first. It could have been the only idea attached to Sacrifices before the flood, since none ate flesh then, and the feast upon the Sacrifice was not instituted till Moses ordained it. The Sacrifices offered by Abraham were whole burnt-offerings—i.e., none were reserved at all. So onward, the Sacrifice seems to have had simply the purpose of offering some victim by which God was appeased; and here let us note lest the mere offering could appease God or could purge the consciences of the worshipers that this was a memorial before Him of the satisfaction yet to be made in CHRIST. The idea of satisfaction by a sacrifice was that it was anticipatory of the proper and only satisfaction to be made afterwards. In this sense only we may say that our heavenly FATHER was appeased. Now, throughout the Mosaic Law the whole burnt-offering alone was the complete sacrifice retaining the principle of satisfaction, but the feast upon the sacrifice for the sin-offering and trespass-offering was the introduction of another principle. In the first was set forth the solitariness of the Atonement of our LORD. He trod the wine-press alone. We only have bestowed on us the results; we could not share in His Atoning act. In this He made the one full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world. It is not necessary to point out here the many texts which teach us how fully He took upon Him the iniquity of us all. How He was wounded for our transgressions, and how His soul made a sin-offering. The fifty-third chapter of Isaiah is both the prophecy and the best exposition of His satisfaction as the sin-offering for the world. It is upon the foundation of the fullness of His satisfaction that the sinner now finds acceptance before God. It is ascribed to Him in glorious worship of the redeemed. It is the constant ground upon which we can hope for everlasting life. But St. Anselm brought it forward as a debt for sin, which was viewed more as a breaking of God's majesty than as of itself a loathsome taint which needed to be atoned for. There was a harshness in the mode in which the Archbishop put it, and a seeming intention to push forward the thought of the crime of sin more than its present and fatal effect upon the sinner. His use, then, of the term is narrow. This doctrine of satisfaction brings out the love displayed in the Incarnation of the Son of God. It shows that for the hour and the agony of the Atonement our blessed LORD came into the world, and that this satisfaction, resting upon that and leading up to His Resurrection and to the gifts flowing from it, also brings forward the facts of our sanctification by the HOLY GHOST. But we must be very careful to separate from this any idea of satisfaction we might dream we could make for ourselves. This is a deduction which by no means follows from the other. The satisfaction of the LORD and our acceptance through Him constitute the grounds upon which the doctrine of good works must be placed, and these can have no wages, but whatever we receive for them is the free gift of GOD through JESUS CHRIST.

Saying and Singing. The rubrics in several places direct there shall be "said or sung" such an Anthem or Psalm. The words have a technical meaning, and are in strictness so to be construed. Saying meant then a recitation of the passage so ordered upon a musical tone, a plain, simple note with little or no inflection or cadence. The English Prayer-Book was published very early by Daye, Merbecke, Tallis, and others musically set. Now, saying is an ordinary reading. Singing meant a more ornate musical recitation. Now, custom has made the word "said" in the rubrics refer to the alternate reading and response of the minister and congregation, and the singing is more of the chant than the anthem music. The places in the rubrics in the Prayer-Book where this phrase "said or sung" is used are for the Venite, the Gloria Patri, or the Gloria in Excelsis after the Psalms; the Te Deum, the Jubilate, and Benedictus in the Morning Prayer; the Cantate, Bonum est, Deus Misereatur, and the Benedic Anima Mea, in the Evening Prayer; the Preface and the Gloria in Excelsis in the Communion Office; the Sentences and the three Anthems in the Burial Service; the selection of Psalms or other portion of Psalms in the Thanksgiving Office; the Veni Creator Spiritus in the Ordinal; the Hundredth Psalm in the Office for the Consecration Office; the anthem Laudate Nomen in the Office of Institution. In all of these the rubric permits in strictness a recitation upon a musical note and fuller musical rendering. But except in the Veni Creator Spiritus of the Ordinal, there is no direction as to who is to say the particular Anthem or Hymn or Psalm. It might be, for all the rubric could determine, read by the congregation responsively. Custom, which must rule and sometimes overrule in defining rubrics, has of course arranged it, but it is a mark of how much was left to discretion and to the law imposed by preceding usages, by the Reformers, and of how far for many historical causes we have drifted from the old custom. (Vide RUBRIC.)

Schism. DIVISION (and then subdivision) of the Body of the Church. Schism, as a sin, is not considered with sufficient care by the Laity. Its open surface evils are acknowledged. The hindrance to the cause of Christianity is freely admitted. The bitterness it engenders are deprecated upon all sides, yet every schismatical body hugs its own schism all the closer. The Evangelical Alliance is but a compromise between the consciousness of the sin of schism and the need of unity; and though as a mere expedient a failure for unity, yet a clear proof that the knowledge of evil and the sin of schism is gaining ground. First, it is necessary to admit the difficulty of breaking up and reorganizing large organizations simply because they are acknowledged to be on a wrong principle; and, secondly, that every schism, to have any force in it, must be founded upon at least a half truth. And, again, the zeal, though of a half-informed knowledge, is gladly granted. But still the great sin remains, not palliated, but rather defined more clearly by these limitations. Then, many of the members of the different denominations are so by descent. They have inherited their Faith, and the change involves a greater struggle than can be easily measured by those who have not passed through it. But it is the great sin of the religious world in this country. The New Testament is very clear upon this subject—this division. Our LORD warned His disciples against false teachers who should arise, saying, Here is CHRIST, or He is there. He laid down the principle of unity, and of love to one another. In His Sermon on the Mount He spoke of false prophets and false teachers, but also of those who would work lawlessness (iniquity in the Authorized Version. Matt. vii. 21-24). The Apostles St. Jude, St. Peter, St. John, St. Paul have all something to say about the sin of schism, either in its deeper form involving heresy, or in the form of a mere rending of a united body. But all, at some point in their protests against it, point out that it is a form of willfulness. It would be a willful choice for themselves of what they should accept and believe.

St. Paul, in the First Epistle to the Corinthians, sets schism, division, in its true light,—the rending of the Body of CHRIST. "Is CHRIST divided?" is his vehement exclamation, yet these schisms had not amounted to an open division, only parties within the Church. He argues that they all speak the same thing, they all be perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment. Afterwards his language (ch. xi. 18) shows how he foresaw its result. God would permit it, that they who were steadfast and approved of God should be made manifest; and as yet there was no open rending, and the point in that place is upon the disorders at the Communion. Again (in ch. xii. 12-31), he compares the Church to the human body, and the unity in it and the work and honor assigned to each. It is on the gifts (Charismata) given, and then he enumerates the offices and helps from the Apostolic down to the gift of language. It is not the place here to more than point out that if partyism, which might issue in something like our modern schism, could draw out such protests, what is not the position of those in actual willful schism? Passing over St. Peter's and St. Jude's strong words, hence these also apply to errors held by men in the Church. We find St. John speaking with sorrowing words of those who had left the Church. How full of suppressed intensity of feeling are these solemn words: "Little children, it is the last time: and as ye have heard that antichrist shall come, even now there are many antichrists; whereby we know that it is the last time. They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would no doubt continue with us: but they went out, that they might be made manifest that they were not all of us" (1 John ii. 18, 19). Here schism, in the modern sense of the word, is set forth, and St. John calls those who joined themselves to it antichrists. But the sin of schism is better seen by turning to the doctrine of unity our LORD laid down. First He taught, "He that is not with me is against me." But this being with Him must rest upon Unity in the Faith and in the Covenant, in His Visible Body, for there is none other stated. Pointing out by His comparisons of one Net, one Fold, one Vineyard, one Vine, the unity of Love, the unity of abiding in Him, or we shall be but withered branches fit for the burning, we turn to the Prayer for His Church (St. John xvii.). It is that those the Apostles and those who believe through their word may be one in CHRIST, as He is one with His FATHER. Unity He left as a part of the Church's Constitution. But as clearly unity in the Apostolic office. St. Paul's and St. John's arguments would be worthless if the Apostolic office were to fail.

St. Paul insists that unity is necessary, and asserts his authority and claims that fellowship with him is essential. So do St. John (1 John i.), St. Peter, and St. Jude imply it. (a) Unity in Apostolic Faith. "If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed. . . . I certify you, brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me is not after man. For I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it by man, but by revelation of JESUS CHRIST (Gal. i. 9, 11, 12). So in clearer language St. John in the first chapter of the first Epistle, so Acts ii. 42, and many other places; indeed, the fact that the Epistles were written implies that unity in the Faith is a necessity. (b) Unity under Apostolic government (Acts ii. 42, and 1 John i.). Eph. iv. 11-16: "And He gave some, Apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the Body of CHRIST: till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of CHRIST: that we henceforth be no more children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive; but speaking the truth in love, may grow up into Him in all things, which is the Head, even CHRIST: from whom the whole body fitly joined together and compacted, by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body unto the edifying of itself in love." In this, the freedom, flexibility, the unity, and the government of the Church, the living Body of CHRIST, is very plainly set forth. The second and third Epistles of St. John are almost entirely upon direction to refuse to commune with those who bring in false doctrines.

We draw these conclusions. That schism, even in the undeveloped state of partyism, is a Sin. That developed schism is based according to our LORD's words and to St. Paul's warning on lawlessness. That schism divides from the Unity of the Church, that those who are steadfast and approved are made manifest. Therefore that it is so utterly not Apostolic in any way, that it is solemnly protested against by the Apostles as an imminent danger. But the real question now is for those who are charged with schism to decide from what body are we in schism; so many rival bodies claim to be "The Church;" so many pretensions are put forth; so much confusion is brought in by discussion of side issues. Upon the doctrine of the Church we must refer to that article. And for the proofs of the Apostolic Succession to the article upon that subject. And upon the Faith to the article the RULE OF FAITH. But the solution must be the reply that each can give to this question, Can I claim to be in all respects upon the foundation laid down in the description of the three thousand converted on the Day of Pentecost, "And they continued steadfastly in the Apostle's doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in [the] prayers"? If it was necessary then it is necessary now. It is of the very life of the Christian to be in the Body his LORD created, purchased, loved, and sanctifies. He cannot be sure that he was in union with his LORD unless he is in the Apostolic unity in the Apostolic teaching. He is only certain that he is in his LORD's presence when he is with those who are gathered by his LORD's authority. (Vide NAME.) That men may be in formal schism who are unwittingly or unwillingly so is true. That Schismatics may have Apostolic Orders is possible, but they have not the other note of Apostolic Unity of doctrine. But there is only certainty when these two are united.

Scotland, Church of. The planting of the Church among the Caledonians is involved in much obscurity. Tertullian claims that in Britain the Gospel was preached where the Roman armies could not penetrate.

But whoever first introduced it thither carried it in forms which had no direct connection with the Church of Southern Europe. The old Scotch historians speak of King Donald I. (203 A.D.), probably the chief of some stronger tribe of the Picts, as the first Christian King. Amphibalus, Modocus, Calanus, Carnocus, are traditional names of early preachers of Christianity to them. It is said that Diocletian's persecution (303 A.D.) drove many British Christians into Scotland. The Gospel helped to elevate them, polygamy was repressed, but their wild, warlike life was not so easily laid aside. Ninian, a well-born Briton, said to have been trained in France, has the honor of being the first really historical personage who succeeded in planting the Church effectively among the southern Picts. His holy life, earnest and zealous (412 A.D.), won for him a reverence he well deserved. He founded the Church at Whitehorn and is reputed the first Bishop of Galloway. Paladius, whose mission was originally to the Irish, was diverted from that field to labor with great influence for many years (450 A.D.) among them. He sent the first missionary to the northern Picts. The Bishops seem to have been, as throughout the contemporary history of Britain and Ireland, Tribe-Bishops. Malcolm II. (1010 A.D.) first parted the jurisdiction of the Bishops into Dioceses. This principle of the Tribe-Bishops led to the custom of their living in a monastery with the Monks and of being, as members of the community, subject to the Abbot, a fact which has misled many writers. (Vide CULDEES.) The name next of note was that of St. Columba, the great Saint from Ireland, who was gifted with a powerful mind and considerable capacity as a statesman (563 A.D.). From Iona, which from him was afterwards called I-Colum-kill, or Hy of Columb of the Cells, he did his work. His was a singular career. Of a princely family, a soldier, then a monk, he won a greater fame in his strifes for the Gospel than he had gained in the struggles of his clan. After gathering around him men whom he impressed with his own zeal, and having preached in various parts of Scotland, he at last, at seventy-seven years of age, died on his knees before the altar in his little chapel at Iona.

Out of Iona came the gentle and saintly Aidan, who went through South Pictland and North England afoot upon his Episcopal work, teaching, preaching, founding Churches. A successor, Colman (650 A.D.), held the famous controversy with Wilfrid, Archbishop of York, at Whitby, as to what rite—the Old Celtic or the Latin—should prevail. Colman was defeated, and retired from Northumbria to work more exclusively in Scotland.

St. Cuthbert, the laborer among the Cumbrians, also made his work felt north of the Solway by his zeal and energy.

The principal Sees at this date were those of Man and Galloway. Others appear, but with uncertain bounds. Kenneth (844-860 A.D.), who crushed the Picts, winning the leadership for the Scots, gave greater regularity and more certain bounds to the Dioceses. The See of St. Andrew's was removed from Abernethy, and was made the chief See in Scotland. Gradually as missions were established in different places these Sees were formed, till all the kingdom was under Episcopal oversight. The influence of the Archbishopric of York, which claimed to have all Scotland under its sway, introduced the Roman rites and broke up the older Celtic traditions. Kellach (904 A.D.) went to Rome for confirmation in the See of St. Andrew's. Later the protracted struggle against the marriage of the clergy was begun. It was not readily ended, for we find Canons against their wives (focariæ) as late as 1225 A.D. The Scotch Kings striving to break up the dependence of their Bishops upon York, tried to use the quarrels between York and Canterbury (1098 A.D.) to gain this end. Most probably the fact was that consecration was conferred generally by the Bishops within the realm, but that upon occasion, as now, political reasons led to different courses. The claim on the part of York was not given up for a long time, and frequent consecrations were given by its Archbishops to the Scottish Sees. King David (1124 A.D.) endowed some Sees. They were distributed somewhat as follows: St. Andrew's, with a large jurisdiction in Fife, Lothian, Merse (now Berwick), Stirling, Angus, and Mearns; Glasgow in the West; Mortloch (later Aberdeen); Brechin, Dunblane, Ross, Dunkeld. The events in the Scottish Church were varied by visits from Cardinals, who came upon a pretext for reform, but really to extort money, and who were at last forbidden to enter the realm but by the King's license. In the unhappy strifes in the State the Bishops sometimes suffered much at the hands of the reckless lords. When the kingdom was plunged into its lowest state by the attacks of Edward I., the lords appealed to the Pope, who sent a Bull to the English King claiming the kingdom as under him, but this interference Edward fiercely rejected.

The more notable events in the history of the Church were the prosecution against the Templars (1300 A.D.), the erection of St. Andrew's into an Archbishopric (1472 A.D.) by Bulls from Rome. Influenced by petty intrigues, the King inhibited Bishop Graham from publishing them. The Bishop, a gentle man, after a struggle of twelve years, succumbed under his troubles and was succeeded by his bitterest foe, Shevez. The ambition of the Bishop of Glasgow led him to obtain a like advancement for his See (1478 A.D.), though the precedence rested in St. Andrew's. At the time of the Reformation the Archprovince of St. Andrew's included the suffragans of Aberdeen, Brechin, Caithness, Dunblane, Dunkeld, Moray, Orkney, and Ross, while Glasgow had under it Galloway, Argyle, and the Isles. The Scotch Church was infected with the same abuses and evils that had tainted the rest of the Church that acknowledged the Roman obedience. The Lollards began at the beginning of the sixteenth century to disseminate their opinions in Scotland. Some were arrested, but were not punished till Hamilton, the young Abbot of Firme (1527 A.D.), was accused of heresy. His execution did more to stir up the people than many disputations. This martyrdom led to many others. But the effort at Reformation was of a much more mixed character than elsewhere. The wild, reckless character of the nobility, their rapacity, and the peculiar tribal relations, gave the Reformation there a much different tone. The political aspect of the struggle soon assumed was one of its marked features. When James V. died (1542 A.D.) the Earl of Arran, a reformer, was regent, but soon the Roman party got influence over him, and the persecuting, repressive efforts were renewed. John Knox, who had returned from a residence in Geneva (1555 A.D.), began to gather a congregation about him in Edinburgh.

The English Reformation had affected those in Scotland so far that the counsel of the English leaders was sought by them, and Edward's Prayer-Book was introduced. In 1558 A.D. the Earls of Argyle, Glencairn, and Morton, and the Lord of Lorne, entered with others into a league together to urge a reformation and to introduce the Book of Common Prayer. Soon followed monastic excesses, the destruction of the monasteries, the deposition of the Queen regent. Then came the Parliament of 1560 A.D., wherein the Bishops kept silence, and strangely permitted themselves to be over-slaughed. Weakness on the one side, hurry and violence on the other; the intrigues and conspiracies which gathered around Queen Mary Stuart for seven years; the dying off of the Bishops, who were allowed to hold the property of their Sees, and the introduction of the Presbyterian discipline, 1572 A.D., and the appointment of the Titular Bishops,—not Bishops by consecration, but only by a political device to hold the seats of the spiritual estate in Parliament, to keep up constitutional forms. When this empty order was attacked (1572-80 A.D.) Presbyterianism prevailed, under the leadership of Andrew Melville. For thirty years this continued, till the accession of James VI. to the English throne (1603 A.D.), when he took measures to restore Episcopacy to the Scotch Church, which were finally carried out in 1610 A.D. There were no commotions nor more trouble than was natural in effecting such a change. Laud endeavored to enforce the use of a Liturgy, and drew up the ill-starred book of 1637 A.D. The troubles which were gathering around Charles I. gave opportunity for the discontented to foment fresh troubles, which grew into riots at Edinburgh. The leaders in Scotch affairs banded together in the famous National Covenant, and took the name of Covenanters. The overthrow of Episcopacy followed upon the death of Charles.

The next era in the varied fortunes of the Church extends over twenty-seven years (1661-1688 A.D.). Charles II, upon his restoration promised toleration to all; but so many prominent Presbyterians were so deeply plunged in the treasons against his father, as well as implicated in religious disturbances, that State prosecutions for treason wore the appearance of persecutions. He restored the Scotch Episcopate as soon as possible. Archbishops Sharp and Fairfoul, and Bishops Hamilton and Leighton, were consecrated in Westminster Abbey by Sheldon, Bishop of London, assisted by the Bishops of Worcester, Carlisle, and Llandaff (December 15, 1661 A.D.). They consecrated seven Bishops to fill the old Sees on the 7th of May, and two others on the 1st of June, 1662 A.D. The administration of the Church's affairs was as mild as it could be consistently with its preserving dignity and truthfulness. No Liturgical form was introduced. The right of presentation to benefices lay in the Patrons, and the induction was with the Bishops. The change in the incumbents created some confusion, and the imposition of fines by Act of Parliament upon all who did not attend church added to the difficulties. Continued disaffection and opposition, which could have been overcome by time and patience, was aggravated by legal suppression, which finally found vent in the foul assassination of Archbishop Sharp, after several attempts, 1679 A.D.

The accession of James II. affected the Church in Scotland very seriously. His efforts for the restoration of Romanism in Scotland were resisted by the Bishops in Parliament, and incurred the royal displeasure. However, the adherence of the Bishops to King James and the factious conduct of the Presbyterian leaders effected a second overthrow of Church polity and gave Scotland over to the Presbyterians. These changes showed that there was still a strong Church feeling among many, especially in the north of Scotland. No move was made by the ejected Bishops to continue the succession till 1704-5 A.D., when the death of the Archbishop of St. Andrew's brought this necessity forcibly before them. Two clergymen were selected, Revs. J. Fullarton and J. Sage. This last was a noted and able controversialist; in fact, his Episcopate was chiefly spent in this labor. In truth, the position of the Bishops seemed at this time to revert to the ancient custom in Scotland, for they were in no position to hold Sees. The adherence of the lay members of the Church in Scotland to the Stuarts prevented any practical amelioration of the condition of the clergy. Two other clergymen, Revs. J. Falconer and H. Christie, were consecrated in 1709 A.D. In 1712 A.D. the Bishops adopted the English Book of Common Prayer, and later (1764 A.D.) revised the office of the Holy Communion from materials supplied by the English non-jurors, by adding more especially the Invocation after the prayer of Consecration, which Bishop Seabury introduced into our own American Prayer-Book with some verbal changes. The broken and scattered Church had by this time so consolidated that the clergy could now desire to have a Bishop in settled residence, and Bishop Fullarton was chosen Diocesan and Primus (1720 A.D.). The clergy suffered severely from the government after the insurrection of 1745 A.D. The acts passed against them were severe, and were so denounced by the English Bishops in Parliament. However, obliged to endure much hardship they still kept up their services, and when another clergyman was advanced to the Episcopate it was as Diocesan of Aberdeen. Gradually the Sees were being again filled in a quiet way. So in difficulties and dangers was preserved the Church which was destined to give to the American Church her first Bishop. Bishop Seabury's election, suit to the English Bishops for consecration, and, upon the advice of Dr. Berkeley (the son of Bishop Berkeley) his successful application to the Scotch Bishops, are recorded also in the articles upon the American Church and upon the Church in Connecticut. He received his orders November, 1784 A.D., from Bishops Kilgour (Primus), Petrie, and Skinner. It drew the attention of the English Bishops to the depressed estate of the Scotch Church, and they procured the repeal of the penal statutes of 1746-48 A.D. The debt of our Church to the Scotch Bishops is very great, and must always be gratefully acknowledged. Yet the English Church is after all the real source of the Scotch line. We are not the less practically indebted to them for the Orders given us by our Mother Church; for the consecration of Bishop Seabury led the English Parliament to relax the stringent act, and to permit the consecration of Bishops White and Provoost. Gradually the Bishops became Diocesans, reviving as far as practicable the old lines and holding several of them as a single jurisdiction. Moray, Ross, and Caithness are held by Bishop Eden, St. Andrew's, Dunkeld, and Dunblane are under Bishop Wordsworth, Edinburgh is under Bishop Cotterell, Glasgow and Galloway are ruled by Bishop Wilson, Brechin by Bishop Jermyn, Aberdeen and Orkney by Bishop Douglass, and Argyle and the Isles by Bishop Chinnery-Haldane. The growth of the Church in Scotland has been slow but sure. It does not exhibit that rapidity of increase which we have here. In 1708 A.D. there were 133 clergy and 79 parishes vacant. In 1838 A.D. there were about 190 clergy. In 1882-83 A.D. there were 252. In this same year 28,144 communicants were reported.

Scriptures. The Holy Books of the Bible were so called very early in the Church from the New Testament usage. Then, of course, the term referred to the Old Testament (e.g., 2 Tim. iii. 15, 16; so Rom. xv. 4; 2 Pet. i. 20). They are called the HOLY Scriptures, the Scriptures of the PROPHETS. The title as given to both Testaments as early as the Epistles of St. Clement. (Vide BIBLE.) The Scriptures were from the first read constantly by the Church, both in public and in private. The public reading of them is treated at large in the articles LECTIONARY and LESSONS. We do not now understand how fully they were read in private. It is not probable that the complete copies we have in daily use were generally possessed by any but the rich, and we have numerous MSS. of only parts of the Scriptures; but not only were they read so constantly and largely in the public services that the attentive hearer could become familiar with their contents, but the people were so constantly referred to the books themselves, that the only conclusion was, that the preachers who so referred them were confident that they could easily gain access to them. Clement, Polycarp, Theophilus, Justin Martyr, Tertullian, a series of writers for the first century after the Apostles, imply this (97-190 A.D.). Clement of Alexandria continually refers to the private study of the Scriptures. St. Cyprian made specially collection of Testimonies against the Jews,—i.e., of texts bearing upon the controversies with the Jews. But St. Chrysostom is the one who specially urges, with great persistence and force, the duty, the profit, the delight, in studying the word of God. We are very apt to suppose that the study of the Scriptures was laid aside during the period called the Dark Ages; but this is the reverse of the truth. The many copies made by those monks whose affair it was to make them, the reading in order in the daily offices, which latterly, however, became overlaid with other liturgical uses, the numerous comments on the several books of Holy Scripture,—e.g., by Haymo of Halberstadt (840 A.D.),—and especially the many comments on the Apocalypse, attest that the study of it was by no means relaxed. That many in the monasteries were unable to read at all is true, but many of these listened so attentively that they were quite skilled in the text. That the wild, undisciplined Franks and Goths could not read them, did not care for them, is a fact, but when we consider what the Church had to do in educating them, with the difficulties of only MSS. at hand, we can well see that much ignorance may be excused them. Making all allowances for these drawbacks, there was a very large amount of Biblical instruction disseminated under great hindrances. The Emperors and nobles had their choicely prepared MSS. Gospels, the rich had their copies, the Churches had public copies in the church, and there was constant instruction given in different ways.

The true defect was in the substitution, too often, of listening to the public reading in preference to spending much time in private study. But however much the amount of private study varied at different times and in different places, still there were ever some in every age who had reverently studied the Holy Scriptures. In this day we are giving more attention to them than ever; some of the most absorbing controversies of the day are upon portions of the Holy Book, and the recent issue of the Revised translation has given a great impetus to a closer reading of the New Testament. There is no book in the world which has been so constantly printed, of which so many thousands of editions have been published. Yet there is but little intelligent reading of them. They have been read through by course as a stated daily task year after year by a good many, who think themselves students, and who yet have never retained a clear idea of all they have read. The Scriptures have been read, on the other hand, by those who wanted to find the authority for certain private views, others pick out favorite passages and reread these only. There are three rules to be laid down for a profitable reading of the Scriptures. The two first are general and to be constantly used, the third is for gaining a more particular training in their contents. I. Not merely to read with attention, but with that attention which leads to comparison of passages. II. To meditate frequently as we read, and endeavor to find some practical lesson or to receive, with better insight into its meaning, the doctrine taught us. III. After a general training in Holy Scripture by these two rules to then take some chief topic, as the Articles of the Creed, the divinity of our Lord, the Unity of the Church, or the such like, and compare Scripture with Scripture, "comparing Spiritual things with Spiritual." But again, there is a caution ever to be had: not to look for some preconceived idea of what should be there. The error of sectism in the study of Holy Scripture is twofold: it goes to Scripture to bolster up an already formulated doctrine, and reject every text that does not square with this formula; and, secondly, it does not touch large portions of Holy Scripture which set forth truths incompatible with the theory the reader wishes or seeks to uphold. For example, few without the Church spend much time in tracing the office and continuity of the Apostles in the New Testament. The texts upon Absolution are largely overlooked. The full witness to Confirmation is not often noticed. The texts on the Unity of the Church are seldom dwelt upon, for they do not fit in with preconceived notions. Private judgment reads into Holy Scripture much that never was there, and leaves out much that Holy Scripture insists upon. It is a practical mangling of God's Word. The full round of Bible Doctrine is seldom studied and mastered. The rule should be, that as the Creeds have defined, so difficult or opposing texts are to be accepted; and that Scripture cannot be quoted against itself. The Scriptures read with the Prayer-Book beside it, and a reference to the way the Church has arranged and selected certain Scriptures, would help very much. The XXXIX. Articles, though only binding on the clergy, furnish excellent hints upon difficult topics. The use of some special texts in the Services or the Offices, as of the Holy Communion and Baptism, will guide to a better understanding not only of the texts selected, but of others that are connected with them. One rule has been left to the last, the rule of ever reading the Holy Word of God with prayer.

Sealed Books, The, of Common Prayer, were the officially-ordered copies of the English Book of Common Prayer, revised by the Commission of 1661 A.D., which were to furnish the standard text for all future editions. Every Cathedral and Collegiate Church had to procure a copy of it, certified under the great seal of England, which Book was to be "kept and preserved by them in safety forever, and to be also produced and showed forth in any Court of Record as often as they shall be thereunto required." The Courts at Westminster and the Tower of London were to receive copies. By these copies all other printed copies of the Prayer-Book were to be compared and corrected, and when properly certified to, these copies were to be received in Law as good records as the "original book" itself. The original MS. was not found for a long while, and not till after the valuable edition by Archibald Stephens, Q.C., was published from the Legal Copies. These Sealed Books are of the utmost importance in criticising the text of our own Prayer-Book, in which many variations (despite all care to prevent them) from the Standard edition, issued in 1847 A.D., have appeared.

Secondaries. The general name for the inferior members of Cathedrals, as vicars choral, etc. The clerici secundæ formæ, i.e., of the second or lower range of stalls. . . . The Priest, Vicars, and Minor Canons were sometimes included in the superior form. Some of the lay-singers at Exeter are so called. Sometimes the term was applied to the assistant priest in course, even though not of the second form. At Hereford the second Vicar who assists in chanting the Litany is the "secondary." (Hook's Ch. Dict.)

Second Advent. The doctrine which is expressed in the confession of a Prophecy yet to be fulfilled: "From thence He shall come to judge the quick and the dead." Our LORD's prophecy (St. Matt. xxii. 30, 31; St. Mark xiii. 26, 27, and elsewhere), the constant preaching of the Apostles (1 Thess. iv. 16; 2 Thess. i. 7; 1 Pet. i. 7; Heb. ix. 28; Phil. iii. 20, 21), the prophecy of St.

John (Rev. i. 7; xxii. 12), are the basis of this Article in the Creed. The Apostles confidently expected it in their day. It has been looked for from age to age, and many holy men have been sure that it was only at the door. It is well to expect it, for we believe it as an assured fact of the future, but it is one of those things which can never be foreseen. Our LORD has clearly put this, that He will come as a thief at an unlooked-for hour, when the times and seasons in His FATHER's power only are ripe. He has distinctly said that no man, not even Himself, as SON of Man, knoweth that time, but the FATHER only. He has only certified solemnly to that coming to deliver a judgment, which will be His by office and by His Human Nature. In this Second Advent (whether preceded by a millennial reign the future only shall show) He will summon all before Him, the quick and the dead, to give an account of their deeds and words, and to receive a righteous award. The strictness of this inquisition, the laying bare of the secrets not of our lives, but of our thoughts and motives, the double witness both of His book of Remembrance and of our own memory, are all clearly brought in. The awful splendor of that great day, when, with the sign of the SON of Man in mid-air to proclaim His Presence, He shall come with His holy ones, seated in the clouds with the Angels of Judgment, summoning all, from earth and sea, with the blast of the Archangelic trumpet, He has described in language grand by its very simplicity and by the weight of facts in prophecies. These should be the subject of our meditations. The ends of that Judgment are: The conclusion of that great scheme of probation whereby each child of Adam goes through his trial, and as he fulfills his mission or fails in it, shall be rewarded or punished accordingly. It is the end of all those providences which are connected with the free-will of man. Each man's life is a course of trial, and the end alone shows the result. Now, though as a matter of a particular judgment must needs be passed on each one in the hour of death, to determine his position, yet it needs the solemnity of the final day to declare it.

And next, it is the great means by which the justice of GOD is made manifest. Here we only see the end of the golden chain that hangs between heaven and earth, and there are many providences which we cannot fathom. We see virtue crushed to the earth, and vice triumphing. We see the most total disproportion of the lots of men. Why should the lord have more than the beggar? We see one man carried to the grave after a life of uninterrupted success, another the victim of the frowns of fortune. Why is this? Though GOD occasionally gives us hints of His justice, and shows us just enough to convince us that it is well with the righteous and ill with the wicked even here, yet to mark the Christian dispensation (unlike the earlier times) He has referred the ultimate retribution, both of good and bad, to the future state. And accordingly, when the great day comes, much that is inscrutable to us now will be cleared up. God has revealed to us the judgment, that by the thought of it we should be urged both to piety and patience. "Blessed is that soul, which day and night hath no other care than how, in the great day, when every creature shall stand around the Judge to give an account of their works, she shall be able to relate her life. For whosoever continually places that day and that hour before his eyes, and ever thinks of his defense at that most just tribunal, is likely to commit no sin, or at least very few." Hence, also, St. Chrysostom says, "Let us ever be saying to ourselves and to others, there is a resurrection, and a terrible judgment awaiting us."

Sect. It means a division in the body of Christians. It is a body that itself cuts off from the unity of the holy Church Catholic, for in that body there must be a unity. It is noticeable that a sect has the name of some human leader or founder given to it despite its repudiation of it, thus marking its human origin. This natural law was as old as the parties in the Corinthian Church. "I of Paul," "I of Apollos," "I of Cephas," and lastly and truly, "I of CHRIST," so St. Paul asks, "Is CHRIST divided?" If, then, we have any name other than that of CHRIST, both God and man, called upon us, we are guilty of partyism or of sectism. Therefore it was that our LORD warned us, "Neither be ye called masters: for one is your Master, even CHRIST" (St. Matt. xxiii. 10).

Secularization. The alienation and the application of Church property to secular uses. It has happened repeatedly in the history of the Church that its property has been seized and secularized by the state. There is here no reference to the petty seizures and spoliations of lands and property from which Parishes or Dioceses have suffered more or less in every age, but to the larger acts that affected the real estate of the national Church, or of the richer corporations, which (as, for instance, the Templars, the Jesuits, and other large bodies) were spread throughout the Church. The Templars were prosecuted and suppressed and their property seized by Philip Augustus in 1312 A.D. In England, Henry VIII. seized upon the Monastic property, and though he promised to found Bishoprics with it, either put it into the treasury for his own purposes or gave it to his favorites. In France at the Revolution all Church property was secularized, though much of it has been recovered since. In Spain, in Italy, in Austria, in every country in Europe there has been such secularization of Church property. Even the State of Virginia at the close of the Revolution seized upon the glebes belonging to the Church.

Secular Clergy. The name given to those of the clergy in the Roman Church who do not belong to some one of the Monastic orders.

Sedilia. Seats or stalls, usually three in number, placed within the Chancel on the south side. They are either level or are graduated, following the steps of the altar, the highest seat being nearest the east end. They are intended as seats for the clergy during the sermon.

See. (Vide DIOCESE.) It comes to us from the Latin "Sedes" through the French siege, a seat. It was the name given to the seat or residence of the Bishop, and so to the city in which he had his Throne. St. Augustine speaks of those cities in which the Apostles formed Churches as the Apostolic Sees, and so they are usually named. It was from this fact, in part, that Rome's opposition came when Constantinople was raised, because of its political importance, to the second place, for Constantinople was not an Apostolic See. Jerusalem, Antioch, Rome, Corinth, and Ephesus were named Apostolic Churches, as having Apostles for their founders.

Semi-Pelagians. As Pelagianism was practically but the assertion that man could save himself, and so was refuted by the Theologians and condemned by the Councils of the Church, so Semi-Pelagianism sought to find a mean between the two. It would not fairly accept the doctrine that man was indeed far gone from original righteousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil; nor yet could it hold that a man could save himself, and could live without sin and keep the commandments of God perfectly if he willed it. Those who sought an escape from either statement formulated their opinion thus: that the first strivings of repentance can originate and are within the power of the will of man, but that if he would grow in grace at all, he must have and use the grace of the HOLY SPIRIT. This doctrine was very popular in the south of France among the Theologians there, the chief of whom was Cassianus. It has never been fairly dropped, but ever reappears from time to time. Augustine's extreme doctrines were the result of this resistance to Pelagius. The less cautious though correct doctrines of St. John Chrysostom were taken up by the Gallican Doctors, while they resisted Augustine's formulation of doctrine. Augustinianism gradually won its way.

It is not within our plan to dwell upon the controversies which sprang up from time to time upon these questions. The most noted was the contest between the Jesuits and the Jansenists, who followed the Augustinian statements. In the end the laxer Jesuits triumphed. In England the numerous sectaries who sprang up during the Reformation and just after it were more or less tainted with Semi-Pelagianism.

And at this day there is current a large amount of Semi-Pelagian doctrine, chiefly from carelessness and from inaccurate reasoning than from any recognition of it as a theory, and very often probably in utter ignorance that there was ever any school that bore that name. The doctrine of the Church Catholic is properly set forth in the Articles (Articles LX., X.).

Septuagesima. The Sunday which is about seventy (accurately sixty-three) days before Easter. It took its name (Septuagesima) probably from counting back from Quinquagesima Sunday, which is forty-nine days before Easter, and so, roundly, is the fiftieth day from Easter-day. The name is very old, being used in the Sacramentaries as early as Galasius, 494 A.D. The preparation for Lent is begun in the Epistles and Gospel, which are upon the self-control (1 Cor. ix. 24-27) needed in the Christian race. The Gospel (the parable of the Laborers in the Vineyard) has its interconnection with the Epistle in implying the nature of the toil imposed upon the laborers in the spiritual kingdom, whether of the soul or of the larger field of the Church. The Collect has been traced through the Sarum Missal to Gregory I. (596 A.D.).

Septuagint. The most famous and valuable of all the ancient Versions of the Old Testament. It is called the Septuagint (LXX., or the Seventy) from the legend that King Ptolemy procured from the High-Priest at Jerusalem a company of seventy-two learned Jews, who translated for him the Hebrew Scriptures in seventy-two days. The legend varies in details in different reports. The legend is worthy of credence, so far as it shows Alexandria to have been the place of the translation, and that it was at some time placed in the library there. But the translation itself shows such variations in style and manner that it is impossible to suppose it to have been made by any one set of men, or at one date. The facts, from internal evidence, point to many translators, and perhaps recension, separated by considerable spaces of time. We may suppose with great likelihood that the collection which we call the Septuagint was the result of the translations made as the needs of the Jews of the dispersion demanded. It was the version universally accepted in the time of our LORD, and was the one which the Hellenic Jews would be most familiar with. So its great value lay in the wide dispersion of copies of it, in the fact that it prepared a language, so to speak, in which the Gospels could be written, for it introduced so many Hebraisms and Jewish forms of thought that the style of the Gospels (written by men Jews by birth and speaking the Aramaic vernacular, yet engaged in original composition) would not grate so harshly upon the Greek ear. Both, of course, used forms of the Hellenic-Greek current after the time of Alexander the Great, but both used the language as an instrument to be tempered anew for their sacred work. This Version was in such current use that St. Paul uses it freely, seldom making any attempt to give a closer rendering of the Hebrew original. And so do the other Apostles, though, of course, to a less extent, since their audiences were not so generally Gentile as were his. "The use made of the LXX. in the New Testament has rendered it very precious to the Church. Of three hundred and fifty direct quotations from the Old Testament, scarcely fourteen per cent. differ from the Septuagint. Of thirty-seven quotations ascribed to our SAVIOUR, thirty-three agree almost verbatim with the LXX. Two follow the Hebrew, and differ from the LXX. One agrees with neither, and another partly with both. In the speech of St. Stephen there are nearly thirty quotations from the LXX. The Ethiopian Eunuch was converted by reading the LXX. All the quotations in the Acts of the Apostles are taken from this version, and wherever the word (graphé) Writing or Scripture occurs, it means the LXX. The Epistles of St. James and St. Peter, being addressed to Hellenists by birth, are fully furnished with quotations from the LXX. St. Paul, the Apostle to the Gentiles, and deeply versed in the Hebrew Scriptures, yet quotes from the LXX. on all occasions. His first and longest address in the synagogue at Pisidia is full of allusions to the LXX. His vocabulary is wholly supplied from the same source, and this is no less true of the immediate successors of the Apostles. Timothy, of Hellenistic parentage, could only have been instructed in the Septuagint Version." (Blunt's Dict. of Hist. and Doct. Theol., sub voc.) But there are one or two things to note as to the Version. Either it was made from a Hebrew text which varies much from our own, accepted from the Jews and certified to, or it takes many liberties with the text. It is no part of the point to be made to attempt to defend any liberties so taken, but the variations are certainly more numerous and wider from the Hebrew text than any modern version could possibly venture upon. Yet the writers of the New Testament did not disdain to use it, with all its imperfections, but incorporated its language into their own Inspired Writings. It was rightly not their mission to retranslate the Version, since they would prejudice the reader against their own work, though they did correct any very glaring defect in the text they chose to quote. Now, is not this case somewhat parallel with that of our authorized Version (with vastly the advantage on the side of the English Version in point of accuracy), as compared with the Revision lately put forth? Again, as it grew and was accepted as the best Version possible for the Hellenistic Jews, it was the accepted Version for the Eastern Church, and from it the Lessons in the Church, the proof-texts in Controversies of the utmost importance, as in the Arian Controversy, the current comment in Sermon and in Lecture, were taken.

There is needed yet an edition of the text worthy of its importance in the History of the Scriptures and the Versions in the Church's keeping.

Sequestration. This is a separating the thing in controversy from the possession of both the contending parties. It is of frequent use in England. When a living becomes void by the death of an incumbent or otherwise, the Bishop sends out his sequestration to have the cure supplied, and to preserve the profits (after the expenses deducted) for the use of his successor. Sometimes a benefice is left under sequestration for many years together, namely, when it is of so small value that no clergyman fit to serve the cure will be at the charge of taking it by institution. In this case sequestration is committed sometimes to the Curate only, sometimes to the Curate and Church-Warden jointly. There are several other kinds of sequestration, as for neglect of duty, and a levy upon the Parson's goods for debt, made through the Bishop. All acts involving sequestration pass through the Bishop. (From Hook's Ch. Dictionary.)

Seraphim. Vide ANGELS.

Sermons. The Sermon, or Discourse, has always been a most important part of the work and duty of the Parish Priest, or of the Deacon, "if he be licensed thereto by the Bishop." Originally it was confined to the Bishop as an official act. But this rule was very frequently broken, and laymen were at times allowed to preach or to exhort. In the Apostolic Age the pressing necessities of an active, energetic Apostolate, and the miraculous gifts which were shown by many lay members, led to the use of orders of men who had this authority to preach. And instead of these orders having been dropped, it is far more probable that as spiritual gifts ceased, the offices were held by one and the same person. It must be carefully borne in mind that the preaching of the Apostles and the modern sermon have distinct aims. In the first place, the Apostle had a heathen or a Jewish audience to whom he proclaimed the Faith as a perfectly new thing (hence the Gospel, good news). But when there was a congregation gathered, then it would be a mixed audience, and for these the prophets were appointed (for prophesying was not merely a predictive power, but also it included the wider power to teach), and the prophets in the New Testament were also teachers. Later the Presbyter held this as well as other functions joined to his office, so that it was merged not lost. The Missionary really used the Apostolic authority to preach. The Parish Priest is the Teacher or Prophet in its broader meaning. Our own modern Sermon is much more nearly the older use in the Primitive Church, and it is (as might be expected) a fact that those old Sermons, freed from the mere local and temporary accessories of the age, can be effectively used now as well as then, and the later homilies and expository form of Sermons is but a reverting to the great models which the Fathers have given us. It was and now is meant for direct instruction in the Scriptures. It is said that the power of the pulpit has declined, but this is far from true. The mode of preserving religious truth must be affected by the circumstances about it. It is not given to every man, on whom is laid the duty of preaching, to be an orator. Attractive speaking in this day is equally amusing as in Athens eighteen centuries ago. But it does not always prove most effective. Soundness in teaching will alone last. It is the preacher's duty to make his Sermon interesting, but it is also the hearer's duty to listen heedfully to him who has the care of souls. Our LORD said, "Take heed what ye hear," and St. Paul predicted that "the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine; but after their own lusts shall they heap to themselves teachers having itching ears, and they shall turn many from the truth" (2 Tim. iv. 3, 4). Here are the Churchman's rules as to whom he will listen to. If they are heedfully examined they will keep him straitly in his own Parish church. There is also the responsibility of hearing aright. A Sermon can be upon only a fragment of the great body of doctrines. It presupposes some acquaintance with the general topic treated, and with its interrelation to the whole teaching of the Faith. Still, it requires close attention on the part of the hearer, with faith (Heb. iv. 2) and prayer. The Sermon is within the lines that the Scripture, the Creeds, the Prayer-Book, and the Articles draw around it, and a serious departure from them would be instinctively felt. So the Congregation have an unnoticed but real defense against wrong doctrine.

Sermons may be roughly divided into Doctrinal, Hortatory, or Expository. Sometimes the Sermon may partake of all three, usually of only one, though every Sermon should be practical in some way. There is a general but wrong objection to doctrinal Sermons. But if they are laid aside the preaching would soon become poor and shrunken. Doctrines are our Faith,—e.g., the Incarnation, the Atonement, the Resurrection, the work of the HOLY GHOST,—the living power of the Church. We rest upon them. We need to hear them explained, enforced, and illustrated. The Church intends that her children shall receive doctrine. Of the three this class of Sermons should be most valued.

Again, there is a tendency with some to undervalue, with others to overvalue, the Sermon in comparison with the worship and service of the Church. In truth, there is no comparison, each is distinct, each is essential. That they are joined together is the result of convenience, of custom, of the rubric enjoining the Sermon when there is a Communion, of the opportunity to use the lessons of the service to point the instruction to be given. That the Congregation may be attracted most by what costs the least effort is true, for the service is a holy work, a sacrifice; so the Sermon is impatiently looked for and the glorious beauty of worship is obscured. And as by the exigency of the hour the Sermon must be short, it may fail to be as instructive as it should be, because there is not time to develop and enforce any very important topic upon the minds of the hearers. There can be no rubrical reason why the Church could not be opened for the Sermon only with the shortened service at some convenient hour, not the usual hour for service, when full time could be given to the service. There is this serious duty resting upon every Churchman, to take heed what he hears and to whom he listens, to consider for himself, and to urge on others to receive instruction, not seek amusement.

We will not be allowed to plead ignorance of the Law of God when we can know, and we should listen carefully to authoritative explanations that we may not transgress it ignorantly.

Service. A general term, including the offices of Morning and Evening Prayer and other most frequently used offices. It is used to describe also separate musical renderings of a part of the Public Service. A "Morning Service" would contain the Venite, the Te Deum, and Jubilate, or Benedictus, or the Benedicite in place of the Te Deum. A "Communion Service" contains the Responses to the Commandments, the Prefaces and Sanctus, and the Gloria in Excelsis. The proper musical rendering of the service should also include the Versicles and the Amens. It is not an easy matter to persuade those in charge that there should be more unity of movement and intention in the usual selection of the Chants and Glorias chosen for the regular Sunday service. The Precentor should select the several portions of the music with reference to the general unity of the service. Not, as is so often the case, choose each piece separately because it happens to be pleasing, without regard to the fact whether it is in harmony with what precedes or what may follow it. Such a service properly compiled from churchly music is as much a "service" as though the whole series of Anthems and Canticles had had appropriate music from the pen of a single composer. Such musical settings of the Morning and Evening Prayer and of the Communion Service require a training from those in charge, which makes them an act and a sacrifice of praise which has cost something to prepare and to offer to God.

Session of Christ. His sitting on the right hand of His FATHER is a necessary part of that Confession of the Facts of our Redemption which constitute the Creed. The value of this constant confession is less felt than it should be. The Article of His Ascension is properly followed by a declaration of His session at the right hand of GOD the FATHER Almighty. He that liveth and was dead, and, behold, is alive for evermore, has carried our human nature into the Presence of Presences. There our LORD JESUS CHRIST abideth in the full majesty of all that was His as Eternal SON of GOD, and waiteth as our Judge, clothed with plenary power. He is there in that true Human Body (then mortal and possible, but now immortal and impossible), which He took in the Virgin's womb, together with the true Human Soul which belongs to His Human Nature, and which was, during His life on earth, completely joined to His Divine Nature, yet without fusion, and which separated from His body by Death, was reunited to it upon the third day after His Crucifixion, and constituted His true and real Resurrection; and with this He as perfect immortal man, as well as GOD for evermore, has "gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of GOD, angels and authorities and powers being made subject unto Him." By this session at the Right Hand of His FATHER is set forth His Supremacy. But also our LORD being our High-Priest, and having entered into the holiest with His own blood, abideth there to make continual intercession for all who shall come to Him. It is His mediatorial office which He must retain till the fullness of the times shall come. "Sit Thou at my right hand until I make Thine enemies Thy footstool." The facts we confess, then, in this Article of the Creed, are His Immortality, His Presence at the Throne of His FATHER, His Royal Supremacy over all things visible and invisible, His Mediatorial Office, His exercise of this Office continually until the time shall come when He shall appear in the clouds of Heaven as the Supreme Judge of the quick and the dead.

Sexagesima. The Sunday falling on the fifty-sixth day before Easter. As in the case of the Septuagesima Sunday, the name is given from the round number, not from the actual count of days. The Collect, Epistle, and Gospel are from the Sarum Missal, but slightly altered, since there was a reference to St. Paul as a protector, which was removed and a correct phrase substituted. The Epistle has double but distinct lines of allusion to the Gospel: first the notable sower, St. Paul under the guidance of the HOLY GHOST; next the example he gave of endurance, of depth of good ground, and of the abundant harvest his sowing has produced. "I have planted, Apollos watered, but God gave the increase" (1 Cor. iii. 6).

Sexton. Segestan, contracted from Sacristan. His duties are not so dignified or responsible as were those of the Sacristan, who had the care of the valuables of the Church. The Sexton has generally charge of the menial offices about the church building. His duties vary in detail as the customs of the several parishes vary, but they generally lie within the limits of caring for the church building, ringing the bell, and looking after such matters as the rector shall direct or require. It is really an office that deserves much more consideration than it receives, being a charge in the care of sacred things. "I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness," was the Psalmist's impassioned exclamation. Any service rendered for the decency and order and comfort of the worshippers in God's house is accompanied with a blessing.

Shechinah. It may be freely expressed by the Indwelling Presence of God. It was a word of later coinage, and was the word by which the Jews expressed the presence of God dwelling in the Holy of Holies. It was not the Glory or the Pillar, but it was that abiding presence of which the Glory and the Pillar were the manifestations. He dwelt in the bush in Horeb and it was not consumed. He dwelt between the Cherubim, and thence gave answers to His People. His promise: "Sing and rejoice, O daughter of Zion, for, lo, I come, and I will dwell in the midst of thee, saith the LORD" (Zech. ii. 10), expresses in part the meaning of this Shechinah. It was a word used in explanation of the Targums, not a word of the Inspired writers. It was a preparation as it were for the later coming, teaching of the wondrous indwelling of our LORD among men. We may, therefore, say that what the devout Jew understood and confessed of the indwelling of God's glory among men was fulfilled in our LORD. Wherever the New Testament speaks of the Word being made flesh and dwelling among men, and of His glory (St. John i. 14; iii. 11; Rev. vii. 15; xii. 12; xiii. 6; xxi. 3), the Jew would readily understand the Shechinah of His Presence. But since this is so, the references by our LORD to Himself are so to be understood: "I am the light, the Life of men. Abide in me, and I in you." These refer to His dwelling as a glory and a sanctification in the heart,—a fulfillment of His pledge. "I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit." "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty." We can well understand this as a spiritual reference, but it is something far more than that, it is much nearer what St. Peter expressed by the words "partakers of the divine nature." And the presence of His Glory among us is pledged to us by the promise, "Where two or three are gathered together in My Name, there am I in the midst of them." In these ways this later Jewish word taught by anticipation the truth of His abiding presence, with a fullness which we are likely to lose in this day.

Shew-Bread. The Twelve Loaves which were to be placed upon a table overlaid with fine gold, and which was set in the outer Sanctuary with the Seven-branched Lamp and the Altar of Incense. The twelve loaves were to be placed there fresh every Sabbath with incense upon them, that they may be a memorial, even an offering made by fire, unto the LORD. The loaf of the previous week was the priest's portion to be eaten then in the Holy Place (Ex. xxv. 23-30; Lev. xxiv. 5-9). It was never to fail; it was the bread before the face of the LORD, and so a memorial, to be set before the LORD alway. As the Bread before the Face of God. So, to use Bähr's beautiful language (Smith's Bible Dict., sub voc.), "The Bread of the Face is therefore that bread through which God is seen, that is, with the participation of which the seeing of God is bound up, or through the participation of which man attains the sight of God. Whence it follows that we have not to think of bread merely as such, as the means of nourishing the bodily life, but as spiritual food, as a means of appropriating and retaining that life which consists in seeing the face of God. Bread is therefore here a symbol, and stands here, as it so generally does in all languages, both for life and nourishment; but by being entitled the Bread of the Face, it becomes a symbol of a life higher than the physical: it is, since it lies on the table, placed in the symbolic heaven, heavenly bread. They who eat of it and satisfy themselves with it see the face of God (Bähr, Symbolic). It is to be remembered that the Shew-Bread was taken from the children of Israel by an everlasting covenant, and may therefore be well expected to bear the most solemn meaning." It is the type of Him who was at once the perfect Image of God, the one who abides in the Presence of Presences as the Bread of Life, and who also has given us Himself the Bread for the nourishment of the soul (St. John vi. 51).

Shrine. A place where relics or consecrated things are solemnly placed. It is used to designate holy places, as the Holy Shrines at Jerusalem and in the Holy Land, to which pilgrimages used to be made. It may also mean a tomb, since the bodies of saints were placed in costly tombs in the churches.

Shrive. To pronounce the absolution over penitents. It was done publicly once a year during the Holy Week, when all penitents who had faithfully fulfilled the required proofs of a thorough repentance were solemnly absolved and restored to Communion. But it also came to mean the private administration of absolution upon confession.

Shrove-Tuesday. Tuesday before Ash-Wednesday. It obtained its name from the confession and absolution given upon that day in preparation for the Lenten fast.

Sick. Visitation of the Sick. Vide MINOR OFFICES.

Sign. The Hebrew word ôth, signifying sign, is used in Ex. iii. 12, where it means a token of God's power. Gideon asks for a sign from God that it is really His angel who talks with him (Judges vi. 17). The flesh and the unleavened cakes brought by Gideon are consumed by fire at the touch of the staff of the angel (v. 21), and thus the sign is given by a miracle, and Gideon accepts the divine commission to enter on his great work for God. In the New Testament the scribes and Pharisees ask for a "sign" from CHRIST (St. Matt. xii. 38, St. Mark viii. 12), but He declines to perform wonders for those who cavil against Him. This craving of the Jews appears again in St. John ii. 18, and vi. 30, and 1 Cor. i. 22: "The Jews require a sign." In 1 Cor. xiv. 22, we read, "Tongues are for a sign not to them that believe, but to them that believe not." In St. Mark xvi. 17, our LORD speaks of the miraculous signs which "shall follow them that believe," and the twentieth verse tells of the fulfillment of the prophecy. In the plural number the word is usually combined with wonders, and denotes God's interventions preternaturally warning men of approaching judgment, and also the miracles wrought by means of God's ministers.

In the XXV. and XXVII. Articles the term sign is used in reference to the Holy Sacraments. In the XXV. Article they are called "effectual signs of grace." In the XXVII. Baptism is called "a sign of Regeneration or New Birth." In the Church Catechism the word Sacrament is defined as "an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace." In this ecclesiastical sense of the word we learn that both outward acts and inward spiritual life are needed to perfect the Christian. The white garment formerly worn at Baptism was an indication of the purity of life which should follow the reception of that Holy Sacrament. Those who receive the Holy Communion should be so united to CHRIST that they may partake of the heavenly banquet, and be ever "with the LORD" (1 Thess. iv. 17).

St. Paul likens the Christians to the branches of a wild olive-tree grafted into a good tree (Rom. xi. 17). So by the Holy Sacraments believers are engrafted into CHRIST. But the grafts must not simply be bound to the tree; they must also "take hold of the stock," and the budding shows that they have received sap from the root, and "are really united to the tree." Here we have both the "outward and visible sign" and the "inward and spiritual grace."

REV. S. F. HOTCHKIN.

Simon, St. The surnames Zealotes and the Canaanite (these two titles, the first given by St. Luke and the other by St. Matthew) are all that we have to mark him or to give us the slightest insight into his character. They both point out that he belonged at one time to the faction of Zealots, which was so noted a party in the last sad scenes of Jewish history. It shows how broad our LORD's human sympathies were, and how He could by His wondrous influence harmonize the most jarring and conflicting elements, could gather into one body the headlong St. Peter, the energetic yet loving St. John, the calm and stately St. James, and the earnest men like St. Andrew and St. Philip, and those with a fanatical past like St. Simon, and send them forth with the one aim, the one enthusiasm, the one energizing conviction that would give them the victory.

Simony. The sin of simony consists in a willing sale and purchase of spiritual gifts, or of those offices and preferments by which spiritual gifts are conferred. Our LORD had laid down the rule, "freely have ye received, freely give." And St. Peter's indignant rebuke to Simon Magus, "Thy money perish with thee, because thou hast thought that the gift of God may be purchased with money." Simony can, it is evident, take many shapes and can find excuses for itself. To check it, it was very early enacted that the buyer and seller of the offices of Bishop, Priest, or Deacon should be cut off from the Church. The Councils, both Diocesan, Provincial, and Ecumenical, repeatedly passed canons against it. Much of the confusion which occurred in ecclesiastical affairs during the Middle Ages was incurred by the effort to suppress it. There must be no fee for baptism, or for the spiritual gifts which Our LORD left to be freely given to His people. Thank-offerings were not to be refused, but no fees were to be charged. But all spiritual preferments must be given only on due examination of the fitness of the person, without bribe or thought of future reward. The Papal extortions which began about 1125 A.D. and were continued on for three centuries, afforded the real foundation for the present legal enactment against simony. They sold offices and Benefices to the highest bidder, and claimed and obtained by means of provisions, reservations, and commendams a large income from those who were willing to pay. The Benefices were valued as annuities are. This state of things led to the numerous and complicated laws in England upon simony, and the simple direct rights of patronage became much confused by the claims and counter-claims between the Papal Court and the Parliament.

The sale of livings which now exists, and is hedged in by law, is felt as a great evil, which from its conditions may not be actual simony, but which brings in all the scandal of it. And steps have been taken during the past years both by the Convocations of Canterbury and York to urge the movement made in Parliament for the removal of the evil. Simony in the Church in this country is not known.

Sin. Among the many and various definitions of sin, there can be no safer or more accurate guide than St. Paul's exhaustive treatise in the Epistle to the Romans. From that we learn clearly that sin is the failure to attain to the standard of God's moral requirement, and is independent of any direct revelation of His will, although that standard is fixed by His revealed moral law. The Greek verb hamartano, to sin, means to fall short of the mark, as with a javelin badly thrown: "For all have sinned and come short of the glory of God" (Rom. iii. 23). "As many as have sinned without law shall also perish without law." (See also verses 14, 15, of the same chapter.) In general it is the willful transgression of either God's laws or the moral sense as witnessed by conscience. The mere consent of the will without any overt act is sufficient to constitute sin, as our LORD distinctly asserts. Indeed, an action not intrinsically wrong may be sinfully performed or purposed, if its propriety be even doubted, since "Whatsoever is not of faith is sin." From the universality of sin, affecting even angelic natures, it would seem to be a necessary result of the freedom of imperfect will. The origin of sin in the world was coeval with the origin of man. It appeared in the first man with the first temptation which came in his way, and with him it was the deliberate transgression of the Divine command. In what the primal innocence of Adam consisted the Scriptures leave us in doubt, whether it was a willing obedience, or a lack of moral responsibility, or a mere ignorance of right and wrong. The two latter conditions are strongly indicated by the exceedingly low state of civilization and development attributed to him (vide MAN), and by the coupling of his disobedience with the sudden awakening to a knowledge of good and evil. The immediate result of sin was the passing of man from a state of mere animal idleness and security to one of labor, sorrow, and the fear of death, which the Scriptures declare to be the direct consequence and punishment of sin. But while this declaration is positive we are not to receive it as definite. Physical death was certainly in the world before man, and therefore before sin. It had swept away generations of living forms before man's creation, and the constitution of numberless creatures contemporary with him made it necessary to their life, if not to his own. Nor is it necessary to raise the physiological and other difficulties incident to the theory of a forfeited immortality in the case of man alone. From its very nature sin concerns only that higher life which was super-added to man's animal nature when he "became a living soul," and can only incidentally affect his animal part. It is the death of that higher life which sin brought into the world, and from that death only, not physical death, did the sacrifice of CHRIST redeem the human race. No change whatever has passed on man's mortality because of the tragedy of the Cross, and therefore if physical death were that curse of sin from which man was to be redeemed by the Atonement, then the Atonement has failed of its purpose and itself become in some sense a "missing of the mark,"—hamartia, Sin. This argument alone, the reductio ad absurdum, is sufficient to prove the irrelevancy of sin to the question of physical death.

The punishment of sin is of two kinds, viz., that which it brings of itself in this world, as ill health, mental anguish, or social disgrace, and that which God will inflict for it hereafter, the death of man's God-life, by which he shall become fitted only for the eternal companionship of the fallen angels and deserve a share in the terrible fate reserved for them. Sin is necessarily hostile to true happiness, because its nature is essentially evil, and evil is inconsistent with happiness, which is in itself good. "The pleasures of sin," therefore, cannot be true pleasures, and must eventually result in some development of evil. Since sin is itself evil and the perversion of what should be man's moral nature, and since its inevitable final consequence is moral death, it is the great and, universal moral disease which infects man's higher life. The Remedy for sin is the Atonement (q.v.) made by the Divine Son of God assuming the nature infected by sin, living its life without sin in His own person, and bearing its punishment in behalf of the human race. While this sinless life and death of the God-Man does not enable any other man to live a life free from actual transgression, it has yet secured God's pardon for every sinning man upon condition of his believing in JESUS CHRIST and becoming mystically united to Him by Baptism (St. Mark xvi. 16). It also secures to man the help of the HOLY GHOST, the Spirit of CHRIST, to strengthen his will in resisting temptation to sin. Although the effect of sin is to alienate man from God and destroy his love for Him, it yet does not alienate God's love from man. Indeed, it was because of God's love for sinners that He sent His Only-Begotten Son into the world to redeem man from sin and its penalty (St. John iii. 16). When sin is the performance, or the mere consent of the will to the performance of some evil act, it is known as sin of Commission. When it is the simple failure to obey or to perform some duty, it is sin of Omission. Some of our LORD's severest denunciations are against the latter class of sin (St. Matt. xxv. passim). The distinction of venial and deadly sin is made by the Roman Church, but is not generally recognized among Christians. The unpardonable sin, or sin against the HOLY GHOST, has occasioned much dispute and is often a source of great mental anxiety, the belief that it has been committed being a frequent feature of insane hallucinations. The belief in the possibility of such a sin arises from our LORD's declaration that "All manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men: but the blasphemy against the HOLY GHOST shall not be forgiven unto men, . . . either in this world, neither in the world to come" (St. Matt. xii. 31, 32), and also from St. John saying, "There is a sin unto death: I do not say that he shall pray for it" (1 John v. 16). It is generally conceded by the ablest interpreters that the sin here mentioned consists in the deliberate and final rejection of God's grace in CHRIST, as by the Jews rejecting the testimony of the HOLY GHOST to CHRIST's claims as the Divine MESSIAH, or a sinner dying in willful refusal to accept His redemption. The very obscurity of the subject should be a sufficient safeguard against the despairing fear of the commission of such sin, since so terrible a possibility could not be left in doubt without vitiating every assurance of God's love for man, while no man could possibly commit such a sin who believes in CHRIST sufficiently to fear it. REV. R. WILSON, D.D.

Sisterhoods. Sisters of Mercy, Sisters of Charity, Sisters of the Church, or simply Sisters, as they are variously called, have become an accepted fact in the life and work of our Church. Their power for good has been fully recognized, and the Church now only desires to see more of them coming forward and devoting themselves to God. Yet for all this many Churchmen and Churchwomen have but a very vague idea of what a Sister is, of what the life is that she is called to live. It is our purpose in this article to give clear and simple instruction upon this.

A Sister is a woman who is consecrated to Almighty God in His Church. It is true that this may be said in a degree of all baptized Christians, but the consecration of a Sister is something more than that to which others are called.

There are some to whom the voice of the Master comes now as it came of old, calling "Follow Me," with a special call involving the leaving of all that the world holds dear, houses, land, friends, father, mother, for His sake. James and John heard and obeyed; and some hear it now. God makes Himself known to the soul as the "chiefest among ten thousand and altogether lovely." He reveals to the soul what He has done for it, what He will be to it. The soul sees that there is "none to be desired in comparison with Him," it is filled with gratitude and love at the revelation of what He has done for it, it bows itself before Him in loving, adoring self-surrender. "LORD, what wilt Thou have me to do?" "LORD, I will follow Thee whithersoever Thou goest."

This call of God is what is technically called Vocation, and it is consecration in obedience to this that underlies and is the foundation of the true Sister's life.

When God has thus called the soul and the soul has surrendered herself, He makes clear in the way of His providence what His will is for that particular soul. Sometimes it is long before He does this, and the soul must wait in simple obedience and in a dedicated spirit until the way is clear for a change to be made in the outer life.

This change is made when the one who believes she has this vocation becomes a member of a Religious Community, that is, enters a Sisterhood. Probably she is guided in her choice of a Community by her previous knowledge of some Sisters with whom she has been brought in contact, or by the advice of her clergyman, with whom of course she takes counsel, or by hearing or reading of some works in which Sisters have been engaged. If she is wisely guided she will seek some large, well-organized Community, where she will have the benefit of experienced training, and a well-developed and tried Rule of Life. While it is desirable that the number of Sisters in the Church should be largely increased, it is not well that there should be many little Sisterhoods. A few large Communities will do more to keep up a high ideal of life, and fit and train women for the life to which they are thus called, than little independent societies in separate parishes, struggling on feebly with insufficient discipline, and over-weighted with a multitude of parish cares.

It has sometimes happened that an earnest clergyman feeling the need of women's work among the people, and seeing certain devout women apparently fitted for the work, has tried to gather them into a little Sisterhood, under his own care, and for the benefit of his own parish. It would have been better if he had guided such women to some existing Community, where they would have had teaching and training such as it was not in his power to give, and from whence they might possibly return, or others might come in their place, as Mission Sisters, or even as a Branch House of the order they had joined.

When a woman desires to join a Community the question of money naturally arises. It may be well to say here that this is not a matter of real importance. In some Communities it is required that a certain sum be brought as dowry by those seeking admission, or if not required it is thought advisable; but this is not a general rule, and very few Communities would reject any one on this ground if she were otherwise well qualified for admission. If any one is already possessed of money, she is not required to give it to the Community. She may do so if she pleases, or she may distribute it among her friends. The Community would refuse to receive it if she had any relatives who needed assistance and whom it was her duty to help. It is only required that she shall not retain any money for her own use.

In most Communities there are two or more orders of Sisters. The first or higher order are called Choir-Sisters, the others variously Lay, Minor, or Second Order Sisters. The first Order is composed of those of superior education and gifts, and in them the management of the Sisterhood rests, the Superior and other officers being elected by themselves from their own number; they also elect the Chaplain.

To the Lay, Minor, or Second Order Sisters a somewhat subordinate position is given. They keep the same spiritual rule as the others, but they do the lesser works of the Community, the duties of the household and such like, and have no share in its government.

On entering a Sisterhood the Postulant, as she is called, being in the position of one seeking admission, remains on trial for some six months, keeping the rule of the Order and being under the direction of the Novice-Mistress, an officer elected or appointed because of her fitness for training others. At the end of this time the Postulant is admitted as a Novice, and wears the dress of the Order and bears also the name of Sister. The Novitiate lasts from two to three years, when the Sisters, if they think her fit and worthy to join the Order, elect her into their number. She is then professed, that is to say, she publicly before the Sisters and Chaplain, and in many cases the Bishop of the Diocese also, professes her willingness to give up her whole life to God, to remain in this Community and keep its rules as long as she lives, and then vows herself to God before His altar. During the time she is Postulant or Novice the Sister may return at any time to her former life in the world, but once professed it is a pledge for life. Before profession also, the Community may dismiss her if they think her wanting in the true spirit of consecration, or in other needful gifts; but after profession she cannot be sent away unless for some grave moral fault, which may God forbid.

We have referred to the Rule, or Rule of Life. This varies in different Sisterhoods, but in all it is based upon the three great principles of Poverty, Chastity, and Obedience. Poverty separates the soul from the world; Chastity lifts it up to God; Obedience binds it in the Life of the Community and in self-discipline and control under the will of God. Something must be said of each separately.

Poverty.—The soul that has heard the call of which we have spoken desires to give up all for Him who has called her. She will not any longer have anything to call her own, and what she has while she continues to live in this world she will use for Him and for His glory. For this reason she gives up everything when she is finally professed. The Sister has nothing, her very clothes belong to the Community, she wears what is given her without question or murmur. All that she needs she must ask for, she may not help herself. Of all that is intrusted to her for use she must give careful account. Of everything she is most sparing as one who is really poor. So the food of the Community, while it is wholesome, is only such as the poor eat, and taken for necessity, not for pleasure. Many things accounted necessary in the world Sisters readily learn to do without. They may not receive any presents for themselves, nor may they receive payment for work done. All that any may wish to give them can only be received for the Community to be shared for the common good. They are called to be poor, and by all possible ways they try in their life to realize this.

Chastity.—The Sister comes to the Community because she has felt the constraining power of the Love of CHRIST. That love takes possession of her soul, and all other loves become subordinate to it. The motive, the inspiration, the power of the life is all in this, "My Beloved is mine, and I am His." Hence the true Sister is willing to leave all other friends and ties and to have and love only as God wills her to love. God first, and all others for His sake; and this all through her life. The Sisters' life is not for those who have used up all pleasures in the world and found them worthless, or who have been disappointed and perhaps embittered by the treatment they have received in the world; such rarely make good Sisters. The life of a Sister is the life of one who, looking upon the face of JESUS CHRIST, can say, "I have found Him whom my soul loveth," and saying that, can give up all else for Him, and having Him desires nothing else. "CHRIST is all."

Obedience.—The Sister comes to the Sisterhood not only to give up her worldly possessions, moved by the love of God, but to do that which is so much harder, to submit her will to the will of God. For this she takes the vow of obedience to the Rule of the Community and to all those who shall be set over her. Of course this vow in no way conflicts with conscience and her obedience to the revealed will of God. It only affects her life in all those matters in which she is free to choose. She by this vow surrenders her liberty of choice, accepting in its place the voice of the Superior speaking in the name and on behalf of the Community. It would, of course, be impossible to conduct a Sisterhood without such a rule and vow; if all were free to choose their own work and way, there might early be discord and difficulty where all ought to work easily in order and harmony. This, however, is not the chief end of the Vow of Obedience. The chief end is that the highest powers and faculties of the soul may be brought under control and be disciplined, that the soul may learn to lay itself aside, that the will of God may be felt in all the details of every-day life.

All the rules and regulations of the Sisterhood are based upon these three great principles, expanding them and applying them variously, according to the genius of each Sisterhood and the works undertaken by its members.

A life under such discipline of course separates those who live it very much from others. It brings a gravity and seriousness into the life, a quietness of deportment, and perhaps a certain sadness. It can hardly be but that those who are drawn near to the Master in close and enduring bonds of love should be drawn to Him in a penitential spirit, sharing in His sorrow over a world lying in sin. The quiet dark habit of the Sisters befittingly sets forth this aspect of their life.

The life comes first, but we must speak also of the work. Of course Sisters will work, and work hard. They are called to be poor, but not to be idle. Church-people are asked to contribute to the maintenance of Sisterhoods and the works of the Sisters, not that the Sisters may do nothing, but that they may have a place in which to live and means to do their work well. Indeed, Sisters work very hard, harder than many who work for the wages of this world, while they only work for the love of God.

Their works are of many kinds. They teach the children of the rich and the children of the poor. They take charge of hospitals, orphanages, penitentiaries, and asylums of various kinds. They nurse and visit the sick and poor in their own homes, and carry out missionary works for the good of the Church. In many cases they do embroidery and other needle-work for the sanctuary, by the sale of which they often almost entirely support themselves. Besides these more distinct works, they exert an influence which can hardly be defined or measured. Many a hard and worldly heart has been brought to God by the gentle influence of their devoted lives; many a sorrowful, broken-hearted sinner has been cheered and strengthened by the love that came forth from those who in close communion with their LORD had learnt the secret of the love that caused Him to lay down His life for the world.

What is the power that is to hold women up in such a life? The power of God alone can do it, and this is only to be obtained by prayer. The Rule of every Community, therefore, implies many hours daily given to prayer and devotion. Seven times a day at least the Sisters come together in their chapel to pray. If possible, the Holy Communion is celebrated daily in their midst. Besides this, every one has her own hours set apart for private prayer and meditation. Without this the Community would soon sink down into a mere society of persons living together for the sake of the work they can do, instead of being a company gathered together in the Church to live in loving devotion to Almighty God, irrespective of the work which each member might be able to do. In Prayer and Meditation and the use of all the means of grace the Sisters strive to live near to their LORD, and to drink in of His Spirit, that their own souls being first purified from sin, they may be instruments of His glory, and accomplish the work to which He sends them in the world.

A life of consecration, a life of poverty, a life of earnest self-denial and self-surrender, a life of devoted work,—such is the life of the Sisters of our Church, but more than all, a life of Prayer and of continual communion with Him who said, "If a man love me, he will keep my words, and my FATHER will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him."

REV. EDWARD OSBORNE.

Solidifidians. Those who rest on faith alone for salvation, without any reference to works or to repentance. This pernicious heresy was at one time rampant in England, so much so as to make quite a party. The doctrine, in its evil consequences, is not current, but the extravagant and unguarded language of some popular preaching would lead one to suppose that it is still held.

Son. The doctrine of the Divinity of our LORD is that He is the Eternal Son of God; that this Sonship was His whom we confess to be JESUS CHRIST; that it was foretold, and His birth, work, and redemptive acts were in perfect accordance with the prophecy, and that Eternal Word, in whom entered the glory of the FATHER, the Man CHRIST JESUS, is also the Mediator now at the right hand of the FATHER. The Scriptures are full, express, and clear upon this. The confession of it entered into the worship of the Jew, for he sang before God the inspired words of the FATHER to the Son, "Thou art my SON; to-day have I begotten Thee. Ask of me, and I shall give Thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the Earth for Thy possession" (Ps. ii. 7, 8).

Again, "Give the King Thy judgments, O God, and Thy righteousness unto the King's SON (Ps. lxxii. 1), where the Psalm gives an outline of the offices that can only belong to the Son of God. So in the forty-fifth Psalm. These are dwelt on because they were in the public services, and formed part of the National worship and the National Confession of Faith. Nor are these the only places in the Psalms, for there are Ps. lxxxix. 27, and cx., where His Sonship is set forth clearly, and not by inference. The prophecy of Isaiah, "For unto us a child is born, unto us a Son is given," and, "Behold, a Virgin shall conceive and bear a Son, and shall call His name Immanuel" (Is. ix. 6, and vii. 14), can only describe Him whom Nebuchadnezzar saw walking in the midst of the fiery furnace,—and the form of the fourth is like the Son of God" (Dan. iii. 25). Here no attempt is made to show how much more fully the prophecy of the Son of God pervades all of Hebrew predictive writings, and there is omitted perhaps the most pointed of all the promises to David, that recorded in 2 Sam. vii., since it would involve a longer discussion than is possible here. Then the prophecy was continuous and accepted, in the History of David's family, in the Worship in the Temple, in the Prophets, that the Son of God should come on earth and be born, and take upon Him our flesh. It was fit, then, that the Gospels should begin with this. St. Matthew begins with the descent of JESUS CHRIST, the son of David, the son of Abraham, who is Immanuel,—God with us. St. Mark writes, "The beginning of the Gospel of JESUS CHRIST, the SON of GOD." St. Luke records the Annunciation to the Virgin, "He shall be called the SON of the Highest: and the LORD GOD shall give unto him the throne of His father David: and He shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of His kingdom there shall be no end." And St. John, "In the beginning was the WORD, and the Word was with GOD, and the Word was GOD. The same was in the beginning with GOD. . . . And we beheld His glory as of the Only-begotten of the Father."

Passing over all other references, we will quote our LORD's own claim. He had said, "I and My FATHER are one." Nor did He retract when the Jews took up stones to stone Him as a blasphemer, but added, "Say ye of Him whom the FATHER hath sanctified and sent into the world, Thou blasphemest, because I said I am the SON of GOD?" Not only did He claim it, but Satan based one of his temptations upon its being true; and after His victory the demons, whom He dispossessed of men, cried out, "JESUS, Thou SON of GOD." And it was distinctly upon this charge that He was arrested and tried, and when solemnly adjured by the High-Priest, "I adjure Thee by the living God that Thou tell us if Thou be the CHRIST, the SON of GOD? JESUS saith unto him, Thou hast said." So, in other terms, do the other Evangelists. And when He was brought before Pilate, and the governor tried to release Him, the Jews charged that He was worthy of death, because He made Himself the SON of GOD. And Pilate was the more afraid, and sought the more eagerly to let Him go; and at last, at the sight of the terrors of that Crucifixion, the Centurion of the Guard was compelled to confess, "Truly this man was the SON of GOD." Our LORD's claim was repeated by all that came about Him. His Apostles confessed it, His enemies hated Him for it, His judge and His executioners felt its truth; and when He rose from the dead, that held as doctrine was now proven historic fact, for the SON of Man risen with power from the dead could only be the Eternal SON of GOD. It was upon the truth of this Sonship that the Apostles went forth to evangelize the world, and to baptize in His name, and to establish His Church. It was this doctrine that gave them their power. St. Peter, who had the grace given him to be the first to confess it, reminded those to whom he wrote (2 Pet. i. 7), how on the Mount of Transfiguration he heard the "voice from the excellent glory," "This is my beloved SON, in whom I am well pleased." St. John (1 John v. 12), "He that hath the SON hath life, and he that hath not the SON of GOD hath not life." So St. Paul, in innumerable passages, one for its devoted love: "And the life I now live in the flesh,

I live by the faith of the SON of GOD, who loved me and gave Himself for me." Therefore the Creed puts into our mouth and teaches our hearts to believe this fact, which is eternal, and which by the Manhood of the Word comes into our lives and begetteth it, "And I believe in JESUS CHRIST His Only SON our LORD." This faith reaches from the Throne of GOD to the depth of our sinfulness,—for "there is joy in the presence of the Angels of GOD" (i.e., on the Throne of GOD) "when one sinner repenteth;" and repentance must be upon the ground of faith that JESUS is the SON of GOD, and is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto GOD by Him, seeing that He ever liveth to make intercession for them.

Son of Man. The related doctrine and fact to the confession of the SON of GOD is the further confession that He became for us the SON of Man. The prophecy that went before of the SON of GOD in some cases, as in those from Isaiah, spoke of that SON of GOD as born a man; the Virgin's SON is a man, but also Immanuel. The man to be born of David's line (2 Sam. xxvi.) was the MESSIAH. So far David knew, and the Psalm he wrote upon this (Ps. lxxxix.) shows that he knew Him also to be the SON of GOD. Isaiah's prophecy of the suffering MESSIAH is too large, too heroic a figure for any mere mortal man. He who could fill out its proportions and bear its awful burdens must be the SON of Man, who is also the SON of GOD. But the prophecy implies this, and can only be understood when it is acknowledged in its fullness. The term Son of Man occurs frequently in the Old Testament, and most often as applied to Ezekiel as the type of CHRIST. The royalty of the SON of Man is set forth in the seventh Psalm. The Judicial office of the SON of Man is set forth in Dan. vii. 13, 14. It was the special name which our LORD gave Himself. The Evangelists do not give it to Him as from others, but it is His name for Himself. It was to identify Himself with the prophecy and to claim His place in the Human race that He did this, we may reverently suppose. On two crucial occasions He uses this title, when He asks His Apostles, "Whom do men say that I, the SON of Man, am?" and St. Peter makes the confession for Him and the rest, "Thou art the MESSIAH, the SON of the living GOD." Again, when the High-Priest adjured Him to confess if He claimed to be the SON of GOD, He replied, "I am, and ye shall see the SON of Man sitting on the right Hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." It was the declaration of His twofold nature, the announcement of Himself as the GOD-Man. It is not necessary here to quote all the texts which set Him forth as the SON of Man in the Gospels. But in this character it was that He lived the wonderful life of His sojourn here.

It was as SON of Man that He humbled Himself, it is as SON of Man that He is exalted; it was as SON of Man, born of a woman, that He was made under the law (Gal. iv. 4), and as SON of Man He was LORD of the Sabbath-day (St. Matt. xii. 8); as SON of Man He suffered for sin (St. Matt. xvii. 12; St. Mark viii. 31), and as SON of Man He has authority on earth to forgive sins (St. Matt. ix. 6). It was as SON of Man that He had not where to lay his head (St. Matt. viii. 20; St. Luke ix. 58), it is as SON of Man that He wears on His head a golden crown (Rev. xiv. 14); it was as SON of Man that He was betrayed into the hands of sinful men, and suffered many things, and was rejected, and condemned, and crucified (see St. Matt. xvii. 22; xx. 18; xxvi. 2, 24; St. Mark viii. 31; ix. 31; x. 33; St. Luke ix. 22, 44; xviii. 31; xxiv. 7), it is as SON of Man that He now sits at the right hand of GOD, and as SON of Man He will come in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory, in His own glory, and in the glory of His FATHER, and all His holy angels with Him, and it is as SON of Man that will "sit on the throne of His glory" and "before Him will be gathered all nations" (St. Matt. xvi. 27; xxiv. 30; xxv. 31, 32; St. Mark xiv. 62; St. Luke xxi. 27); and He will send forth His angels to gather His elect from the four winds (St. Matt. xxiv. 31), and to root up the tares from out of His field, which is the world (St. Matt. xiii. 38, 41), and to bind them in bundles to burn them, and to gather His wheat into His barn (St. Matt. xiii. 30). It is as SON of Man that He will call all from their graves, and summon them to His judgment-seat, and pronounce their sentence for everlasting bliss or woe; "for the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed unto the Son; . . . and hath given Him authority to execute judgment also, because He is the Son of Man" (St. John v. 22, 27). Only "the pure in heart will see God" (St. Matt. v. 8; Heb. xii. 14); but the evil as well as the good will see their judge: "Every eye shall see Him" (Rev. i. 7). This is fit and equitable; and it is also fit and equitable that He, who as SON of Man was judged by the world, should also judge the world; and that He who was rejected openly, and suffered death for all, should be openly glorified by all, and be exalted in the eyes of all, as King of kings, and LORD of lords. (Smith's Dict. of the Bible.) This is the truth which is so tersely expressed in the Creed. The facts of His life and His death set forth His true manhood, and in that very and true manhood was bound as under a veil, and yet in closest union, the eternal SON of GOD. To confess this with a loving heart, and to live the life such a faith implies, is the true life of the Christian. For it is a strange fact that we cannot speak of or dwell upon the life of JESUS CHRIST without feeling that He has a power over us that compels a love and an obedience or repels the unhappy rejecter. His words are true of every man that hears His words: "He that is not with me is against me, and He that gathereth not with me scattereth." It is an attraction unto life or a repulsion unto death that the SON of Man is wielding over the whole world.

Song. The Apostle classifies the rhythmic praises as Psalms, and Hymns, and spiritual songs. It is the title of a good many of the Psalms, especially of those called the Songs of Degrees (Ps. cxx.—cxxxiv). The Old Testament poems may be the Spiritual odes (inspired odes?) of the Apostle's enumeration. The poems of the New Testament are always Hymns. The rhythmic swing of two or three quotations by St. Paul from some Christian writing is so marked that they may be possibly fragments of hymns; such may be the faithful saying (2 Tim. ii. 11-13), "For if we be dead with Him, we shall also live with Him. If we suffer we shall also reign with Him. If we deny Him, He also will deny us. If we believe not, yet He abideth faithful: He cannot deny Himself." The parallelism is marked, and the rhythm is nearly as clear in the English. So in the quotation in Eph. v. 14: "Awake thou that sleepest; Arise from the dead; And CHRIST shall give thee light." Such rhythm is also found in the sum of doctrine in 1 Tim. iii. 16.

Soul. (Vide SPIRIT.) The Greek word used in the New Testament for soul originally means breath. It is the vital spirit or life: "This night thy soul shall be required of thee" (St. Luke xiv. 20). The corresponding Hebrew word occurs in Gen. xxxv. 18, Rachel's "soul was in departing." Our SAVIOUR widens the word to include the world beyond the grave in St. John xii. 25: "He that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal." In this expression the word "life" or "soul" in the Greek is natural life, while the word "it" gives us a reference to the same word as meaning immortal life. In St. Matt. xvi. 25, 26, JESUS said that he who would save his natural life should lose it, but he who would lose it for His sake should find it, and then asks the weighty question, "For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" He adds a warning concerning the judgment-day. In a parallel passage (St. Luke ix. 25) the expression is "lose himself, or be cast away." The soul, then, is the real self.

The word soul sometimes means a departed spirit: "The souls of them that were slain for the word of GOD" (Rev. vi. 9). "The souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of JESUS" (xx. 4). The term soul is used also to designate the seat of the senses and desires, the animal nature. "Spirit, soul, and body," in 1 Thess. v. 23, includes the whole man. Again it refers to the mind, as (2 Pet. ii. 14) "unstable souls." "Heartily" (Col. iii. 23) is in Greek "from the soul." Unanimity (Acts iv. 32) is shown by the phrase "of one soul." The soul of man may include "his spiritual and immortal nature, with all its higher and lower powers, its rational and animal faculties."

"Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear Him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell" (St. Matt. x. 28). "That believe to the saving of the soul" (Heb. x. 39). "They watch for your souls" (xiii. 17). "The engrafted word which is able to save your souls" (James i. 21). "The end of your faith, even the salvation of your souls" (1 Pet. i. 9). "Abstain from fleshly lusts, which war against the soul" (ch. ii. 11). "Shepherd and Bishop of your souls" (v. 25). "Let them that suffer according to the will of God commit the keeping of their souls to Him in well-doing, as unto a faithful Creator" (ch. iv. 19).

The word soul is used for a living thing: "The first man Adam was made a living soul" (1 Cor. xv. 45). This is an allusion to Gen. ii. 7. (See Rev. xvi. 3; Gen. i. 24, and ii. 19, and ix. 10, 12, 15.) It is used for man: "Fear came upon every soul" (Acts ii. 43. See iii. 23). "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers" (Rom. xiii. 1). "Every soul of man" for every man (Rom. ii. 9. See Acts ii. 41, and vii. 14, and xxvii. 37; 1 Pet. iii. 20; Gen. xli. 15).

Reasoning is not performed by the body, love is not a bodily act. The soul is affected by moral culture, as the body by exercise. It is injured by sin, and restored by repentance and faith in CHRIST. It progresses in this life, and is thus prepared for a higher future life. While it is perhaps impossible to define fully what the soul is, every reflecting mind may be aware that in man's constitution there is something higher than mere matter, and that a spiritual part dwells within the body and works through it. As it is destined to live through endless ages hereafter, how carefully should it be trained in devotion and obedience to God here! This care of the soul concerns all men, and is the one thing needful. It is of the highest importance, involving peace here and blessedness hereafter (St. Luke x. 42; Jer. vi. 16; Heb. xii. 14). If one had a valuable jewel which he wished to bequeath to a friend he would keep it fair and clean, so should he endeavor to present his soul at last before God washed by the tears of repentance. Our Lord declares that none can kill the soul; it must live forever (St. Luke xii. 4). It is to endure as long as God Himself, for ever and ever. The souls of the righteous enter into joy. Lazarus is in Abraham's bosom. The wicked, as Dives, lie down in sorrow (St. Luke xvi. 22). The penitent thief enters Paradise (ch. xxiii. 43). Those who die in the Lord are blessed (Rev. xiv. 13). The soul of man can find true happiness only in God. As the image of the sun in a lake displays its character and beauty, so even on earth a holy man reflects the character of God, in whose image he is made, and if he is a partaker "of CHRIST's sufferings" (1 Pet. iv. 13), he may become a partaker "of the divine nature" (2 Pet. i. 4).

The faculties of the soul are not fully developed here. The world cannot satisfy it, and if a man sells his soul for a world it is a fearful loss, because that which is outside of him cannot satisfy his spiritual needs. The dissatisfied soul of man cries after God. In weakness it needs a higher Being to trust, and love, and lean upon. This thirst for God must have its gratification from that God who places on earth the running stream to satisfy the bodily thirst. He cannot give bodily aid and deny spiritual help. The higher men rise in life, often the greater dissatisfaction is experienced. The immortal soul dwells in a body which in Holy Scripture is called a garment or a tabernacle, or house. 2 Pet. i. 13, "As long as I am in this tabernacle." This shows the soul to be distinct from the body.

South Carolina, Church in. The first attempt to settle the Province of Carolina was in 1660 A.D. The first effectual attempt in 1670 A.D. In 1672 A.D. the present site of Charleston was laid out, and about 1681 or 1682 A.D. the first Episcopal church in Carolina was built in that city. It was built of black cypress, upon a brick foundation, on the site now occupied by St. Michael's Church. It was called St. Philip's Church.

The first clergyman in South Carolina was the Rev. Atkin Williamson. He was there in 1680 A.D. In 1698 A.D. an Act of Assembly was passed "to settle a maintenance on a Minister of the Church of England in Charles Town." It appropriated a salary of £150 per annum to him and his successors forever, and directed that a negro man and woman and four cows and calves be purchased for his use, and paid for out of the public treasury.

In 1698 A.D., Mrs. Affra Coming donated seventeen acres of land, now in the city, and the glebe of St. Philip's Church.

In 1700 A.D. the population of the Province was estimated at 5300, besides Indians and Negroes. But one clergyman of the Church of England was settled out of Charles Town. The Rev. William Corbin officiated among the settlements on Goose Creek.

The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, incorporated in 1701 A.D., appointed their first Missionary to South Carolina, Rev. Samuel Thomas, in 1702 A.D. He was instructed to attempt the conversion of the Yemassee Indians, but the Governor interposed, and his cure was on Cooper River.

In 1704 A.D. an Act of Assembly was passed prescribing oaths, and requiring conformity to the Church of England. It was opposed alike by Churchmen and Dissenters. The Rector of St. Philip's, Rev. Edward Marston, was involved in difficulty by reason of his strong opposition to the Act, and was removed from office by a Lay Commission appointed by the Act itself. The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel determined to send no more Missionaries to Carolina until the section relating to Lay Commissioners should be repealed.

Nine clergymen had been in the Province prior to 1706 A.D., four remaining at that date.

The Church of England was established by law, by Act of Assembly (Nov. 30, 1706 A.D.), known as the Church Act. It established six Parishes outside of Charles Town, in Berkeley County, provided for building six churches and six rectories, and appointed Commissioners to execute these provisions. The Parishes are Christ Church, St. Thomas, St. John, St. James, St. Andrew, and St. Dennis, in a French settlement. It also divided Colleton County into two Parishes—St. Paul's and St. Bartholomew's—and erected the Parish of St. James on Santee. The Act sets forth that "the rector of the Parish, duly appointed, is the body corporate," and provides that the Rector or Minister shall be one of the Vestry. It also affixed penalties upon both the Minister and the parties who should "presume to marry" contrary to the Table of Marriages.

In 1707 A.D. the Rev. Gideon Johnson was appointed Commissary of the Bishop of London in South Carolina, and was elected Rector of St. Philip's Church. In 1711 A.D. the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel established a school in Charles Town, under the charge of Rev. Wm. Guy. There is no Parochial Register of St. Philip's Church before 1719 A.D., nor any Journals of the Vestry before 1732 A.D. On Easter-Monday of that year two Church-Wardens and seven Vestrymen were elected.

In 1711 A.D. an Act of Assembly was passed for building St. Philip's Church of brick on its present site, and another in 1720 A.D. for its completion. It was opened for worship on Easter-Day, 1723 A.D., and finished in 1724 A.D. In 1724 A.D. a letter from the clergy to the Bishop of London represents the Church in the Province as in "a very flourishing and prosperous condition."

In 1726 A.D., Rev. Alexander Garden, Rector of St. Philip's Church, was his Commissary for North and South Carolina and the Bahama Islands. Commissary Johnson died in 1816 A.D. Individual efforts had been made for the conversion of the Negroes, and many had been baptized; but about this time the Clergy addressed a Joint Letter to "the Society" in England on the subject; and Dr. Gibson, Bishop of London, published a Pastoral Letter "to the Masters and Mistresses of families in the Plantations," and another "to the Missionaries," urging it upon them. About the year 1730 A.D. the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts had twelve Missionaries in South Carolina.

The Commissary convened the Clergy for the first time (Oct. 20, 1731 A.D.), when they exhibited their Letters of Orders and License. The celebrated George Whitefield first came to Charles Town in 1738 A.D. In 1740 A.D. he was cited to answer before the Commissary "certain articles" touching irregularities and breach of pledges made at Ordination. Mr. Whitefield excepted to the authority of the Court, and appealed. After the expiration of a year and a day proceedings were resumed, and Mr. Whitefield failing to appear or to answer after successive adjournments for that purpose, he was declared suspended from his office.

In 1742, Commissary Garden procured a school-house, to be built by private subscription, for instructing the negroes, and purchasing, "at the expense of the Propagation Society, two intelligent negro boys, with the intention of having them prepared in this school for the tuition of others." "These youths received the baptismal names of Harry and Andrew. They continued in the school at Charles Town, and there are colored persons now (1819) living here who were taught by them to read." (Dalcho, p. 149.) In 1744 A.D. upwards of 60 children were instructed in this school daily, of whom "18 read in the Testament well, 20 in the Psalter, and the rest were in the spelling-book."

In 1749 A.D. the Commissary resigned his office, after twenty-three years' service, having held eighteen visitations. Henceforward the Clergy held annual meetings, one object of them being to supply with services the vacant parishes.

Up to the year 1750 A.D. there had been fifty-nine Clergymen in the Province, the average number during the later years being ten or twelve. Seven Parishes had been added to the original ten, and eight others were added between this date and the American Revolution.

In 1751 A.D. the General Assembly provided for the erection of another Parish in Charles Town,—St. Michael's; the church to be built "on or near the place where . . . St. Philip's formerly stood." The church was opened for Divine worship February 1, 1761 A.D. The bells and clock were imported in 1764 A.D. In 1757 A.D. the Rector of St. Philip's reported the Negro School flourishing and full of children, and from its success lamented the want of establishments for the Christian instruction of 50,000 Negroes.

In 1758 A.D. Chief-Justice Pinckney, who died that year, founded The Pinckneyan Lecture, charging his estate with the payment of "five guineas yearly and forever to a lecturer appointed . . . to preach two sermons a year on the greatness and goodness of God." The fulfillment of his purpose was delayed until the "breaking out of the war; but his son, General Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, established the Lectures in 1810 A.D., and they were regularly delivered until interrupted by the breaking out of another war, in 1861 A.D."

In 1759 A.D., Rev. Robert Smith, afterwards first Bishop of South Carolina, succeeded to the Rectorship of St. Philip's Church. He had come over from England as its Assistant Minister in 1757 A.D. In 1762 A.D. "The Society for the Relief of the Widows and Children of the Clergy" was founded by the Clergy, but made slow progress until 1771 A.D., when Laymen applied to be admitted. In 1818 A.D. its funds amounted to $45,461.11, and continued to increase until 1860 A.D. In 1766 A.D. the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel discontinued their appropriations, having aided the Church in South Carolina during sixty-four years.

The last "Annual Meeting" of the Clergy on record before the Revolution was in 1770 A.D. Nine clergymen were present and six absent. The largest number in any previous year was twenty.

One hundred and twenty-eight clergymen, in all, had been in the Province since its settlement, but the sojourn of many was very brief,—of the larger number, only two or three years.

In 1774 A.D. the Assistant Minister of St. Michael's gave offense to many of his congregation by a sermon bearing upon political questions, and was compelled to leave the Parish. Five of the Clergy out of twenty adhered to Great Britain and left the country. The late Bishop Smith was banished by the British to Philadelphia. Rev. H. Purcell was Chaplain in the Army and Deputy Judge-Advocate-General. Of the twenty-five Parishes existing prior to the Revolution, twenty are still in union with the Convention, the other five are virtually extinct.

In consequence of proposals for a General Convention, at a meeting held on the 12th of July, 1785 A.D., at which eight Churches were represented, five Deputies thereto were chosen; one of them being a Clergyman.

In 1786 A.D. a committee was appointed to form a constitution for the "Associated Churches," and six "Fundamental Articles" were adopted. In 1790 A.D. the Constitution and Canons adopted by the General Convention, and also "The Liturgy," were unanimously agreed to. Also, a Standing Committee was provided. In 1795 A.D. the Rev. Robert Smith, D.D., long time Rector of St. Philip's Church, Charleston, was unanimously elected Bishop. He was consecrated in Christ Church, Philadelphia, on the 13th of September of the same year, and died October 21, 1801 A.D. To the Convention which elected Bishop Smith testimonials were presented in behalf of Mr. Milward Pogson, the first candidate for Holy Orders in the Diocese on record.

No Diocesan Convention met from 1798 to 1801 A.D. That year one assembled, and the Rev. Edward Jenkins, D.D., was unanimously elected Bishop. Dr. Jenkins declined the office because of advanced age and inability. In 1806 A.D. "Rules and Regulations for the government of the Churches" were, for the first time, adopted. In 1810 A.D. the first Parochial Reports were made to the Convention. The same year was incorporated "The Protestant Episcopal Society for the Advancement of Christianity in South Carolina," which for many years was the missionary agent of the Church in the Diocese.

In 1812 A.D. the Rev. Theodore Dehon was elected the second Bishop, and was consecrated on the 15th of October. During his brief Episcopate an impulse was given to the Church in South Carolina. In 1813 A.D. he delivered the first Episcopal Address, and reported the first church consecrated in the Diocese; also the first new congregations organized. The next year he reported the first Confirmations; the aggregate number being 516. He departed this life August 6, 1817 A.D., universally lamented.

The following year the Rev. Nathaniel Bowen, D.D., was unanimously elected Bishop, and consecrated on the 8th of October. His judicious, conservative administration extended over a period of twenty-one years, until 1839 A.D., when he died on the 25th of August.

The Rev. Christopher Edwards Gadsden, D.D., was elected Bishop on the 14th of February, 1840 A.D., and consecrated on the 21st of June of that year. He zealously and earnestly discharged the duties of the office until 1852 A.D., when he entered into rest on the 23d of June.

Rev. Thomas Frederick Davis was elected Bishop at the ensuing Convention, on the 6th of May, 1853 A.D. He was consecrated October 17. About the year 1860 A.D. Bishop Davis was stricken with blindness, but continued to discharge the duties of his office with wonderful energy. The effects of civil war produced a great change in the condition of the Diocese during his administration. Some of the results are given by committees appointed to ascertain them, thus:

Ten churches burnt; three have disappeared; twenty-two Parishes suspended; eleven parsonages burnt; the Society for Relief of the Widows and Orphans of the Clergy lost $100,000; the Society for Advancement of Christianity in South Carolina lost $56,000; the Bishop's Fund lost $18,000.

Amid all these depressing conditions the blind Bishop labored on until 1871 A.D., when he was constrained to ask for help, and in response thereto the Rev. W. B. W. Howe was elected Assistant Bishop on the 14th of May of that year. Bishop Howe was consecrated in Baltimore on the 8th of October, and on the decease of Bishop Davis in December of the same year became the Diocesan.

South Dakota. (Vide NIOBRARA and NORTH DAKOTA.) In the General Convention of 1883 A.D., Bishop Clarkson, retaining the Diocese of Nebraska, resigned his position as Missionary Bishop of Dakota, and the Territory was divided into two jurisdictions, North and South Dakota. South Dakota was put in charge of Rt. Rev. W. H. Hare, D.D., who had been Missionary Bishop of Niobrara. His field includes the part of the Territory south of the forty-sixth parallel, with the Santee Indian Reservation in Nebraska. Bishop Hare estimates the white population at 200,000, and thinks their interests linked with those of the Indians. The immigration for sixty or eighty days last spring was at the rate of 3000 to 6000 each day. Over 100 new post-offices were opened in the past year, more than were opened during the same period in all the other Territories together.

The new-comers are largely Americans, and favorable to the Church. Towns grow as if by magic. Churches are needed, and an itinerating clergy. The towns demanding occupation are numerous, and the need for work is urgent, and the Bishop calls earnestly on the Church to hold up his hands in this interesting and wonderfully promising field. (See his statements in the Spirit of Missions, January and February, 1884 A.D.) Institutions: St. Paul's School, Yankton Agency, D. Southern Ohio. The question of dividing the Diocese of Ohio was agitated many years before that measure went into effect. In fact, the subject was brought before the Convention as early as 1850 A.D. The State embraces an area of nearly forty thousand square miles. Its average length north and south is two hundred and twenty miles; its average breadth is nearly the same. Parishes lay upon the extremes, as well as in interior and central parts. To visit them required an amount of travel and fatigue quite beyond the strength of any one man. But the measure proposed was not at that time deemed expedient. Soon thereafter, however, it became evident that the health and strength of Bishop McIlvaine, the then incumbent, was fast giving way under his accumulated and still increasing burdens. The question of an Assistant Bishop, in preference to a division of the Diocese, was now agitated. In 1859 A.D. this measure was adopted, and the Rev. Gregory T. Bedell, Rector of the Church of the Ascension, of New York, was elected to that office.

In the year 1873 A.D., Bishop McIlvaine died, after a laborious and distinguished Episcopate of forty-one years. Bishop Bedell now succeeding to the entire charge of the Diocese, it soon became evident that some way must be found to relieve him of a portion of his labors. The old question of division came up for consideration. The Bishop himself proposed this measure, and it seemed to be generally preferred. Accordingly, the Convention at its Annual Session at Gambier, in June, 1874 A.D., passed a resolution for the division of the Diocese by a line running east and west along the southern boundary of the following counties, to wit: Mercer, Shelby, Logan, Union, Morrow, Knox, Coshocton, Tuscarawas, Harrison, and Jefferson. The northern portion, by the same resolution, was to be called "The Diocese of Ohio," the southern portion "The Diocese of Southern Ohio." In determining the name which the northern Diocese should bear, compliance was required with a provision of the Constitution of the Theological Seminary, which made it indispensable ble that the Bishop of the Diocese of Ohio should be, ex officio, President of its Board of Trustees, and at the time of division agreed upon left that Institution in the northern part, that name was accordingly adopted. The action of the Convention was confirmed by the General Convention at its session in New York in October of the same year.

By this division forty of the eighty-eight counties comprising the State were left in the new, or Southern, Diocese. These counties included a little more than half the population of the State, although somewhat less than half its area. The number of parishes left by this division in the Diocese of Ohio was seventy-five; the number of clergy seventy-four. The number of parishes in the Southern Diocese was forty-four; the number of clergy thirty-nine.

Bishop Bedell having, in accordance with his privilege under the Constitution, chosen the Diocese of Ohio as his jurisdiction, called a Primary Convention of the new Diocese for the organization of the same and for the election of a Bishop, to be held in Trinity Church, Columbus, on the 13th day of January, 1875 A.D. This action was in conformity with the requirements of Canon vi., Title iii., of the General Convention, and Articles v. and xi. of the Constitution of the Diocese of Ohio.

The Convention met pursuant to this call; twenty-eight clergymen entitled to seats being in attendance, and eighty-three lay-delegates representing thirty-five parishes. The new Diocese was duly organized and a Bishop elected. The lot fell upon the Rev. Thomas Augustus Jaggar, D.D., Rector of the Church of the Holy Trinity, Philadelphia, Pa. His consecration took place in the church of which he was Rector on the 28th day of April, 1875 A.D. Bishop Jaggar entered upon the duties of his Episcopate in the following month. He was present and presided at the first Annual Convention of his Diocese, which was held in St. Paul's Church, Cincinnati, on the 19th, 20th, and 21st of that month (May). The Convention Sermon was preached by the Bishop. It gave great satisfaction by its clear and forcible presentation of Gospel truth and requirement. This, together with his cordial manners, his manly bearing, and his hearty engagement in his new work, drew to him the confidence and respect of his Diocese. That confidence and respect greatly increased as time went on, and has continued to the present. His administration, extending now over eight years, has been characterized by wisdom, prudence, and earnest devotion to the interests of the Church. During this time the number of the clergy has increased to forty-eight; the number of parishes, including missionary stations, to sixty-five. The policy of the Diocese, under the advice of the Bishop, has been to discourage the full organization of parishes until such time as they should be able to be self-supporting. It is provided by Canon that missionary stations may have a provisional organization, by virtue of which they are entitled to a representation in the Convention, and are thus brought into close relations to the Diocese. In pursuance of this policy a large number of quasi-parishes are held back from full canonical organization, and hence the number of parishes, as such, does not represent the actual strength of the Diocese.

The number of communicants has increased since the Diocese was constituted from 4171 to 5651, the number reported this present year (1883 A.D.). The contributions of the Diocese for all purposes during this period have been as follows, to wit: in 1875 A.D., so far as reported, $62,884 (report very imperfect); in 1876 A.D., $118,554; in 1883 A.D., $147,663.

The number of church buildings and chapels in the Diocese is 57; the number of rectories 13.

A "Woman's Auxiliary Society to the Board of Missions" was formed in 1876 A.D., which, under an energetic and judicious directorship, has done good service in the Diocese and in the General Missions of the Church. The result of its last year's work is the sum of $7765.95.

At the last Convention (1883 A.D.), Bishop Jaggar delivered a "Charge" on "The Duty of the Clergy in Relation to Modern Skepticism." It was an able, affectionate, and timely admonition on that subject, and produced a deep impression. A brief extract from the concluding portion will indicate, in a general way, the treatment of the subject:

"I have tried to show you that your duty in relation to the prevailing skepticism is determined by the nature of your office, and of the truth committed to you.

"Your office being a stewardship, your duty is to preach positively that which is committed to you.

"The trust committed to you being personal, a trust in JESUS, your duty is to set Him forth in all the fullness of His person and work; to let Him be your strong fortress and tower of defense against unbelief; to make it your aim to bring men up to the faith of personal loyalty to Him; above all, to keep yourselves personally in the truth, letting the love of CHRIST constrain you.

"The truth being essentially supernatural, your duty is to understand clearly the meaning of the supernatural, to stand firmly in the historic fact of the resurrection which verifies it, to attempt no compromises with the spirit which would eliminate it.

"The truth being self-manifesting, commending itself to every man's conscience, your duty is to the conscience, depending upon and keeping yourself in the line of the quickening and awakening power of the HOLY SPIRIT."

The prospects of the Diocese of Southern Ohio for the future may be regarded as in a large degree favorable. All her machinery, so to speak, is in good working order; no serious differences, either in doctrine or in the conduct of worship, prevail. Harmony in an unusual degree marks her Conventional proceedings. Her Liturgy is now appreciated in places where, at no distant period, it was an offense. Her festivals and fasts are coming into favor, and to some extent into observance, by those without, instead of being regarded as old superstitions. The claims of her ministry, as derived through Episcopal authority, are better understood and more indulgently allowed. And the time seems near at hand when, under Divine favor and blessing, and faithfulness on the part of her people, a large degree of prosperity will mark her advancement.

Among the hinderances which have hitherto retarded the advance of the Church in Ohio (both north and south) has been the large and constant drain upon the number of her clergy for the supply of regions farther West. This probably was due to the geographical position of the State, as being in what was formerly considered as the West, and adjacent to the rapidly forming new Dioceses and Missionary Jurisdictions. These naturally called for help to those nearest at hand, and Ohio suffered greatly from this cause. The same may be said in respect to her Laity. Of these, very large numbers have removed farther West. In this manner many parishes have suffered great loss, and some have been wellnigh depleted. It is likely that, as means of travel and communication between all parts of the country have now become easy and rapid, these hinderances will in a measure disappear.

In the division of the Diocese of Ohio, although the line of separation adopted left her Theological and Literary Institutions in the Northern Diocese, yet careful regard was observed that each division should have a joint and equal share in the interests and rights of these Institutions. Only in one or two particulars is it otherwise. By the terms of the Constitution (Art. viii.) adopted when the Institutions were founded, it was made an essential condition that the "Bishop of Ohio" should be forever, ex officio, President of the Board of Trustees, and by Art. ix. the Theological Seminary is put under his immediate charge and supervision. It is to be understood that the Board of Trustees is the corporate authority of all the Institutions, and, as such, has control of all the property held for their support, whether used for the Seminary proper, or for Kenyon College, or for Preparatory Schools, the corporate name being "The Board of Trustees of the Theological Seminary of the Diocese of Ohio."

Except in the particulars above specified the Southern Diocese possesses equal rights and powers in the Institutions, being entitled to an equal number of representatives in the Board, and consequently to an equal share in their government. Dioceses contiguous to Ohio are also given an interest in these Institutions. They are entitled to a representation in the Board. They may each send two Trustees, one clerical and one lay, with rights co-ordinate with those of the other members of that body. And as soon as certain measures, recently initiated, can be perfected by the assent of other authorities, the Bishops of the aforementioned contiguous Dioceses will also be entitled to seats in the Board.

It is a matter of no small congratulation that the plans adopted for the equal co-working of both Dioceses, and for enlisting the interest and aid of the adjacent Dioceses, in these Institutions have resulted most favorably. The utmost harmony has prevailed, and great good is anticipated from these wise and liberal adjustments. Gambier, the seat of these noble Foundations, is in a county (Knox) adjoining the Southern Diocese, and but a few miles from the dividing line. It is very near also to the geographical centre of the State. It is beautiful for situation and natural scenery, and beautiful also from improvements in buildings, parks, and grounds. It is unsurpassed for healthfulness. The faculties of these several Institutions are men of eminent scholarship and large experience in teaching, and nothing seems wanting to make this famed Seat of Learning equal in efficiency and usefulness to any in the land.

Sponsors. Persons who make vows for others are called "Sponsors." They are also in the Church called "God-fathers" and "God-mothers." The persons who stand with adult candidates for baptism are spoken of in the rubric as God-fathers and God-mothers, but in the body of the service they are called "Witnesses."

The "Witnesses" make no vows for the adult person, but they assent to the injunction to put him in mind of his vow, promise, and profession, and to see that he is rightly instructed in God's Word. The Witnesses in adult baptism may be spoken of as Sponsors, but that use of the word is not entirely correct, inasmuch as they make no vows for the person baptized.

The word Sponsors is correctly applied, whereas, in the case of infants and persons not having reached years of discretion, some others stand forward and make vows for those who are admitted to the membership of the Church by Baptism.

The office of Sponsor is of ancient authority. It is mentioned by the early Fathers as existing in their time, and has always continued in the Anglican Church. The qualifications for the position, while never having been authoritatively defined, may be gathered from the Baptismal Office itself, where such duties are specified for the Sponsor that no one but a devout person can properly engage to perform them. How can one engage to renounce all evil for the child if he is the slave of sin himself? How can he say that the child shall be taught to believe the Articles of the Christian Faith if he does not believe them himself? How can he promise that the child will obey God's commands if he is living in disobedience himself?

Consistency demands that the sponsor should be a practical believer. It is not required that he be eminent for saintliness, but he should be a sincere Christian. The neglect of duty on the part of sponsors shows that too often the office is entered upon without any real understanding of what it involves, and with no true desire to do what is best for the child's welfare.

It is an absolute perversion of the sponsorial office to think of it as a mere formal appendage to a naming ceremony. If a sponsor think of himself as merely witnessing the giving a name to the child, and regards his work as ending there, he has not understood the matter at all. He is to be the child's religious friend, watching over him as opportunity will permit, seeing that he is taught and trained in a Christian way, and is finally brought to the Bishop to be confirmed. The relationship of the sponsor to the child ought always to be such that the latter may confidently look upon him as a safe teacher and a reliable guide, and expect from him a full measure of Christian sympathy and help. REV. G. W. SHINN.

Springfield, the Diocese of. The Diocese of Springfield is composed of all that part of the State of Illinois lying south of the counties of Woodford, Ford, Livingston, and Iroquois, and east of the Illinois River. It has an area of 30,000 square miles, and had in 1880 a population of 1,300,000 persons.

The consent of the Bishop and Convention of Illinois to the organization of this new Diocese was given in September, 1877 A.D. The consent of the General Convention having been obtained at its session in October of the same year, the Diocese was formally organized at the Primary Convention, held in Springfield (December 18, 1877 A.D.).

The division of the Diocese of Illinois was suggested by Bishop Whitehouse, in the 33d Annual Convention in 1870 A.D., when the matter was referred to a committee of six clergymen and six laymen, with the Bishop. It was proposed to divide the Diocese into three, but the proposed action failed to receive the consent of the General Convention of 1871. The subject of division was considered in each of the Conventions of 1872, 1873, and 1874 A.D. The decease of Bishop Whitehouse, in 1874 A.D., prevented, for the time, any further action on the subject. Bishop McLaren, the successor of Bishop Whitehouse, in his address to the Diocesan Convention of 1876 A.D., intimated his willingness to consent to such a division of the Diocese as would secure the consent of the General Convention. The first definite step towards securing such compliance with canonical requirements as would render the division of the Diocese practicable was taken on the 23d of April, by the Churchmen of Quincy, who conveyed all the property of the two parishes in Quincy to the Bishop of Illinois in trust, to be reconveyed to the Bishop of Quincy, when such person should exist, and pledged the sum of $3500 annually for the support of the Bishop and an assistant clergyman. The lines at first proposed for the new Diocese of Quincy not meeting the approval of a majority of those concerned, they were modified so as to include the existing limits of the Diocese. At the meeting of the Diocesan Convention of 1877 A.D., arrangements were perfected for the division of the Diocese into three on the lines since adopted.

While this division was being carried out for the purpose of obtaining increased Episcopal supervision, the idea was steadily kept in view that division was not necessarily separation. The plan of a federation of the Dioceses within the State, as authorized by the General Convention, was contemplated from the first.

At the Primary Convention for the organization of the Diocese of Springfield, held in the city of Springfield on the 18th of December, 1877 A.D., 17 clergymen were entitled to seats, and 19 parishes to representation. Of these, 16 clergymen and the representatives of 15 parishes were actually present. On the first ballot for Bishop, the Rev. Geo. F. Seymour, S.T.D., Dean of the General Theological Seminary, was unanimously elected by the concurrent votes of the clergy and laity. When the consent of a majority of the Standing Committees had been obtained, Dr. Seymour, acting under the advice of his Bishop and the members of the Standing Committee of the Seminary, declined the election. At the first Annual Convention, held on the 28th day of May, 1878 A.D., 15 clergymen were entitled to seats, of whom 14 were present, together with the representatives of 12 parishes. The Rev. Dr. Seymour was unanimously requested to withdraw his declination. He consented to do so, and was consecrated as first Bishop of Springfield, in Trinity Church, New York, on St. Barnabas' day, 1878 A.D. Ten Bishops united in the laying on of hands, among whom was one of the English Colonial Bishops, thus again uniting the two lines of succession.

The harmony of the Diocese, thus happily begun, has continued to the present time. No party issue has ever been raised or party vote cast in the Convention. The Diocese has grown, as shown by its statistics, with unexampled rapidity. The number of clergy has risen from 16 in 1878 A.D. to 42 in 1883 A.D.; the number of parishes and missions from 21 to 47; the communicants have increased from 1425 to 2129; the amount of contributions from $22,685 to $38,884. An orphanage, supported by the general offerings of the Diocese, and a school of high grade for girls, are in successful operation in Springfield, and five grammar schools for boys, under the patronage and supervision of the Bishop, have been organized in as many places. The beginning of a Diocesan Library, about 500 volumes, has been made.

The Diocese has been the first to introduce into the Church in America the office of Archdeacon, as it exists in the Church of England. The duty of this officer is specially to look after the real estate and other property of the Church in the Diocese, the security of titles, and the proper care of church buildings, plate, and vestments. There are at present three Archdeaconries, those of Springfield, Alton, and Cairo. The ancient office of Rural Dean is also recognized and adopted by the Diocese. There are six Rural Deaneries.

In the legislation of the Diocese, the inherent rights of the Episcopate are recognized by the provision that no change in the Constitution or Canons shall be made without the consent of the Bishop. An important change was made in 1882 in the time of holding parish meetings for the election of vestries. In every other Diocese, so far as known, these meetings are held on Easter-Monday, thus bringing an election which is often a fruitful source of contention immediately after the solemnities of Holy Week. In this Diocese parish meetings are held on the Monday before Advent. In the year 1882 A.D. the name Convention was changed to Synod, and the word "male" was stricken from the description of qualified voters at parish elections.

The following are the statistics of the Diocese reported to the Synod of 1883 A.D.:

Clergy, 42; parishes and missions, 47; baptized, 311; confirmed, 270; communicants, 2129; Sunday-school scholars, 2212. Contributions: parochial, $33,174.24; general, $547.24; diocesan, $5162.87; total, $38,884.32. REV. J. D. EASTER, D.D.

Stalls. (Vide SEDILIA.) To say that a person has a stall is only another way of saying that he has an office in that Church.

Standing. The rubric directs standing at certain times in the service. We stand at the opening of the service as an act of reverence. So in acts of Praise, as in the Anthems and the Hymns, and as showing reverence when the Gospel is read, and when notice of the Communion is given. Standing in prayer was a Jewish custom as well as kneeling. Solomon knelt, so also Daniel. The Pharisee stood. Standing is now the posture of the Easterns in the Sunday services, except for the fifty days of Pentecost. At Baptism the congregation should stand till after the baptism is administered. The adult at Baptism should also stand when receiving that sacrament. Those to be joined in matrimony should stand till the benediction, when they should kneel. Indeed, the rule may be held universal that the congregation should not kneel till so directed in the rubric. As for those to be married, kneeling even at the benediction is not ordered, but only it is a proper posture. But the Priest stands in token of authority at the Absolution, in reading the Commandments, in reading the Prayer for the whole estate of CHRIST'S Church Militant, at the Consecration of the Elements, and at the Benediction when all the congregation are still kneeling. The decency and reverence of these rules is evident to all who consider that the worship of God is more than a mere form, and has a meaning and is directed to an Infinite Person.

Stations, were the assembling of the congregations at certain services which were protracted, so that the days on which these services occurred were called stated days, and the assembly a station, and it was held as a fast. The station or fast was explained "as an encampment, which protects us from the attacks of the devil" (St. Ambrose, Sermon 25). The congregations on the Sunday later acquired that name. The processions called stations were of later origin, but the "stations" of Passion-Week are of quite a later date, and had a close connection with image worship.

Stephen, St. The first martyr of the Church, the first witness to the Faith of CHRIST who sealed it with his blood, the leader of the noble army of martyrs. A man full of Faith and of the HOLY GHOST, filled with wisdom, grace, and power. He was chosen with six others to be the first deacons of the Church. By his faith and power he did such great wonders and miracles among the people, and then disputed with such wondrous force, that he overbore all opposition. He was arrested upon a charge which, in the evil sense the Jews placed on his words, was probably correctly quoted, but in the fact and the intention with which it was preferred wholly false;—that he had spoken blasphemous words against Moses and against GOD, which they made out from his assertion that JESUS of Nazareth would destroy the Temple and remove the Law. Before the Sanhedrim he rose equal to the trial. His face was as it had been the face of an Angel. So far from retracting, he only placed in a clearer light the facts. GOD is not bound to any one place as holy. Horeb was holy. Sinai was holy, as well as the Temple. Then he suddenly broke out into a vehement invective, seeing his words made no impression upon his audience, and in his ecstasy the heavens opened and he rapturously exclaimed, "I see the heavens opened, and the Son of Man standing on the Right hand of God." It was this that maddened them beyond endurance, and they who were stately judges transformed themselves into angry executioners. They hurried him out of the city, and casting their garments at the feet of a "young man whose name was Saul," they stoned him. Calling upon Gon-and saying, "LORD JESUS, receive my spirit," he kneeled down and cried with a loud voice, "LORD, lay not this sin to their charge," and when he had said this he fell asleep. The worth in which he was held and the might of his character were shown by the devout men who, in the midst of a dangerous persecution, could bury him with that state which is implied by the words, "they together bore him to his burial and made great lamentation over him." His must have been a most glorious character. Energy, knowledge, power, steadfastness, unflinching courage, a loveliness of mind that transfigured his face to angelic beauty, all centred upon this, one of the mightiest of the early converts to Christianity. Of the depth of the impression he made upon those of his own day we have the best proof in that by the direction of the HOLY SPIRIT St. Luke, who may well have been an eye-witness of it, records the history proportionally more fully than any other single part of his record. St. Stephen's speech, in the ease and readiness, in the freedom and force of his arguments, stands forth as a model. Its criticism Dean Stanley shows is natural and just. It differs from the record of the Hebrew, where we may well suppose tradition would supplement the concise statements of Holy Writ. These have provoked much discussion, into which we cannot enter, but the result has always been to show how accurate the different writers of the New Testament really were, and that there is no necessary disagreement if the statements are fairly valued. St. Stephen's day falls upon the 26th of December. In art he is represented with a mural crown.

Stipendiaries. Members of choirs and other officers who were paid salaries were usually called Stipendiaries, in distinction from others who were supported from the Fund or Endowment.

Subcantor. (Vide SUCCEUTOR.) As subchanter he was the representative for the Precantor, and to him was assigned the duty of arranging the musical services of the feasts of the second class.

Subdeacon. An office which had an early existence in the Church, but which the English Church dropped at the Reformation, together with the other minor orders, Acolytes, Exorcists, Readers, and Door-keepers. It is not in use in the Anglican Church at all now, while it is still in use in the Eastern and Latin Churches. The name was given from the duties which appertained to the office,—to serve the deacon in filling his ministry.

Sublapsarian. They who hold that God foreknew but did not predestine Adam's fall. But that the decree of Predestination did take effect immediately upon all of Adam's descendants. This mode of attempting to avoid the logical consequences of the supralapsarian theory—for both can be but theories—cannot relieve the difficulties by merely removing their action a step lower. The consequences of the decree of Predestination, whether before the fall or after it, do not change the terrible, logical inference that God is the author of sin, nor do they the less render the Scriptures of none effect, which distinctly teach us that God willeth that all men should repent and be saved, by the mere change of the point at which the supposed decree of Predestination was operative. The consequences must necessarily be the same to us. It is only, therefore, a mere nominal escape from the doctrines which flow from an extreme statement of Predestination, which excludes the apparently but not really opposed fact of freedom of will. (Vide PREDESTINATION.)

Substance. It is the "Being," existence. We are of the substance of our parents, different in person, but of the same substance, limited by the same conditions, having the same general capacities. The unity of our human nature, which we all feel but cannot readily express, is the common substance, as it were, of our nature. We as individuals with varying abilities are yet tied down to the common limits which time and mortal nature and the opportunities of the hour furnish. By using these as instruments with those abilities which belong to us, controlled by and controlling events, we advance or retard development of our powers, but we cannot go beyond. Our substance is created. But of the Supreme Being we cannot limit our conceptions to these things. God is a Spirit and self-existent. Of the conditions of His self-existence we cannot conceive. But we know Him to be a substance, unbegotten, eternal. The substance of God is ONE, SOLE, SELF-EXISTENT; subject to nothing that can affect any other being in the universe. We confess to be in the three Persons of the TRINITY,—The FATHER, Eternal, Unbegotten, the SON of One substance with the FATHER, the HOLY GHOST proceeding from the Substance of the FATHER and through the SON sent to us. It is a mystery incomprehensible to finite minds, not contradictory of our other knowledge of divine things, but above our reach and known only by revelation, but not solvable by reason alone. As our substance is common to many individuals, it is not beyond this analogy to confess the Unity and the circum-incession in the substance of God,—of the Three Persons, the FATHER, the SON, and the HOLY GHOST.

Succutor. The leader of the second choir, as St. Augustine explains the use of the Psalms antiphonally, or he was the leader of the chorus, as St. Basil seems to imply in explaining the singing of the Psalms in his day.

Suffragan. The Bishops in a province under an Archbishop or Metropolitan are called Suffragans. So the Archbishop of Canterbury has twenty-two Suffragan-Bishops in his Province of Canterbury. The Archbishop of York has eight in his Province of York. But besides the use of the title there is another, which forms a part in the compound title, Suffragan-Bishop. Anciently the Chorepiscopi, or country Bishops (vide CHOREPISCOPI), were doing a missionary work subordinate to the Bishop of the See. His was a city, they were in the country in some sort as his commissaries, with equal spiritual prerogatives, which they exercised under him. The order was removed after a long struggle (when its missionary work had made the Church a national one) in the several countries in Europe, and so it disappeared from England. But in the spoliation of the monasteries it was intended to endow twenty-six Sees, to be practically chorepiscopates under the title of Suffragan-Bishoprics. Of these, one was actually filled by Hodgkin at Parker's consecration. The Act of Henry VIII. ordering the Suffragan-Bishoprics fell into desuetude, but it was held could be revived at any time. It has been so revived in England that three, Dover, Bedford, and Colchester, are filled, and it is proposed that the Isle of Wight shall be also filled.

Suffrages. The votes of assent and of approbation; and hence the assenting petitions of the people in the Litany are called the suffrages, and the versicles and responses after the Creed in the Morning and Evening Prayer, in the Visitation of the Sick and of Prisoners, and Offices of the Prayers at Sea. These suffrages are very ancient in substance, and there is sufficient similarity to the prayers called the Ectene in the Eastern Church to lead the masters in Liturgies to suppose a common origin for them. The suffrages for some of the Lenten offices in the Mozarabic Liturgy are of great beauty.

Sunday. GOD, from the first, set apart one day in seven for His service. This was the seventh day, because He is said to have "rested" on that day from His work. The sanctification of it by the Jews was their acknowledgment that they were worshipers of Him as their only Creator; and also their proclamation of Him as peculiarly their Redeemer from the bondage of Egypt; and their deliverance on that day at the Red Sea was Moses' argument with them to keep the Sabbath. But this rescue of Israel by Moses was only a type and pledge of a spiritual deliverance by CHRIST. Therefore the shadow must give place to the substance, and GOD is now to be worshiped as the One who has fulfilled the promise; and the Christian, after six days of work, also sanctifies a day, to acknowledge the same obligation to his Creator, and to his Redeemer, who, on the first day of the week, by rising from the dead, delivered him from death.

The change from the seventh day to the first was made by the earliest Christians with sufficient reason; for if the Jews sanctified the seventh day in gratitude for temporal deliverance, which was only a pledge of a spiritual, surely the Christian has more cogent reason to sanctify that day on which the pledge was fulfilled by CHRIST's rising, and He was delivered from spiritual captivity, His enemies overwhelmed, and He led, not to an earthly Canaan, but to an inheritance incorruptible in heaven. And we have abundant testimony of Scripture that the first day of the week, or Sunday, has always been the day which Christians have consecrated to GOD's service: "Upon the first day of the week" "the disciples came together to break bread" (Acts xx. 7), etc., etc. And GOD approved it, for it was upon this day that the HOLY GHOST came down visibly upon the Apostles, to qualify them for their ministry in the evangelization of the world. This change continued, and Ignatius emphasizes the fact, when he urges the Magnesians "not to sabbatize with the Jews, but to lead a life agreeable to the LORD's day, on which our life was raised from the dead by Him" (i.e., CHRIST) "and by His death."

It is called the LORD's day in Scripture; "I was in the Spirit on the LORD's day" (Rev. i. 10).

It is called Sunday by many early writers, as Ignatius, Justin Martyr, Tertullian, and others. It was originally the day dedicated by the heathen to the sun, and early Christian apologists in speaking of the Church to heathen governors, used the name with which they were familiar. In the edicts of the first Christian emperors it is almost always called Sunday. The name is appropriately retained, because Christians dedicate it to the SAVIOUR, whom Malachi called the Sun of Righteousness (ch. iv. 2).

It is only recently that this day has been called the Sabbath. In a sense it may be so spoken of, since it is a day of rest; but Scripture and all primitive ecclesiastical writers apply the term Sabbath only to Saturday, the Jewish sacred day.

Chrysostom says that it was sometimes called The Day of Bread, because of the general custom in the primitive Church of meeting for "the breaking of bread" on every Sunday throughout the year.

Pliny, a heathen magistrate soon after St. John's death, learned from some Christians that their custom was to meet together early in the morning before light, on a certain fixed day (which Ignatius explains was Sunday), to sing hymns to CHRIST as their God, and bind themselves with a sacrament to do no evil, and afterwards to partake of a common feast.

To secure proper observance of Sunday, it was ordered by Constantine that all proceedings at law be suspended on that day, except in cases of absolute necessity, or when there was opportunity for some eminent charity; and all Christian laws forbade the frequenting of games or sports on that day. In time the Jews grew careless in observance of their Sabbath, spending it in idleness and indulgence, and heathen practices were continually tending to divert Christians, and therefore the fourth Council of Carthage decreed, "That if any one forsook the solemn assembly of the Church on the LORD's day to go to a public show, he should be excommunicated." Persons were liable also to excommunication who absented themselves for three LORD's days from the public assembly without good reason, if they went to the games at any time on that day, left the church while the Bishop was preaching, refused to join in the prayers or receive the Holy Communion, or held or frequented a separate assembly.

Recreations and relaxations for health, or to promote the more proper observance of the holy day, were permitted. Therefore, strict as the early Church was in observing fasts, yet no fast was ever allowed upon Sunday, not even in Lent; but these, in honor of the risen LORD, were made days of refreshment, recreation, and religious rejoicing. Tertullian says that they regarded it a crime to fast on that day. St. Ambrose condemns the Manichees for fasting on Sunday, because they thus in effect denied the LORD's resurrection. The fourth Council of Carthage reckons him no Catholic who fasts upon that day; and the first council of Braga particularly anathematized a number of sects because they persevered in this custom.

So eager were the early Christians to attend Divine worship, that nothing but sickness or great necessity, such as imprisonment or banishment, could detain them from it; and they did not regard persecution as an excuse for forsaking the assembling of themselves together (Heb. x. 25), and when they could not meet by day, did so at night. Their zeal for the observance of Sunday showed itself in long vigils preceding the day, begun of necessity in times of persecution, but continued afterwards as useful exercises of piety. They usually had sermons twice on that day. But where there was no sermon in the evening, they still had evening prayer, which they considered themselves obliged to attend as a necessary part of public worship and observance of the day. In obedience to St. Paul's injunction, "on the first day of the week" they made liberal offerings for the poor and for religious purposes.

The enforcement of the observance of Sunday throughout mediæval times was a very important factor in the process of disciplining and Christianizing the wild tribes whom the Church had to evangelize. And while we find constant laxness of observance, beside this, we find as persistent, urgent teaching and canonical enactment upon its being kept as a holy day. It was, it is, emphatically a holy day: "This is the day the LORD hath made: we will rejoice and be glad in it." The neglect of it is a pollution, and, without any exaggeration, it may be asserted, that wherever this day is publicly desecrated, then trouble, social and political, has brooded over the country. The LORD's day is a blessing we should zealously guard as a protection to our land. Not in a narrow, pharisaical spirit, but in the broader and holier ground of a thankful, rejoicing spirit. To better preserve it, the Church has enacted this Canon, conceived and issued in this spirit (Tit. i., Can. xx.): "All persons within this Church shall celebrate and keep the LORD's Day, commonly called Sunday, in hearing the Word of God read and taught, in private and public prayer, in other exercises of devotion, and in acts of charity, using all godly and sober conversation."

Like other monuments, the continued observance of this day, as a matter of course, by nations widely distant, not only perpetuates the memory, but demonstrates the historical fact of CHRIST's Resurrection. And nations have been thankful to cling to the observance of that which, for nearly two thousand years, has borne silent testimony to that greatest of events upon which all of man's hopes for eternity depend.

REV. T. G. LITTELL.

Sunday-School Work in the Church.

The relationship of the Sunday-School to the Church is determined by two principles which have always been held, and which must always be maintained.

The first is that every child should be baptized, and thus brought into covenant relations with God. The second is that every baptized child is to be taught by parents, sponsors, and pastor the truths of the Christian Faith; should be trained to live a Christian life; and should be encouraged to seek help in the use of the means of grace.

These two principles make the Christian nurture of the young so vitally important that nothing can ever be regarded as a substitute for the personal work of pastor, parent, and sponsor.

Other agencies may become helps, but never can they be substitutes.

The Sunday-School is a helping agency. It supplements the work which is to be done by those who are directly responsible for the child's welfare, and it supplies some training where there is neglect on the part of any of the three classes of responsible parties before mentioned.

In no case, however, can the Sunday-School relieve pastor, or parent, or sponsor of the duty of imparting that instruction and training which are needed by the baptized child to enable him to understand the terms of the covenant under which he is to God, and to perform the practical duties growing out of it.

There will always be the need of home training in the ways of godliness, always the need of that watchfulness and sympathy which a sponsor should manifest, and always the need of that fidelity in teaching and guiding which a pastor should exercise.

The Sunday-School, therefore, cannot be thought of as an independent organization, or as having a mission separate from the Church, or as working in lines and by methods which are not under the supervision of the clergyman who is the spiritual guide of all in his parish, of the young as well as of the old.

The baptized child is already a member of the Church of Christ. His baptism was not a mere ceremony in which he received a name, but a sacrament in which he became "a member of CHRIST, a child of GOD, and an inheritor of the Kingdom of Heaven."

There is contemplated the period when the baptized child, after faithful teaching and training, will realize the relationship in which he stands to the LORD, will turn to Him with sorrow for sin and faith in CHRIST, and will take upon himself his baptismal vows, seeking in the Apostolic Rite of Confirmation the gift of the HOLY SPIRIT to be a faithful disciple of the LORD JESUS. His confirmation admits him to the Holy Communion, in which Sacrament he is taught not only to remember the love of his divine Master, but also to feed spiritually upon Him. From Baptism to Confirmation, from Confirmation to Communion, and from Communion to a life of personal fidelity and usefulness,—these are the well-marked lines of growth in the history of a Christian child properly trained according to the Church's ways.

Very prominent, then, among the means to be used for this training is the catechising by the pastor. It is hardly to be thought that the spirit of the Church's provision for the catechising of the children is complied with in the hard, dry, technical recitation of the Church Catechism sometimes in vogue.

While this summary of the things "which a Christian ought to know and to believe" should be committed to memory, its mere recitation is not sufficient. It should be regarded as the ground-work, the outline of the range of truth which is to be taught and illustrated; the convenient series of hooks and pegs on which to hang the many topics included in a religious education.

Catechising the children openly in the church is required of the clergy and is faithfully performed by many of them, although in varying methods, some calling the children together for a Children's Service, others going regularly into their Sunday-Schools, and others meeting the spirit of the requirement in ways which their own judgment finds most effectual.

The children come especially under the pastor's training as they approach that age when they reach the period of discretion, that is, when they are old enough for Confirmation.

To meet their needs, and to enable them to come to that Apostolic Rite properly prepared, it is the usage to form a Confirmation

Class in the parish, where for a length of time they receive the clergyman's especial instructions. These instructions cover quite a range of topics, including a review of the elementary principles of religion, the practical duties of the Christian life, the history and meaning of Confirmation, and the nature and benefits of the Holy Communion.

The Confirmation class, or rather the Confirmation instruction, holds a most important part in this Church in the whole matter of the religious training of the young. Although no definite form has been given to it, it is felt by almost all to be one of the most important of the pastor's duties.

This brief summary of some of the things the Church expects the clergy to do in the way of teaching the young leads us on now to consider the work of the Sunday-School.

Regarding the Sunday-School as a help in teaching and training the young, and regarding the Church Catechism as containing the summary of the things to be taught, we think first of the organization of the Sunday-School. The school should not be mob-like. If it is not organized it defeats its own purposes, but its organization should be simple. Not many rules are needed, and not many officers. No matter how large the number of scholars, the machinery of the school should never be elaborate or cumbersome.

Some one must be at its head; some one else is to record attendance, and attend to various like details; some one is needed to change library-books, and a sufficient number of teachers are required to permit the scholars to be grouped into departments, or else to be divided into classes.

A Superintendent, Secretary, Librarian, and Teachers are the usual working force, but to these may be added a Treasurer and a Chorister or Organist.

Very much of the efficiency of a school depends upon the kind of a superintendent it has. If he is an active, faithful, and pious man, with a fair share of tact and earnestness, and disposed to co-operate with the rector, he will find his position one of great usefulness, and he can do much towards making the school what it ought to be.

On the other hand, an indolent, neglectful, and blundering man, or one who cannot work with the clergyman, is manifestly incompetent to have charge of the Sunday-School.

Whether the clergyman himself should act as superintendent is often debated. It is certainly helpful if a good layman can be found to attend to the many details which the position involves, so that the rector may have more time and opportunity for religious instruction.

Some of the clergy find it a very good plan to put the opening services and various matters of detail in charge of the superintendent, but they, the clergy, make it a point to be present some ten or fifteen minutes before the session closes to catechise the children upon the lessons for the day.

It is hardly necessary to speak here of the duties of the other officers, except to remark that one of the most useful persons in a school is the chorister, who can teach the children to sing.

There ought always to be some one with sufficient musical ability, and also with that necessary enthusiasm to teach new hymns, chants, and carols, from time to time, and to lead the singing at the regular sessions.

A good chorister is a treasure in the Sunday-School. Something should be said here on the general subject of the music and hymns suitable for children. We have, on the one hand, a great mass of light trifling melodies attached to very silly and sometimes very erroneous words. On the other, we have heavy harmonies with very little melody, and words that may suit the piety of adult years, but which are not at all suitable for children.

The number of really good hymns and tunes for children is very small. They have to be searched for. It is certainly desirable to avoid the trashy, sensational music so persistently advertised, and equally desirable to avoid the heavy sort which children cannot and should not use. Where the hymns in the Hymnal are suitable, and where the music is within the power of the children, it is manifestly proper that they should be made familiar with them, as likewise with the Canticles in the Prayer-Book. Nowhere, however, are more care and judgment needed than in the selection of hymns and tunes for the Sunday-School.

Passing on to the qualifications needed to make one a good teacher, we are met by the fact that many of the persons who are available as teachers have had very little training, and do not always have the right conception of the work before them.

It is a pity that more of the older persons, the fathers and mothers, do not take classes. Too often this work is handed over to young men and young women, who, whatever may be their zeal, do not always have sound judgment in dealing with the children. But given the average teacher, the person who wants to be useful, and who is willing to go to some trouble to accomplish a good result, much may be done by the rector or superintendent in the way of Teachers' Meetings for the study of the Lessons.

In many places the Teachers' Meeting is regularly held each week, and the lesson appointed for the following Sunday is gone over with great care, so that each one goes to his class with some fair understanding of what is to be taught. There are few exponents so helpful to the same teachers as these meetings, where the lesson is talked over, discussed, and illustrated, but others prefer the more quiet opportunities which their own homes, with the aid of Commentaries, Teachers' Helps, and the like, provide.

It matters not how the preparation is attained so that the teacher comes to the class full of the topic of the lesson. And no teacher should ever come empty. It is a dreadful waste of time to pretend to teach when one has nothing to impart. The children soon perceive a teacher's ignorance, and are not slow to comment upon it. Not only should a teacher come well prepared upon the lesson for the day, but he should come punctually and regularly. His irregularities in this regard tell badly upon the class, and lead to most deplorable results, sometimes to the breaking up of the class altogether. If he has to be away he should provide a substitute, or if unable to do this, should notify the superintendent.

Then, too, the teacher should feel that his presence with his class is for a definite purpose. He is not to appear to them as if he did not know what he had come for, nor is he to waste his time and theirs by chatting upon miscellaneous topics. They have come to be taught something in religion, and he is there to teach them.

Above all else the teacher should be a religious man. No others should teach in Sunday-School. It is better to have a few good teachers than a score of those whose lives negative all their words. A man need not be perfect before he take a class, but he must be sincere. He must be interested in personal religion to that extent that he will do his utmost to teach his pupils to revere God's truth, and to aim at serving Him in a Christian life. After all, the religious faculty in children is reached not so much through the intellect as through the affections. Indeed, it seems to be awakened and stimulated in ways that we cannot describe other than to say that a sympathetic soul comes into the presence of others, and their spiritual faculties become active. It is very wonderful, this awakening of the spiritual faculties of others. Eloquence, learning, and earnestness fail to accomplish that which sincerity and straightforward simplicity will secure. The one qualification which every teacher should have and may have is this personal piety, which in itself is the best of all agencies for awakening a responsive interest on the part of those who are taught.

The three divisions of the Sunday-School which are usually found most convenient are the Infant Department, the Main School, and the Bible-Classes. The first is intended for the children who are to receive oral instruction, the second for those who are able to read, and the third for the older scholars of a more advanced standing.

It is well to have the three departments brought together for the opening and the closing exercises, and especially in the latter, that they may all have the benefit of the review of the lesson and the catechising.

The Subjects of Study in the Sunday-School next engage our attention. They may be divided into five classes:

1. The Sacred Scriptures.
2. The Catechism.
3. The Prayer-Book.
4. The History of the Church.
5. The Practical Duties of the Christian Life.

Although thus separated here for the purposes of our consideration, we are not to think of them as being always distinct. Thus any study of the Scriptures means gaining some knowledge of the practical duties of Christian life, and any study of the Prayer-Book involves some study of Church History. What is meant is that, in the usual order, the infant becomes familiar first with the Bible Stories, then with parts of the Catechism, then with the Gospels, afterwards he gains some knowledge of the Prayer-Book as he grows old enough to use it, of the History of the Church, and finally of the many things a Christian ought to do. There is afterwards the going back over ground previously trodden, to examine it more fully, and then widening out on either side.

Among the earliest parts of a child's religious education, and one of the most helpful, is telling him Bible Stories. The story-telling ability of the teacher should be so cultivated that he will be able to impress the stories of the Bible indelibly upon the youthful memory. These old stories are the most interesting, and the freshest in the world, and they carry with them their unmistakable lessons. They show the struggle between good and evil, and reveal what style of character God approves. There is no more effective mode of teaching than that of being able to tell the Bible Stories in simple but striking language adapted to the comprehension of children.

Passing on from story-telling, the teacher then begins to employ the child's memory in parts of the Catechism, especially in the Creed, the LORD's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments.

Following closely upon this will come some explanation of the Church's year, so that as the child begins to note the coming and going of days and weeks, he may be able to associate them with the facts and doctrines which the Church commemorates.

A child has received a good start when he knows the principal Bible Stories, can recite the leading parts of the Catechism, and understands what the principal divisions of the Church's year commemorate. But now he has learned to read the Scriptures for himself, and his knowledge widens out. How much there is now for him to learn! The narratives of Holy Writ, the Words of the LORD JESUS, the doctrines in the Epistles, the planting of the Church, the daily duties of the daily life,—there never need be any lack of topics for the teacher's teaching.

Without enlarging upon these, it seems proper to add that the children of the Church are to be taught as children of the Church. Our Church has a definite system of truth, clear and simple. It covers a few points of doctrine, and that system of truth should be adhered to. Our Church has an orderly form of worship, her children should be taught to love it and to unite in it.

Our Church makes demands upon the personal service and loyalty of her children. They should be taught to give willing adhesion. In a word, the children ought to be so trained in Sunday-School that as they grow up they will become loyal members of this Church. It is not enough to make them mildly acquiesce in her ways. They should become thoroughly in love with them. This is not to make them bigots and uncharitable, but to give them tone and fibre whereby they will go out into the world and be of some positive use in the world.

First sincere Christians, then loyal Churchmen,—who can doubt that children trained to be thus will develop noble characters and find their work for CHRIST and His Church?

And that is the object of the Sunday-School. It offers to aid parents, sponsors, and pastors in developing the religious life of the young, in filling their minds with the truths of our Most Holy Faith, and in training them to serve God faithfully in their day and generation. Whatever its defects of administration, this is its aim.

REV. G. W. SHINN.

Supererogation. Works which it is claimed may be done over and above what is commanded us to do. The XIV. Article is very express in disproving this: "Voluntary works, besides over and above God's commandments, which they call works of supererogation cannot be taught without arrogancy and impiety: for by them men do declare that they do not only render unto God as much as they are bound to do, but that they do more for His sake than of bounden duty is required; where, as CHRIST saith plainly, 'When ye have done all that are commanded you say, We are all unprofitable servants.'" That some advice in Holy Scriptures is given which may be lawfully chosen or declined, as celibacy, yet it is equally plain that it demands all our willingness to obey the motions of the HOLY SPIRIT only to do what is commanded us. The choice of doing or not doing certain things is of expediency. If one sells all that he has and gives to the poor he is doing well, but it may be inexpedient in another, or he may not choose to do this, using the uncertain riches to obtain a treasure hereafter. The young man who kept all the commandments (in his own estimation) yet owned he lacked something that he was told could be supplied by his selling all and following the LORD, this touched the defect not only in his conduct, but in his character too. He lacked self-denial in its best form. But we are taught in Holy Scripture that we can do no good thing of ourselves, that if we say we have no sin we deceive ourselves, that in many things we offend all. Then there can be no power of ourselves to do more than what is commanded. If we but consider that the very best we could do would be but the mere measure of our duty, and we can add nothing more, we cannot overpass that, we could not dream for an instant that there were works of an obedience more than is required of us. The choice in the counsel is not an addition to a sufficient goodness, it is a voluntary selection of a certain form of obedience left to us to choose. Then as we are taught in Scripture, we can merit nothing, but all is of grace and of His gift. It follows, then, that there can be no treasury of good works which we can help to fill with those things over and above what we do as sufficient for ourselves, which treasured good works may be passed, as it were, to the blessing of those who are disobedient and erring; an error which is too glaring for any one seriously thinking of his own duty to fall into. Our life in CHRIST is not a task or a business. So much to be done for so much wages. Such obedience only required, and the rest of our work as we choose. This was one form of Pharisaic hypocrisy. It is a life, and to be a healthy spiritual life requires all our own energy, work, and labor from an humble sense of our own unworthiness and a deep, earnest love to Him who loved us and gave Himself for us. He learned obedience in the days of His sinless flesh, with pain, and tears, and strong crying. And we who are sinful can never with wailing, and tears, and prayers ever gain in this mortal life His sanctity. It is of His worthiness, and His mercy, by His eternal power that the treasury of His atoning acts is sufficient for us.

Supernatural. The word supernatural is popularly opposed to natural, being that which is beyond the experience and knowledge of man. Its more exact use is to express the higher region of system, the lower region being that of things and events in ordinary experience and knowledge. Supernatural things are not opposed to order and law, but form "the higher portion of an universal order, and are the subjects of an unknown, but not unknowable law." The idea of mystery varies in different generations according to their degree of information, but it always will exist. But in what is mysterious the devout and thoughtful mind still finds that "Order is Heaven's first law." Even the miracle may fall under law. Man can interrupt the action of gravity by stopping the fall of a descending body, so God can interrupt the course of nature without a violation of law. The law of resistance is as much a law as the law of gravitation. "The veil of the supernatural is lifted by a miracle for a moment, and it is then evident that nature is not to be limited by our experience, but extends into a region ordinarily unseen, and forms one great system of order, of which the supernatural is but the higher atmosphere."

In primitive ages men were freely inclined to believe in the supernatural, as is evident in the religions of Egypt, Greece, and Rome. They believed "in fates and furies, nymphs and graces." The Sophists tried to resolve mythic tales into "facts and powers of nature." The Sadducees acted similarly in CHRIST's day. The supernatural is, however, a necessary part in the system of God. "He is before all things, and by (or in) Him all things consist" (Col. i. 17). This shows that Christianity was not an after-thought of God, but a fore-thought, and that CHRIST existed before the natural world, "before all things," and created "all things" (v. 16). He is "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world" (Rev. xiii. 8). The world was made to include Christianity. By or in CHRIST all things consist, stand together, as many parts coalesce in a whole. "All things were made by Him, and without Him was not anything made that was made" (St. John i. 3). A personal loving relation to God in CHRIST is the key which unlocks mysteries. "Every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God" (1 John iv. 7). "The whole life of faith is an experience and spiritual discovery of God." It was to CHRIST's own disciples that He said, "it is given unto you to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven" (St. Matt. xiii. 11). Says Archbishop Benson, "The countless tribes which broke up the old civilizations were governed by an absolute naturalism in feeling and in action, and she (the Church) overcame it." The introduction of the supernatural was an unanswerable argument. The natural conclusion from the marvels wrought by JESUS was, "no man can do these miracles that thou doest, except God be with him" (St. John iii. 2). "Since the world began was it not heard that any man opened the eyes of one that was born blind. If this man were not of God, he could do nothing" (St. John ix. 32, 33).

In the Old Testament the fact of the supernatural is constantly present. It meets us in the account of the creation: "By the Word of the LORD were the heavens made; and all the host of them by the breath of His mouth" (Ps. xxxiii. 6), "the utterance of His mouth, that is, the originating Word." "The heavens declare the glory of God" (Ps. xix. 1). "Thou hast established the earth, and it abideth" (Ps. cxix. 90). The lightnings obey God (Job xxxviii. 35). He appointed the moon for seasons; the sun knoweth His going down" (Ps. civ. 19). What a mighty and yet peculiar care of the world is displayed in Job xxviii. 25, 26, where God is represented as making "the weight for the winds," and weighing "the waters by measure," and making "a decree for the rain"! In Jeremiah xxxiii. 20, we read of God's "covenant of the day," and His "covenant of the night," that they should preserve their order. The rainbow was made "the symbol of nature's constancy."

"The true notion of the natural cannot be held without the complementary idea of the supernatural, since nature can have no beginning in itself (the thought involving a contradiction), and therefore demands a power older than itself, beyond and above itself." Even the magicians of Pharaoh acknowledged "the finger of God" in His miraculous work (Ex. viii. 19). The tables of the law were "written with the finger of God" (Ex. xxxi. 18, and Deut. ix. 10). Our SAVIOUR speaks of casting out devils "with the finger of God" (St. Luke xi. 20). Of the volcano the Psalmist says of God, "He toucheth the hills and they smoke" (Ps. civ. 32), "the lightness of the effort implying the mightiness of the power." In the Old Testament the supernatural is seen at the creation, in the passage of the Red Sea and other miracles, the wonders of Sinai, and the smitten rock in the Wilderness. In the book of Job the natural appears in the thunder and storm, and in animal life. In Ps. xxix. the voice of God is represented as dividing "the flames of fire," and shaking "the wilderness." The natural and supernatural are mingled in the account of the Flood, the crossing of the Red Sea, the Egyptian plagues, and the providing of food in the Wilderness. "Again, the great natural is so described in Job and the Psalms, that the awe of the supernatural is upon us, and we receive the impression of a divine presence as distinctly as though it had been all miracle." Both at the creation and at the present time we are to think of the natural and supernatural as constantly mingled, and as being alike the work of God. The earth bringing forth at the creation was obeying God, and creation and growth are named together, so each harvest is a repetition of the work of the Author of the world, who opens His hand daily to fill his waiting creatures with good (Ps. civ. 27, 28).

Supplication. The act of offering an humble request and a pleading that it may be granted, whether it be for ourselves or for others, as did Daniel in his intercession. It is usually in the form of a litany. The preces, or prayers, these supplicatory forms, were the people's part, therefore they were responsive. The supplications in the Litany are properly the first four of the preces. The rest of the Litany is addressed to our LORD. The term is by no means to be confined merely to mean responsive prayers, for St. Paul directs supplications to be offered for all men. So in the Collect at the end of the Communion Office, "Assist us mercifully, O LORD, in these our supplications and prayers."

Supremacy. Lordship, whether natural, as God's supremacy, or given as man's lordship over the lower creation or constitutional, as that of Rulers both in Church and State, either according to Law or usurped, in Church or State.

God's supremacy is part of natural religion, and is universally received by all who believe in Him. Our LORD's supremacy is part of our Christian Faith. His Supremacy is by direct grant from GOD the FATHER. He hath given all things, all power in heaven and in earth, into the hands of the SON. So also is man's supremacy over the lower creation (Ps. viii.). The Bishops, as the successors in office, have the supreme government in the Church by a grant from CHRIST: "As my FATHER hath sent me, even so send I you." And by Constitutional enactment for government the different ranks of precedence or appellative power are arranged. There is also a usurped supremacy in the Church, as that of the Pope. This supremacy was not from the beginning. The Bishop of Rome had a Patriarchal sway over the Province of Rome, the suburbicarian Dioceses near Rome, and an advisory right in the Western Church. Against anything but this advisory right the Spanish Bishops protested, in St. Cyprian's time. They did not admit his patriarchal right. This was all that was held till after the year 606 A.D. The Sardican Decree (347 A.D.) was passed only by the Western Bishops after the Council had partly broken up. It gave an appellate jurisdiction to the then Bishop of Rome, Julius (347 A.D.), and Valentinian III. made it absolute (445 A.D.). But it was very slowly accepted in the West through an hundred and fifty years. It interfered very seriously with the government of the Metropolitans over their Provinces, and affected the trials of cases. It was admitted at times, and again resisted, as short-sighted self-interest and the political state of things varied. The Popes gradually stretched this power towards supremacy, first by an extension of the general right to hear appeals, next by decretal letters interfering and ordering changes, next by assuming the right to confer jurisdiction. But these alterations of Church Constitution, vast as they were, received an immense impetus from the Pseudo-Isidorean Decretals. These forged documents formulated the floating, shapeless ideas of the time, and fixed them in favor of Roman Supremacy by the usual appeal to the "Thou art Peter," and by a series of daring inventions. The Papacy gladly seized upon them, and by the skillful use of only three or four little sentences, embodying a new principle, were enabled to overturn the whole fabric of the Church Constitution.

From the acceptance of the Pseudo-Isidore on to the Reformation, the encroachments of the Papacy were unceasing. The resistance was disconnected, dependent upon the political expediency of the moment. Yet strangely, the semblance of power universal in the West, which seemed to be within the Papal grasp, ever eluded it at the critical moment. The arrogance of Gregory VII. crushed the Emperor Henry IV., because of the irregularly controlled abilities of that great Emperor; and just as Gregory deemed himself successful he died, with the knowledge that he had failed to complete his purpose. So, too, Innocent III. held England as a papal fief for a moment, but exasperated the English and irritated the French, and was powerless to prevent the Magna Charta, the instrument which helped to make England free. His reign marked the highest point which Roman absolutism ever reached. Boniface VIII. overreached himself by his violence, and this led to the Avignonese residence of the Popes under French influence. Then came the line of the great Councils of Constance, Pisa, and Basle, which further weakened the Roman prestige, which at last was to incline the different provinces to act in either direction. The next step was to make the Metropolitans the holders of delegated power from Rome. This was a usurpation based upon an assumption of false principles. (a) That the See of St. Peter was supreme in the Church, a doctrine which the Roman Bishops persistently taught everywhere. (b) That the Appellate jurisdiction which Valentinian III. had conferred could overset and supplant the ancient liberties of the Metropolitans. Both principles were contrary to fact and to history, but self-interest in petty contests among the Metropolitans, and a steady adherence to a fixed policy on the part of the Roman Bishops, gave the desired opportunities to establish them both. The violations of the ancient canon law were always made with a protest that either they were in direct line with the spirit of the Canon law, or because St. Peter's See had plenary authority, or because the exigencies of the time demanded that a lesser evil should be done to avoid a greater; but throughout, the value of a convenient precedent was always appreciated. This course continued down to the year 860 A.D. Numberless cases could be adduced, did space allow, to show that this encroachment was resisted in the West. The East as yet knew nothing of the assertions of the Pope as meaning anything more than a magnifying of his office. The resistance in the West, as in the case of the Priest Apianus of Carthage, who appealed to the Pope against his Bishop, and in the case of Hilary of Poitiers, was by appeal to the Canons, but there was no concerted resistance. The gift of the Pallium, which was at first a mark of favor, became a yoke of obedience to the Roman See, and was so accepted by the Franco-German Bishops under the lead of Boniface, the English apostle of Germany. But Pope Zachary complains that some of the Bishops did not care to receive it. But this Pall or cloak as investing with Metropolitan dignity, came to mean the grant of Metropolitan Jurisdiction,—a further step in encroachments.

To trace the Constitutions of Clarendon and the earlier articles of Louis IX., and the Concordats drawn up with the several governments of Europe, and the political diplomacy used by the Popes, and their waste of diplomatic sagacity in endeavoring to control Italy to the aggrandizement of their several families, would be too long. But the facts are irrefutable that a Patriarchate extending at first only to the suburbicarian provinces, and an advisory position as Bishop of the once capital of the world, a skillful use of political events upon a steadily adhered to line of policy, and a claim to preside, either directly or by proxy, at the Councils of the Church, were ably used to make a Primacy of honor, the supremacy of a power so destructive of all constitutional rights in the Church, so thoroughly a despotism, so glaring in its usurpations, that it could not be endured. The wounds it inflicted upon the Church have not been healed, but it has been fettered and hampered in every way possible. This Supremacy yet claimed, urged, and lately fortified with a decree of Infallibility, is a thing of the past. It can never return again, but this does not repair the breaches, nor does it remove the present ill consequences to the Body of CHRIST.

Surplice. The usual form of the Alb, which was anciently much less loose, with closer sleeves, than in the present Surplice. It is a corruption of the word superpellicium. Its present form goes back to the twelfth century. (Vide VESTMENTS.)

Surrogate. The deputy for a Chancellor, Commissary, Archdeacon, or official, who had to hold a benefice near the place where the Court was held, be in good repute, and skilled in both civil and ecclesiastical Law. He could hold such Courts as his principal, could issue the like licenses and mandates. Usually he issued licenses to marry, for he was the deputy of the Bishop who could dispense with the banns and give a license. He also admitted wills to probate.

Sursum Corda. The versicle "Lift up your hearts," with the response "We lift them up unto the LORD." It is the part of the Preface which formerly began with a benediction, but now in our own Prayer-Book forms the introduction. Its antiquity is very great. It was the usual versicle at this point of the Liturgy in the time of St. Cyprian (252 A.D.), and was then quoted as the common form. That it should not have been quoted oftener and earlier is not surprising when we consider the secrecy with which all celebrations of the Communion were made. The next writer who quotes it is St. Cyril (380 A.D.) of Jerusalem, who speaks of it in his lectures to the Catechumens. After that the references are quite frequent. But the Sursum Corda includes also the remaining versicles and responses. "Let us give thanks unto our LORD GOD. It is meet and right so to do. It is very meet, right, and our bounden duty that we should at all time and in all places," etc. The Preface extends from the Lift up your hearts to the first words of the Sanctus. After the prayer of Humble Access, the Canon or rule of the Holy Communion begins and goes on to the Hymn.

Susanna, Book of (Apocrypha). The name Susanna means a lily. The Book containing the story of this Jewish woman is a part of the Apocryphal Additions to Daniel. It was called "The History of Susanna (or the Judgment of Daniel)." There is no evidence that it ever formed a part of the Hebrew text. It is thought that it may have been the work of an Alexandrine writer. The story, whether true or not, is intended to teach the excellence of virtue, and the punishment of a lying tongue and an unclean heart. "To Christian commentators Susanna appeared as a type of the true Church tempted to infidelity by Jewish and Pagan adversaries, and lifting up her voice to God in the midst of persecution." In the Septuagint this history of Susanna is placed at the beginning of the Book of Daniel, while in the Vulgate it forms the thirteenth chapter. That the account of Susanna was written originally in Greek instead of Hebrew or Chaldee is shown by the fact that when Daniel is represented as declaring what would be the punishment of the wicked men who were making a false accusation to shield themselves, he makes use of a paranomasia, or play upon words, which could only hold good in the Greek language. The Hebraisms show that the addition to Daniel was written by a Hebrew in Greek. As the elders were judges, Calmet concludes that the Jews had judges during the captivity, though it may be doubted whether they had power to put to death. Jewish writers thought that the punishment was inflicted by Nebuchadnezzar. St. Bernard and St. Chrysostom compare the persecuted matron to an innocent lamb, and the wicked judges to ravenous wolves, but their prey was taken from them; and so the narrative ends with an account of the pride of husband and parents and kindred in the noble Susanna and of Daniel's great reputation in the sight of the people.

Suspension. The penalty of suspending a layman from communion or a person in orders from any or all his official functions is not a final, and may be a temporary, deprivation.

A clergyman may for cause be suspended from the office of preaching alone, or he may be suspended from holding a Parish, or from all his functions, as the gravity of the offense may require. According to the Canons of the General Convention, there are three grades of punishment for five different classes of offenses—viz., admonition, suspension, or degradation—either of which is to be inflicted according to the Canons of the Diocese in which the trial takes place, until otherwise provided for by the General Convention. Suspension is also inflicted upon a clergyman absenting himself for five years from his Diocese without proper reason or excuse, satisfactory to his Bishop, which shall only terminate when he gives in writing sufficient reason, or when he returns to reside in the Diocese, or renounces the ministry. Suspension or degradation is also the penalty for a contumacious non-appearance in the Court if the clergyman is on trial for any offense. But there can be no suspension pronounced against a Bishop, Priest, or Deacon which does not specify what terms or at what time the penalty shall cease.

For the layman, suspension from the Holy Communion is the only penalty known in our Canon Law, and this cannot be pronounced and enforced but by consent of the Bishop, to whom every case of discipline requiring such suspension must be referred. Restoration may be, generally is, granted upon sufficient proof of amendment of life. According to the ancient Canon Law, admonition should precede Suspension, unless the case was such as required immediate action. And if suspension in ordinary cases was not preceded by an admonition, there would be cause for an appeal.

Symbol. It was early used to mean the CREED. The reason for this cannot be satisfactorily traced. But the Symbols of our Faith are the Creeds,—the Nicene and the Apostolic. The word, however, latterly, is not confined to the Creeds, but is applied to all confessions of Faith by different Churches, Denominations, or Religious Societies. In this it takes a wider range than should be permitted to so technical a term. But the word is used to mean the representation of something by another by which it can be suggested, as a letter for a sound, a type for a reality, or a hieroglyph for a word or concrete idea, and thence passing into the Christian ritual and decorative art. Symbolism has taken a very important part in the development of certain Christian ideas. The Cross, the A and Ω, and the  are common symbols of our Lord. The  imagery of the Revelation has passed into decorative symbolism in the forms of the Four living creatures taken as symbols of the Four Evangelists, and the Cherubs of the Hebrew temple have been imagined and reproduced with other angelic forms. These and the like have passed into allowed decorative symbolism, but it has ever been a difficulty to draw the line between what is perfectly allowable, what is doubtful, and what must be absolutely rejected, as, for instance, the attempt to represent the Supreme Being. To us the Crucifix, or the representation of the Virgin Mother and the Holy Infant, have both ideas behind them that make their use most doubtful, if they do not condemn them. A deeper and better symbolism is carried out in the proper plan and construction of a church. There from the great door to the Eastern window all can be symbolically arranged, in gradations, as we find them carried out in the Temple of the Courts, of the Gentiles, Women, Men, Priests, and the Sanctuary, and the Holy of Holies. The Narthex, the Nave, the Choir, the Sanctuary, had their appropriate positions. The Cruciform plan, the Arch of triumph over the choir, the lights of the Eastern window, all were marked with a beauty of symbolism, which was the more deep and enduring because it places the worshiper into the centre of its types, and existed for him and his service made use of it. Of all the plans of constructive symbolism the Eastern Church is the most complete; from crypt to dome it was originally intended to have a significance, to tell a fact, to symbolize the doctrine of the Faith. It was so considered, and the explanations and allegorical descriptions which appear so puerile to those who do not admit the value of symbolism, are full of meaning to the student. Take, for example, the work of St. Simon of Thessalonica, which was written in 1430 A.D. How trifling it seems to the one, how devout to the other! One more part of symbolism is to be noticed. That which the Divine wisdom of our LORD has attached to certain acts. The pouring of the water in the act of Baptism, the breaking of the Bread and the taking of the Cup in the Holy Communion, are by His example. The raising of the hands to bless, and the kneeling in prayer and bowing as a worship, are religious acts which are common to all religions and to all Faiths. The white robes of the ministers of GOD are noted as the symbol of righteousness. In fact, no doctrine of religion can take form in outward act without the use of some symbolism or other.

Symphony. The harmony of voices and instruments, or again, the concert of many instruments together. There is no room in the service for a symphony.

Synod. Speaking broadly, Synod is the Eastern word for Council (the Western word), for the assembly of the Bishops and Clergy and Delegates, who have a right to meet and to enact Canons, to hear cases, and to decide upon the work of the Church, whether it be of a Diocese or Province, or a National Church, or whether it be an Ecumenical Council. It has not taken root in the Western Church, Council being the usual term employed. Under their respective titles will be found the outlines of the more important Councils held at different times in various parts of the Church. It may be noted here that Synod was the more usual name for the Anglo-Saxon Councils till the Norman influence, beginning with Edward the Confessor, supplanted it by the term Council,—not so but that Synod was used later, and two Councils before that, but in each time less commonly than the other term.

Synodals. Payments made by the Clergy to the Bishop at the time of their attendance at the Synod. But it was distinctly urged that this payment was made then from convenience. The payment was due to the Bishop, but was not a fee for permission to attend a Synod which was of his own summoning.

The decisions of Provincial and Diocesan Synods also received this name occasionally, and ordered to be read to the Parishes throughout the Province or Diocese wherein they were to be enforced.

"Systematic Divinity" is a sublime designation. Some, perhaps, may think it is one step from the sublime. It is certainly one or the other. If the revelation of GOD can be reduced to a system, he must have a capacious understanding who can take it all in; and a wonderfully analytical and synthetic mind who can distinguish all its parts, and put them together, in due relations of order and reciprocal support, into a system.

The designation is not very old. Some of the early Christian Fathers were voluminous writers upon divinity. They were mighty philosophers as well. But they were content to deal with portions of the doctrine of the Faith. Being often controversialists, they were eminently successful in supporting the point of truth that was assailed, and in showing its vital importance towards preserving the integrity of the whole. They do not appear, however,—any one or any class of them,—to have attempted to put all the truth, or as the phrase now is, all the essential truth, into one complete system. Even the "Apologists for Christianity" appear to have aimed rather at showing its superiority to heathenism, and its accordance with sound philosophy, than at exhaustive statements and elucidations of all the truth it taught. Later writers, including even the voluminous schoolmen, remained also content with treating of portions of the faith. Very comprehensive many of them were, but none ventured the attempt to put the whole into a system.

The sixteenth century invented systematic divinity. It produced several systems indeed. It was remarkable as the era of systems. Every eminent reformer had his own system. It accorded with his peculiar germinal ideas, and was developed according to his conception of some general principle.

For example, Calvin took the sovereignty of GOD for both principle and germinal idea. Putting aside whatever conflicted, as he thought, with it, and not recognizing a "duality," much less a "manifoldness," in truth, he simply followed out deductively, with hard logic, his one chosen principle. The whole systematic divinity of Calvinism flowed from this postulate. The universality of his first "logical" term being accepted, it followed of course that the Almighty Sovreign, as He knew, so also ordered all things from beginning to end. He not only "fore-knew"—more accurately, was ever, eternally knowing—whatever occurred, how every man would live and act, but He actually decreed the destiny of every man from his birth. It mattered not to Calvin that every man knew himself to be free. This he treated as a general delusion. He accepted the Divine Humanity of JESUS, preached the atonement, but he brought that also within the close circuit of the single, irresistible, self-evolution, all-embracing will of the ALMIGHTY. It mattered not to him that, if the will of God was all, the Sacrifice was unnecessary and therefore unreal. It was God's will that CHRIST should die for our sins. That was enough. God's consistency was not a point for man's reason to inquire into. Submission was the single duty of the reason, as it was the sole practicability for the human person as a whole.

It will be observed that Calvinism and Romanism meet at their respective extremes. Neither has room for personal, free man. The immense, accumulated piles of Roman theology or divinity, all fall together into a system, whose practical principle is submission to one central authority, or rather usurpation. The authority of the Church—which is a fact and, within its scope, legitimate—was, under Romanism, made, first to crush the individual into one homogeneous mass, and then to put the efficient work of his salvation into the partly directing and partly ministering hands of the priesthood. This system of divinity completes itself in the infallible headship of the Pope. The whole system of Romanism stands upon a half-truth; which, like all half-truths when developed, has become a hideous distortion of the Catholic faith.

The systematic divinity of Calvin was a thoroughly logical devolution. Its fault lay in its major premise or postulate. It is true that God is sovereign, but it does not necessarily follow that He will, much less that He must, act purely and simply after the evolution of Almighty power. God is something besides the ALMIGHTY. He may have made a creature after His own image, and have endued that creature with liberty of choice, and may then have dealt with that creature according as he should exercise his granted freedom. This He clearly did. Hence Calvinism fails in its postulate, and consequently fails throughout.

Arminius was the opponent of Calvin. He took for his postulate the liberty of man. He or his followers, in the exasperation of controversy, and because of the blinding influence of his own half-truth, perhaps did seem to deny or rather diminish the Divine Sovereignty; certainly they were charged with it.

The Arminians have always accepted the doctrine of the Atonement. They have been chiefly remarkable for a system of divinity which placed the whole efficient work of salvation within the soul of the individual man. They agree with Calvinism in this respect. They differ in that they regard personal "conversion," "change of heart," or "experience of religion," not as a single operation of irresistible grace, but as an operation of grace in which the man's own will co-operates, and which may be lost and won not only once, but many times. The systematic divinity of Arminianism, having for its postulate human free-will, has developed in the direct line of opposition to Calvinism. Both, within their scope, are completed systems of divinity. Either is comparatively easy of understanding, and not difficult in evolution and practical application. Both postulates being true, and either without the other being only a half-truth, it follows that their systems, being both one-sided, are both erroneous.

Lutheranism has its systematic divinity, which differs from both Calvinism and Arminianism. It is more comprehensive than either. Lutheranism has, however, always been remarkable for its adherence to the State. Luther contended against the Pope with the aid of princes. The Emperor favored the Pope, but did not simply follow his behests. He dealt with Luther as with a political agitator. Hence proceeded a mingled religious reformation and political revolution. The two ideas reciprocally affected each other. They remain yet united. Protestant Germany has state churches, Presbyterian in form, Erastian in spirit.

The systematic, doctrinal divinity of Lutheranism is deduced from two fundamental principles,—personal spiritual liberty under direct responsibility to God, with the right of "private judgment," and the sufficiency in and by itself of Holy Scripture. Of course these principles entered into the whole Protestant Reformation, but in Lutheranism they were received pure and simple. They constituted its original germ and energy, and have since evolved themselves by natural development. Luther rejected not only papal usurpations, but all church authority. Nothing remained, therefore, but such lines of theological invention as proceeded from private judgment of the Written Word. Luther, his associates, and his near successors, were not exempt from the influence of traditional doctrine, and did not, therefore, wander entirely off from the primitive faith. Having dropped, however, the principle that "the Church hath authority in matters of faith," there was nothing to limit the widest application of "private judgment." His followers have not failed to use "private judgment" both in Scriptural interpretation itself, as well as in criticism, at every point and in every way, of Scripture itself. Hence the two principles so came into conflict that one had to yield. Private judgment was not the one to yield. The result was what is known as "destructive criticism," and the consequence is that the Word of God itself—bereft of its rightful interpreter, the primitive Church, and taken away from its appointed keeper, the living Church—is accepted, notably in Germany and by Lutherans generally, according to current knowledge, prevalent philosophy, and the critical private judgment of the day.

The chief doctrinal peculiarity of Lutheranism is solifidianism, or justification by faith only.

"Indulgences" were on sale openly. It was asserted that the "saints" had done so many more good works than were needed for their own salvation that the "Church" had a vast accumulation in its spiritual treasury, out of which it could make sales of purgatorial exemptions to those whose good works were deficient or even wholly wanting.

Luther, in his fierce opposition to such uses of "good works," naturally drifted to the opposite extreme. While Faith, or personal trust in CHRIST, is to those capable of it the sure intelligent ground for the hope of salvation, yet, as St. James shows, "faith without works is dead." Luther, in the fervor of his Protestantism, separated faith from works, leaped the barrier of the Epistle of St. James by calling it an "epistle of straw," and invented the phrase "justification by faith only." The Antinomians soon pushed this doctrine to its extreme consequences, and taught boldly that the moral law was no longer binding upon the justified in CHRIST. Luther does not appear to have liked this consequence of his own doctrine, but nevertheless held on to it, as have many of his followers since, both in and out of Lutheranism.

In fact, the distinguishing points of Lutheranism, out of which grew its whole systematic divinity, were every one true, but every one also only half the truth. Hence the system, on the whole, is one-sided; and its drift, far away from the concrete Church and doctrine of CHRIST, has been rapid, perhaps fatal.

Modern Lutheranism has drifted far off the position held by Luther and Melancthon. While it still possesses learned and able scholars, who defend the Scriptures, it has many more who apply "destructive criticism" to them. The result is a systematic divinity and prevalent theology, going by the name of Lutheranism, which holds little in common with Luther except "the right of private judgment."

The Anglican Reformation retained not only the primitive order and unbroken continuity of the Church, but asserted, even rather more strongly than did the Continental Reformers, the dignity of man, his indefeasible liberty, and direct personal responsibility to GOD, in virtue of his original creation after the Divine image, and because of his right and duty to accept for himself individually the benefits and consequent obligations of the redemption. These two points have therefore distinguished the systematic divinity of Anglicanism,—the authority of the Church and the personal liberty of man. They have been acknowledged principles from the first, and remain still living energies in both life and doctrine. Voluminous writings of able, learned, and devout theologians have already grown into a vast catalogue of Anglo-Catholic theology. It has been particularly rich in Church history. It has shown through history not only the unbroken continuity of the organic Church in England with the primitive Catholic Church, but her strict adherence also to the primitive "faith once for all delivered to the saints." Some of her divines have leaned most to the side of Church authority, and have elucidated most fully and earnestly such points as the Apostolicity of Episcopacy, the efficacy of Sacraments, and the blessed reality of the organic communion of the Saints, living and dead, in the one Body of CHRIST, in which He everywhere and always dwells, bestowing the grace of the Spirit, who Himself as "LORD and giver of Life" inspires the chosen Household of GOD, and guards His temple.

On the other hand, another able, zealous and devotional body of English divines have written largely upon Christian doctrine and practice, as they relate to personal man under the personal GOD,—FATHER, SON, and SPIRIT. With earnest orthodox zeal, they have distinguished the persons in the substantial Trinity of the One GOD; have applied all the old established doctrines of the unchanging One Faith to the mind, heart, and conscience of the individual man; have set forth clearly and strongly penitence, faith, and holy obedience, and have promoted earnestly the reproduction in living disciples of CHRIST's example, by teaching the duty of resting on Him alone for pardon and grace, vouchsafed for His sake by the loving FATHER, and made efficient by the light and power of the HOLY GHOST.

These two classes of divines, one looking in the direction of organic Church life, and the other in the direction of individual salvation and personal immortal growth, have not always, as is natural, fully appreciated each other. Sharp and protracted theological controversies have been waged between them, within the bosom of the English Church. Their systems of divinity have been thought by many to be irreconcilable. But the English Church has remained without schism, and both schools are now at last perceiving that each holds one wing in the united citadel of the faith, and that both are joined together and made one in the common centre and Head,—CHRIST.

Divinity or theology, so far as it can be systematic, has in England a dual system. The organic principle is as essential to the unity of the Truth, as that of the indefeasible personal dignity and responsibility of man is to "the liberty wherewith CHRIST hath made us free." The form of the point of junction between these two principles is incapable of definition, because it lies hidden in the God-manifest, who is both the personal Saviour of every man that believeth, and the "Head over all things to His Church, which is His Body."

Such contributions as have been made to systematic divinity in America have followed very much after English examples. A more open and clearer field, however, is found in America, for a deeper exposition and wider application of the principles of manly dignity and independence. In social and political life, this principle has already developed a specifically American type. It has in these directions developed strength, force, and a prevalent confidence of power. Nor has it wholly failed in a gentle refinement, one in which self-assertion is more and more felt to be needless.

American Christianity is thrown into this current of far occidental feeling, thought, and force of evolving progress. The Church in America intrusts to her divines the work of setting her forth, clearly and definitely, amid this American development. Without the prestige enjoyed by the English Church, she cannot, even if she would, begin by claiming authority and demanding reverence. She is not helped by such social conditions as the English Church enjoys. The American people are not habitually reverent. Before they pay respect even, they wish to understand on what grounds it is claimed.

Here, then, is a new field for the Church; out of which must grow a somewhat peculiar—not new essentially, but new in order and form—systematic divinity. There is a chapter in the great book of all Catholic theology which England has commenced but never can finish. Its principle is the glorious manhood of the image of God, with its resplendent development through membership in CHRIST. The Church in America has to grow into the American Church. She can only do so as she absorbs into herself and sanctifies the irrepressible, because natural and providential, American instinct. The systematic divinity of the future will be that which honors and conserves man's free personality, and shows his Person, all the larger and more free, in the organic communion of the Living Church.

The God-man is the perfect type of humanity. He is His Church, as a body. He is "the light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world." The Americans, that will learn and know the truth, need not step outside the line of their progress. There is a nobler manliness and a larger liberty in the Church than can possibly be in the world.

Upon the whole, it is apparent that systematic divinity never can be a single treatise, nor indeed a single line of treatises, embracing the whole formal instruction in Christianity. It is contained in many books, with many chapters; some dusty and forgotten, some venerable but not now efficient, some old yet ever young, some in course of writing, some yet to be written. The subject of all, however, is the "one faith" "once for all delivered to the saints," embodied in the historic Church and manifested by the ever Living Body of CHRIST. Systems of divinity come and go; but the truth, as it is in JESUS, ever remaineth ever liveth, and goeth on forever.

Tabernacle. The symbol of God's presence. The Tabernacle was the type of His Presence with His People. It was complex in its symbolism. The gradation from the outer broad admittance to all, on to the solitary entrance once a year of the High-Priest into the Holy of Holies, was a lesson upon the inner life. The Sacrifices, varying yet all upon a consulted plan, inculcating the true doctrine of sin as God sees it, were types of a mode of access to Him. The constant offerings taught the necessity of prayer. The ministrations of the priests in their appointed order and rank; the giving by them of the Blessing of Peace; the services of the Psalms and Hymns,—all trained the people in a conception of holiness and of the abiding presence of God, which should have raised them into a higher and nobler character. It did so, but Holy Scripture ever records the sins as well as the virtues of the chosen People so impartially, that we do not feel that they were, as they really became, far above the nations around them. This teaching by rite and by symbol reached farther than the training of the people. It was the pattern of the things God showed Moses in the mount, with the charge to carry them out strictly. They were the shadows of the reality in CHRIST JESUS, and they even had a preventing grace, an anticipatory character, and so were to teach the great truth of the Atonement for sin. They were a declaration of God's will and purpose upon the law of worship, which we are to offer willingly, as it is in Psalms of the new birth of the Church in CHRIST: "In the day of Thy power shall the people offer Thee free-will offering with an holy worship: the dew of Thy birth is of the womb of the morning." It is but following out the comment of the Epistle to the Hebrews, as illustrated by the Vision of the Revelation, to hold that the Mosaic ritual, a shadow of the good things to come, is a guide to us in reverently seeking the Divine will as to worship in the freedom and the liberty of the glorious Gospel of CHRIST.

Te Deum. The noblest of the uninspired hymns, if indeed it can be truly said that it is not inspired. Its origin is very dim. The story that it was a responsive improvisation in the enthusiasm of the moment by St. Ambrose and St. Augustine when the latter was baptized is only a beautiful legend. Its material was most probably gathered from many devotional sources. St. Cyprian's tract, "De Mortalitate," closes with a strain very like "the glorious company of the Apostles praise Thee:" "There is the glorious company of the Apostles. There is the number of exulting prophets. There is the innumerable multitude of the martyrs." The passages in the hymns at the end of St. Clement of Alexandria's works are evidently the source of much of the Te Deum. Other material may yet be forthcoming; and it may well have been sung, not in its present state, but in some fragmentary form, at St. Augustine's baptism. It was most evidently a growth that has become perfected by the joyful use in the public worship of innumerable holy hearts. The earliest notice of it is in the rule of Caesarius (527 A.D.). From that time it passed into more and more frequent use. It is often chanted after a victory or a great deliverance. The famous Te Deum which Handel wrote was upon the victory at Dettingen. The constant use in daily worship passed into the English Prayer-Book of Edward VI. (1549 A.D.). Its permissory use outside of the daily service is in the Forms of Prayer to be used at Sea, when it may be used, after the anthem appointed to be used after a Victory. In Edward's first Prayer-Book it was not to be used in Lent, but the Benedicite was to be substituted for it, but this direction was omitted afterwards.

Temple. The first Temple vowed, and prepared for, by King David, and built from his plans and with the treasure he had accumulated by his son Solomon, upon Mount Zion. It was seven years in building, and so faithfully were the plans of the architects carried out and the varied parts so well prepared, that when the Temple was erected there was neither hammer, nor axe, nor any tool of iron heard in the house while it was building. The cost of the work was immense. The total sum (supposing money to have been worth sixteen times as much then as now) exceeded three hundred millions of dollars. Its equipments for worship were complete, and perhaps the most splendid, as they certainly were the most extensive, ever made. The Temple on its completion was consecrated with magnificent pomp and a profusion of sacrifices which are unparalleled. But it must be noticed that these ceremonies followed, did not precede the offer of the Temple to JEHOVAH.

When the ark was put into its place, then the glory of the LORD descended, and by its insupportable presence drove the priests into the outer court, where they made their offerings. After this Solomon uttered the grand prayer of dedication. In its relation to the Tabernacle, the Temple was the type of the Christian dispensation in its relation to the Mosaic. It completed, set in order, and celebrated with a greater splendor the typical ritual of the Law which could not be so carried out, and was in fact intermittently used for many years. It is used also in relation to the Christian life as a type of the indwelling of the HOLY GHOST. "What!" exclaims St. Paul, "know ye not that ye are the Temple of God?" "that your body is the Temple of the HOLY GHOST which is in you, which ye have of GOD, and ye are not your own?" (1 Cor. iii. 16; vi. 19.) Again, the service of God in the Temple was the home of the Christian Liturgy. There is a parallelism in the two, which shows that the one was the pattern for the other. Its choral character impressed itself on the Christian worship. Its responsive structure has been taken up and enlarged. Its intercessory services are re-impleaded with the one, full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice through which all our pleadings are offered. The great festivals, so significantly carried out in the Temple worship, were transferred under a more spiritual meaning into the Christian worship. Looked at in every way, the Temple in its glory is the type and the earlier pattern of so much which belongs to the Church of God. It is probable that the Temple worship did not always retain such stately splendor. Only in Solomon's day, in the reformation of Hezekiah, and at the restoration of Josiah, was there a full realization of it. In the Second Temple and in Herod's Temple there were wanting several things which especially belonged to the Solomonic Temple. The ark had perished. The glory did not rest upon either one. The perfect appointments of vessels and of minor details were wanting. As in so many other of God's dealings, His gifts are not recognized. The presence of CHRIST in the Second Temple, which was indeed its greater glory, was not acknowledged, but His people drove out and gave up to be crucified Him who was at once the Presence and the Priest.

Temptation. This word has been and is used so confusedly, that it is difficult to force on men's minds the real meaning of the word in the several places where it may occur. The intention under the word at the place in which it is used, affects its force very seriously. Properly and in a good sense, it is but the trial under which a superior always places an inferior as a test of his trustiness. This is always admitted as being perfectly fair in our daily life. So GOD tried, tempted, tested Abraham. So every opportunity that is put in our hands is a trial, a test, a temptation. But it has an evil sense, when we turn what was a test to evil ends; so GOD's fair tests may by our evil take a worse turn, and we yield, either by our own carnal will, or by suggestion of the devil, to the evil side of the trial. So Adam was justly tempted by GOD, but was ignorantly tempted by Eve, who was herself evilly tempted by the devil. A third sense still lower, and the usual one, is when the devil tempts us to sin; in this case we use most commonly the word in its worst meaning. The devil tempted Eve with wicked intention, Eve tempted Adam ignorantly; out of these comes a fourth form, when men tempt each other to sin, whether wittingly or unwittingly. And lastly, when men tempt themselves, for it is a wonderful power in our human nature that a man can, as it were, go outside of himself and tempt himself to sin, as if he were a second person.

This life, which should be a holy probation, is by our sinfulness and by the combinations of causes beyond us, a time of temptation, which descends from the trial which fits for heaven through every step to the sin that destroys the soul. And a single probation from GOD, by the interference of men and the secret temptations of the fiend, and by our own weakness, either from habit or from carelessness, may become a temptation. The petition in the LORD's Prayer, "Lead us not into temptation," while one of the most difficult to explain, yet is one of the most needful of its petitions. It is the cry of the trembling soul to a merciful CREATOR to lighten its trial, to relieve and to strengthen it in the mortal struggle, to open the WAY of escape. Temptation is the sin-tainted form for GOD's holy probation. In every way our LORD's temptations are an example for ourselves to use, and in themselves are the Victory that He must win that we may be more than conquerors in Him. His temptations were not only the ones which assailed Him after His fast, nor were they those that His enemies put upon Him; but the temptations He speaks of when He saith, "Ye are they that have continued with me in my temptations," are those trials which as the SON of Man, tempted in all points like as we are, He had to endure,—the jarring against His perfect nature by the weak and faithless, the ignorant and unbelieving. His temptations conclude all that was necessary to make Him master of our weaknesses, failings, and temptations. For this cause He is not ashamed to call us brethren. The extent and subtlety of temptation, the power to resist it, the power granted to Satan to tempt, the relation so wonderful of our LORD's sympathy with the tempted, and His ever-present help, are all subjects that need a far longer discussion than space allows, and to indicate without developing each of these would be to do harm rather than good. Every Commentary should supply some light upon these questions, and the innumerable sermons upon it published, and which are easily accessible, would give more instruction than could be given in a few sentences here.

Tennessee, History of the Protestant Episcopal Church in. Unlike those of some of the older States, its records do not extend far into the past, only dating from 1829 A.D. Five or six years before this period, Bishop Otey emigrated to Tennessee, and preached to congregations at Franklin, and Columbia, and Nashville, at which latter place the Episcopal Church in Tennessee, July 1, 1829 A.D., was first regularly organized. Upon this occasion a meeting was held, and a Constitution and Canons for the government and regulation of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Tennessee were adopted. At this meeting there were present only three clergymen, Rev. Daniel Stephens, Rev. James H. Otey, and the Rev. John Davis, and nine laymen. Bishops Ravenscroft and Mead visited Tennessee, the former presiding at the first Convention of the Church in Tennessee. On the 29th of June, 1833 A.D., the Rev. James H. Otey was elected Bishop of Tennessee, and immediately after his consecration, January 14, 1834 A.D., he entered upon the duties of the Episcopate, and for nearly thirty years, not only as the Bishop of Tennessee, but also as Missionary Bishop of Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Florida, most faithfully dispensed the word of life. The coadjutors of Bishop Otey were not many, but their interest in the Church never diminished. After the election of Bishop Otey the prospects of the Church were encouraging. The Book of Common Prayer was sought after, books explanatory of our doctrines and worship were read, Sunday-schools, Missionary Societies, and institutions of learning were established.

The progress of the Church was seriously impeded by the civil war. Some of the churches were without clergymen, her people scattered, and the perils of the times seemed to extinguish the zeal of the freeness of the Church. At the close of the war a special Convention was held at Nashville, at which Rev. C. T. Quintard was elected Bishop, and from that time the Church has gradually progressed. Churches were organized in many places: in Memphis 3, Bolivar 1, Jackson 1, Cleveland 1, Chattanooga 1, Cumberland Furnace 1, Sewanee 1, Trenton 1, Tullahoma 1, Edgefield 1, Knoxville 2, Greenville 1, Mason 1, Brownsville 1, Pulaski 1, Covington 1, Winchester 1, Shelbyville 1, Nashville 2, besides many missionary stations. Sewanee is the University of the South. At Columbia is a flourishing female school, and also one in Bolivar. Owing to the imperfection of statistical reports, the number of communicants cannot be given with certainty. There is a project on foot to divide the Diocese; whether it will be done the future will decide.

REV. GEO. WHITE, D.D.

Tenure of Church Property. The property with which this article has to do consists mainly in Houses of Worship, Rectories, buildings devoted to eleemosynary, hospital, or educational purposes, and their appurtenant grounds. From the nature of the case it is apparent that the tenure by which this property is held must of necessity be fiduciary in its character. It is, therefore, of the first importance that the legal title, in whomsoever vested, be firmly impressed with the trust which it is intended to subserve, and that this trust be so clearly defined and securely guarded as to be protected, beyond peradventure, against diversion or misuse. Not only is this precaution important in order to secure the benefits intended to flow from the property of the Church already in possession, but additionally so in respect of encouraging gifts, bequests, and devises, which for want of it might be withheld.

The General Convention of 1880 A.D. having had its attention drawn to the subject of Church incorporations and the methods of tenure of Church property by the Deputies in that body from the Diocese of Minnesota, took action in the matter by the appointment of a Commission to inquire into and report upon the subject. The report of that Commission made to the General Convention of 1883 A.D. so fully and ably presents the whole matter, that we shall content ourselves with adopting and reproducing here its principal parts.

In a communication published under date of February 6, 1881 A.D., the Chairman of the Commission, the Right Rev. the Bishop of Central New York, set forth the objects sought to be attained by the appointment of the Commission, and the importance to the Church of close attention to the practical bearing of the subject.

Attention was called to the frequent loss of gifts, bequests, and property through defects or irregularity in legal forms, and to the "waste in Dioceses, Parishes, and public charities for the want of duly constituted and qualified trust corporations empowered to receive and manage the endowments."

Reference was made to facts then already brought to the attention of the Commission, showing the disaster resulting from imperfect legislation, fiduciary negligence, and the ignorance of testators.

A request was made for facts, opinions, and suggestions; and the following recommendations were made to all Dioceses in the United States where such action had not already been taken:

1. To consider the expediency of obtaining, if possible, from the legislative authority in each State or Territory, an Act making the Diocese itself, or its Convention or Council, a legal corporation, qualified to receive and hold in trust any Church property designed for religious, benevolent, or educational purposes, under suitable conditions.

2. To appoint, from time to time, a committee to examine the state, title, and securities of all funds or investments or real property having a Diocesan character.

3. To require every parish to report to the Diocesan Convention or Council whether there is good ground to believe that its right to receive and hold property is good under the provisions of the common or statute law.

As a result of this action, the subject was drawn under consideration in several of the Diocesan Conventions; and with respect to what has already been done, both before and since the appointment of the Commission, it may fairly be said that there has been a good beginning, and some progress in the direction indicated in the suggestions made.

In August last a circular letter was prepared, containing ten questions intended to elicit information upon the whole subject; and copies were sent to the Bishops, and also to the Secretaries of the Diocesan Conventions.

To this letter from only nineteen Dioceses have answers been received containing information of some value, but not full enough to furnish the material for such a report as the Commission desired to make, nor to offer a basis for the compilation of statistics, either comprehensive or exact.

Enough has been ascertained, however, to warrant the estimate that the aggregate value of property held by the Church, for various uses, cannot be less than thirty millions of dollars, not including the large properties controlled by Trinity Parish in New York. The control of this large interest is distributed among more than three thousand corporations in different States, with different powers, subject to different trusts; and it is to be feared, at the very least, more than half of it not impressed with the trusts to which it is intended to be applied in such manner as to insure the protection of the law.

It will, in the judgment of the Commission, be impossible for any candid mind to apply itself to even a superficial examination of this subject without being duly impressed with the lack of system, uncertainty, and ineffectiveness with which these great property interests are secured to the future use and benefit of the Church. And, in most of the Dioceses, there are now possibilities of loss, which by greater legal precision, and the adoption of accurate forms of conveyance, well-considered corporate supervision, and attention to the clear and legal definition of trusts, might be reduced to a minimum, if not absolutely avoided.

It might be presumed that, with respect to the Church buildings and Rectories, the interest of the individual Parishes would be strong enough to afford adequate protection.

We venture, however, to hazard the assertion that, in Dioceses where this subject has not been especially and carefully considered and acted upon, it will be found to be the rule that there is no barrier which could, in case of necessity, be interposed to prevent the diversion of the property from its legitimate use, or its being hopelessly encumbered by any Vestry which might, by accident or otherwise, find itself in the control of it. The Canon upon the subject of the alienation and incumbrance of Church property affords no legal protection whatever, as has been demonstrated in several notable cases arising in the courts of law.

Such, generally stated, being the condition of affairs, it is apparent that the subject demands the most careful consideration and serious attention of the Church. The remedy for these evils, however, cannot be furnished or applied through the General Convention, but must be sought in and through the several Dioceses.

It is very important that it be clearly understood that the subject cannot be covered by Canonical legislation, either general or Diocesan, but must be controlled by the statute law of the respective States. The provisions of Canon 24, Title I., have, of themselves, only moral, not legal, force, to prevent alienation or incumbrance contrary to its provisions. The effect of the existing Canon has probably been misleading in creating a false impression of security. What is needed is, not a provision depending upon voluntary action, but one which will restrain a Vestry which does not consider itself bound by the Canon, and makes the Church property useless to a purchaser, because available for no other use than that to which it has been consecrated.

If there is to be a Canon on the subject, it would seem to be desirable to so frame it as to secure the execution of its provisions ex vi termini. And it is practicable to require by General Canon, that for the future, the title to real estate for Church buildings, Chapels, and Rectories shall be taken only under conveyances expressly defining a trust, the general terms of which might possibly be set forth. The Commission have not considered it within the proper scope of the present report to suggest any Canonical legislation. If, upon consideration, the Committees on Canons should deem such legislation advisable, it would not be difficult to frame such amendments as would accomplish what is intended by the present Canon, at least wherever the common-law doctrine of uses and trusts is in force.

Beyond this point legislation by the General Convention could not go; since the title to real property must be acquired and held under such diverse systems of law as, were there no other reason, to forbid any attempt to furnish unvarying forms and methods.

It was, nevertheless, a timely measure of prudence for the General Convention to direct attention to a subject so vital in its relation to the future welfare and prosperity of the Church. Already its action has led, in more than one instance, to Diocesan action; and it is believed that, if the present interest be not suffered to abate, few, if any, Dioceses will fail to make proper provision for the future security of their property.

Entertaining these views, the Commission has not considered the scope of its authority—conferred by the somewhat indefinite resolution under which it was appointed—to go beyond the collection of information, and the suggestion of such general principles of action as might be safely recommended.

While it is to be regretted that the information obtained has been so meagre, it is yet sufficient to show the necessity for prompt and energetic action to secure permanence in the tenure of Church property, and the creation of suitable Church corporations with such powers as to make them available for all present or future necessities of a Diocese.

Without entering into or attempting to prescribe details, except for the purpose of illustration, the Commission desire most earnestly to direct attention to these vital points:

1. It is of the utmost importance that, upon the title of every separate property dedicated to the uses of the Church, there be impressed a trust which will be so clear and well defined as to secure it for all time against diversion, and to protect it against the contingency of being alienated from its legitimate use, either directly or through the medium of incumbrances, even by the action, or with the assent, of those who happen, for the time being, to be entitled to its use.

With proper attention to legal forms the end may be secured, whether the legal title to the property be vested in the Parochial or in a Diocesan corporation.

It is not within the province of the Commission to decide between the two systems; but it may be permitted to suggest some of the advantages which accrue from an adequate Diocesan provision for the separation of the legal from the equitable title.

The former may be vested in such corporations as are hereafter recommended, as a dry trust, which in certain contingencies—as, for example, the failure of the Parish organization—would become an active trust, subject to proper limitations to be prescribed in each case. The use may, in such case, be vested absolutely in the Parish, and subject to its control for every legitimate end as fully as under an absolute conveyance to it. If there be objection in any quarter to the application of this system to existing Parishes, it may be made compulsory only for the future, and voluntary as to others. If the admirable features of this system are understood, it may, when that is desired by a Diocesan Convention, be safely left to work its own way to popular favor, when the necessary machinery is provided to make it practicable.

What is termed, for convenience, the Diocesan system, has the additional advantage of providing a proper custodian of the property when, from any cause, there ceases to be a local Parish or organization to use and to protect it. The provision of a corporation of the Diocese, to hold the legal title to real estate held for Parochial as well as Diocesan purposes, also furnishes the necessary machinery hereafter recommended for the convenient administration of trusts of every species of property, whether the amount be large or small, and secures its application to the purpose designated by the donor.

It is a fact well understood, that the want of security and certainty for the future restrains many pious and benevolent persons from making gifts, devises, or bequests, which would otherwise be secured to some one of the many objects for which the Church is constantly appealing for pecuniary aid.

The frequent changes in the Vestries, the composition of very many of them, and the confessed impossibility of present improvement in this respect, together with the fact that they are intrusted with the care of the property interests which were never intended to be at the disposal of any one generation, —all demonstrate the impropriety of having these important interests at the mercy of so unstable and accidental a guardian.

It is to be remembered, on the other hand, that care must be taken, where titles are vested in the Diocesan corporation, that nothing shall be done to weaken the sense of responsibility of the Parishes and local authorities for maintaining the services of the Church, and doing their work to the extent of their ability. The suggestion of the Diocesan system does not affect the relation of the Parish to its property, since upon it must rest the entire responsibility and actual control as heretofore.

Another measure, already adopted in some States, for the protection of Church buildings and real estate of kindred character, is a statutory provision forbidding the alienation of such property without the prior approval of a competent court of equity. The publicity attending applications to the court under such laws insures an opportunity for all interested parties to be heard; and, if these laws should be extended to embrace mortgages as well as absolute conveyances, they would probably afford adequate protection. Where, under the practice of a Diocese, the title is vested in the Parochial corporation or local trustees, the passage of such a law would be a valuable safeguard; and even where the legal title is vested in a Diocesan body, though the necessity is less pressing, it is still an additional security if alienation and incumbrance of the Church building, at least, be only permitted under the direction of the court. Such laws exist in the States of Virginia and Ohio, and possibly in others not reported to the Commission.

2. This naturally suggests the other branch of inquiry included in the resolution under which the Commission was appointed.

The necessity of a comprehensive Diocesan corporation, capable in law of holding any species of property upon any trust which may be ingrafted upon it, is apparent, and now becoming so generally recognized as to require statement only, and not discussion.

Such a corporation may be comprehensive enough to administer any and every trust within the Diocese, whether its object be Diocesan or Parochial, and whether it be strictly ecclesiastical, or one of those eleemosynary, educational, or benevolent foundations which are already frequent, and, as the real spirit of the Divine Master more thoroughly permeates the Church, will the more abound if the creation of proper Diocesan agencies insures fidelity in their execution and reasonable certainty in their future safe-keeping.

Such corporations, responsible to the Diocesan Convention or Council, are annually subjected to the scrutiny which business considerations render necessary; and embarrassments to the trust by death or resignation of trustees, and the lapse or loss of trust property, are thus guarded against with absolute certainty.

Such corporations appear, from the reports made to the Convention, to have been already provided in several Dioceses; and the number of them is increasing. Some of those already created are very comprehensive, and will afford satisfactory precedents for similar legislation for Dioceses which have not yet acted upon the subject.

3. In order to secure both or either of these points, it will be essential for each Diocesan Convention to provide, as early as is practicable, for the thorough examination of the condition of its titles, and the tenure of its property; and to obtain from the legislature such enactments as shall be found necessary to secure adequate protection for the future. At the same time, the creation of such Diocesan corporate bodies as may be required should be secured.

Where, as is done in some cases, the Diocese is itself incorporated, there should be provision in the charter for the administration of trusts and property interests by a board of trustees with some degree of permanence, rather than by so transitory a body as the Diocesan Convention. The trustees may be elected by the Convention for fixed terms, or may be named in the Act of Incorporation.

poration, with provision for filling vacancies by vote of the Convention or otherwise.

The Commission recommend that this subject be presented to the attention of the several Dioceses more effectually than will be accomplished by the publication of this Report in the Journal. If it be deemed advisable, provision may also be made for the continuance of this Joint Commission, to be charged with the duty of assisting, when such assistance shall be requested, in the formulation of Diocesan and legislative action, suggesting well-considered forms of conveyance and the collection of information, to be reported to the next General Convention.

The passage of the following resolutions is respectfully recommended:

1. Resolved (the House of Bishops concurring), That it is recommended to each Diocese to obtain, without delay, such legislation as may be found necessary with respect to the existing laws of the State, for the protection of its property, real and personal, and whether held for Diocesan or Parochial uses.

2. Resolved (the House of Bishops concurring), That all real estate held in any Diocese, for Diocesan or Parochial purposes, should have the use for which it is held impressed upon its title.

3. Resolved (the House of Bishops concurring), That a form of conveyance should be provided, under which churches shall acquire title to real estate, with proper limitations in trust.

4. Resolved (the House of Bishops concurring), That the Committees on Canons be, and they are hereby, requested to consider and report if, in their judgment, Canon 24, Title I., should be amended so as to require that title to real estate for Churches, Chapels, or Rectories shall be so taken as that the trusts under which they are held shall be limited in the conveyance.

5. Resolved (the House of Bishops concurring), That a permanent board of trustees, with proper provision for filling vacancies, should be legally incorporated in each Diocese, to take charge of and control all such property of the Diocese or of its Parishes as may be intrusted to it. When the Diocese is itself incorporated, the Act of Incorporation should provide for the exercise of its corporate powers in the care of property, and the administration of trusts, by a board of trustees having some permanence of organization, rather than directly by the Diocesan Convention.

6. Resolved (the House of Bishops concurring), That the joint commission upon Church Incorporations and the Tenure of Church Property be, and the same is hereby, continued for the purpose of assisting, when requested, in the formulation of Diocesan and legislative action, suggesting forms of conveyance, and the collection of further information to be reported to the next General Convention.

Ter Sanctus. The Hymn which Isaiah heard in his vision in the Temple (Isa. vi. 1-4), and which has been ever used in the Celebration of the Holy Communion. There is the Preface belonging to the ordinary celebration, or the Proper one appointed for the festal Sunday; then follows the Ascription, which should always be said only by the celebrant: "Therefore with Angels and Archangels, and with all the company of heaven, we laud and magnify Thy glorious Name; evermore praising Thee, and saying, 'Holy, Holy, Holy, LORD GOD of Hosts, Heaven and Earth are full of the Majesty of Thy Glory. Glory be to Thee, O LORD most High. Amen.'"

This is a shorter form (both in the immediate Preface and in the Ter Sanctus) than in other Liturgies. The Sanctus in the form usual elsewhere ended with the words, "Hosanna in the highest, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the LORD. Hosanna in the Highest." There seems to be no assignable reason for the change from a venerable form. In the preceding words, "Therefore," etc., the form was different in every Western Liturgy, and was probably made variable from a very early date, while the Eastern Liturgies clung to a single unvarying Preface. (Vide PREFACE.)

Testament. The word for Testament is also the one for Covenant, but the translators of the English Bible have not always observed this, and have used the word indifferently, but to our loss, as in Heb. ix. 19, 20, where it must mean Covenant, as it is correctly translated in Gal. iii. 15, and this mistranslation has passed into the Words of Institution in the Communion office when the Priest recites the words, "This is my blood of the New Testament," in place of the New Covenant, which was our LORD's full meaning. (Vide COVENANT.) But the word is now usually used of the New Testament, and when the whole Bible is referred to by it, it is customary to use the phrase, "the Old and New Testaments."

Testament, Old.—The Old Testament, as a volume, begins with an inspired account of the creation of the world in Genesis, and closes in Malachi with a prophecy of the coming of CHRIST. It comprises Divine accounts of history, and sacred laws, and prophecies, and Psalms and Proverbs. An ancient division of the entire book made three parts—the Law, the Prophets, and the Hagiographa, or Holy Writings. "The Law" included the Pentateuch,—that is, the first five books of Scripture. "The Prophets" contained Joshua, Judges, Ruth, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Lamentations, Ezekiel, Daniel, the twelve Minor Prophets, Job, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther. The Hagiographa embraced the Psalms, the Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon. Afterwards the Jews made a different division. The Jewish historian, Josephus, who was contemporary with the Apostles, divides the Old Testament into the Law, the Prophets, and "Hymns and Instructions for Men's Lives." There is a similar division in Philo. Our LORD's words are, "that all things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms concerning Me" (St. Luke xxiv. 44). In this phrase the Hagiographa are styled Psalms. The Pentateuch or Law was divided into sections, to be read as lessons in the synagogues on the Sabbath-Day, as we now read Scripture lessons in church. In the dispersion of the Jews, the synagogues, with their Scripture readings and teachings, prepared the way for Christianity. One of the most striking scenes in the New Testament relates the blending of the old and new dispensations in a Jewish synagogue. Our Blessed LORD in Nazareth, "as His custom was,"—a lesson of worship for mortals,— "went into the synagogue on the Sabbath-Day," and read and commented on the outpouring of God's Spirit of blessing described in Isaiah, and declared the prophecy fulfilled in Himself (St. Luke iv. 16-22). The ancient Book of God in the hands of the Son of God is a sublime picture (see also Acts xv. 21, and xiii. 15). The Jews kept the Holy Scriptures in a sacred chest, and thrice a week they were read in the synagogues. Every seven years, at the Feast of Tabernacles, when all Israel were assembled before the LORD, the law of the LORD was read (Josh. viii. 35). The sacredness of the five books of the Law is seen in the fact that they were, by the command of Moses, deposited by the Ark of the Covenant, within the Holy of Holies, on which the Divine Presence rested (Deut. xxxi. 9, 26). Sometimes the phrase "the Law and the Prophets" includes the whole Old Testament. Both in the Old and New Testaments a prophet means not simply one who predicts, but also "any one sent by God." See St. Luke xxiv. 27, where CHRIST speaks of "Moses and all the prophets," and immediately the words "all the Scriptures" follow. In St. Matt. xxii. 40, "All the law and the prophets" appears to include all the Old Testament, as in St. Matt. vii. 12, and xi. 13. So highly did the Jews reverence their sacred Scriptures that they were ready to die, if necessary, for "the Oracles of God."

One interesting fact which meets us in beginning the Old Testament is the great age which was then granted to men. Methuselah lived from Adam to Noah, Shem conversed with Noah and Abraham. Isaac conversed with Abraham and Joseph, from whom traditions might have been easily conveyed to Moses by Amram, "who lived long enough with Joseph." "When first revelation was given to man, men's lives were so long, that there was little danger lest the light of truth should be lost; Adam, Seth, Enoch, Methuselah, Noah, were in fact all but contemporaries. Seth, the son of Adam, lived to within fifteen years of the birth of Noah. Tradition, therefore, may have sufficed for them; and yet we have reason to believe that, even then, the faith was much corrupted." (Browne on the Articles.) Hence various Revelations have been needed, and GOD has given them from the days of Moses to the time of St. John. The Old Testament is a Covenant between GOD and man (Ex. xxiv. 3-12; Deut. v. 2; Gen. xv.; Ex. xxiv.; Jer. xxxii. 22). The Mosaic Covenant or Testament was an agreement which engaged the Hebrews to worship GOD alone, while in return GOD promised that they should be His chosen people. The Christian religion is a New Testament or Covenant (St. Matt. xxvi. 28). Hence St. Paul speaks of "the two Covenants" (Gal. iv. 24). The Covenant of Sinai and the Covenant of Calvary are alike parts of GOD's plan for man's redemption. The New Covenant is that of forgiveness through faith in CHRIST. The Old Testament looks forward to CHRIST. He asserts that they testify of Him (St. John v. 39). The New Testament is the key to the Old. The Seed of the woman is promised in Eden, and born in Bethlehem. Our LORD in the Sermon on the Mount shows "how deep is the moral teaching implied in its letter." The prophecies foretold CHRIST. In Isa. liii. the crucifixion is plainly foreshadowed. As the Jewish Church was under a Theocracy, so is the Church under CHRIST. "The Law was our school-master to bring us unto CHRIST" (Gal. iii. 24).

The promise to Abraham concerning his seed, and to David about his son, and the types of passover and scape-goat, and the sacrifices on the Day of Atonement, and the consecration of the High-Priest, all point to CHRIST. St. Paul speaks of the Jews as eating "spiritual meat" and drinking "spiritual drink: for they drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them: and that Rock was CHRIST" (1 Cor. x. 3, 4). The same Spirit is needed and promised to those who seek to know the Scriptures now (St. Luke xi. 13). The Church has been commissioned to hand the Scriptures down to us, as the Samaritan woman brought her townspeople to CHRIST. The liturgical use of Scripture in Lessons and Psalms has kept it before the people, and so the Church has been the keeper of Holy Writ. To speak of the various books of the Old Testament: Genesis signifies generation, or production, and tells of the generation of all things. Exodus is the departure of the Israelites from Egypt. Leviticus contains the Laws of Sacrifices and the Institution of the Priesthood. Numbers has an account of the numbering of the Israelites, with a part of their history. Deuteronomy means the second law, or the law repeated. It also gives a history of Moses. Joshua gives name to a book which contains his acts. Judges gives the administration of thirteen Judges from Joshua's death to the time of Eli. The book of Ruth is generally considered as an appendix to the book of Judges and an introduction to that of Samuel.

Ruth was an ancestress of David, and so of CHRIST. This Moabitish damsel's history is thought to be an intimation of the reception of the Gentiles into the Christian Church. It also shows God's providential care over those who fear Him. The greater part of 1 Samuel is supposed to have been written by Samuel. The names and characters of Samuel, Eli, Saul, and David are mingled with Jewish history in 1 and 2 Samuel. In the books of Kings, Solomon and his successors appear, and the division of the kingdom occurs, and finally the tribes go into captivity. The Chronicles contain Genealogical Tables and Histories. The book of Ezra harmonizes with, and illustrates the prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah; it shows God's Fatherly care over His people. Nehemiah narrates the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem by his oversight, and the two reformatations accomplished by him. The noble Queen Esther deservedly gives name to the book which records her pious deed of self-sacrifice for her nation. The Poetical Books are Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon. In Job we see the patriarchal doctrines, and a prophecy of resurrection, and a delineation of final retribution. The Psalms the Hebrews styled the Book of Hymns, or praises; they were to be sung with the voice, accompanied with instruments of music. As to the name, see St. Luke xx. 42. The use of the Psalter in the Church Services keeps up an echo of the Temple worship through the centuries. They are often termed the Psalms of David, because he was the chief author. Many of them refer to CHRIST, "Great David's Greater Son." "The book of Proverbs has always been ascribed to Solomon," though it has been doubted whether he wrote every maxim. It instructs men in the mysteries of wisdom and understanding, the perfection of which is the knowledge and fear of God. The Apostles frequently quote it. Ecclesiastes signifies a Preacher. The book is ascribed to Solomon. As for the title, see chap. i. 1, 12. The object of the book is to display the vanity of earth, and to draw men to communion with God, as the "only permanent good," and to teach that happiness must be sought "beyond the grave." The "vanity of vanities" (ch. i. 2) rings through the book until "the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep His commandments: for this is the whole duty of man" (ch. xii. 13). The Song of Solomon is generally deemed "a mystical poem, or allegory." It is full of Oriental figures. Scott considers it as intended "to describe the state of his (the Christian's) heart at different times, and to excite admiring, adoring, grateful love to God our Saviour." The Prophetical Books are chiefly prophecy, though history and doctrine are also to be found in them. They are sixteen in number, the Lamentations being considered an appendix to Jeremiah. The Greater Prophets are Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, so designated from the size of their books. The Minor Prophets are Hosea, Joel, Amos, Jonah, Obadiah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. This "Goodly Fellowship of the Prophets," as the Te Deum styles them, all point to the coming CHRIST: "To Him give all the prophets witness" (Acts x. 43). In reading the Two Testaments, or Covenants, we should reflect that a proper Covenant implies the agreement of two parties, and if God gives miracles and prophecies, and sends His Blessed Son to die for man, man must on his part in faith accept the benefits. "He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life" (1 John v. 12). "Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in hope, through the power of the HOLY GHOST" (Rom. xv. 13).

Testament, New.—The New Testament, as a complete book, consists of four Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, twenty-one Epistles, and the prophetic book of the Revelation of St. John the divine. The life and teaching of Our Saviour JESUS CHRIST form the topic of the New Testament. It begins with the events which preceded the birth of JESUS, and ends with a picture of the "same JESUS" in glory, and a declaration that He who came once in humility will come again in power to judgment. The crucifixion and atonement—the act of CHRIST's death, and its blessed effects—are the central points in this volume. As the Old Testament in the Prophets and Psalms testified of the coming CHRIST, the New Testament declares that He has come. A connecting link throughout this varied book is found in St. John, the beloved disciple. He commences his Gospel by saying, "In the beginning was the Word" (compare Gen. i. 1). He ends the Revelation with a prayer for CHRIST's second advent, and the blessing through CHRIST. His great age permitted him to see the working of the Church after CHRIST's Ascension, and to complete the Gospels. His personal association with our LORD gives deep interest to all his teachings. In the endearment of love he never loses the thought of his LORD's divinity. Well did the ancients make the soaring eagle an emblem of St. John. The zeal of St. Peter and the logic of St. Paul supplemented the work of St. John. The Epistles show much human feeling, as especially the wide-hearted salutations of St. Paul in Rom. xvi. The description of the earthly life of CHRIST is closed in the beginning of the book of Acts. The lives and acts of CHRIST's disciples, and the doctrines they taught, through the guiding of the HOLY SPIRIT, form the rest of the New Testament. In their teachings these men of God, like their Master, constantly appealed to the Old Testament, so that the quotations from that book are numerous. The teaching is intensely personal and practical. CHRIST is represented as a Person, and man's relation to Him here and hereafter is to be the incentive to Christian living.

St. Paul was "in Christ" (2 Cor. xii. 2). Believers were "baptized into JESUS CHRIST" (Rom. vi. 3). St. Paul is "crucified with CHRIST." "CHRIST liveth in" him (Gal. ii. 20). Hence "to live is CHRIST, and to die is gain." (Phil. i. 21). Then the New Testament is not a mere story. It is the tremendous announcement of the saving work of the SON of God, not to be debated over, but to be reverently received, as the starving man grasps at food. The Collect for the second Sunday in Advent teaches how it is to be digested. The early Church saw in the Four Gospels a representation of the Cherubim seen by Ezekiel (ch. i. 5-26, and x. 1-22). Like them they bear God "on a winged throne into all lands," moving by the Spirit's guidance. Like them they are "joined together," are full of eyes, and sparkle with heavenly light. Like them, they sweep from heaven to earth, and from earth to heaven, and fly with lightning's speed, and with the noise of many waters. Their sound is gone out into all lands, and their words unto the end of the world (Ps. xix. 4). St. John sees these Four Living Creatures in heaven, and they cry, "Holy, holy, holy, LORD God Almighty, which was and is, and is to come" (Rev. iv. 4-11). Each Evangelist has his particular mode of displaying CHRIST. St. Augustine shows that St. Matthew more fully declares CHRIST's Kingly character. His genealogy is from David the King, by a line of Kings, and the wise men do homage to the "King of the Jews." St. Luke dilates on the Priestly character of our LORD, and describes the sacrificial offerings made for the infant CHRIST (St. Luke ii. 22-24). He oftener reveals CHRIST in his mediatorial office in prayer, ever living "to make intercession for us" (Heb. vii. 25). St. Luke was the Evangelist of the Gentiles. He taught the inefficiency of the Mosaic law, and the "saving efficacy of CHRIST's Sacrifice, and the blessedness of the Atonement made by Him on the Cross, and justification by Faith in His Blood." This justification he makes a "practical principle," and "the root of Christian virtue." As our LORD says in the parable of the Good Samaritan, "Go and do thou likewise." "All who would be saved by His death must imitate His life." The lion is referred as an emblem to St. Matthew (see Rev. iv. 7), because he is the king of beasts, and our LORD is called "The Lion of the tribe of Juda" (Rev. v. 5). St. Mark relating what CHRIST did in His Human Nature is symbolized as the Man in adapting (Rev. iv. 7). The Ox, the Sacrificial Victim, is ascribed to St. Luke. St. John with his eye fixed on the Light of CHRIST is the Eagle. St. John teaches that "the contemplation of the Truth and the sweetness of Love" must go together.

The book of Acts is the first history of the Christian Church. It has been called the Gospel of the HOLY GHOST, as it represents the wonderful work of the Spirit from the day of Pentecost onward. The character of the primitive Church is shown in chap. ii. 46: "They, continuing daily with one accord in the temple, and breaking bread from house to house, did eat their meat with gladness and singleness of heart." Here was the constant prayer and the communion of saints. No wonder that the next verse adds that the "LORD added to the Church daily such as should be saved." As the little Church thus grew it made its home in various places, and Pastoral Letters were needed from its Bishops; hence came the Epistles, which are for the most part addressed to Churches or to Christians in general. A few are directed to individuals. By these inspired Epistles Church order and true doctrine were inculcated, so that the new converts were "built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, JESUS CHRIST Himself being the chief corner-stone" (Eph. ii. 20). A pleasant connection between an Epistle and a Gospel occurs in Col. iv. 14: "Luke, the beloved physician, and Demas, greet you." A touching motive for writing is given by St. Peter (2 Ep. i. 15): "I will endeavor that ye may be able after my decease to have these things always in remembrance." He also connects the Epistle with the Gospel accounts in speaking of the Transfiguration (vs. 16-18). The Epistles are a continuation and amplification of the Gospels (Gal. i. 11). While the Acts describe the planting of the Church, the Epistles give an account of its training. St. Paul, as a missionary, founded Churches, and when he could, revisited them, and in cases where he could not do this, he wrote to them, answering their letters and messages, and comforting and strengthening them. Hemsterhusius says that St. Paul's Epistles "seem to have been written under an almost celestial excitement of mind." Jerome remarks that his "words are thunder-bolts." Tholuck gives "power, fullness, and warmth" as the distinguishing marks of St. Paul.

St. Chrysostom calls St. Paul's Epistles "an adamant wall to the Church throughout the world." The Epistle of St. James was to give fortitude to the Jewish Christians, and enforce the practice of the Gospel. Of St. Peter's first Epistle, Alford says that it follows out our LORD's "command to its writer, 'And thou, when thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren'" (St. Luke xxii. 32). The second Epistle is distinguished by the sublime description of the destruction of the earth by fire, and should move in every reader's heart a prayer for mercy through CHRIST in the "Day of the LORD" (ch. iii. 8-13). The Epistles of St. John abounding in love recall the legend that "the Apostle of love" in the feebleness of age used to utter the brief sermon, "Little children, love one another." St. Jude's Epistle is an earnest exhortation to "contend for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints" (v. 3). The prophetic book of the Revelation, with its magnificent description of Heaven, fitly closes the Sacred Volume: "Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things which are written therein" (Rev. i. 3). With so many topics and such various writers the unity of the New Testament denotes the work of the Spirit of God. Furthermore, the Old and New Testaments are in wondrous agreement. The Fathers called them "the perfect and well-tuned organ of God," "from differing sounds" giving "one saving voice to those who are willing to learn." Justin Martyr says, "What else is the Law but the Gospel foreshadowed? What other the Gospel than the Law fulfilled?" St. Augustine compares things in the Old Testament to such as are under a shadow, the New Testament brings them into the open sun. The Old and New Testaments have been likened to the lower and upper millstones, which together grind the wheat.

Testimonials. The certificates of good character and of proper qualifications which the Canons demand must be presented in behalf of a postulant or candidate for holy orders, that he may be duly received as such by the Bishop. The testimonials are demanded at every step taken in the premises, that the Church may be sufficiently protected against the admission of unworthy applicants. Despite all the care taken, it does occur that unworthy men are admitted to holy orders. A great responsibility lies upon those who are asked to sign these testimonials and certificates, for a heavy duty towards God and the Church is placed upon them, and there is no room for courteous or kindly intentions, or for any wish to spare the feelings of the applicant, no matter how well intentioned he may be. Archbishop Dolben, of York, charged his clergy with these solemn words: "Not to impose upon him by signing the testimonials which they did not know to be true, as they would answer it to Him at the dreadful day of judgment." It should be well weighed with the laity, for with them lies much of the responsibility, by avenues of information practically closed to a clergyman. If, then, by laxness, heedlessness, or other insufficient cause, testimonials are signed for a man known not to be fit for the ministry and harm to the flock of CHRIST come thereby, then those who aided his admission must bear their share. Reasonable doubt should weigh, not a prejudice nor a past life which has been heartily repented of, and sufficient personal knowledge should in all cases be the basis for any consent to sign such testimonials.

Texas, the Protestant Episcopal Church in. A sketch of the Church in Texas, within the limits prescribed for this article, must be very brief, and so far unsatisfactory. Only a general and meagre outline can be given. Its first planting goes back about forty-six years. In 1838 A.D. the Rev. Caleb S. Ives came to Texas as the first Missionary, under the auspices of the Foreign Committee of the Board of Missions of the Church in the United States. He settled in Matagorda, an old Spanish town, near the mouth of the Colorado River, and the outlet of a fertile agricultural region. It was then one of the most flourishing points in the infant Republic. By his godly life, earnest zeal, and faithful teaching he soon won his way to the hearts and confidence of the people, and laid deep and lasting the foundations of the Church, organizing a Parish which has retained its churchly and loyal character amid all subsequent changes, and the general decline in latter years of that region. He collected funds both in the North and South for a church building. It was framed and shipped from New York in 1839 A.D., a neat and commodious edifice, and sufficiently advanced towards completion to be used for service the same year. In 1844 A.D. it was consecrated by Bishop Polk, of Louisiana. Mr. Ives was at this time, and for years previous and subsequent, the most Southern and Southwestern Episcopal Minister in North America. After abundant labors, he died in the latter part of 1849 A.D., beloved as few have ever been in the Church.

His successor was the Rev. S. D. Dennison, so prominently connected with the General Missionary work in after-years. Seeking temporary relief from Parish labors in a voyage to the South, he arrived in Texas in December, 1849 A.D., having been appointed a Missionary to Matagorda. He entered on the work and was elected Rector of the Parish, but resigned the following October. The Rev. D. D. Flower, of Alabama, was called in the spring of 1851 A.D., and accepted, but remained only a short time. The Rev. H. N. Pierce (the present Bishop of Arkansas) followed Mr. Flower, and remained until his removal to New Orleans. He was succeeded by the Rev. S. R. Wright, of Alabama. On the eve of his departure for this field, in October, 1854 A.D., Matagorda was wellnigh destroyed by one of the most terrific tornadoes that ever swept the coast of the United States. The church building shared in the general wreck. The vestry, deeply despondent, offered to release Mr. Wright from the engagement, but this devoted man of God would not decline. He officiated for a few weeks, and then went North and East to raise funds for another church building. His efforts were crowned with success, and a most comely structure was reared, the pride of the town and county, the first and most conspicuous object seen by the traveler on his approach, many miles away on the prairie. In a destructive storm of 1875 A.D. it was partially destroyed, but fitted up, to be used, it is hoped, for many years to come. Mr. Wright soon after, 28th of January, 1857 A.D., was called to his rest, taken ill in his vestry room while preparing for a funeral, and surviving but a few hours. A succession of faithful men followed him in the Parish, among the most prominent of whom was the Rev. John Owen, who died during the epidemic in Galveston, 1867 A.D., one, like the saintly Wright, "whose praise was in all the Churches."

The name of the Rev. R. M. Chapman stands next to that of Mr. Ives as a Missionary to Texas. He was appointed by the "Foreign Committee" from the "Eastern Diocese," and sailed from New York, October 31, 1838 A.D., for Houston. He came with the purpose of supporting himself in part by teaching. In March, 1839 A.D., subscriptions were made of about $5000 for a church building. On the 1st of April a Parish was organized, and wardens and vestrymen were elected. Whether discouraged by surrounding circumstances, or impaired in health by the climate, is not known, but Mr. Chapman left the following summer. In April, 1840 A.D., Church officers were again elected, and on the 21st of that month the Rev. Henry B. Goodwyn, of Maryland, then in Houston on a visit, was elected Rector, but remained only a few months. During the previous year the first Episcopal Visitation was made to this then distant field. In the latter part of 1838 A.D. the Right Rev. Leonidas Polk, Bishop of Louisiana, was requested by the Foreign Committee of the Board of Missions "to visit Texas with reference to the Missions of the Episcopal Church to be established in that country." The Bishop came the following spring, and in his report to the Board, dated Houston, May 17, 1839 A.D., says, "There is a Presbyterian congregation organized here, and also one of our own Church. Four or five thousand dollars have been subscribed for erecting an Episcopal church." This visitation to Houston and other places was doubtless most encouraging to the few and scattered members in this remote field. For that noble man and Bishop never failed to leave behind him the enduring impress of his godly character, his genial spirit, and commanding presence as he journeyed in his Apostolic office among the Churches.

Houston and the adjacent region were not left long without a Minister. The Rev. Benjamin Eaton arrived January 14, 1841 A.D., his appointment having been previously communicated by the Secretary of the Board of Missions to the Wardens at Houston. Mr. Eaton began his work here. He also visited Galveston, soon after organized a Parish there, and was called to the Rectorship, which he accepted. His first intention was to divide his time between Galveston and Houston, but after doing so for three months he concluded to confine his labors to the former, although he found there "only four persons who professed any attachment to the Church, while at Houston there were seventeen Communicants, the majority males." In a letter written some years afterwards, May, 1858 A.D., Mr. Eaton says, "I commenced the building of the church here six months after my arrival, having by that time collected a large congregation. The church was opened in June, 1842 A.D. It was blown from its foundations and greatly injured the following September, which obliged me to make a second begging expedition. The liberality of friends abroad enabled me to repair and again open it in about six months. The corner-stone of the present building was laid under very discouraging circumstances on Thanksgiving-Day, 1855 A.D., and the church opened November 1, 1857 A.D. The extreme exterior length is 154 feet, and the width 66. It has seats for 750 persons, and is generally well filled. Whenever necessary, it can be made to accommodate 1500." Of Mr. Eaton's long rectorship of thirty years, his varied gifts, his faithful labors, and his tragic death,—falling at the desk where he had so long preached the unsearchable riches of CHRIST, carried by weeping friends along the aisle and to the rectory, where he breathed his last after a few hours of unconsciousness,—the Church has been generally informed. His reward is with him, and, "being dead, he yet speaketh."

Next came the Rev. Charles Gillette, long an active and prominent clergyman of Texas. He set sail from New York for Galveston January 12, 1843 A.D. For several months before, under the direction of the Board of Missions, he had been engaged in making collections for the rebuilding of the church in Galveston, which was blown down the September previous, and raised about $1000. He was instructed by the Board to select his own field of labor, and went first to Washington, as probably the most eligible point, it being then the seat of government. He found the opening, however, better at Houston, and, returning there, continued his ministrations as Rector for a time in that place. In June, 1844 A.D., he visited the North, seeking aid in the erection of a church building, and secured $1800. The building was completed and opened for service Easter-Day, April 4, 1847 A.D. In September, 1845 A.D., with Mr. Eaton, he made a tour through Middle and Western Texas, among other places visiting Brenham, Independence, Austin, and San Antonio. In September, 1847 A.D., by request of certain citizens there, Mr. Gillette again visited Austin, held a series of services, and organized a Parish, under the name of Christ Church. The second Episcopal visitation to Texas was made by Bishop Polk in February, 1844 A.D. He confirmed some persons in Houston. Accompanied by Mr. Gillette, the Bishop proceeded through the country to Matagorda, and thence, with Mr. Ives also, returned along the coast to Galveston.

Prior to this, in May, 1843 A.D., Messrs. Eaton, Gillette, and Ives met at Matagorda for the purpose of organizing the Diocese of Texas, but owing to adverse causes the project was defeated.

The two visitations of Bishop Polk already mentioned were necessarily hurried, and made with a long interval between. The need for more frequent, indeed, constant Episcopal supervision was more and more sorely felt. To meet this need the following memorial was prepared, to be presented at the ensuing General Convention:

"GALVESTON, March 13, 1844 A.D.

"The undersigned, Presbyters of the Dioceses of Alabama, Missouri, and Virginia, Missionaries in the Republic of Texas, feeling the urgent necessity of constant Episcopal supervision for the welfare of the Church in this Republic, and being satisfied of the kind intention of the Church in the United States, manifested hitherto by her fostering care, are encouraged to ask such assistance as may early supply our necessities. And we would respectfully solicit such action by the General Convention of the Episcopal Church in the United States at their approaching meeting as shall provide us with such Episcopal supervision as is enjoyed by Missionary Districts in the United States.

"CALEB S. IVES,

Rector Christ Church, Matagorda.

"BENJAMIN EATON,

Rector Trinity Church, Galveston.

"CHARLES GILLETTE,

Rector Christ Church, Houston."

To provide for the expected consecration of a Bishop for Texas, then a foreign power, a "Promise of Conformity to the Doctrine, Discipline, and Worship of the Church in the United States" was drawn up by the House of Bishops, when a Bishop for Texas should be elected. This soon followed. On the 22d of October, 1844 A.D., the House of Bishops nominated to the House of Deputies the Rev. Geo. W. Freeman, Rector of Emmanuel Church, New Castle, Delaware, as Missionary Bishop of this Church, to exercise Episcopal functions in the State of Arkansas and in the Indian Territory, south of the 36½ parallel of latitude, and to exercise Episcopal supervision over the Missions of this Church in the Republic of Texas." The Deputies concurred, and Dr. Freeman was duly elected, and consecrated without delay. In his first triennial Report to the General Convention, October, 1847 A.D., he says, "Leaving the place of his former residence 17th of February, 1845 A.D., he proceeded on his first visitations, which from the lateness of the season when it was commenced was somewhat hurried, and confined chiefly to the Missionary Stations already existing, and was completed in the latter part of the month of June." "In the three years which have elapsed since his consecration, besides visiting the Churches and Missionary Stations within his jurisdiction thrice, he has visited Columbia and Brazina, in Brazina County, Texas, twice, and Richmond and Velasco in the same State once. The number of Communicants within his jurisdiction he reports to be, as nearly as he has been able to ascertain, 200 in Texas and 70 in Arkansas; whole number, 270." This was in October, 1847 A.D. He also says, "In Texas the congregations in the three established Parishes have been steadily growing, at Houston the number of Communicants is about 80; the church recently completed and consecrated is already found too small to accommodate the increasing congregation, and notwithstanding the large Confirmation (35 persons) lately held there, the worthy Rector reports that he has already a large class of additional candidates for that holy rite. At Galveston the congregation is large, and still increasing; the number of Communicants is 62, and the erection of a new church is seriously spoken of, although the present building is the largest belonging to our Communion in the State. At Matagorda, too, the Church is prospering, though, of late, there have come in some who 'rise up and speak against her.' The faithful Missionary is doing good service, both by his pastoral labors and his schools, which are becoming important nurseries for the Church; and although his field is apparently circumscribed by the limits of a small town, the whole population of which does not exceed three or four hundred, the circle of his influence for good is far more extensive, and may be considered as embracing the country around for many miles. The number of Communicants is 38. In various other parts of the State there is a manifestly growing interest in religious things in general, and a decided bias towards the Church, and nothing appears to be wanting, with the blessing of God, but a band of faithful and efficient Missionaries to insure a glorious ingathering of the faithful into the fold of CHRIST. To earnest, devoted, and self-denying men, capable of 'enduring hardness' in the cause of CHRIST, there is scarcely a more promising field in the whole range of our Missionary operations than that presented by Texas."

The next important step, contemplated for some years past, was the organization of the Diocese of Texas. Bishop Freeman called a meeting of the Clergy and Laity at Matagorda, August 1, 1849 A.D. They assembled as members of the Church of the United States living in Texas. The Bishop presided at this primary Convention, and the same day the organization was completed.

It was ordered that the next meeting of the Convention should be held in Houston, on the second Wednesday in December of the same year, unless the Bishop, who was authorized to change the time, should see fit to so do. It was changed, and the meeting was held in Christ Church, Houston, May 9, 1850 A.D. Five Clergymen were in attendance, with the Bishop, and delegates from three Parishes. Four new Parishes were admitted into union with the Convention, viz.: Trinity Church, San Antonio; St. Peter's, Brenham; St. Paul's, Washington; and St. Paul's, Polk County. The Bishop reported the ordination of two Deacons to the Priesthood,—the Rev. H. N. Pierce and the Rev. Henry Sansom. There were also reported 10 organized Parishes, and, since the previous Convention, 211 Baptisms, and 80 Confirmations. In 6 Parishes, 262 Communicants, and in 3 Parishes, Sunday-School Teachers, 33; and Scholars, 211. Action was taken for the establishment of a Mission, or Church School, and a Committee appointed to take the necessary steps for raising means, the selection of a location, providing Teachers, and to report to the next Convention. By resolution, the Bishop was earnestly requested to make his home at some central and convenient point within the Diocese.

At the succeeding Convention in Galveston, March 1, 1851 A.D., the Bishop, in his address, urged as absolutely essential to the welfare and progress of the Church that they should have a Bishop exclusively their own. The matter was referred to a Committee, which strongly indorsed the Bishop's views, and recommended it to the serious consideration of the next Convention. Further action was taken as to the Diocesan School, and the Rev. C. Gillette was requested to undertake, under the direction and advice of the Bishop, the raising of funds, providing for Teachers, and putting the said school in operation.

At the Convention of 1852 A.D., May 13, in St. Luke's Church, Chapel Hill, 7 Clergymen were present and delegates from 6 Parishes. Three new Parishes were admitted into union with the Convention, viz.: the Church of the Epiphany, Austin; Redeemer, Anderson; and All Faith Church, Liberty.

The Bishop again urged the necessity for a resident Episcopal head, the wisdom of at once making provision for his support, and preparing for his election at no distant day, intimating "that, in view of advancing age, his mind had been much inclined to the thought of resigning his present Episcopal charge altogether." A report was made in accordance with the recommendation, and the Convention decided to proceed to the election of a Bishop. On the first ballot, Bishop Freeman was unanimously chosen. He stated in reply that "he had neither anticipated nor cherished such a result, and was not prepared at present to respond, and asked time for consideration."

The Diocesan School was reported to have been located at Anderson, Grimes County, and put in operation the 1st of January preceding. Mr. Gillette also reported the commencement of a Female School, distinct from the other, for which he had been obliged to become personally responsible.

The Diocesan School soon after took the name of St. Paul's College, and was so incorporated. There were reported in 10 Parishes 176 Baptisms, 261 Communicants, and 52 Confirmations during the year; contributions for Church purposes in 4 Parishes, $1744.28.

At the next Convention, May 5, 1853 A.D., in Austin, assessments were laid on the Parishes, amounting to $500, towards the support of a resident Bishop; and the Deputies to the General Convention were requested to solicit the Board of Missions to grant Bishop Freeman a fixed income per annum, should he accept the Episcopate of Texas. From 13 Parishes 510 Communicants were reported.

In 1854 A.D., Bishop Freeman informed the Convention "that the circumstances of his family relations, and other matters, rendered it impossible for him to remove into the Diocese without greater sacrifices than he felt able or willing to make;" that without such removal the permanent Diocesan charge would be of no material advantage, and would scarcely be desired; and he therefore felt constrained to decline it. No action was then taken as to another election. In the Convention of 1855 A.D., at Seguin, after favorable and adverse reports, and much discussion, it was decided not to go into the election of a Bishop, and not until the succeeding Convention, 1856 A.D., at Galveston, was a choice made. The Rev. Arthur Cleveland Coxe, of Baltimore, was elected, but declined, and so the Diocese continued without a resident head. The following year, at Austin, May 21, 1857 A.D., a letter was read from Dr. Coxe, of March 25, offering, if the Diocese would raise $1000 annually for three years, he would pledge, with the co-operation of sundry clergymen in New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, the additional sum of $1500 per annum, three years, for the person who might be elected their Bishop, with his expenses of travel, that so he might be exempt from all incumbrance of parochial work or other sort, for the entire devotion of his time and talents to the Episcopal work. A committee was appointed to secure, if possible, the required amount on the part of the Diocese. The Rev. Alex. H. Vinton, D.D., was elected Bishop. The next day Bishop Freeman, assured, as he said, now of a favorable result, and regarding the question as to the permanent Bishopric settled, resigned his provisional charge. Dr. Vin-ton, however, declined the call for weighty and conclusive reasons, in a letter marked by propriety and good sense.

At the following Convention, April 15, 1858 A.D., in Houston, Rev. Benjamin Eaton presiding, the Rev. Sullivan H. Weston was elected, and again the Diocese was doomed to disappointment, Mr. Weston declining. A few days after the adjournment of this Convention, Bishop Freeman died in Little Rock, Ark., April 29, 1858 A.D. The next Convention adopted a report, paying the following tribute to the departed Prelate: "Ever firm, faithful, and conscientious in the discharge of duty, and at the same time kind and conciliatory, he did much to lay a firm and broad foundation for the Church in Texas. He labored faithfully as a Bishop in the Church of God; and rests from his labors, and his works do follow him." The statistics for the previous year showed no marked advance except in the increase of Sunday-School teachers and scholars, and contributions for Church objects, amounting to $26,487.47. St. Paul's College had passed already through a troublous financial history. The Rev. C. Gillette had taken charge of Christ Church, Austin. The Rev. Mr. Platt, a worthy and devoted man, succeeded Mr. Gillette, but the decline continued; and in the early part of 1860 A.D. the school was no longer in existence, the Parish at Anderson retained little more than a nominal existence, and only one or two buildings remained to tell the story of the failure.

The tenth Annual Convention was held in Galveston, May 5, 6, 1859 A.D. The Rev. Alexander Gregg, Rector of St. David's Church, Cheraw, S. C., was elected Bishop. His acceptance was in due time made known, and his consecration took place in the Monumental Church, Richmond, Va., October 13. The Bishop began a brief Visitation at Galveston, December 11, going thence to Brenham, Austin, San Antonio, Gonzalez, Columbus, Richmond, and Houston. He returned from South Carolina with his family the middle of February, 1860 A.D., and took up his residence at Austin. The first Convention after his coming was held in Matagorda, April 13. The statistics from nine Parishes were: of Baptisms, 165; Confirmations, 114; Communicants, 456; Candidates for Orders, 8; Clergy, 14; Contributions for Church purposes, $10,689.50.

The following year the war began, but notwithstanding the unfavorable influences and spiritual drawbacks of such a protracted civil strife, the Church continued to advance, as was shown by the statistics reported at the Convention in Houston, June 15-17, 1865 A.D., viz.: "Baptisms, 278; Confirmations, 271; Communicants, 962; Contributions, $12,387; Clergy, 19." In 1874 A.D., nine years after, at the Convention in Jefferson, May 28, there were reported: "Clergy, including the Bishop, 84; Candidates for Orders, 7; Lay-Readers, 21; Parishes organized, 3; Missions, 6; Baptisms, 466; Confirmations, 290; Communicants, 2567; Sunday-School Teachers, 203; Scholars, 1362; total Contributions, $53,-096.34; Value of Churches, Rectory, School-houses, etc., $127,050." At this meeting final action was taken on the important subject of the reduction of the Diocese, which had been considered in previous Conventions, and by the General Convention, at its last session, the matter of making Canonical provision being then considered. On this occasion a special Committee reported, in accordance with the recommendation of the Bishop, proposing the cutting off large portions of the State (or Diocese), to be formed into the Missionary Districts of Northern and Western Texas, according to the lines suggested by the Bishop, and that the General Convention be petitioned to provide for and ratify the same. This was done, notwithstanding the grave difficulty that no legal provision had been made for such a mode of relief. The Rev. Alexander C. Garrett, D.D., was elected Missionary Bishop of Northern Texas, and was consecrated at Omaha, Neb., 20th of the following December. The Rev. R. W. B. Elliott, D.D., was elected Missionary Bishop of Western Texas, and consecrated at Atlanta, Ga., 15th of November. The territory of Northern Texas embraced an area of 100,000, and Western Texas 110,000, square miles, leaving the Diocese with 59,694, the population being more unequally distributed. The total population of the State was estimated at 1,200,000. The Diocese, as reduced, contained nearly 600,000; Northern Texas, 400,000; and Western Texas, a little over 200,000. The State embraced 167 counties, 57 of which were in the Diocese, and 55 each in the Missionary Jurisdictions.

The Diocese as it was then reported 39 Parishes, 34 Missions, and 32 Clergymen. Of these it retained 26 Parishes, 15 Missions, and 20 Clergymen, Northern Texas having 4 Parishes, 9 Missions, and 5 Clergymen, and Western Texas 9 Parishes, 9 Missions, and 7 Clergymen. The progress of the Church throughout this vast territory since has been encouraging, and the wisdom of the action taken in October, 1874 A.D., abundantly justified by the results. In October, 1883 A.D., at the last General Convention, the statistics reported for the Diocese were: Clergy, 20; Parishes and Missions, 57; families, 1200; individuals, 5600; Baptisms the previous year, 335; Confirmations, 146; Communicants, 2400; Sunday-School Teachers, 183; Scholars, 1748; Contributions, $47,600. For Northern Texas: Clergy, 9; Parishes, 9; Missions, 15; Baptisms, 107; Confirmations, 50; Communicants, 1134; Sunday-School Teachers, 88; Scholars, 715; Contributions, $9736.36. Western Texas: Clergy, 15; Parishes, 12; Missions, 18; Baptisms, 143; Confirmations, 79; Communicants, 1153;

Sunday-School Teachers, 124; Scholars, 888; Contributions, $14,155.16.

By the close of another decade it is not to be doubted but that the growth of the Church will be found to have kept pace with that of population, and Bishops, Clergy, and Laity will have reason to say, hitherto hath God helped us, and as much reason to pray to the great HEAD of the Church for an increasing blessing to the end.

RT. REV. ALEXANDER GREGG, D.D., Bishop of Texas.

Text. The letter of the Holy Scripture. Usually the word applied to the verse or verses upon which a set discourse is delivered. But it is also the letter of the Scriptures, whether in the Greek or Hebrew, or in some particular version under examination. The Old Testament text was settled by the Jewish doctors (the Masorites, vide MASORAH) fifteen hundred years ago. It is now in the state in which they placed it. Earlier MSS. in point of time do not exist, but some MSS. represent copies of the Old Testament which were transcribed before this recension, and also the Masorites themselves distinguished between a reading which they did not displace, but which was wrong, and the reading they recommended (the K'ri and the K'theb, "what should be read" and "what is in the text." The text was providentially preserved to us intact, for though human weaknesses intervene to prevent us from a positive certainty that we have every letter as it came from the pens of the inspired writers, yet we are sure that we have a very accurate copy of the work. The vast labors of Scholars, Jewish and Christian, have not touched the integrity of the Masoretic Text, though emendations may be suggested. So, too, of the New Testament. The text of the Greek of the New Testament was arranged by a famous printer in Paris, Robert Stephens, in 1546 A.D. (and later 1549 A.D., and the Regia, 1550 A.D.), from confessedly imperfect MSS. but with remarkable freedom from essential defects. The labors of a long line of eminent scholars since then have produced a purer text, yet of the thirty thousand variations in MSS. collated and arranged not three affect doctrine or the essentials of the text, and but few omit any of the important words. The passages affected are 1 John v. 7, which is generally supposed to be a late insertion; and St. John viii. 2-11, which is most probably genuine, and has very strong authority. The third is a various reading of Who for God in 1 Tim. iii. 16, a variation which does not affect the doctrinal statement. A good idea of general variations in the text made by modern criticism may be obtained by a comparison of the marginal notes in the recent Revised Translation upon what is left out or what is considered doubtful, with the parallel passages in the Authorized Version. By far the larger number of variations are to the ordinary reader nearly valueless, being variations in tense or mood or a change of particles. But very few out of so large a number change the words of a text. In still fewer instances a sentence evidently inadvertently repeated from another suggestive or parallel passage has been left out. The TEXTUS RECEPTUS, as the text of Stephens of Paris is called, will probably remain practically the text of our New Testaments, though critical editions are imperatively necessary for the Biblical Scholar and the Theologian. Such have been recently published, foremost of which is Westcott's Text of the New Testament.

This very imperfect notice of the Text of the originals should be supplemented by the information to be found in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible. For a notice of the Authorized Version of the Bible and Revised Version of the New Testament, see VERSIONS.

Thanksgiving. If it is a plain duty and an act of common politeness to thank any one for a favor, much more is it an obligation laid on every human being to heartily thank God for the countless undeserved blessings received at His hand. "Every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving" (1 Tim. iv. 4). Cruden defines Thanksgiving thus: "An acknowledging and confessing with gladness the benefits and mercies which God bestows either upon ourselves or others." Thanksgiving naturally forms a part of the Church services. The Jew had a "sacrifice of thanksgiving" (Lev. vii. 12, 15). There were psalms of thanksgiving (Neh. xii. 8, 46). "Offer unto God thanksgiving" (Ps. l. 14). "Let us come before His presence with thanksgiving" (Ps. xcv. 2). "Enter into His gates with thanksgiving" (Ps. c. 4). St. Paul exhorts that "giving of thanks be made for all men" (1 Tim. ii. 1). Prayer is to be "with thanksgiving" (Phil. iv. 6). Public thanksgivings are given for public mercies, as the song of triumph after the miraculous passage of the Red Sea (Ex. xv.), and in the Prayer-Book the hymns and prayers after deliverance from tempest, or after a victory. Special acknowledgments occur in Scripture for special mercies, for "wisdom" (Dan. ii. 23), for the faith of Christian believers (Rom. i. 8), "for the grace of God" given by JESUS CHRIST (1 Cor. i. 4). The four and twenty elders thank God for the enlargement of CHRIST's kingdom (Rev. xi. 16, 17). Anna, the prophetess, "gave thanks unto the LORD" for the infant CHRIST (St. Luke ii. 36, 38). This spirit of general and particular thankfulness to God finds proper expression in the Prayer-Book. The "General Thanksgiving" for bodily and spiritual mercies and redemption through CHRIST is placed in the Morning and the Evening Prayer. Various Thanksgivings for personal and national mercies of providence and grace are found in the Occasional Prayers. In the "Family Prayer" for the "Evening" is a beautiful and comprehensive form for acknowledging the daily benefits received from God. In thanking the LORD for "our reason" in this prayer it may be well to remember the question of the insane man to a London merchant, as to whether he ever thanked God for his reason. The merchant said that he never after offered thanks to God without thinking of gratitude for reason and right mind. A much neglected occasional prayer is the Thanksgiving "for a Recovery from Sickness." The prayer "For a Sick Person" is often called for, but when God blesses the invalid, too often, like the nine ungrateful lepers, he does not return thanks. Dr. Samuel Johnson writes, "I am so far recovered that on the 21st I went to church to return thanks, after a confinement of more than four long months." The word "Eucharist" means thanksgiving, and after recovery from sickness it is most desirable to draw near to God in this Holy Feast. Indeed, the Holy Communion is the great act of Christian thanksgiving, and stands pre-eminent in this respect.

The Prayer-Book contains "A Form of Prayer and Thanksgiving to Almighty God for the fruits of the earth, and all the other blessings of His merciful Providence." In the United States this festival often very properly combines the idea of a Harvest-home and a family reunion. The "Mid-lenting" or "Mothering" of English sons visiting the family abode corresponds to the social part of this festival. It is a pleasant custom to deck the church with the fruits of the earth, and then give them to the poor, and a large offering for some worthy object should on such a glad day be placed thankfully on God's altar. The Law declared that bread was not to be eaten before an offering was made to God (Lev. xxiii. 14). In Deut. xxvi. 1-11, is an account of the offering of first fruits, and when the American thinks of his nation's advancement, and how the "few" have become "a nation, great, mighty, and populous" (v. 5), like the descendants of the Syrian Jacob, he should freely return to God a part of what he has so freely received. Grace at table is a private thanksgiving in accordance with this public one. "When thou has eaten, and art full, then thou shalt bless the LORD thy God, for the good land which He hath given thee" (Deut. viii. 10). If the Jew blessed God when he smelled a flower, much more should we bless Him at the daily meal, spread by His bounty.

When the spirit of thanksgiving shows itself in an offering to God, it is desirable to sing, as the offering is presented at the altar, the words of David, "All things come of Thee, and of Thine own have we given Thee" (1 Chron. xxix. 14). If thanksgiving is a proper employment for God's people on earth, it is also the work of angels in heaven, as they fall "before the throne on their faces and" worship God, "Saying, Amen: Blessing, and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honor, and power, and might, be unto our God for ever and ever. Amen" (Rev. vii. 12).

Theandric Operation. A word compounded of Theos and Andros, of God and man. We use frequently a similar compound, JESUS CHRIST, the God-man, to intimate the complete, interrelated union without fusion of our LORD's two natures in His one Person. The theandric operation also denotes the complete harmonious, subordinated work of His human will under His divine will. The word was of late introduction (640 A.D.), and is comparatively unused.

Theology is the philosophy of the Faith. In so far as it is of the Faith it is fixed and unchangeable, because the Faith was once for all delivered to the saints. So far as its philosophical element reaches, Theology is subject to the laws of human reason, and is affected by the progress or retrogression of knowledge. Hence Theology changes from time to time. Its changes are causes of conflict. Those who defend the old theologic forms of expression and modes of argument think they are contending for the faith itself, while those who assail these old forms and modes may declare themselves the more strongly attached to the Faith, and possessors of the more confidence in it, for the very reason that it can be shown to stand firmly even while the Theology generally received as expressing it is found no longer consistent with advanced knowledge or with improved logical methods. Every one will recollect the standard illustration of this point. The Word of God was as true, and the Faith it enshrines as sure, after Galileo proved that the earth moved round the sun, as they were before. In our own period, too, the true faith respecting creation is only more fully set forth and elucidated by the fact that Theology requires some reconstruction in order to fit it into the unfolding facts of geological science. No one now thinks of the six days, of the progressive creation of the world, as fixed temporal quantities of twenty-four hours each.

Skeptics, of course, exult when they make a breach in old walls of theologic opinions and prove untenable some forms of its expression. Many timid saints, also, tremble for the stability of the "building of God." But the Faith is never shaken. The Church sacraments and doctrine as given or sealed by CHRIST and the HOLY GHOST are immutable, because they rest on the Corner-Stone, the Rock, the Word of God, God with us, the Truth, in whom dwelleth all the fullness of God.

Thus it is seen that the Faith is that sum of fact which rests in and on CHRIST, which cannot, therefore, be prevailed against, which will remain the one Faith forever.

Theology is not to be underrated, because it never can stand on the clear ground of certainty. It is more or less probable, and therefore, when well used and duly esteemed, becomes a great help towards understanding and applying the Truth. Human reason is just as much a God-given faculty as the faculty of faith itself. Within its own limits, men should esteem, value, and follow it. Reason may fairly test the foundation of the Faith. Then the man must take what rests on that foundation into his faculty of faith. From this, as a second starting-point, reason may proceed according to both its methods. It may deduce, from facts of the Faith, just consequences and conclusions; and, if its deductions are sound, its results will carry the obligation to believe, follow, and obey. It may lay points of the Faith alongside other points, and mingle them even with philosophic or scientific truth; and, upon induction from the whole, draw out a theological conclusion, or even a chain of doctrine and law. If this induction be fair, full, and faithful, the whole theological conclusion becomes binding upon the minds and consciences of those who receive or ought to receive it.

Hence Theology is a thing of weight, a power given from on high, a means of wide instruction, a legitimate basis of exhortation. Sermons are generally theological discourses. They are designed to apply points of the "one Faith" to the specific needs of hearers. Though not infallible, they may be true. In so far as they are true they are spoken of God, because spoken according to His will by those sent by Him, His own chosen prophets or teachers. Hearers are not bound by every theological instruction or exhortation they may hear; they are, however, bound to take heed how they hear. They may not innocently reject or neglect what they hear, merely because the human element in the discourse takes away its whole infallibility; because whatever of truth there is remains God's truth still, and hence binding on conscience and obligatory to the will.

The Theology of the past embalms much of the history of man. Christian theology has run side by side with the currents of human progress. Mankind are very much indebted to it for mental, moral, social, and political advancement. The Western human tidal flood of progress has been impelled always by strong theological forces. Indeed, its recuperative and evolving forms of civilization have been, and yet are, imbued with power that proceeds from Christian theology. While not overvaluing, one must also take heed lest he undervalue, that great energy of Divine-human Theology, through and by which God works in, into, over, and around mankind.

REV. BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, D.D.

Theophany. It refers to the anticipative manifestations of God the Word as the JEHOVAH Angel, in the Old Testament. In the following list only those which are admitted as undoubted Theophanies are given. Excluding first the free intercourse of God with yet sinless man, and the expostulations of God with Cain, and the communications to Noah, there is the appearance of the Angel of the LORD to Hagar when first driven from Abraham's tent (Gen. xvi. 7-13); the visit of the three Angels which appeared to Abraham on the plains of Mamre and one of whom was the LORD (Gen. xviii.); the Angel of the LORD appearing to Abraham at the offering of Isaac (Gen. xxii. 11 sq.). Passing by the earlier appearances to Jacob in visions, there was the mysterious wrestling with the Angel at the ford Jabbok (Gen. xxxii. 24-30). Jacob devoutly acknowledged His presence and guiding care when he blessed Joseph's sons: "The Angel which redeemed me from all evil bless the lads" (Gen. xlviii. 16). The Angel of JEHOVAH in the Burning Bush (Ex. iii.-iv. 17). The Angel of God in the Pillar of Fire (Ex. xiv. 19). The Angel in whom is the Name of God and who led the People through the wilderness (Ex. xxiii. 20-23). This is the Angel that appeared to Balaam (Num. xxii.), to Joshua at the siege of Jericho (Josh. v. 13), to the People at Bochim (Judges ii. 1), to Gideon (Judges vi. 11), to Manoah (Judges xiii. 3), over Jerusalem with drawn sword (2 Sam. xxiv. 16). He chose to withdraw Himself and to reach His People by other channels. But in visions He was seen by His Prophets, as when Isaiah saw His glory, and heard His Worship sung by the Seraphim, and when Zechariah in a vision saw Him beside the High-Priest, Joshua, to protect him from Satan (Zech. iii. 1, 2). It was this Angel of the Covenant who should appear suddenly (Mal. iii. 1). These are the chief and undenied Theophanies of the WORD, who was from the beginning with God and was God, and this Word of God is JESUS our LORD.

Theophori. A name the Christians often gave themselves. Bearers of God in their hearts. It is said that St. Ignatius gave himself this name when questioned by Trajan.

Theosophy. Wisdom concerning God. It was principally applied to the grotesque speculations of Jacob Boehm, the philosophic shoemaker of Görlitz (1575-1624 A.D.), but it has also been given to the speculations of metaphysical Brahmins. The system of Jacob Boehm is a most quaint farrago of deep spiritual and mystic speculations, written in a style that resembles strongly the Rosicrucian and Alchemic jargon. It was translated by William Law, the famous non-juror, who wrote against Bishop Hoadly. Law was himself a man of remarkable power and of deep devoutness, but apparently unbalanced in those speculations in which he was not forced by controversy to be precise and accurate. In these speculations he gave reins to his mystical tendency.

Thessalonians, First Epistle. By a series of just inferences from St. Paul's movements in his second missionary journey, we may fairly infer that this Epistle was written some months after he had established the Church in Thessalonica, 52-53 A.D. St. Timothy had been sent to revisit them, as the Apostle could not do so himself, and his report was so encouraging to the Apostle that he wrote his letter to them in a spirit of commendation which is also found in the Epistle to the other Macedonian city, Philippi. In this First Epistle, which was also the first of the grand letters which St. Paul wrote, he dwells, as is natural, upon the central truth of the Faith, and chiefly upon the Second Advent. As yet there had been but little antagonism to the Apostle which would bring out a written enunciation of the teaching he afterwards recorded. Faith and works and justification are not named indeed, but they are thoroughly implied. He dwells naturally upon the comfort of the hope of the Future Life and the preparation to meet our LORD, and implies that there had been a persecution, in which the Christian Thessalonians had stood firm. He warns them against the besetting sins of the day, and bids them be patient. It is not that St. Paul's own teachings were elemental, but rather that as yet the difficulties in the Church did not demand of him a full record of what he taught orally. The general plan of the Epistle is wholly characteristic of the Apostle.

I. Ch. i. He recalls his mission and preaching and then conversion.

Ch. ii. He reminds them how he lived among them disinterested and blameless.

Ch. iii. He speaks of his anxiety for them and of Timothy's report, and offers a very earnest prayer for their increase in the Faith.

II. Ch. iv. He exhorts them to purity, brotherly love, and honest life, comforting those whose friends had died with the certainty of the Resurrection, and (ch. v.) assuring them that though he looked for it in his day, yet it was in the determination of God. The Epistle ends with practical suggestions and warnings.

In its construction we see a larger reference to the articles of the Creed, dwelling so pointedly upon our LORD's passion, death, resurrection, and coming to judgment, and founding his exhortation upon it.

THE SECOND EPISTLE must have followed the first quite soon, as St. Paul appears to have found that he was misrepresented in some way, and he writes repeating what he had said of the LORD's coming, but dwelling upon the hindrances which must be removed before that could take place. His language here has been used controversially in an endeavor to fix the person of the man of sin, and so has given a prominence to this Epistle. It is very markedly in the same line of teaching as the previous one. As full of fervent zeal, of delicate suggestion, and warning, as earnest in declaring the Faith, and in urging that suffering is a condition of entering into the Kingdom of Heaven, and a reiteration of the coming of the Son of Man to judge the world, it is well to give this outline of the Epistle:

I. The Apostle's joy in their faith and exhortation to suffer gladly for the LORD's sake, that they may receive double at His hand when He shall come to judgment (ch. ii.). But that Coming is hindered by many things, some of which were political, and, too, that characters might be developed, and that those who are His be proven.

II. Ch. iii. A practical suggestion or two upon the holy life and upon discipline of unworthy members, so delicately and so mercifully worded that the Apostle's tenderness and sympathy are well displayed. This Epistle is better known because of the polemical use made of it, but throughout, the devoted zeal of the Apostle, his earnestness and love, are so characteristic that these form the true worth of the Epistle apart from that enunciation of the Gospel which he makes in it. It is as full of love expressed in St. Paul's manner as are St. John's Epistles; love to his LORD and love to the Christians at Thessalonica because of his LORD's love to him.

Thomas, St., in the list given of the twelve Apostles by three of the Evangelists, is the seventh in place. St. John, who has recorded no list of the Apostles' names, seems to have had a personal knowledge of St. Thomas, as he alone (note the name Thomas is Syriac, and means a twin) mentions him as Didymus, or a twin. He also seems to have understood his character better, as he both heard and recorded the four remarkable sentences uttered by St. Thomas. When called to be an Apostle, he is supposed to have been like St. John and St. Philip, a young man, a Galilean, and a fisherman. His character, to judge from the account of him in St. John's Gospel, was ardent and affectionate, bold and courageous, but possessed of a degree of caution that made it difficult for him to receive any truth that was not fully explained to him, and rendered him unwilling to believe in his LORD's reappearance after the Resurrection on the testimony of others. It made him boldly declare, "Except I shall see in His hands the print of the nails, and put my finger in the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into His side, I will not believe." This proof had already been given to the other Apostles, and why should he not demand it also? How those eight days of doubt were passed by him we can only conjecture; but when the first day was come again, and the disciples were assembled together, Thomas was with them, and then the doors being shut, JESUS stood in the midst and said, "Peace be unto you." Then addressing Thomas by name, He said, "Reach hither thy finger and behold my hands, and reach hither thy hand and thrust it into my side, and be not faithless, but believing." In ecstasy and devotion, St. Thomas made use of the wonderful exclamation, "My LORD and my God."

The festival of St. Thomas is of ancient date, having been observed in the time of St. Gregory; it falls on the 21st day of December. The Collect has the leading idea, drawn from a Homily of St. Gregory when he says, "that by this doubting of St. Thomas we are more confirmed in our belief than by the faith of the other Apostles." It is recorded by Eusebius that after the day of Pentecost and the gift of tongues the Apostles were scattered abroad, and that St. Thomas was sent to the Parthians, Medes, Persians, and Chaldeans, founding churches among them till he penetrated into India. The Christians of St. Thomas, a remarkable religious community, still bear witness to his labors in that distant land; they are settled along the Malabar coast of the Indian peninsula. To the north also there seem to be relics of the Christian faith preached by St. Thomas mixed with the strange religion of Thibet. St. Thomas was martyred at a place called Taprobane. Having been at first assailed with stones, he was at last killed by the thrust of a spear, thus offering a comparison to the words of our LORD to him: "Reach hither thy hand and thrust it into my side." It was not granted to St. Thomas to have his courageous aspiration fulfilled to die with CHRIST, but to die for His cause. It is related that the Portuguese found an ancient inscription in Meliapore, purporting that St. Thomas had been pierced with a lance at the foot of a cross which he had erected in that city, and that in 1523 A.D. his body was found there and transported to Goa. It would appear that St. Thomas traveled farther than any of the Apostles, and preached to various nations of different languages, showing that as his incredulity was great, so was his faith great in proportion.

In Sacred and Legendary art St. Thomas finds a conspicuous place. "The Incredulity of Thomas" has been variously treated by different painters, but by none more successfully than by Rubens, whose picture is in the gallery of Antwerp. In purely Legendary painting he is the subject of many beautiful fancies. When painted alone or with the other Apostles, his attribute is always a builder's rule or square, and for this reason he is called the patron of architects and builders. This attribute must be sought for in a popular legend of which he is the subject. He was sent by our LORD, so says the legend, to an Indian king who was seeking architects to build him a palace. Being pleased with the appearance of St. Thomas, the king gave him large sums of gold and silver, bidding him build a palace finer than the emperor's at Rome. The king then went into a distant land for two years. St. Thomas meanwhile, instead of building the palace distributed all the treasure among the poor and sick. The king on his return was full of anger, and cast St. Thomas into prison, intending to torture him to death; but he was shown in a vision a beautiful palace in heaven, which the Angel told him St. Thomas had built for him. The king ran to the prison to deliver the Apostle, who said, "Know, O king, that I have laid up thy treasures in heaven."

Throne. The Bishop's chair in his Cathedral. It is often so called, but properly the title Throne describes the rank of the Patriarch, but the Bishop's chair is a Cathedra. It is placed generally beyond the stalls, and is raised. Its position in the ancient Church was beyond the Holy Table, which was placed nearly in the centre of the Chancel, and this arrangement is carried out in some Cathedrals. This was once the position of the Marble Chair of the Archbishop of Canterbury, which may well be called a Throne. The Patriarchal Sees are called Thrones.

Tiara. The mitre, surrounded with a triple crown, which the Pope wears upon certain State occasions. The Tiara was a comparatively late ornament added to the Pontifical dress. It was a round cap at first. John XIII. placed upon it the first crown. Boniface VIII. added the second, and Benedict XIII. a third. (Vide Hook's Church Dictionary.)

Tiles. (Vide ARCHITECTURE.) The glazed brick of various colors used in Church Architecture, which is now extensively used, especially for floors in churches.

Timothy. The best beloved of all of St. Paul's companions. To him probably more than to any one else St. Paul confided the thoughts of his great soul. Timothy was born of holy parentage. His mother and grandmother were faithful, earnest Jewish women, living either at Derbe or at Lystra. His temperament, as we may gather from what St. Paul alludes to in the two Epistles to him, shows him an earnest, zealous youth, devoutly trained by a loving mother and grandmother, accepting with them the Gospel, and proceeding in all godliness, so that it were easy that Prophets in the Church should point him out as a fit person to rule in the Church. At St. Paul's second visit he was set apart to do the work of an Evangelist. He then was circumcised, since, being half an Israelite, that the covenant of his forefathers remained uncompleted would be a scandal to Jewish converts. He was henceforth the Apostle's constant companion, leaving him only upon imperative need. He was at Berea and Athens; he goes on a mission to Thessalonica. For the next five years he is not noticed, but probably actively serving St. Paul. Then he is sent to Macedonia and Achaia, when the Apostle plans his third Missionary Journey. His relations to Corinth are those of the most kindly nature. A large circle of friends scattered throughout the Church receive greetings from him in St. Paul's Epistles, or hear from St. Paul of his labors. How often he left the Apostle's side or when he returned to it from some special mission we cannot now determine. From the letter to the Romans in which he sends a salutation till the Apostle is a prisoner there we lose sight of him. But now he becomes the Apostle's constant messenger. He is arrested, and witnesses a good Confession. St. Paul, after he is released, leaves him at Ephesus to regulate and correct disorders. He is set over men older than himself, and has to see to the many and various duties which fall to a Bishop now. Ordination, Discipline, Finance, Preaching, and Personal Conduct as a public man are all set before him as proper to his office. He is to fight a steadfast warfare. But the Apostle is arrested a second time, and is in prison at Rome again. How long an interval lies between the first Epistle and the second we cannot know accurately. Timothy is still at Ephesus, and now St. Paul needs him, and writes to him one of the most touching of all the Epistles he had yet written. In it the master calls the servitor to come to him, and it is probable that Timothy is now at the last scene of St. Paul's eventful life. What his future career was we do not certainly know, but there is very much probability in the conjecture that he is the Angel of the Church warned and appealed to by our LORD in St. John's Apocalypse (Rev. ii. 1-7). That this was certainly so of course cannot be proven, but it is very likely the warning of the Angel's faults and the commendations of his zeal suit very well the temperament of St. Paul's beloved companion, and there is nothing at all more likely than that when St. Paul laid down his life Timothy would return to Ephesus, where his work was already planned out, and where his office and authority were not only known, but were established: probability would point that way. But whether this was so or not, Timothy's charge, which he received from St. Paul, only establishes the more clearly the continuance of the Apostolic office and the extent and limitations of its authority. In Ephesus is a well-established Christian community, and has Elders set over it already. If Elders could ordain Elders, then why should Timothy be imposed upon them with a higher office of ordination as well as discipline? But if (as St. Paul calls him when writing to the Thessalonians, 1 Thess. i. 1, compared with ii. 6) he is an Apostle in office, then the whole of his duty falls in at once with the lines that the Epistles lay down. Any other supposition compels us to do violence to some part or other of the Sacred record. In this, which is led up to by the general facts of the New Testament, the Apostolic nature of his authority, and the linking of his name with the Angel of the Church of the Apocalyptic Message, are clear, natural, and within the lines of the office as our LORD established it and as St. Paul instructed Timothy to wield it.

Timothy, Epistles to. The two Epistles to Timothy which we receive have been fiercely assaulted as spurious. But the refutation is complete and decisive. Style, purpose, date, and contents all are unmistakably St. Paul's, and Timothy's relation to him and the missions upon which he was sent all prove that they are genuine. The first Epistle was written after the first imprisonment, at some place from Macedonia probably, but under what surroundings we do not know. Timothy is left at Ephesus (a) to teach sound doctrine and to discipline those who teach false doctrine as the Apostle had, Hymenæus and Alexander. (b) He is to set in order the Liturgy (giving of thanks is "the Eucharist's"). (c) To ordain fit persons for the Diaconate and Presbyterate. (d) The Apostle recurs to false teaching again. (e) He outlines the practical government to be exercised both over the Ministry and the Laity, and intermingles personal directions and exhortations to him, and gives him the topic upon which he is to warn those committed to his charge. The Epistle closes with a most earnest personal appeal and a magnificent doxology, and then most characteristically with an addition of warnings,—as if Timothy in his own loving sympathetic nature might be tempted to relax that strictness which so difficult a position as that at Ephesus demanded. The second Epistle, which was written at the second imprisonment, almost with the gleam of the sword above him, is full of St. Paul's marked style. It is intensely personal; his own prayers, the tenderness of St. Timothy, the kindness of friends who were not ashamed of his chain, the dispersion of his companions upon missions, his loneliness, his fear that Timothy may be confused by babbling heretics, the salutations of his friend, his sermons to St. Timothy to come with speed, all are so direct, so personal, that we may almost see the chained Apostle in his cell striving to dictate to an amanuensis (probably St. Luke) his message of love and warning and summons to his best beloved son in the Faith. Its contents may be summarized somewhat thus: (a) A personal appeal and mingled reminiscences, with a compact restatement of the gospel whereof he is appointed a preacher and an Apostle and a teacher to the Gentiles. (b) The holding fast to and transmission of the form of sound words, and the steadfastness in confessing and insisting upon them. On this he quotes from a Christian hymn, and closes with a warning to teach and preach meekly. (c) A prophecy of the last times, and an urging Timothy again by his own example to be courageous and to preach the Word constantly, despite the sectaries that would oppose themselves. (d) The summons to come to Rome as soon as he can, with mingled warnings against certain opposers, and a statement of his lonely state and salutations to friends at Ephesus.

These Epistles and that to Titus are called pastoral Epistles, since they give directions upon the Pastoral office, and are written to men in Apostolic office that they may know how they ought to behave themselves in the house of God, which is the Church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the Truth. By these Epistles, and by the just inferences to be drawn from them, the Bishops, Pastors, and Teachers of the Flock of CHRIST have been guided in all matters pertaining to Ordination, to Discipline of the Clergy, and instruction and government of the Laity.

Tippets were hoods of some black material, which must not be silk, which were worn on the shoulders of such ministers as were not graduates of any University, to distinguish them from those who wore the robe and colored hood pertaining to their order.

Tithes. The tenth part, paid by Divine command by the Jew for the maintenance of the Levites and the worship at the Tabernacle, and kept up as long as the Jews retained any national organization. The principle of the tithe was universally acknowledged by the Gentile, the Patriarch, and the Jew. The Carthaginians paid tithes not only to their deities, but to the deities of other countries. The nations in Asia Minor had such a custom. It was vowed to their deities by the Romans on the eve of battle. The Greeks acknowledged it. It must not, however, be supposed that this was regularly observed. The law of the tithe was broken constantly. But the principle was confessed and often acted upon. Abraham paid tithes to Melchisedec. Jacob vowed the tithe at Bethel. God ordered it in the Mosaic Law as a regular and fixed charge upon the income of the Jew. It was a tithe upon all the income,—produce and flocks alike. This did not include the free-will and thank-offerings and first-fruits. Then, at the end of every third year, the increase was to be tithed also, and a public festival was to be held at some central place for each locality. And the Jew was to invite the widow, the fatherless, and the stranger, and he was to offer a solemn prayer, declaring that he had offered to the LORD all that he was commanded to do by the Law. The Jew, then, who fulfilled his duty, paid the tithe of the increase, and made his offerings with a glad heart, offered nearly twenty-five per cent. of his income as a holy thing to JEHOVAH, and this was a bounden duty. His prosperity depended upon it; and so long as he paid it he was blessed in his store, in his basket, in his flock, and in his field. It seems that it was intended to stamp upon the religious mind the necessity of offering tithes as a condition of grace, and then it was to be left to the conscience and free-will of the offerer. But tithes were not commanded under the Christian dispensation, while their principle is evidently presupposed in the Sermon on the Mount. As in so many other points the will of God having been sufficiently declared and the precedent having been set, the Christian Church was left at liberty to act as circumstances should direct. The Church was to be as flexible and have as large a power of adaptability as was possible. Yet the precedent of the Mosaic Law was not to be lost sight of in the larger liberty of the Gospel. In the first century of Apostolic work we know from the New Testament what the freedom of the Gospel led men to do,—sell houses and lands to give all to their poor. They gave of their ability each one severally as he would. So in the second century we find but little allusion to this, yet the Fathers taught that as the principle of the commandments was carried further back than the letter of the law, so our LORD intended to remove the restraint of the tenth that we might give more joyfully and freely. Again, in the third century we find this glad some giving urged; and we know that immediately after a severe persecution St. Cyprian was able out of the Church treasury to send quite a large sum for the ransom of some Christian captives carried off by plundering Numidian marauders. The tithe so far from being the maximum was not even set as the minimum. There was no real limit, for every one was expected to do all he could freely. The suggestion of tithes was later; the law of tithes was first alluded to in the Apostolic Constitutions, which, since it was a kind of Directorium, was probably a work that grew in successive editions, as would be natural. The idea was further suggested by St. Ambrose's saying that the Christian Priest succeeded to the position of the Levitical. Thence this idea of the tithe was introduced and became the principle of giving; but as this which had been the minimum before now became the maximum, it was enacted by the various provincial synods from about Charlemagne's time that tithes were the first demand of the Church, and this demand was enforced by civil enactments. From this time on, tithes took their place in the regular income and was a charge upon the estates. It is not necessary for us to trace this further, since tithes are only a voluntary act, but indeed as really binding upon a man, if offered by vow or promise, as if made compulsory.

But it is a very serious duty for every one in the receipt of any income, whether by daily toil or from any other source whatever, to consider his dependence upon the merciful compassion of the LORD of the Universe, and to ask himself if a tithe is not the least that he can offer in return for what he has received from GOD. The remarks of the earlier Fathers in connection with this subject, that our LORD bade His disciples see to it that their righteousness should exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, taught the duty of alms-giving, and so far from condemning, commended the paying of the tithe of mint, anise, and cummin, and are worth more than a passing thought. They suggested that the Christian should do more than the Jew. Nor is it too much to say that tithes honestly paid with a glad heart bring prosperity and contentment. It is a trust from God that enables us to have anything to give, and it is a grace of the HOLY GHOST in the heart that enables the devout giver to give joyfully and to prove that he is fit to be trusted with more. Tithes were held to be the minimum. Free-will-offerings, Gifts, Thank-offerings, were also poured into the treasury of the Church. St. Cyprian upon his taking orders, after providing for his sister, gave all his goods to the Church in Carthage, among other real estate some gardens which he owned. So others upon coming into the Church gave freely. Were the tithes and the ancient system of a common treasury for each Diocese faithfully carried out, the work of the Church in Missions and other responsibilities would be well supplied with all things needful.

Titles. The ancient Canon law provided that no one could receive holy orders unless he were appointed to serve some Parish church or some Priest in a Parish. An exception was made in favor of those who were to serve in a Cathedral and those who were officers in a College. Under this principle the Canons require that no one can receive Priest's orders who cannot produce to the Bishop a satisfactory certificate that he is engaged to serve some Church, Parish, or Congregation, or is an agent for some Missionary Society recognized by the General Convention, or is a Tutor, Professor, or Instructor of youth in some incorporated educational Institution, or is to serve as Chaplain in the Army or Navy (Tit. i., Can. viii., § iii.). It is eminently proper, or many could receive orders in the Ministry with no field in which to minister their office.

Titles, the, of the Holy Trinity. The first Person of the Ever-Blessed TRINITY is in Holy Scripture styled a "CREATOR" (Ecc. xii. 1; Isa. xl. 28; Rom. i. 25; 1 Pet. iv. 19). The endearing term "FATHER" is applied to Him (Deut. xxxii. 6; 1 Cor. viii. 6); "FATHER of all" (Eph. iv. 6); "One FATHER" (Mal. ii. 10); "Our FATHER" in the LORD's Prayer (St. Matt. vi. 9). Our SAVIOUR addresses Him as "FATHER" (St. John xvii. 1), and "the only true God" (v. 3); "Holy FATHER" (v. 11); "Righteous FATHER" (v. 25); "LORD of heaven and earth" (St. Matt. xi. 25). In the fourth verse of the sixty-eighth Psalm God is called "JAH," and in the next verse, "A Father of the fatherless and a Judge of the widows." "Maker," "Husband," "Holy One of Israel," and "God of the whole earth" (Isa. liv. 5). The Spirit of adoption teaches men to "cry, Abba, Father" (Rom. viii. 15). The idea of the Fatherhood of God expresses a still closer relation in the term, "The Father of our LORD JESUS CHRIST" (Rom. xv. 6; 2 Cor. xi. 31; and Eph. i. 3). The majesty of God is shown in Ps. xxiv. 7, by the expression "King of glory," and St. Paul calls God "The Blessed and only Potentate; the King of kings, and Lord of lords" (1 Tim. vi. 15). In Abraham's prayer for Sodom he pleads with God as "the Judge of all the earth" (Gen. xviii. 25). He is represented as a "Lawgiver" (Isa. xxxiii. 22; James iv. 12). The glorious orb of day furnishes an emblem of the beneficence of God: "The LORD God is a sun" (Ps. lxxxiv. 11). The same verse indicates His protective power by the word "shield." "God is our Refuge and strength" (Ps. xli. 1). The stability of God draws from David the figure of a "Rock" and "Fortress" (Ps. xxxi. 3). The word rock is a favorite one in the Psalms in this connection: "Lead me to the Rock that is higher than I" (Ps. lxi. 2). The song of Moses refers to this comparison: "For their rock is not as our Rock, even our enemies themselves being judges" (Deut. xxxii. 31).

David also speaks of God as his "Light," and "salvation," and "the strength of his life" (Ps. xxvii. 1). The unlimited power of God the FATHER displays itself in His address to Abram: "I am the Almighty God" (Gen. xvii. 1). The Hebrew Name JEHOVAH, from the verb to be, relates to the fact that God exists of Himself, and that He has existed from all eternity, and that He will forever exist (Ex. vi. 3). "I AM hath sent me unto you" (Ex. iii. 14). The troubled Jacob understands that his Maker is "the God of Beth-el" (Gen. xxxi. 13). Similar is the oft-repeated expression, "The God of Israel" (Ex. xxiv. 10, etc.). The character of God shines out in His own description of Himself as "the Holy One" (Hosea xi. 9). The echo of this comes back in our LORD's words, "Holy FATHER" (St. John xvi. 11). What a comfort in St. Paul's expression, "the God of patience and consolation" (Rom. xv. 5). The duration of God is manifested in the phrase "the eternal God" (Deut. xxxiii. 27), and "the everlasting God" (Gen. xxi. 33. See Isa. lx. 28). Nebuchadnezzar describes God as "the most high God" (Dan. iii. 26), Cyrus as "the LORD God of heaven" (Ezra i. 2). God speaks to Amos as "the LORD, the God of hosts" (Amos v. 16). Moses designates Him as "the living God" (Deut. v. 26), and Nehemiah (ix. 31) as "a gracious and merciful God." In Ps. lxxxix. 8, we find the words "strong LORD." These titles of God the FATHER present Him as Creator, Father, King, Judge, and Refuge, and as ever-existing, all-holy, all-powerful, and all-merciful. Thus He is the constant Preserver and the ceaseless Benefactor of the creatures whom His own hand has made.

The Second Person of the Trinity, our LORD and SAVIOUR JESUS CHRIST, appears in prophecy in the beginning of the Old Testament Scriptures as the "Seed" of the woman who should bruise Satan (Gen. iii.

15). He is "the Head-Stone of the corner" (Ps. cxviii. 22); "A precious Corner-stone, a sure Foundation" (Isa. xxviii. 16; cf. 1 Pet. ii. 6, and Eph. ii. 20). JESUS CHRIST was "a righteous Branch," and "a King," and should "be called THE LORD OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS" (Jer. xxiii. 5, 6). The High-Priest typified CHRIST (Heb. ii. 17): "A merciful and faithful High-Priest." He was "the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world" (St. John i. 29), and "the Messias" (v. 41), "THE SON OF GOD," and "the King of Israel" (v. 49; compare St. John v. 19, 23, 25; 1 Cor. xv. 23, and St. Mark xiii. 32). But while our LORD claims the homage of "the SON OF GOD," He also humbles Himself to be "the SON of man" (v. 27): "JESUS CHRIST our LORD" (Rom. i. 3); "Thou art my SON" (Ps. ii. 7): "The SON of the living God" (St. Matt. xvi. 16); "THE CHRIST OF GOD" (St. Luke ix. 20). CHRIST means Anointed One, or Messiah: "Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending" (Rev. i. 8); "The Door" (St. John x. 7); "The Good Shepherd" (v. 11); "The Sun of righteousness" (Mal. iv. 2); "A Star out of Jacob" (Num. xxiv. 7); "The bright and morning Star" (Rev. xxii. 16); "The true Light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world" (St. John i. 9); "The resurrection and the life" (St. John xi. 25); "A Fountain" (Zech. xiii. 1); "The Rose of Sharon and the Lily of the valleys" (Solomon's Song ii. 1); "The Bread of Life" (St. John vi. 35); "The True Vine" (St. John xv. 1); "First-born" (Ps. lxxxix. 27); "The image of the invisible God" (Col. i. 15); "The Head of the body, the Church" (v. 18); "A Prince and a Saviour" (Acts v. 31); "Prince of life" (Acts iii. 15); "The Holy One and the Just" (Acts iii. 14); "Heir of all things" (Heb. i. 2); "Brightness of His glory, and the express image of His Person" (v. 3); "The Beginning, the First-born from the dead" (Col. i. 18); "The Way, the Truth, and the Life" (St. John xiv. 6); "My LORD and my God" (St. John xx. 28); "The Word" (St. John i. 1); "The Word of God" (Rev. xix. 13); "Equal with God" (Phil. ii. 6. See, also, St. John v. 17, 18, for our LORD's own assertion of Sonship, and the natural inference of the Jews); "The only-begotten Son" (St. John i. 18); "THE CHRIST" (v. 20); "JESUS of Nazareth" (ver. 45); "JESUS" (St. Matt. i. 21, 25); "THE LORD JESUS CHRIST" (1 Cor. viii. 6); "THE LORD" (Heb. ii. 3); "Emmanuel, . . . God with us" (St. Matt. i. 23, and Isa. vii. 14); "Author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey Him" (Heb. v. 9); "The Author and Finisher of our faith" (Heb. xii. 2); "Wonderful, Counselor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace" (Isa. ix. 6); "Our LORD JESUS, that great Shepherd of the sheep" (Heb. xiii. 20); "The chief Shepherd" (1 Pet. v. 4); "The Shepherd and Bishop of your souls" (1 Pet. ii. 25); "CHRIST in you, the hope of glory" (Col. i. 27); "Our LORD and SAVIOUR JESUS CHRIST" (2 Pet. iii. 18); "King of kings, and Lord of lords" (Rev. xix. 16); "A Prophet" (Acts iii. 22); "The LORD of glory" (1 Cor. ii. 8). These titles represent the SON OF GOD as a Saviour and Redeemer and Lord, and the manner in which, in Holy Writ, the same terms are used for both the HOLY FATHER and the HOLY SON teach us, to quote our LORD's own words, "That all men should honor the SON, even as they honor the FATHER. He that honoreth not the SON, honoreth not the FATHER which hath sent Him" (St. John v. 23); "Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they which testify of Me" (v. 39).

The following names are given to the HOLY SPIRIT, the Third Person of the Holy Trinity: "The Spirit of God" (Gen. i. 2, and Job iii. 3, 4). In the reference in Job the phrase is added, "the breath of the Almighty;" "the Comforter" (St. John xiv. 26); "the Eternal Spirit" (Heb. ix. 14); "Free Spirit" (Ps. li. 12); "Spirit of the LORD God" (Isa. lxi. 1, and see St. Luke iv. 18); "the Spirit of the LORD;" "the Spirit" (St. Luke iv. 1); "the Spirit of His Son" (Gal. iv. 6); "the Spirit of JESUS CHRIST" (Phil. i. 19); "Spirit of CHRIST" (Rom. viii. 9, and 1 Pet. i. 11); "Spirit of Judgment" and "Spirit of burning" (Isa. iv. 4); "Good Spirit" (Neh. ix. 20; see Ps. cxliii. 10); "the Spirit of our God" (1 Cor. vi. 11); "Spirit of the living God" (2 Cor. iii. 3); "the HOLY GHOST" (Acts ix. 31); "God" (Acts v. 4; cf. v. 3); "HOLY SPIRIT" (Ps. li. 11, and St. Luke xi. 13); "Holy Spirit of God" (Eph. iv. 30); "Holy Spirit of promise" (Eph. i. 13); "the LORD" (2 Cor. iii. 17; compare Nicene Creed); "the Power of the Highest" (St. Luke i. 35); "Spirit of adoption" (Rom. viii. 15); "the Spirit of Truth" (St. John xv. 26); "the Spirit of Him that raised up JESUS from the dead" (Rom. viii. 11); "the Spirit of His Son" (Gal. iv. 6); "the Spirit of life" (Rom. viii. 2); "the Spirit of your Father" (St. Matt. x. 20); "the Spirit of Grace" (Heb. x. 29); "the Spirit of Prophecy" (Rev. xix. 10); "the Spirit of Wisdom and Understanding, the Spirit of Counsel and Might, the Spirit of Knowledge and of the Fear of the LORD" (Isa. xi. 2); "the Spirit of Holiness" (Rom. i. 4); "the Spirit of Wisdom and Revelation" (Eph. i. 17); "the Spirit of Glory" (1 Pet. iv. 14); "the Seven Spirits of God" (Rev. iii. 1); "Voice of the LORD" (Ps. cvi. 25). The epithet "Holy" indicates the sanctifying power of the Spirit of God: "Sanctified by the HOLY GHOST" (Rom. xv. 16). His guiding and leading work is shown in our LORD's words, "He will guide you into all truth" (St. John xv. 13); "the finger of God" (St. Luke xi. 20). In addition to the titles given to the HOLY SPIRIT in Scripture, several emblems are made use of to explain its work.

Water is abundant and free. It cleanses, purifies, and refreshes, hence the prophet says, taught by the Spirit how to speak of Himself, "I will pour water upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground; I will pour my Spirit upon thy seed" (Isa. xlv. 3). Water was naturally used in Holy Baptism, and the SAVIOUR declares that "except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God" (St. John iii. 5). Spiritual life is "living water" (St. John iv. 10). It is not stagnant, but constantly flowing. Fire enlightens and purifies. The disciples of CHRIST were to be baptized "with the HOLY GHOST, and with fire" (St. Matt. iii. 11). On the Day of Pentecost "there appeared unto them cloven tongues like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them. And they were all filled with the HOLY GHOST" (Acts ii. 3, 4). The Wind is powerful and reviving. The word Spirit means breath or wind, and our LORD says of its unseen work, "So is every one that is born of the Spirit" (St. John iii. 8). Oil heals, and is used for consecrating. The Wise Virgins in the parable were furnished with oil, or spiritual life (St. Matt. xxv. 4). The rain and the dew are gentle and vivifying. Hosea says of God, "He shall come unto us as the rain" (ch. v. 3), and, "I will be as the dew unto Israel" (ch. xiv. 5). The dove is an emblem of meekness and innocence. After the baptism of JESUS we read of "the Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon Him" (St. Matt. iii. 16). A voice teaches, "If any man hear My voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with Me" (Rev. iii. 20). A seal impresses and secures: "Ye were sealed with that HOLY SPIRIT of promise" (Eph. i. 13).

The idea of the Holy Trinity embedded in the Scriptures is well compared to that of a cross in the ground plan of a Cathedral. The whole structure shows the design. And if, too, to him (St. John) this great belief was more than belief, this "light" was also "life"; if he could feel it blessed to acknowledge a Father who is our Father, a Son in whom we also "are called the sons of God," a Holy Spirit who "dwelleth with us and shall be in us;" may we also find in the TRINITY the ground of practical devotion, pure and deep, till, quickened by the power of this faith, the Three that bear record in Heaven shall bear their witness in our hearts; and the Trinity shall have become, not the cold conclusion of the intellect, but the priceless treasure of the affections, the blessed foundation, and the perpetual strength of the new and spiritual life! The mystery of faith is an invaluable treasure, but the vessel that contains it must be clean and undefiled; it must be held in a pure conscience; as the manna, that glorious symbol of the word of faith preached to us by the Gospel, was confined to the tabernacle, and preserved in a vessel of gold.

Titus. One of the nearest and dearest of the companions St. Paul took with him. Silas, Timotheus, Titus, Luke, seem to have been his loving associates. "I had no rest in my spirit," wrote St. Paul to the Corinthians, "because I found not Titus, my brother." He is only noticed in the Epistles, but these notices and the missions he is sent upon all imply a man of forcible and upright character, thoroughly to be trusted, and zealous in anything he undertook. St. Paul tells the Galatians that Titus was a Gentile. He sends him to Corinth twice upon a mission which was connected with the discipline of the Church. He left him in Crete to establish the Church there, and the charge he gave him implied that Titus was a man of firmness and nerve. St. Andrew, Archbishop of Crete, describes him as the first founder of the Church in Crete, "the pillar of the Truth, the main stay of the Faith, the unwearied trumpeter of the Evangelical Promises, the lofty utterer as a tongue for St. Paul." The Apostle recalled him from Crete, apparently after his first imprisonment, and was probably with him till the second, when he was sent on a mission to Dalmatia. Here all our really authentic information ends.

Titus, Epistle to. The Apostle writes after his first imprisonment this second of the three Pastoral Epistles to Titus, his own son after the common Faith. The Apostle knowing the difficulties of his position and the character of the Cretans, gives him short, clear, and authoritative counsels for action. The directions are all explicit, and show that Titus was a man of more than ordinary vigor and capable of dealing sharply and promptly, as he probably had proven in his mission to the Corinthians. He is bidden to set the Church in order; to ordain Elders; to rebuke the careless, that they may be sound in the Faith; to see that the men and women conduct themselves soberly and discreetly in all things; to direct the slaves to honest, faithful service; to put them in mind of the rightful authority of the powers that be; to reject heretics. It is evident that age and toil had not lessened the Apostle's sense of authority and responsibility, and that he bade his fellow-workers exercise their commission to the full. There is one argument in favor of the continuance and increase of the Apostolic office drawn from this Epistle of the Apostle. It is impossible to suppose that St. Paul had planted a Church without giving to it Elders. If the Elders (Presbyters) were competent to perpetuate their office, why leave Titus, then, with special instructions about them? If he was an Apostle also, as St. Paul's words elsewhere imply (2 Cor. viii. 23), then all is clear and plain. And, too, Titus is in exactly the same position that Timothy held in Ephesus. Now Timothy is numbered by St. Paul in his first Epistle to the Thessalonians with himself as an Apostle (1 Thess. i. 1): "Paul, and Silvanus, and Timotheus, . . . when we might have been burdensome as the Apostles of CHRIST" (ch. ii. 6). If Silas and Timothy, then Titus too. In fact, St. Paul's company must have consisted of men with Apostolic Commission above the rank of the Presbyters fitted to take the missions upon which St. Paul sent them. He was too skilled an organizer and too delicately appreciative of others' feelings and rights to have made so signal a blunder as would be implied by any other course.

Tobit, Book of. This story of a faithful captive Jew contains many points which are interesting and instructive. It was highly esteemed among the Jews. Tobit's prayer of rejoicing (chap. xiii.) is a hearty rendering of praise to God. The doctrine of good and evil spirits is plainly taught by the introduction of the evil Asmodeus, and of "Raphael, one of the seven holy angels, which present the prayers of the saints, and which go in and out before the glory of the Holy One." The miracles are not in keeping with those narrated in historical Scripture. The book may have had a historical basis, but extraordinary details have found place in it. The point is in the good moral lessons, while the incidents are pictures to enliven the story and impress the teaching. It is thought by Ewald that the work may have been written in the East, "towards the close of the Persian period." The way in which Media is spoken of (ch. xiv. 4) would imply the strength of the Persian monarchy at that time. There is much reference to alms-giving, and the burial of the dead, and to the Jerusalem worship. Luther said of this book that it was "a truly beautiful, wholesome, and profitable fiction, the work of a gifted poet. . . . A book useful for Christian reading." Tobit is quoted in the Second Book of Homilies (of Alms-deeds). Three verses are found among the sentences at the offertory, beginning, "Give alms of thy goods," etc. (iv. 7-9). For the reference to the sins of our forefathers in the Litany, see Tobit iii. 3. The book is valuable as a beautiful picture of Jewish domestic life. Its works seem to spring from living faith. The alms-giving is loving service (i. 16, 17; ii. 1-7; iv. 7-11, 16). The injunction in the last reference is noteworthy, "let not thine eye be envious when thou givest alms." The tenderness of domestic life displays itself in this book in the weeping of Anna when her son had started on his journey (v. 17) and the father's pious consolation, which pointed to angelic aid, and dried her tears (vs. 20-22). The affection of Raguel and his family (vii. 4-8) is a pleasant touch of Eastern life. Tobit counts the days, impatiently awaiting the return of his son, while the mother neglects her food, and goes out into the way to watch for her child's coming (x. 1-7). The various family relations are painted in simple patriarchal style, as in the happy return of Tobias (ch. xi.). Prayer is highly esteemed (iv. 19). The angel Raphael is represented as a healer by the appointment of God (iii. 17), and the one who brought remembrance of faithful prayers "before the Holy One" (xii. 12). The particular incidents and descriptions of this book may show a historical basis. Horne conjectures that it was begun by Tobit, continued by his son Tobias, and finished by some other member of the family. We have lessons of charity and patience in Tobit's ready aid to his distressed brethren, and his pious submission, like that of Job, to captivity, poverty, and blindness. St. Jerome translated this book into Latin in a rapid manner, by the aid of a learned Jew. The closing up of the book is very striking. Tobit ends his praises of God, and declares his faith in the prophecy of God by Jonah concerning Nineveh. He looks forward to the destruction of idolatry, and the turning of the nations to sacred Jerusalem, and so in faith he dies, an hundred and fifty-eight years old, and receives honorable burial; his wife follows him shortly to the same tomb. The son Tobias grows old with honor, and dies "an hundred and seven and twenty years old."

REV. S. F. HOTCHKIN.

Toleration. To bear with those who hold what is not approved of as true is an act in which we imitate the forbearance of our LORD. To tolerate what is wrong or leads to wrong, when we have the responsibility of seeing that it may be amended, or of protesting against it, is contrary to honesty. To tolerate our neighbor's sins without trying to urge him to amendment is a wrong to society. But to force him to do as we think right is to interfere with him and to usurp an illegal authority. The duty and the limits of true toleration are not properly understood. In this country, where equal freedom is given to all "to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience," there is no need to use the word with regard to those who form religious bodies separate from our own, and their rights we are bound to respect. But within the limits of the Church there can be no such thing as toleration. The widest liberty is allowed in accord with the truth. The VI. Article lays down this principle: "Holy Scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation: so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not required of any man, that it should be believed as an Article of the Faith, or be thought requisite or necessary to salvation." There can be no larger liberty possible; no conditions are laid down other than those in Holy Scriptures. But it would be evidently subversive of the very existence of the Church to yield more, and to tolerate any infringement upon these. It would be fatal to permit any doctrine of men to be substituted and enforced. It is but a just defense of the truth which we must ever enforce. It was on this principle that St. Paul resisted the intolerant conduct of those who would fetter the true Faith with their notions (Gal. ii. 4, 5). It was the disciplinary power of the Church which purged it from heretics and false teachers. Toleration in this sense must be necessarily impossible if the principles set forth in the last message of our Lord to the Church (Rev. ii., iii.) are true. There is a forbearance and an exhortation and an admonition which must be used (Tit. iii. 10). There must be an allowance for defects in education and in capacity to understand, but this is another thing. Beyond the point of kindness to the individual, there should be care for the safety of others in the Church, who might be misled. It lies with the Bishops as the responsible Angels of the Church to judge what is the true limit of a toleration, and where kindness and forbearance cease to be rightly and charitably exercised.

Tonsure. It was a practice in the Church from early times to cut the hair of those entering into holy orders; but tonsure or shaving of a portion of the hair of the crown (as in the Western Church), or totally (as in the Eastern), was of comparatively late date. The earliest authentic order upon it is said to be a Canon of the fourth Council of Toledo (633 A.D.). From that time, however, directions about it are more and more common. In the English Church, Tonsure was dropped at the Reformation.

Tradition. The word tradition (a thing or fact or belief handed down, whether by written memoranda or orally) has lost so much of its better meaning that it is difficult to make that just and right use of the word which is demanded by facts. Our Lord condemned the traditions of the Jews, which made the commandments of God of none effect. This is probably, in part, the reason why the word has gained with us an evil sense. The other reason is that so many false traditions had grown up in the Church during the Middle Ages that when the English Church purged these away, the word was used to brand them as unworthy of credit; and despite the protest of the XXXIV. Article the popular use of the word has overborne its legitimate use. The Jews, we know, had an Oral Law which, while it merited our Lord's condemnation in many things, yet contained the true explanation of the prophecies concerning Him, and kept ever clearly before them the doctrine of the resurrection. St. Paul speaks of the traditions which he had given the Thessalonians, and condemns others' teachings. Now while it may be said that these were not traditions as we now use the word, yet the teaching by "word of mouth" was the foundation of tradition. But there were necessarily traditional usages, unwritten customs which could and did vary in different places; and for the years of persecution and trial in the Primitive Church much had to be intrusted to tradition. There then grew up cases and interpretations of practices right in themselves which formed that body of unwritten common law which is called tradition. To this day we must use tradition. No series of rubrics in the Prayer-Book are so closely joined or contain such minute directions but something is left to inherited custom. Such were the directions of St. Paul when protesting against innovation. He practically appealed to the principle of tradition when he wrote, "we have no such custom, neither the Churches of God" (1 Cor. xi. 16). Using the word, then, in its true sense as the handing down correctly of a custom, a usage, or of some unwritten law of the Church, we find the English Church and our own setting forth the just use of tradition in its rites and ceremonies thus: "It is not necessary that Traditions and Ceremonies be in all places one, or utterly like, for at all times they have been divers, and may be changed according to the diversity of countries' times and men's manners, so that nothing be ordained against God's word. Whosoever through his private judgment willingly and purposely doth openly break the traditions and ceremonies of the Church which be not repugnant to the Word of God, and be ordained and approved by common authority, ought to be rebuked openly (that others may fear to do the like), as he that offendeth against the common Order of the Church and hurteth the Authority of the Magistrate, and woundeth the consciences of the weak Brethren. Every particular or national Church hath authority to ordain, change, and abolish Ceremonies or Rites of the Church ordained only by man's authority, so that all things be done to edifying." (Art. XXXIV.)

The Consenting witness of the early ages of Christianity is not to be despised. Indeed, much more depends upon it than many have thought. Tradition, in its best sense, and treating of subjects of the highest importance, has preserved for us the proofs of the Apostolic Succession, the genuineness and the Canonical Authority of Holy Scripture, the Apostles' Creed, the observance of the Lord's Day, the continuity of the Church, the rites of Baptism, the early proof of the use of Infant Baptism. Subjects of less essential importance, but of great value, are the Liturgical observances, the divisions of the Christian year, the arrangement of the great Feasts, the healthy growth of Ritual. The Rubrics of our own Prayer-Book, which were arranged at its compilation, in 1549 A.D., presuppose a tradition and custom which have been but imperfectly transmitted in continuous use from several causes. (Vide RUBRICS.) It is one of the efforts made by many to endeavor to recover and to restore these traditions, so far as practicable. But the Article most wisely states that each Church "has authority to ordain, change, or abolish Ceremonies or Rites of the Church ordained only by man's authority, so that all things be done to edifying." It would be a sad loss and a breakage of the finer lines of that cord of continuous discipline and usage and Ritual which holds us to the past and may be in essentials traced to Isapostolic usage and tradition. Still, for overruling cause, for the sake of winning souls, for the preaching of the Gospel, all of these lesser bonds might and should be broken. Let that day never come.

Transfiguration. Feast of Transfiguration (August 6). This feast was one of somewhat late institution. It was introduced into the Greek ritual about 700 A.D., for St. John Damascenus, and Cosmas wrote hymns for the Office. In the West it is claimed that it was observed as early as the time of Leo I., 450 A.D. But Potho of Prum, 1152 A.D., condemned it as a novelty. It was ordered to be universally observed in the West by Calixtus II., 1457 A.D., upon occasion of the defeat of the Turks before Belgrade. The date of its observance is, throughout the Orthodox Greek Churches and the West, August 6. It was dropped from the list of the greater feasts in the English Church. The last General Convention, October, 1883 A.D., has restored it, and appointed a Collect, Epistle, and Gospel for it.

It commemorates an act of our LORD which has a deep significance in relation to our spiritual life. He, before His last journey to Jerusalem, took the three chief Apostles with Him into a high mountain, and then as He prayed He was transfigured before them. His raiment became as white as snow, His face shone as the Sun, and Moses and Elias appeared and talked with Him of the decease He should accomplish at Jerusalem. There are several important points to be noted. It was in His human nature that this took place, and after His discipline, which preceded the last of the series of the acts of the Redemption. The glory that shone through that humiliation was now a part of His sinless nature, and it was the consequence of His fasting prayers and doing so perfectly the will of His FATHER. This glory, the Shekinah which was His in His eternal nature, was already manifested in His miracles, in His wondrous powers over nature. It was this by which He awed His opponents. "Never man spake as this man."

Yet the transfiguration was a step more. His humanity was now interfused and perfected in the glory. Henceforth we note a change in our LORD. Acting, teaching, leading with authority always, now He goes forward steadfastly towards Jerusalem. He sends messengers before His face to prepare His way. He, as it were, rules and overrules the acts of others that He should now accomplish His decease, and after that be received up again. The grace and the strength of the Transfiguration were needed (let us say it reverently) for the Cross, as the Baptism and the Dove must precede the temptation. For us, then, St. Paul's language, "be not conformed to this world: but be ye transformed by the removing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God," is divinely given us to receive its interpretation from the Transfiguration of our dear LORD.

Translation of a Bishop from one See to another of higher importance and value. It was early practiced in the Church, and gave a good deal of trouble. There were frequent efforts made by ambitious holders of small Sees to obtain promotion, which in many instances were successful, contrary to the regulations. But the later Councils, while forbidding it as a practice, still allowed it under only certain extreme cases; and the irregularity of the act was once made the pretext for removing Gregory Nazianzen from the Patriarchate of Constantinople. In the English Church, translations are quite frequent. In our own Church there have been several instances of translation from Missionary Jurisdictions to Dioceses.

Treasurer. A dignity to whom was committed the collection and the disbursement of the moneys of the Church or of the Monastery. Now he has the same office in the Parish or in the Diocese. It is the most important of all the offices held in the management of the Temporalities of the Church. It requires much financial tact and skill, and is that office which when properly discharged lessens the friction of the different parts of the Parochial or Diocesan organization. Our peculiar economical arrangements throw very much into the hands of the treasurer, who has with irregularly paid and, too often, scanty moneys to meet the many and varied requisitions made upon him by the needs of the Rector and of the Parish. If he should prove incompetent in skillful management the defect is instantly felt; should he be competent he is hardly known. His office represents the health of the Parish in temporals. And as health of body is assumed and carelessly used, and only valued when lost, so the functions and delicate duties of the treasurer are often only felt and rightly valued when they fail to be properly discharged.

Trent. The great Council of the Roman Church which was held at Trent, in the Tyrol. The progress of the Reformation in Germany, the appeals of the Reformers to a Free General Council, and the demands of the Emperor Charles V. for such a Council, and the promises made by previous Popes, forced Clement VII. to take steps to have a Council summoned in 1534 A.D. But he delayed, threw so many hinderances in the way, that it fell to his successor, Paul III., to convoke it, in 1546 A.D. Its history, of its prorogations and delays, of the intrigues and trickeries used, of the dissensions which threatened to dissolve it, of the political questions which influenced it, and of the political causes which reversed the conduct of the Embassadors present at it, the principles upon which its policy was based, are too intricate and involve the recital of too many concurrent secular events to permit any lengthened notice of it.

It was summoned in 1545 A.D. (December 13). It was removed to Bologna, where it was prorogued in 1547 A.D., after holding ten sessions in all. It was again convened at Trent in 1551 A.D., and held six more sessions, when, in 1552 A.D., it was again prorogued for two years, but this was extended to ten years. When its seventeenth session was held, January, 1562 A.D., nine more sessions were rapidly held, and then, after reciting and confirming the acts of its earlier convocations, it dissolved. Clement VII. prepared the steps, Paul III. summoned it, Julius III. reconvened it, Paul IV. refused to remove its prorogation, and finally Pius IV. ordered its last sessions. Its acts are divided into two series: (a) on Faith, (b) on Reformation, and on both it failed to meet the demands made upon it. Many things were ignored and others produced much dissension. The strongest arguments against the Papacy were urged, and it required all the address and diplomacy of the Italian legates, and all the political influence they could command, to avoid decisions upon some dangerous topics. The results of the Council were not adequate to the needs of the time, and the Popes congratulated themselves when they succeeded in proroguing it, and Pius IV. was relieved when it was dissolved. It refused relief on some doctrinal questions. It made the least possible concession on reform. It crystallized popular Roman doctrine and made some decrees that are absolutely at variance with all facts. It neutralized all important concessions by the phrase "reserving the rights of the holy See." Its claims to be a General Council are worthless; neither the Eastern nor the English Bishops were represented in it. Its decrees were protested against from time to time by the French or Spanish Embassadors. It was not free, but was constantly under the control of the Pope, who prorogued it whenever it threatened to become unmanageable. Its decrees are received in France, but not in name. It failed to meet the true issues upon the questions for which it was summoned. Its whole effect was to solidify into one form the unformed floating opinions and doctrines of the Roman obedience, to bind more firmly the abuses of the Roman Curia, to enable the Pope to formulate an appendix to the Nicene Creed which made the decrees of that Council as binding upon every Bishop and Priest as the Articles of the Faith in the Creed.

A good, impartial history of the Council is yet needed, but the necessary documents are not all, even yet, collected, and the mass of papers now in reach have not been collected and put into proper order. Fra Paolo Sarpi in 1629 A.D. published a history of the Council, which exhibited its defects with great wit and sarcasm. A reply was attempted by Cardinal Pallavicini, 1660 A.D., but, except that it supplied some documents of value, it is not to be compared to Sarpi's attack. The genuine acts of the Council have only lately been published at Prague, by Father Thénier.

Authorities: Brent's translation of Sarpi's History, Mendham's Council of Trent, Pallavicini's History in Migne's Library, Paris, and numberless minor histories and defenses which are readily accessible.

Trine Baptism. The immersion of, or the pouring of water upon, the person baptized thrice,—once in the name of each Person of the HOLY TRINITY. It is an ancient custom, and of so early a date that it may be derived from Apostolic usage, as is shown in the recently discovered "Teaching of the Twelve Apostles," which is dated 120-160 A.D. The earliest mention of the details of the administration of the Sacrament gives this as the practice, and the Apostolic canons, which probably represent the rules which obtained before 325 A.D., direct that the Bishop or Priest who does not so administer baptism shall be deposed. It is something more than a devout practice, for at the least it makes it certain that the immersion or the affusion had been performed, which were it done but once and hastily might be doubted.

Trinity. It is the full all-containing revelation, the declaration of which our LORD came to complete. It was shadowed out in the Old Testament from the very first. The Names by which GOD chose to reveal Himself in His unity also included the TRINITY. (Vide ELOHIM and JEHOVAH.) The Name JEHOVAH was the name by which our LORD was addressed and received worship, and is now adored in heaven and in earth. ("Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that GOD hath made that same JESUS, whom ye have crucified, both LORD and CHRIST." Acts ii. 36.) He revealed the Unity of Nature in the One GODHEAD and the TRINITY of Persons: "I and My FATHER are One." "But when the Comforter is come whom I will send unto you from the FATHER, even the Spirit of Truth which proceedeth from the FATHER, He shall testify of Me." The Baptismal words also must imply whatever we believe of the Name of the FATHER, that also is the power of the Name of the SON, and of the Name of the HOLY GHOST. Not Three Names but one Name,—i.e., Power, Majesty, and Glory. Co-equal honor, worship, and obedience are due to the Three Persons in the Oneness of the Substance of GOD.

This doctrine of the TRINITY makes us Christians, for we must believe that CHRIST is the very and only-begotten SON of GOD, according to the summary of the Revelation in the Nicene Creed, or CHRIST has not the claim He makes and we yield for our worship and obedience. It is the foundation of our Confession. It is woven into our worship. It is in the front of all doctrinal statements. Passing by the Nicene Creed referred to, the first four obsecrations of the Litany express it: "O GOD the FATHER of heaven; have mercy upon us miserable sinners. O GOD the SON, Redeemer of the world; have mercy upon us miserable sinners. O GOD the HOLY GHOST, proceeding from the FATHER and the SON; have mercy upon us miserable sinners. O holy, blessed, and glorious Trinity, Three Persons and One GOD; have mercy upon us miserable sinners."

Beside the other Liturgic offerings of prayer founded upon this Truth, as in the Invocation in the Communion office, and in the several offices of the Church and in the Collects, such as the slightest examination of the Prayer-Book will reveal, the first of the XXXIX. Articles puts forth this formal statement of the Doctrine: "There is but one living and true GOD, everlasting, without body, parts, or passions; of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness; the Maker and Preserver of all things, both visible and invisible. And in unity of this GODHEAD there be Three PERSONS, of one substance, power, and eternity; the FATHER, the SON, and the HOLY GHOST." Full expositions of this Article are so readily accessible that a full discussion here is unadvisable. But it may be well to note that the Fathers, before 325 A.D.; having to combat varied local and temporary heresies, used often in defense phrases which, in view of subtler attacks (which they could not anticipate), appear now incautious; but throughout there is a wonderful consensus of teaching, remarkable, when the difficulties of interchange of thought and of agreement upon lines of defense between the leaders in any sudden emergency are considered. It only proves how full and complete the original deposit of the doctrine was, and how universally it was received. We owe the term TRINITY to the genius of Tertullian (who, however, did not use it in his controversy with Praxeas), when he gives this statement: "The union of the FATHER in the SON, and of the SON in the PARACLETE, implies Three conjoined, which Three are one Thing, not one Person." The most famous defender of the Doctrine of the TRINITY was St. Gregory Nazianzen, whose Five Theological Orations have placed him foremost, and to which we must go for subtle and thorough statements of this fundamental Article of the Faith.

"If the Christian faith concerning the TRINITY consist in admitting three Persons really distinct in a numerical unity of essence, it follows that these Persons must be co-eternal, co-equal, and consubstantial with each other; that the One must proceed from the other, the SON from the FATHER by eternal generation; the HOLY SPIRIT by way of procession from the FATHER and the SON as from one principle. And being convinced that the Three Persons are mysteriously united in one nature from all eternity, the believer is able to give a consistent account of the other truths of Christianity. He can consistently, with this belief, assert that one Person of the ever-blessed Trinity took upon Him our nature and remained undivided from GOD, retaining His nature as GOD, and His distinct personality while He took the Manhood into GOD. By saying this he neither divides the substance of GOD, by saying that part of Him became incarnate instead of saying that one Person of the GODHEAD took upon Him our nature; nor confounds the Person by calling them only three different manifestations of the same Person. By believing a Trinity of Persons he is relieved from the necessity of the blasphemy of the deceptibility of GOD, and, by believing in a Unity of nature, from the folly of dividing the essence of the Infinite. And when he asserts that one Person of the all-glorious Trinity took upon Him our nature, he does not thereby assert His unchangeable, divine nature to be subject to our passions or diminish aught from His eternal perfections, but that through His divine nature made flesh to be divine, seeing He did not destroy His body, but took it up to heaven, where it now ministers to the Christian's good in divers ways. To believe Him to have taken into GOD our nature is easier than to believe that He is the soul of the world; and to believe that there are distinct Persons in the GODHEAD than that He separated all creatures from His own essence; to believe that He has now a human body in heaven to which He will liken the bodies of the saints at last, according to His mighty working, is an easier task than that our bodies and all matter in the universe are an unreality." (Bishop Forbes's Nicene Creed, pp. 77, 78.)

Trinity-Sunday. The Sunday following Whit-Sunday, and by which the Church completes the declaration of all the Doctrines of the holy Faith upon fixed days. It is one of the most valued of our Festival Sundays. It gathers up into one service an outline of all the revelations upon the Nature of GOD and our relation to Him as set forth in the Holy Scriptures, and closes the series of Articles of the Christian Faith. Its observance by name is peculiar to the English Church. Trinity-Sunday has the Epistle and Gospel which were assigned to the Sunday of the Octave of Pentecost in the Comes of St. Jerome, and its Collect is the one assigned in the Sacramentary of St. Gregory (596 A.D.). The retention of the name is a proof of the independence of the British Church, since its offices, though lost now, influenced markedly the Earlier Saxon, which in turn moulded the Norman English Offices, so that the English Liturgic rule has ever retained its own distinctive marks. Our Feast of the HOLY TRINITY is, then, a most valuable one in many ways. Doctrinally, as training the members of the Church in all truth. Liturgically, as completing the cycle of worship and commemoration assigned to the Sundays of the year. Historically, (a) as teaching us (in the world's history) our relation to God in its lesson (Gen. i.), and (b) in its observance in the Church the true apostolic primitive independence of our Mother-Church of England.

Trisagion. A form of the Ter Sanctus which has obtained in the East and is used there: "Holy God, Holy and Mighty, Holy and Immortal, have mercy upon us." It is assigned to the time of St. Proclus of Constantinople (434 A.D.), but Freeman traces its elements to the Eighteen Prayers of the Synagogue, which were in use before our Lord's day, and in which He joined in the Synagogue worship. It passed into Greek Liturgic use, and is of doctrinal importance. When Peter the Fuller (485 A.D.), Patriarch of Antioch, added "who wast crucified for us," the words, as either transferring its application from the Holy Trinity to our Lord alone, or as savoring of heresy, created great disturbances. Its use in the Latin Church of the West is limited only to Good-Friday, and it was dropped by the English Church.

Tropology. That use of a text which gives it a moral significance apart from, or rather folded within, the external and temporary meaning of the text.

Truth. We all, by the constitution of our nature, demand the truth. No question is harder to answer than Pilate's, "What is truth?" when we turn to the human side; none more readily answered when we accept our Lord's declaration, "I am the Truth." Truth is largely relative, and only in the case of facts, and of these as facts, can absolute truth be obtained. There is nothing harder to get at than the "Truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." The reason for this is plain when we pass behind the mere surface. The taint of sin destroys the perfect harmony of our intercourse with each other, and we, from selfishness and sin, act towards each other in half-truths. It has so fatally destroyed the intercourse with God, the source of all truth, that He alone can restore it, and only as we are willing can we receive His truth, from which all subordinate truths receive their true relation. Truth, then, as a thing to be acquired, possessed, is the desire of every heart, but it is so dislocated and distorted that we cannot get it as fully as we would, nor do we accept it as fully as we profess it. Again, the Truth of God, as a possession, is not of our creation. We do not make it, but we must make it our own by accepting it. In the dealings of man with man, whether with a superior, equal, or inferior, truthfulness is our professed principle of action, but it is only half acted upon, and we live with each other more or less on terms of semi-concealment and of implied generally unconscious falsehood. This is the case in business relations, and it decidedly affects our social relations. If, then, we are so trained by daily habits, how shall we be able to accept God's truth fairly and with a pure heart?

Again, in receiving truth, we take it upon evidence. But in most cases the evidence is received and examined by the few, and is reported upon, and the mass accept and act upon this report. Leading masterful intellects, then, whether competent or not to weigh evidence, fashion much of the truth which is generally received. Again, from the nature of some kinds, and these the most important truths, the evidence in their behalf must be most imperfect. In religious truths we are as children learning the alphabet, and have not the ability to comprehend the tithe of the actual evidence direct and circumstantial which is placed within our reach. Glimpses of it and of the extent to which God has actually given it are vouchsafed us, but the spiritual mind alone can enter into its meaning. With these facts before us, we can see why men so often reject some truths which are most vital, and substitute for them fair-seeing provisions, and why, with the plain, full statements of the Gospel before them, many men reject the Truth, more half accept it, and reject what they do not care to examine, and but few accept the whole truth. It is therefore true that because they will not choose to hear it the whole Truth is a sealed book to multitudes. For all men have not the Faith,—i.e., that belief in God which enables them to willingly accept it and follow it to its true consequences. And many shrink from their own convictions of what the truth really is. Let us leave mere secular truth out of the discussion and only treat of Divine truth, and so apply the principles laid down. Holding, then, as we must, that nothing can endure for a day that has not some truth in it, and that the more of truth a person or a body of men can accept the longer they can endure, but that the falsehood (as does a disease in the body) will finally prove fatal if there be not enough of truth held to overcome it, and lastly, that the full truth is held only in the Holy Church Catholic, we can readily see the relations which men hold to the truth. Truth requires sacrifice of all prejudgments, of all preconceptions, of all wishes. Truth, as it is revealed in the Son of God, requires an obedience and an acceptance of the appointed Teachers. These are:

I. The HOLY GHOST, who shall lead the willing mind into all truth. II. The Apostolic teachers, whom alone our Lord sent to teach the world, and by believing their word shall we share in our LORD's earnest Prayer: "Sanctify them through THE truth: THE word is truth. As Thou hast sent me into the world, even so have I also sent them into the world. And for their sakes I sanctify myself, that they also may be sanctified through the truth. Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on Me through thy word; that they all may be one; as Thou, FATHER, art in Me, and I in Thee, that they may be one in us: that the world may believe that Thou hast sent Me" (St. John xvii. 17-21). This, then, is the crown of our acceptance of the Truth, to receive it in and by the Apostolic office which our LORD has blest, which alone is commissioned to deliver the Truth to the whole world. But as the Truth is more or less completely received by those within the Apostolic Unity, so it produces more or less fully those fruits which it should. What wonder, then, that it should not exhibit all its true power equally upon all men? But again, the full Truth of the Gospel, owing to the defects in men's capacity to grasp the interrelation of Truths and their proper subordination the one to the other, cannot be held in its entirety. Taking the statements of the Apostles' Creed, it is safe to assert that though gladly received with an honest intention by the Christian, yet few do really understand their sequence and yet their separate importance. Therefore one portion of the Truth is exaggerated and taken out of its proper place, and so dislocated as it were. And it may be perfectly true that this grasp of the helm is not an exaggeration of it in its separate value, but it results in a depression of other interrelated Truths. And as the heat of a fever is the result and reaction from some unhealthy depression of the system, so some truths too greatly depressed have received a reaction as much too great in their favor, and this has resulted in heresy, or at least in schism. The balance of Truth committed to us has been disturbed, and a breaking of Unity is the consequence. Nearly every schism or heresy has come from an imperfect or heedless holding of the Truth by those who have had its keeping. And at the rate in which those who created the schism, upon a distorted idea of the value of the particular Truth they defend, have retained a measure of the other interrelated Truths, so far will they have the power to continue. It is a fact that we to whom so much has been committed have to at once rejoice in and to deplore. Assuredly St. Paul did not rejoice that CHRIST was preached, of contention by some, to add to his bonds, but he did rejoice that CHRIST was preached and prayed that they who believed might come to the fullness of the Truth. There is yet another point to which the thoughtful mind should be directed, and this is, that as the Truths of Nature are so much nearer our powers than spiritual Truths, which can be only held as such by spiritual men, it is easier for men to say that they will believe only what they can test, and then add that they conscientiously reject Christianity because they cannot test it. If they applied as searching and patient examination into the Truths of Christianity they might have some show of pleading a conscientiousness, which is but another name for a prejudgment. It is forgotten that GOD has proclaimed Himself as He that hideth Himself, and that His Truth must be humbly searched for; and, too, that our LORD rejoiced that these things which so many desire to see have been hidden from the wise and prudent and have been revealed to the lowly hearts. The Laws of Nature cannot be applied to solving the Laws of Spiritual Truth, but the common sense which bids the student in the one to study the conditions of his experiments should bid him study the true conditions of the Laws of GOD's Truth.

Tunicle, among Ecclesiastical garments, is the outer vestment worn by the Epistoler at the Holy Eucharist, also called, as worn by the Deacon or Gospeller, Dalmatic (Στοιχιόριον, in the Greek Church, of the Deacon). It is a kind of loose coat or garment, reaching below the knees, partially open at the sides; it has full but not large sleeves; in material and color it should correspond to the chasuble. The Deacon's dalmatic was usually somewhat more ornamented than the Tunicle worn by the Subdeacon or Epistoler. From Inventories made of church vestments in the sixteenth century, it appears that Dalmatics, or Tunicles, were made of rich materials, silk, satin, or velvet, and of every variety of color. That a desire has long existed and increases to adopt a greater variety of color in the ornaments and vestments of the Church, and especially in the coverings of the Altar, is plain from what has already been accomplished; the object assigned for this variety is the useful one of distinguishing, and so teaching by outward tokens, the changes of Church seasons and the occurrence of Ecclesiastical Holidays.

Type. The image or the likeness of something substantial but not present, and having to be represented for certain sufficient reasons, or to attain certain ends. The Type was not only a memorial of what was yet to be revealed, but in some one or more ways was a precise prefigurement of the actual thing or person so foreshadowed. Types may be grouped (a) as in Rite or Ceremonial, (b) as in some historical fact, (c) in the lives of some persons whose whole career or whose culminating acts were typical of what was yet to be. So, in Rite, the sacrifices prefigured the sacrifice of CHRIST centrally and collectively in the shedding of blood; severally as He is the sin-offering, or our Peace-offering. As we severally plead His atonement for ourselves, or as He offers the Atonement as the whole burnt-offering He made for the sins of the whole world. So the Paschal Lamb was a type of the Lamb of God slain from the foundation of the world. So the heave-offering was a type of His Ascension. The Tabernacle, and still more the Temple, planned by divine inspiration were the types of the perfect Heavenly Temple and the glorious worship of the redeemed and of the heavenly Hosts. In these things the history of the ritual of Israel is the record of the types of the worship before JEHOVAH. (d) In history we find the Ark the type of the Church and of baptism; the passage of the Red Sea also a type of baptism; the wandering in the wilderness a type of the discipline of the Christian life; the descending of the glory upon the Temple at its dedication the type of the gift of the HOLY GHOST making men living Temples. (e) The life of men and their actions, whether continuously in their career here, or in some single or crowning act of their life. So Abraham by his Faith and by the solitariness of his religious life was the type of CHRIST. Melchisedec was the type of our LORD's eternal Priesthood, as Aaron was the impersonation of his Priestly acts and typified His one great sacrifice. Joseph in his humiliation and exaltation was a type of our LORD. Moses, as Lawgiver, was the greatest of the prophets; as having the greatest self-denial, the greatest forbearance, he was an eminent type of our LORD. So Samson, as Nazarite, Judge, and Deliverer, foreshadowed His mighty acts of redemption. David, Elijah, Jonah, St. John the Baptist, all were in their lives, in some great striking fact, or in their careers to typify Him.

The study of these types is important, for they show Him as the Second Adam, as touching ourselves at every point wherein GOD chooses to reach, teach, and sanctify our lives by His interference. Again, these types are of the very texture of the Sacred history, they cannot be denied in the Mosaic ritual, yet they spoke of the MESSIAH; this was their prophetic use. The facts of history cannot be destroyed, but they taught of His deliverance which was yet to be. The biographies of the saints cannot be disproved, yet these men by their Faith and Works spoke more emphatically than by words of Him who was to justify us by Faith and to make us a people zealous of good works. In the attacks upon Holy Scripture so common now, prophecy may be torn out of its historic place, and with a short-lived triumph be held up as a forgery, an interpolation, a record of an eager wish that anticipated a fortunate reality. Prophecy can defend itself in the end. But the types cannot be so treated; they are historic, they take their places in the proper sequences of the world's records, they are woven into the texture of the religion of the people of God. To deny them is to brand as fable the whole history of the past, and to preclude every way of accounting for the present of either civilization or of religion. The type in Holy Scripture is of the very fullness of proof, which He has multiplied on every side, in disproof of the complaint that He desires Faith and gives insufficient grounds. In type, in Prophecy, in History, in men's lives, He has carved a record of His truths far more conspicuous to the world than if they were carved in marble and placed in every market-place, for we bear about in our lives the consequences of such records.

Unction. Anointing persons and places by pouring oil upon them is frequently mentioned in Holy Scripture. Jacob, after his wondrous vision of the heavenly ladder, poured oil on the stone which had been his pillow, and named the place Bethel (Gen. xxviii. 18, 19; cf. xxxi. 13). In setting one apart to an office, anointing was used to signify the endowment of the "gifts and graces of the HOLY SPIRIT." In Rev. iii. 18, the term refers to spiritual blindness, which is to be removed by the "ointment of CHRIST." (Compare St. John ix. 6, 11, as to the blind man's healing.) Our Blessed LORD, as Prophet, Priest, and King, and as being filled with the HOLY SPIRIT beyond measure (St. John iii. 34), was styled the Anointed or Messiah, which has the same meaning (Ps. ii. 2, and xlv. 7; Acts iv. 27). "The anointed of the LORD" (Sam. iv. 20) is the King. The olive oil poured upon the head of a person represented the gift of the HOLY GHOST. The Jews were accustomed to the practice of anointing their bodies (Deut. xxviii. 40, and Micah vi. 15). To abstain from anointing was a sign of mourning (2 Sam. xiv. 2; Dan. x. 3; St. Matt. vi. 17). Anointing signifies joy (Ps. xcii. 10; Eccl. ix. 8). Sometimes a host seems to have anointed the head of his guest with oil or ointment, in token of respect. Our LORD says to Simon, "My head with oil thou didst not anoint" (Luke vii. 46). As to unction for special offices, Elijah is commanded by GOD to anoint Jehu as king and Elisha as prophet (1 Kings xix. 16). At the institution of the Levitical priesthood, priests were all anointed, "the sons of Aaron as well as Aaron himself" (Ex. xl. 15; Num. iii. 3). Afterwards anointing seems to have been reserved especially for the high-priest (Ex. xxix. 29; Lev. xvi. 32). The idea of anointing a king is found in Jotham's parable (Judges ix. 8, 15) before the Jewish monarchy was established. The ceremony was the "principal and divinely-appointed one" in the inauguration of the Jewish kings. Samuel anoints Saul (1 Sam. ix. 16, and x. 1), Zadok anoints Solomon (1 Kings i. 34, 39). The LORD's anointed was a common appellation for a theocratic king (1 Sam. xii. 3, 5; 2 Sam. i. 14, 16). David was anointed king three times, privately by Samuel (1 Sam. xvi. 1, 13). In this case it is added, "the Spirit of the LORD came upon David from that day forward" (v. 13). He is again anointed over Judah at Hebron (2 Sam. ii. 3, 4), and lastly he is anointed king over all the nation (2 Sam. v. 3). When two kingdoms arose, the kings both of Judah and Israel seem still to have been anointed (2 Kings ix. 3; xi. 12). In addition to the anointing of king, prophet, and priest, we find that the tabernacle itself, with all its furniture, was anointed (Ex. xxx. 26-28).

With respect to anointing persons, JESUS CHRIST, as the Prophet, Priest, and King, is especially the Anointed, or the Messiah (Ps. ii. 2; Dan. ix. 25, 26). He is anointed with "The Spirit of the LORD God" (Isa. lxi. 1), and Himself refers to this prophecy in St. Luke's Gospel (ch. iv. 18). As oil made the "face to shine" (Ps. civ. 15), spiritual unction was the "oil of gladness" (Ps. xlv. 7; Heb. i. 9). JESUS of Nazareth is declared to be the Messiah, or CHRIST, or Anointed in the New Testament (St. John i. 41; Acts ix. 22; xvii. 2, 3; and xviii. 5, 28). The fact of CHRIST's anointing is narrated in the descent of the Spirit (St. John i. 32, 33; cf. Acts iv. 27; x. 38). Spiritual unction with the HOLY GHOST is conferred also upon Christians by GOD (2 Cor. i. 21), and they are described as having "an unction from the Holy One," by which they "know all things" (1 John ii. 20, 27). The word unction has a special sense thus defined by Johnson: "That fervor and tenderness of address which excites piety and devotion."

Anointing, or unction, was used in ancient times before baptism, but this is not mentioned by Justin Martyr or Tertullian. While Tertullian speaks of unction, it was that which followed baptism in confirmation, accompanied with the laying on of hands. Therefore Daille and Bingham think this custom arose after the time of Tertullian. In after-ages there was an unction before baptism called "the unction of the mystical oil," and another after baptism called "the unction of chrism." These unctions were consecrated by the Bishop. The author of the Apostolical Constitutions gives a form of consecration for the sanctifying oil used before baptism. The same author calls this "mystical oil," and that used before confirmation "mystical chrism," and gives a distinct form for the consecration of each. The first was administered before the person went into the water, the other after he came out. Cyril of Jerusalem speaks of the first unction as making men "partakers of the true olive-tree, JESUS CHRIST." "St. Ambrose compares it to the anointing of wrestlers before they enter their combat." The unction was a ceremony not essential to baptism, and, if oil was wanting, it could be omitted; but in all these ceremonies may we not see a craving after spiritual help?

Extreme Unction is the anointing the sick with oil as practiced by the Church of Rome. A foundation for this custom is claimed in St. James (v. 14, 15), but that anointing was for healing, and it is said, "the LORD shall raise him up" (v. 15), while Romanists use it as the last sacred act before death. It is an abuse of the text. When the Apostles were sent out by CHRIST they "anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them" (St. Mark vi. 13). The passage in St. James appears to refer to such miraculous acts as were vouchsafed in the beginning of the Christian Church. As extreme unction is claimed as one of the seven Sacraments, the XXV. Article denies the claim, and the English and American Churches do not deem it an ordinance, much less a Sacrament. In extreme unction the oil having been blessed is applied "to the five senses of the dying man." "It is administered when all hope of recovery is gone, and generally no food is permitted to be taken after it." Roman Catholic writers cannot trace their present custom to an earlier date than the fifth century, and even then it seems to have been a matter of question. Extreme unction is supposed by Romanists to give "the final pardon," "in the last agony," as Bishop Burnet says, and he adds, "Here is, then, an institution that, if warranted, is matter of great comfort; and if not warranted, is matter of as great presumption."

REV. S. F. HOTCHKIN.

Uniformity. Refers specially to the Act of Uniformity prefixed to the English Prayer-Book. It was intended to produce a uniform use throughout the English Church. In the time previous to the Reformation there were a variety of uses in the celebration of the Services of the Church. There had been originally the custom of each Bishop arranging the Services and the Rubrics as he chose. The jarring that this produced and the violent changes that were made were so great, that about the fifth century it was arranged that each Province should have but one use. This to a great extent unified the services, but it did not change minor customs. In England, apparently the various uses belonged not to the Provinces, but to separate Sees, and point to the continuance of the earlier Episcopal privilege. This was broken up by the introduction of the Prayer-Book of Edward VI., 1549 A.D., and subsequently, as there was yet much diversity of minor usages, Elizabeth repealed Mary Tudor's acts and restored those of Edward VI. A statute of Uniformity of Common Prayer was enacted (1 Eliz., c. 2), and again a statute for Uniformity of Public Prayer (14 Charles II.). Upon these two rest the binding observance of the Prayer-Book and the general Uniformity of Ritual. The variations which have occurred in rubrical observance and usages recently in England do not affect the actual obedience which all render to use the service, the controversies turn upon the meaning of various rubrics within the use of the Prayer-Book. Mere Uniformity is in itself a very great gain, but when at the expense of adaptability and of gaining souls to the Church it is a loss. The ordination vow, and the pledge to conform to the Doctrine and Discipline of the Church, binds every conscientious clergyman to scrupulously carry out all the service. Still, in missionary work it has often occurred that, under sanction of the Bishop, the service has often to be much modified as circumstances direct. No mere fancy or covert of this sort can be admitted when the Church services can be carried out. And no layman living in a secluded or place remote from the Church but can aid, if he heartily tries, in having the services celebrated in a proper and seemly way. They exhibit the Beauty of Holiness so well, that an explanation of them given forth with a kindly spirit would gain from almost all such congregations a co-operation which (as a result of their use) will make a deep and devout impression upon them. Uniformity is God's Law, but this uniformity must be deeper than outward conformity.

Union, Hypostatical. The complete union in one Person of the two Natures of CHRIST. Hooker has nobly translated two passages, one from Hilary upon the HOLY TRINITY (lix. § 3): "He which in Himself was appointed a Mediator to save His Church, and for performance of that mystery of mediation between God and man, is become God and man, doth now, being but one, consist of both those natures united; neither hath he through the union of both incurred the damage or loss of either, lest by being born a man we should think He hath given over to be God, or that because He continueth God therefore He cannot be called man; also, whereas the true belief which maketh a man happy proclaimeth jointly God and man, confesseth the Word and flesh together." "Cyril more plainly, 'His two natures have knit themselves the one to the other, and are in that nearness as incapable of confusion as of distraction. Their coherence hath not taken away the difference between them. Flesh is not become God, but doth continue flesh, although it be now the flesh of God.' 'Yea,' saith Leo, 'the properties are all preserved and kept safe.'" (Hooker, v. liii. § 2.) And this interposition without confusion, this union which is a glorifying of our Flesh, is so complete that our LORD may be said to have enrobed Himself with our assumed nature so that it cleaveth to His Divinity indissolubly by His resurrection; so that St. Paul did truly say (because of the co-operation of His two natures in His one work of Redemption) that the Church was purchased by the blood of God (Acts xx. 28). And then our union in Him by Baptism is so close that as by descent we are sons of the first Adam, from whom is our living souls, so from the second Adam by the new Birth we become quickened spirits. So that joined to Him, of His flesh and of His bones (Eph. v. 30), we become partakers of the divine nature. Therefore, though we cannot by the absolute nature of the conditions be joined to Him, as He, being the WORD, has joined our nature to Himself, yet by this His very Hypostatical Union of the two natures in the one person, He has placed us within the shadow of His own eternal nature. As He hath said, "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with Me in My throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with My FATHER in His Throne" (Rev. iii. 21).

Unity. Oneness. This Law of unity in complexity has been brought out very clearly by modern speculative and natural philosophy. Its results illustrate the divine Law of unity, yet complexity in the spiritual things. But there is only one side of the topic which can be dwelt upon here,—the Unity of the Church.

The Unity of the Church must follow because that the nature to be saved by CHRIST being one, and the means He uses but one, there cannot be many churches, but one Church. Then, too, the LORD accomplishing one Act of Redemption, and not several for several races, has unified all races into one. This is His purpose. It was the One Fold, One Shepherd, One Net, One House, One Vine, One Vineyard, One City, One King, One Redeemer. His prayer was: "Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on their word; that they all may be one; as Thou, FATHER, art in Me, and I in Thee, that they also may be one in us: that the world may believe that Thou hast sent Me. And the glory which Thou gavest Me have I given them; that they may be one, even as we are one: I in them, and Thou in Me, that they may be made perfect in one; and that the world may know that Thou hast sent Me, and hast loved them, as Thou hast loved Me" (St. John xvii. 20-23). Unity involves glory, perfectness, and love from the FATHER through the SON. This Unity is a real Unity, or else there is no truth in the words of our LORD. It is this Unity, by the means He has given us, which is made as real as the kinship in a family. But this unity grapples us as with hooks of steel to the unity of CHRIST.

To effect this He chose twelve Apostles, for His Church was to be of living men gathered into it by living men, not merely the assent of a faith that comes from study. It is evident that working under His One Supreme command, the Churches they established were equal in rank and in a common unity with the Head. However wide apart these might be established they were co-equal, and united to CHRIST by the same bonds. And it is also evident that time cannot weaken the fact that they are on the same foundation. So that though a Church in Spain might be unknown to a Church in Abyssinia, yet it would be in the unity of the Church, being of Apostolic foundation; and, as our LORD prayed for all those who should believe through the Apostolic preaching, the missionary expansion of each Apostolic Church would give the same unity to the daughter Churches. But they must continue in that unity. But Apostolic foundation is not all that is needed. Our LORD gave as means of union with Him also the necessity of believing in Him. That is much more than believing about Him, but so believing in Him that we put our whole trust in Him and follow His commands, and so trust in Him that whatever He may direct will be our law, and we gladly abide His time and His will, and confess His doctrine and live the life of self-denial He demands of us. And this belief, and the basis of it in the facts of His life, is given to us in the Apostles' Creed. It was not written by the Apostles, but it was the sum of their teachings, and it was everywhere received by the Churches of Apostolic foundation, and so is historically a proof of the unity of their teaching, and of the oneness of the Faith everywhere received. And it is a recital of facts and not of theories. It is a compressed statement of foundations for and of the acts themselves of our redemption. Therefore the Creed is a part of the means of unity, for we in it and by it profess the same thing.

But Apostolic foundation and Apostolic teaching are not by any means all that our LORD gave as bonds of unity with Him. He gave, as it were, instruments whereby to bind men to Himself. He gave the Sacrament of Baptism, which He ordained to be a new Birth into Him, whereby he that is baptized becomes a member of CHRIST united to Him, having put Him on, translated from the darkness of sin into the Kingdom of CHRIST, of Light, of Heaven. And then this birth implying life and this life requiring nourishment, He has given a second Sacrament, the Holy Communion, which He has ordained for the food of the soul (St. John vi. 47-58). By these two, while we receive them by the Apostles, i.e., Messengers He has sent us, and so from those who have authority, we are in direct, continually received unity with Him, and continue in that outward, visible unity, which must be from the fact of there being a visible outward formal organization.

But besides these two standing intermediate and, as it were, the link for them, stood a third ordinance, that of Confirmation. It is not a Sacrament, yet something of Sacramental in its nature. As in Baptism we put on CHRIST, so He gives His HOLY SPIRIT, whereby we receive the sanctification and renewing. It was to send us this HOLY GHOST, the anointing which is of GOD, that He ascended up on high and sends us the STRENGTHENER, CONSOLER, COMFORTER, the Sanctifier of our lives and of our hearts. It is the gift of the Spirit, whereby we become something more than we were before. Members of CHRIST by Baptism, by Confirmation we become Temples of the HOLY GHOST, and receive of Him the power to be renewed, the gift of a true, constant, repentant state, whereby we grow in grace. These are the bonds that tie us to CHRIST in our lives. But there is another part of the unity which remains to be considered. Summing up what has just been stated, that by Apostolic men, by the Apostolic creed, with Sacraments given to us by which to receive life, union, and grace in our LORD, we are brought into a Body of Men having the like organization, governed by these Commissioned Officers, and being at Unity of intercommunion. The Unity of the Church resides in the Sacraments delivered us by those having authority to do so. And this government must be Episcopal the world over, otherwise it is not in the Historical Body of CHRIST. Now we see this visible unity of intercommunion broken at the moment. It has been severed for a thousand years. This has been permitted in GOD's providence because of the transgression of this law of Apostolic equality in two directions; the first was a usurpation to itself (from a false notion of unity) by one Apostolic See of the liberties and authority which were the rights of the Bishops in common. This usurpation of rights, breaking the unity in complexity, brought on the reacting transgression of the law by a denial that the Apostolic office was a necessity for unity at all. On the one side is the Papacy, with its autocratic theories and its practice destructive of Unity by a cast-iron uniformity, and on the other extreme are the many bodies of co-religionists who claim a freedom to determine their own government, and to create for themselves the right to administer at will those bonds of unity with CHRIST for the giving of which He created and commissioned a special body. Between these two the ancient Apostolic Bodies of the East and of the English and American Churches, though formally apart, acknowledging each other in the unity of the one body, hold to the proper liberty and authority of all Bishops in the Apostolic Commission. This unity of outward visible communion is daily acknowledged more and more by all earnest Christian men of all bodies to be a necessity to the Conversion of the world, the special mission of God's Church. And till this unity be effected the work is either stopped or held in abeyance. This desire for unity which is daily growing is of God, who can heal all our dissension, in answer to our prayers for the oneness of His Holy Church. It is of His wisdom that the evils of Separation and Schism and Heresy are permitted to infest the Visible Body of our LORD. But as He has so permitted them, we can have but one duty for ourselves and one towards those without this unity. The one for ourselves is to be assured, as indeed we are, of our holding on fast to the Head, JESUS CHRIST. "For we are partakers of CHRIST if we hold the beginning of our confidence steadfast to the end." The doctrine of unity is a settled and fundamental one, closed, and on which we build. The second duty is earnest prayer.

We are in Christian love towards others, to pray more especially for CHRIST's Holy Church Universal "that it may be so guided and governed by His good Spirit that all who profess and call themselves Christians may be led into the way of truth, and hold the faith in unity of spirit, in the bond of peace, and in righteousness of life." Nor has the Church forgotten to teach us this in her prayers. It is one of the intercessions of the Litany. It is in her daily prayers; in the Institution of her Priests in their parishes; it is in the supplications for Good-Friday. As the Apostles' Creed is the Confession of a one Faith, so this unity must come upon the reception of the Nicene Creed by all Christians alike,—“I believe in one, Holy, Catholic, and Apostolic Church.”

This unity of the Church should be dear to us all, as touching the honor and glory of our LORD's visible Body, and as setting forward the work which His blessed Passion and Death and glorious Résurrection began. That it will be in vain of course is impossible, but we may not by our carelessness share that blessedness of helping to heal the divisions, dissensions, schisms, and perversions that now hinder the conversion of the world. (Vide CHURCH, CATHOLIC, APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION.)

Universal Redemption. One of the clearest of all the statements in the Holy Scriptures, repeated continually in some shape or other, is the truth that redemption is fully, freely offered to all men; that God desireth not the death of a sinner; that He willeth that all men should repent and be saved; that as in Adam all die, so in CHRIST shall all be made alive. These and such like statements pervade Holy Scripture, often in the Old Testament, but, as is natural, more frequently in the New Testament. It was, it is, the Gospel of CHRIST which was made from the first. This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that “CHRIST

JESUS came into the world to save sinners.” God “hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation,—to wit, that God was in CHRIST reconciling the world unto Himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them, and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation.” That this redemption had a retroactive force is shown by that our LORD preached to the souls in prison who had sinned before the flood. It was offered through the Sacrifices of the Law by anticipation. It was, it is offered constantly. Therefore St. John in his Vision saw the Lamb of God as it had been slain before the foundation of the world. But as it is full and free and complete, and as it had a power over the past as well as over the future, so we are plainly taught that it is offered upon condition, for (a) a man is not saved against his will, and (b) the conditions, Faith and Repentance, upon which it is offered are such only as fit the man for the reception of the salvation, since it would be absurd and impossible for a man who disbelieved to receive the salvation he would not admit existed, and it would be equally shocking for a man who did not sorrow over and forsake his sins to receive the purity of CHRIST when he would defile it deliberately and consciously by his own wickedness. Therefore Redemption, though universally offered and efficacious for all souls that ever have or will come into this world, must still, from the very nature of the case, be offered upon conditions not burdensome, but in themselves cleansing and healing,—nay, commending themselves to the common sense of men. Then the restrictions placed upon the power and efficacy of this redemption over men are because of their sinfulness or blindness. The word of God is not bound. But we bind it.

God is not willing that any should perish, but that all men should come to repentance (2 Pet. iii. 9). “God our Saviour, who will have all men to be saved and come to a knowledge of the truth.” That all men have not faith, that many refuse to repent, that some will be lost, are sad facts indeed, but they belong to the complex problems of man's sinfulness and willfulness, and not to the truth of the fact, or of its power, that CHRIST died for the whole world. The limits upon His redemption are those interferences from a sinful use of the freedom of our wills. And the study of this fact will help us to feel how fully our LORD has made this atonement, and how lovingly He has provided for its proclamation throughout the world by the machinery and agencies of His Church. It is not possible to point out all the limitations upon the universality of its acceptance, but (a) We may consider how the willfulness of men rejects it either by a direct refusal, or by substituting some other plan of their own in place of an humble reception of His terms. (b) We can see how education will lead a man to make a final rejection of this redemption. (c) How other influences (which perhaps is after all a form of education) may, too, lead a man to act upon his prejudices and not upon his knowledge of the truth. (d) Indulgence in sin and evil habit may so become part of character that they prevent the actings of faith, which would be but a mere belief such as the devils have, and repentance be but unavailing remorse. These are practical everyday facts which can be traced in the lives of those around us who reject the offers of salvation.

The ancient Church taught the full efficacy of our LORD's death. So Ignatius, "Let no one be deceived. Heavenly beings, and the glory of the angels, and the powers visible and invisible all believe in the blood of CHRIST." Justin Martyr, "Cleansing through His blood those who believe on Him." So Irenaeus, "The LORD washed us in His blood, gave His life for our life, and His flesh for our flesh." And so many other quotations might be added. So the closing sentence of the XVIII. Article, "For Holy Scripture doth set out unto us only the name of JESUS CHRIST, whereby men must be saved." In Article XXXI., "The offering of CHRIST once made is that perfect redemption, propitiation, and satisfaction for all the sins of the whole world, both original and actual; and there is none other satisfaction for sin but that alone." So, too, in the Catechism we are taught to believe in JESUS CHRIST, "who redeemed me and all mankind." And in the Communion Office this freedom and fullness of redemption is assumed. So in the Collects for Ash-Wednesday and in the General thanksgiving. In all of these places the Church not merely recognizes the fact, but founds her intercessions, her prayers, her thanksgiving upon it.

Use. The different nations had differently arranged Liturgies, following always the same great outlines, but varied to suit the temperament or the customs of the people among whom each was in Use. In the article on Uniformity was shown that the Bishops had originally the power to refashion each the Liturgy of his Diocese. But that they generally followed the precedents set them, and that after some time the Provinces had each one use throughout their several jurisdictions. But while we have many indications of this, yet we find that Liturgies can be classified into families, and that these obtained currency in quite large areas, the Ephesine in parts of Asia Minor, the Petrine in Southern Italy, Ambrosian at Milan, Mozarabic in Spain, the Liturgy of St. Mark in Egypt, of St. James in Palestine, till at length the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom is now in general use in the East, with an exceptional use of the Liturgy of St. Basil upon certain days, and that of St. James on his feast-day, in the Churches of Jerusalem and Cyprus. The Roman Missal has expelled the Ambrosian, Gallican, and Mozarabic uses. And the English Prayer-

Book has supplanted the many uses of the English Church before the Reformation, as those of Sarum, Hertford, Bangor, Lincoln, York, and Durham. Use, then, has a technical sense, meaning the liturgy in use in some particular Church. It is therefore a proper term to use for our own Book of Common Prayer, whose title runs further, thus: "and administration of the Sacraments and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church according to the USE of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America." Here we note the proper technical employment of this term USE.

Utah and Idaho, the Missionary Jurisdiction of. The present Missionary Jurisdiction of Utah and Idaho originally belonged to the Jurisdiction of the Northwest, the field assigned by the Church to the Rt. Rev. Joseph C. Talbot, D.D., in the year 1860 A.D. Bishop Talbot never performed any official duty in Utah or Idaho, though he passed through this region on his way to Nevada. In 1865 A.D. he was translated to the Diocese of Indiana, and it was in a great measure owing to his reports and representations of the wants and character of the field that, upon his resignation, the jurisdiction of the "Northwest" was divided into three: Nebraska with Dakota was assigned to the Rt. Rev. R. H. Clarkson, D.D.; Colorado with "parts adjacent," understood to include New Mexico, Wyoming, and Idaho, which then included Montana, was assigned to the Rt. Rev. G. M. Randall, D.D.; the third, Nevada with Arizona, having been declined by the Bishop-elect; a special meeting of the House of Bishops was called October 9, 1856 A.D., and the Missionary Jurisdiction of Montana with Idaho and Utah was erected, and the Rev. D. S. Tuttle elected Missionary Bishop. In 1880 A.D. this jurisdiction was divided, Montana set apart, and Bishop Tuttle became Missionary Bishop of Utah and Idaho.

The Rev. D. S. Tuttle was rector of Zion Church, Morris, N. Y., at the time of his election. He was consecrated Bishop at Trinity Chapel, New York, on the Feast of SS. Philip and James, May 1, 1867 A.D. The consecrators were Bishops Hopkins, Presiding Bishop, H. Potter, Odenheimer, Randall, Kerfoot, and Neely. The Bishop-elect was presented to the Presiding Bishop by the Bishops of New York and Pittsburg. The testimonials were read by the Rev. J. H. Hobart, D.D., and the attending Presbyters were the Rev. S. R. Johnson, D.D., and the Rev. Morgan Dix, D.D. The Bishop of Colorado preached the sermon from the words, "Make full proof of thy ministry." In his personal address to the Bishop-elect allusion was made to the fact that he was probably the youngest Bishop in the Catholic Church.

Very soon after the consecration, on May 22, Bishop Tuttle, accompanied by the Rev. E. N. Goddard and the Rev. G. D. B. Miller, started for their field of work. They had been preceded on the 5th of April by the Rev. Geo. W. Foote and the Rev. Thos. W. Haskins. This was in the days before the transcontinental railway, and the stage-journey was tedious and dangerous by reason of Indian troubles and swollen streams. The Bishop's party did not reach Salt Lake City until July 2, having been forty-one days on the journey. Rev. Messrs. Foote and Haskins had already established regular church services, and opened a day school in Independence Hall. The Rev. Mr. Miller was stationed at Boise City, Idaho, and the Rev. Mr. Goddard accompanied the Bishop on his first visitation of Montana. The Bishop and his helpers found absolutely virgin soil as far as Church work is concerned, with the exception of a short visitation of Idaho in 1864 A.D. by Bishop Scott, of Oregon. A small wooden church had been built at Boise City under the supervision of the Rev. S. Michael Fackler, who labored in that vicinity a little more than a year. The population of Idaho in 1867 A.D. was estimated at about twenty thousand, almost exclusively engaged in mining. They gave the Church and its ministers a cordial welcome. Of Utah, the estimated population was one hundred thousand, all Mormons, with the exception of a small body of merchants, tradesmen, and employes of Wells, Fargo & Co., in Salt Lake City. There were also some apostate Mormons of English descent ready to welcome the Church. From the Bishop's first annual report, August 31, 1867 A.D., it is found that the number of communicants in Utah and Idaho was thirty-three, and one hundred and twenty children had been gathered into Sunday-schools. At the end of the first decade, 1877 A.D., there are reported 7 clergymen, 4 church buildings, 400 communicants, 624 Sunday-school pupils, 756 day-school pupils, and church property valued at $124,700. The first confirmation in the jurisdiction was at Salt Lake City, July 14, 1867 A.D.; eleven persons were confirmed. The first ordination occurred September 19, 1869 A.D., at Salt Lake City. The Rev. Thos. W. Haskins was ordained priest. The next week, September 26, the Rev. Henry L. Foote was advanced to the priesthood at Boise City.

In 1870 A.D. the Rev. J. L. Gillogly began work at Ogden, Utah. The Memorial Church of the Good Shepherd was built in 1874 A.D., at a cost of above $7000, and a substantial building of stone was erected in 1878 A.D., costing $4300, for the School of the Good Shepherd. In the same year a school-house was built at Plain City, an outlying mission of Ogden. Mr. Gillogly did faithful and efficient work until his sudden death in 1881 A.D. All his enterprises had a steady growth from the first. He was succeeded by the Rev. S. Unsworth, who was brought up from a child in Utah, and received his preparatory education at St. Mark's School.

St. Mark's Cathedral, Salt Lake City, was completed in 1871 A.D. It is built of red sandstone from plans by Upjohn, and cost fifty thousand dollars. The Bishop is rector, and the Rev. R. M. Kirby became assistant minister in 1871 A.D. He resigned in 1882 A.D., and was succeeded by the Rev. N. F. Putnam. Under Mr. Kirby's supervision St. Mark's Hospital was opened April 30, 1872 A.D., with thirteen patients. It is mainly supported by the monthly dues of miners in the surrounding region, who are entitled to the benefits of the Hospital if disabled by sickness. The buildings cost $10,000, and the yearly number of patients treated is five hundred and thirty-five, at a current expense of $11,359.

Church work was begun at Logan, Utah, in 1873 A.D., by the Rev. W. H. Stoy, and St. John's School established. The population being almost wholly Mormon, the progress of the work has been slow, but the Church and school are steadily gaining ground, and exerting a beneficial influence upon the community.

In the summer of 1878 A.D. funds were placed at the disposal of the Bishop for a Memorial Church. He decided to place it in Salt Lake City; and St. Paul's Chapel was opened for service in October, 1880 A.D. It is a well-built stone structure, with a seating capacity of three hundred. The chapel is under the administration of the rector and vestry of St. Mark's Cathedral, and is served by one of the assistant ministers.

Parish Schools have been among the most important agencies of Church work in the jurisdiction. St. Mark's School, Salt Lake City, was opened July 2, 1867 A.D., with sixteen pupils, and grew so rapidly that immediate measures had to be taken for the erection of a suitable building. This was completed in 1872 A.D., at a cost of $22,000, and opened with two hundred and fifteen pupils. The number soon rose to nearly four hundred, and the school has had between four and five hundred in constant attendance up till the present. Fully four-fifths of the pupils have been of Mormon antecedents. Rowland Hall, a boarding-school for girls, was opened in 1881 A.D., and has seventeen boarders and sixty day pupils. St. Michael's School, Boise City, Idaho, was opened in 1867 A.D., and was well sustained until the community became more settled, and the character of the public schools superseded the necessity of its longer continuance. The School of the Good Shepherd, Ogden, with one hundred and twenty pupils, has steadily grown in reputation and numbers, under the management of the Rev. Chas. G. Davis. About one hundred children of Mormon parentage come under the instruction of the Church yearly in St. Paul's School, Plain City, and St. John's School, Logan.

At the first Convocation of the jurisdiction, then including Montana, there were seven clergy and eight parishes and organized mission stations on the roll. At the last Convocation, 1883 A.D., of Utah and Idaho, there were eleven clergy and seventeen parishes and organized mission stations. The seventeenth annual report of the Bishop, 1883 A.D., gives the present condition of the field: 11 clergy, 5 church buildings, 728 communicants, 930 Sunday-school pupils, 794 day-school pupils, and church property of the value of $195,150. Idaho now has a population of 38,000, and Utah 147,000.

The Bishop has made an official visitation throughout the jurisdiction every year, reaching as far as possible every town, mining settlement, and hamlet. In Idaho, it is only a question of aggregation of population whether they will have a settled clergyman and the regular ministration of the Church. Any town of a thousand people will take care of itself; but the bulk of the population is in small settlements, and scattered through the valleys on ranches or farms. These can be served only by itinerant missionaries. The parish at Boise City is self-supporting, but all the rest of Idaho is purely missionary ground, and the amount of work accomplished depends upon the men and means at the disposal of the ecclesiastical authority. The state of affairs is quite different in Utah. Outside of Salt Lake City and Ogden, little, if any, help or encouragement is given, and the field must be worked on the same principles and by the same methods as the missionary work in foreign lands. While no overt acts of hostility are manifested, the Mormon faith presents a steady, unbroken front of moral opposition to all forms and enterprises of Christian endeavor. Seldom, if ever, is there an instance of an adult Mormon coming directly from Mormonism into the Church. Most of the aggressive work, above unperceived moral influences, has been accomplished through the education of the young, though there has been considerable accession to the Church from apostate Mormons, originally brought up in the Church of England.

REV. G. D. B. MILLER.

V.

Veils. I. In England and in some parishes in this country it is customary that the women and girls who are presented for confirmation wear a light veil. II. Usually the term Veil is given to the covers of very thin light linen fabric which should be provided to protect the bread and the wine from insects before and during consecration, after the "fair white linen cloth" is removed. They should be not more than eight or nine inches square and decently wrought, but as light as possible.

Veni Creator Spiritus. A Hymn used in the Office of Ordination of Priests and Consecration of Bishops. It was attributed to St. Ambrose (380 A.D.), but it is not found anywhere earlier than the ninth century, when it was put into the Ordinal of the Consecration of a Bishop. It is a beautiful hymn addressed to the HOLY GHOST, by whose gift it is that all Apostolic offices are wielded. The translation of the Hymn in the Prayer-Book was made, it is said, by Cranmer.

Venial Sin. Sins may be divided generally into two great divisions, Mortal and Venial. Venial sin is as much a sin as a Mortal sin, but not as heinous in degree, as larceny is as much a transgression of the Law as burglary, yet the latter is a felony and the other is a misdemeanor. "There is a sin unto death. All unrighteousness is sin: and there is a sin not unto death" (1 John v. 16, 17). Both Mortal and Venial sins bring penalties, and Venial sin becomes fatal to the soul when its frets and temptations eat away the soul by piece-meal. It is despising small things to our great loss to overlook and neglect the little sins of which we all are guilty. It is a dangerous habit to excuse them. To master these by daily watchfulness is really as great a work as to resist some great temptation. It is a training of the Christian character, and produces that beauty of soul which makes it so lovely. The constant use of self-examination and of the Holy Communion is necessary, that we may be rid of them as noxious weeds that choke the good seed.

Venite. The portions of the xcv. and xevi. Psalms which are joined into a single anthem, in place of the English use of the single xcv. Psalm. It is an invitatory Psalm, and its choice for this place is peculiarly felicitous. It was used by the Jews in their Synagogue worship, in the earliest Eastern daily service, and in the Western Churches. Its use was either complete, as in the English Service, or partial, as in the Eastern, and with verses from other Psalms, as in our own use. Its responsive (musical) use dates from a very early time, and its hortatory composition makes it specially fit for its present place in public worship. In fact, its use should be, whether musically rendered or not, fully and wholly congregational.

Vergers. The name of the officer who carries a "mace before the dean or canons in a Cathedral or Collegiate Church. In some Cathedrals the dean goes before any member of the Church, whether Capitular or not, unless he leaves his place to perform any part of the service. An officer of a similar title precedes the vice-chancellor in the English universities." (Hook's Church Dict.).

Vermont, Diocese of. The organization of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Vermont was extremely defective until the year 1811 A.D., and not complete till 1832 A.D. But prior to the former date there was an Annual Convention of its Clergy and lay representatives, beginning in the year 1790 A.D.

Before the Revolution the present territory of this State was a part of the Province of New Hampshire. And Governor Wentworth, of that Province, had granted 138 townships within the present limits of Vermont, reserving in each of them a lot of land for the English "Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts," and a glebe for "the Church of England as by law established," and another share for "the first settled minister" of whatever name. These grants doubtless excited a hope in the minds of Churchmen in Massachusetts and Connecticut of ultimately bettering their religious privileges here, and induced some to settle here. But there seems to have been no concert having this end in view among the settlers as to their location, excepting perhaps in the town of Arlington. Thus in most of the townships the Church settlers were too few and poor to think of immediate organization, or of obtaining regular ministrations of the Gospel according to their faith. In a very few places the Liturgy was said by laymen, and rare occasional visits of clergymen from New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Connecticut afforded the only opportunities for receiving the Sacraments of the Church.

Before 1790 A.D. only four Church clergymen are known to have rendered any regular service here, and two of these resided without the State, and their service was limited and transient. The other two were residents, who were admitted to holy orders by Bishop Seabury in 1787 A.D. Bethuel Chittenden was the first, and deserves an ever-grateful remembrance. He was a brother of Governor Thos. Chittenden; was an early settler in Tinnmouth; had cleared his farm and done other business there; and, at forty-nine years of age, with only the preparation of a clear mind and a very common education, gave himself to the ministry, and spent the remaining twenty-two years of his life largely in visiting the little clusters of Churchmen in the State, and doing what he could to hold them together until a better day. The other was Reuben Garlick, M.D., of Alburg, who received only Deacon's Orders, and combined with his sacred ministrations the practice of medicine and school-teaching. He was respectable and very useful among the rude settlers in thus caring for their threefold nature, but naturally found himself in the background when society was able to employ men that gave themselves to the "one thing," and at length removed to Canada, and died there.

There met at the first Convention (1790 A.D.) two clergymen and eighteen laymen, representing eight so-called parishes. The organization of this Convention was hastened by a well-grounded fear lest they should lose their chartered inheritance if they did not take active measures to keep it. And the same motive urged them to take measures in advance of their ability to complete their organization by obtaining a Bishop.

At the Annual Convention in 1793 A.D., the Rev. Edward Bass, D.D., of Newburyport, Mass., was regularly chosen Bishop of Vermont. This position he finally consented to accept, on the condition that he should not be required to change his residence until the income of the lands should suffice for his support, which was probably as favorable an answer as the Convention had anticipated. But there was no further action upon it. In February of the following year a specious project was devised by men not properly Churchmen, which occasioned a hasty and imperfect call of a Special Convention. At this the engineers of the movement were well represented, and the Church proper but poorly; and then the Rev. Samuel Peters, D.D., formerly of Connecticut, then of London, England, was nominated for Bishop, and at once elected, not without opposition. Several years passed in vain efforts to secure his consecration in England, and, that failing, in the United States.

In the mean time (1794 A.D.) the General Assembly of the State sequestered the lands, both the glebes and those granted to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, and applied the avails of them to the support of common schools. On the other hand, late in 1802 A.D., there was a valuable accession to the Clergy, in the person of the Rev. Abraham Bronson, from Rhode Island, who settled in Manchester, officiating also in Arlington, in one or both of which parishes he labored with great usefulness to them and the Diocese for more than thirty years. To him perhaps more than to any other one the Church is indebted for the tenacity which finally recovered a part of her inheritance. At the time of the formation of the Eastern Diocese he was the only Church clergyman in the State. The means being so meagre, of course the Church as a whole, in this region, could not grow; the wonder is that it was not crushed under the weight of prejudice and the oppressive action of the State. From the sequestration of the lands to 1811 A.D. the Annual Conventions comprised an average of less than two clergymen and eleven laymen from less than six parishes. But there were among them men with a keen sense of right respecting both their religious obligations and the Church's claims, and who would neither abandon the one nor surrender the other.

A brighter prospect at length appeared. A proposition of the Church in Massachusetts to the Churches in the other New England States, excepting Connecticut, which had a Bishop of its own, and Maine, which was not yet developed to the desire of one, but which afterwards joined the rest, was adopted, namely, to confederate in the election and maintenance of a Bishop who should have jurisdiction over all; and in a joint Convention, in 1811 A.D., choice was happily made of the Rev. Alexander V. Griswold, D.D., of Rhode Island, for the Bishop. He was consecrated on the 24th of May in that year, and commenced his supervision in the four, afterwards five, States. These had each its own Convention, and all together a Biennial Convention in common.

The war of 1812 A.D. renewed old prejudices, and in various ways hindered for a time the good fruits of this approach to an organization according to the principles of the Church. But the Bishop was so earnest, faithful, wise, and lowly, that in a few years his coming was a time of special interest to almost the whole community. An old Congregationalist expressed the feeling: "He is the best representative of an Apostle that I have ever seen, particularly because he does not know it." The Church visibly increased from about 1816 A.D.

In 1817 A.D. a Power of Attorney was received from the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel by certain persons who had been recommended to the Society for this end, empowering them to act as its agents to take care of its claims in Vermont; it being understood that the Society should be involved in no expense and that the Church here should have the avails of what should be recovered.

After a thorough study of the case a suit was brought, which it was thought would decide all the claims. A favorable decision was rendered, but was carried up to the Supreme Court, and there finally confirmed in 1823 A.D. But litigations continued for some years, the holders of the grants usually finding something peculiar, each in his own case. At length claims which could be clearly traced were recovered. But the glebes of the Church of England have never been recovered, there being here no Church of that name and by law established to make a claim which would be legally binding; though the Protestant Episcopal Church is known to be, to all moral and religious intents, a continuation of that Church in this country.

The Bishop soon came to regard Vermont as the most fertile portion of his wide field, and as early as 1822 A.D. recommended the Diocese to have a Bishop of its own as soon as convenient. But ten more years of evident prosperity elapsed before this was accomplished. It became evident, however, that the unwieldy confederation must soon be dissolved. The Convention of Massachusetts expressed its desire to retain the Bishop. And in 1832 A.D. the Convention of the Church in Vermont, comprising 13 clergymen, and 39 laymen from 19 parishes, having before it the advice of the Bishop, and the consent of the Eastern Diocese, and of its several Diocesan parts, erected itself into a separate jurisdiction. It prepared a most loving parting address to its late Diocesan, and then proceeded to elect one for Vermont.

The Rev. John Henry Hopkins, D.D., of Boston, formerly of Pittsburg, Pa., was its choice. Being consecrated with other Bishops-elect at the close of the General Convention in 1832 A.D., he came at once to Vermont, settling in Burlington. Here he took St. Paul's Church as his parish, a Church recently gathered by the Rev. Geo. T. Chapman, and the consecration of its plain stone edifice was the first Episcopal act of the new Bishop. There were at that time in the Diocese but two other churches built of that material, one in Middlebury and one in Arlington, and they were of like plainness.

The life of Bishop Hopkins is too well known to be dwelt upon here, except as involved in that of the Diocese. While his attainments were remarkably varied, and his personal power and energy great, his natural temperament and modes of action were almost the opposite of those of Bishop Griswold. Some friction inevitably resulted, but was overcome by the earnestness and weight of the Bishop.

The great trial of his Episcopate resulted from his erecting with generous purposes for the Diocese, by his own means and credit, an Academical and Theological Institution, called the Vermont Episcopal Institute. On spacious grounds, admirably located, three noble buildings for the Episcopal residence, the Academy, and the Theological School were completed by 1838 A.D. The Academy had already for a time had a goodly number of boys, and the Theological department a few students. But the expense was too heavy for the Bishop, and he desired at this time to transfer it to the Diocese at cost. He was willing further to solicit aid in other Dioceses and in England for the object. He secured in England and Ireland about $5000, with 400 volumes for the Library, and by this help offered the property to the Diocese for $30,000.

But the Church had few members of wealth. Most of them were poor, and all unaccustomed to large offerings and rapid movements. A financial panic hastened the end. The Diocese did not respond; the Institute was lost to the Church; the Bishop's own property was gone; and a heavy residuum of debt rested upon him. Such an issue of his plans and labors disheartened even his resolute soul, but he accepted the stroke as from the LORD, and engaged himself laboriously in his parochial and Episcopal duties and in writing books. Assisted by his eldest son, a purchase was made of a romantic woodland farm on the shore of the lake and of Burlington Bay, named Rock Point, three miles from the city, where the family together built a plain house with the timber or its avails, where he resided until his death, and where his honored widow still abides.

The growth of the Church was not rapid, but generally constant. The Bishop's parish increased rapidly, and its church was enlarged and adorned under his supervision in 1852 A.D. The next year the Bishop reckoned that within the twenty years of his Episcopate the number of his Clergy and their relative proportion to the population was more than doubled, and that the old disputes of High- and Low-Churchmen had entirely ceased.

In 1854 A.D., fourteen years after the wreck of the former Institute, he proposed another, the scheme comprehending the purchase of the Rock Point farm as the site, and also the removal of his old indebtedness. The Convention approved, and an act of incorporation was obtained. For the better prosecution of the undertaking the Bishop resigned his parochial cure (Easter, 1856 A.D.), and in person solicited, collected, and expended the means, was architect and superintendent of the building, adorned the chapel largely with his own hand, and the result is the valuable Institute at Rock Point, admitted by all to have been economically and skillfully erected, and all free of debt. The Diocese contributed willingly, though not bountifully, the larger part of the cost being met by the generosity of brethren without. The chapel was consecrated in 1860 A.D.

Released from the incubus of debt, and assured of the affection of his Diocese, the Bishop's vast energy was conspicuous in this work and in all that followed. He now proposed the addition of a female department to the Institute, and collected several thousand dollars towards it, but the outburst of civil war deferred its accomplishment. The fund is considerably improved, but not yet applied to that object.

During the war, the Bishop was politically very unpopular in Vermont; but he so thoroughly restrained himself and his Diocese from the introduction of politics into the Sanctuary, that the time passed without a rupture. Three valuable churches of stone were consecrated during this period, two of them being affecting memorials of his varied activity and skill.

By the decease of the late Presiding Bishop the functions of that officer fell to Bishop Hopkins, and added much to his labors. He seems to have been in just his proper element, with work enough, and that diverse, important, and appreciated. In 1867 A.D., St. Paul's, Burlington, became vacant, and he again acted as Rector, and the Church building was again greatly enlarged and beautified under his direction, and the Parish property in other respects greatly improved. He attended the Lambeth Conference in that year, the means being readily provided. On his return in November, most of his clergy assembled to welcome him, and the warmth of their mutual affection was very conspicuous. Almost immediately he entered upon the delayed annual visitation of the Diocese. Twenty-one parishes and missions had been visited, but a service at Plattsburg, N. Y., rendered for the Bishop of that Diocese, in that inclement season with its exposures, brought on pneumonia so severe that his robust constitution could not withstand it. After a very short and painful sickness, heroically and sweetly borne, he entered into his rest January 9, 1868 A.D. A beautiful monument, devised by his eldest son, has been erected by the family and the Diocese to mark his grave at Rock Point.

A special Convention was soon called, and assembled at Burlington on the 11th of March, for the election of his successor. There were present eighteen clergymen and fifty-six laymen from twenty-five parishes. The choice was made of the Rev. William Henry Augustus Bissell, D.D., of Geneva, N. Y., but formerly of Vermont. He was consecrated on the 3d of June, at the Annual Convention, by five Bishops, in the new, beautiful, and costly Christ Church, Montpelier; that church itself having been consecrated the day before by Bishop Williams.

Without presuming to characterize the living, this may be said, after he has gone in and out among the parishes, missions, and places where the Church was before unknown for fifteen and a half years: his loving heart, and easy accessibility, and faithful preaching, and judicious management have made him welcome and useful everywhere and with every class. And the statistics of the Diocese show a more rapid growth than at any former period, notwithstanding the severe depression in business during the larger part of the time. A fine stone church in East Berkshire, the richer and more beautiful church in Bellows Falls, and several handsome churches of other materials have been consecrated by him. Beautiful stone chapels have been erected in Burlington and Rutland. The Missions of the Diocese have been greatly enlarged. The northeastern counties of the State which had no church before have now several. The Diocesan branch of the Woman's Auxiliary to the Board of Missions has been inaugurated, and is doing a great work. The wealth of richer Churchmen flows more freely in sacred channels. A partial endowment ($25,000) of the Episcopate has been secured. An Episcopal residence within the city of Burlington has been presented to the Diocese by a generous friend in New York. The permanent Missionary Fund has received a handsome endowment.

To appreciate the following statistics the increasing drain of the native population of the State by emigration must be borne in mind. During Bishop Griswold's Episcopate the annual gain in population was 1½ per cent., and that mostly American; during that of Bishop Hopkins, ¾ per cent., not more than the foreign immigration; during that of Bishop Bissell, less than ¼ per cent., — a serious loss of population that is now accessible to the Church.

This Statistical Table was prepared for a recent occasion, October 31, 1882 A.D.:

REV. A. H. BAILEY, D.D.

Vernacular. (Verna, Latin for slave. Originally indigenous, thence popular or common. Vernacular, a speech that may be understood by the poorest or most ignorant.) It is used now especially of the translations of Holy Scripture and the Liturgic worship in the language of the people. It seems very strange that there should be needed any argument in its behalf, yet it is gravely claimed that Latin should be used as the sacred language in which all services of religion must be recited. Even St. Paul assumes the absurdity of it in his expostulation: "How shall he that occupieth the room of the unlearned say Amen at thy giving of thanks (Eucharist), seeing he understandeth not what thou sayest? For thou verily giveth thanks well, but the other is not edified" (1 Cor. xiv. 16, 17). In the case of the Scriptures we have the example of the Targums, which were paraphrases from the Hebrew Scriptures into the Aramaic vernacular, and into the current Greek of the third century before CHRIST. These were in common use; and the Greek translation, with all its defects, some of which might have caused hot controversy, was used by the Evangelists and the Apostles. Nor was there any doubt about the propriety of the translation. The Peschito translation of the New Testament is the Syriac version. There was the old Italic version. Ulphilas, the Apostle to the Goths, translated portions of the New Testament into Mæso-Gothic. In fact, the evidence is overwhelming upon the use of the Vernacular. The only objection, that in cases of controversy there may be a wrong use made of an inaccurate phrase in a popular translation, is met by the constant use of the Greek translation of the Old Testament, which received the silent sanction of being quoted in the New Testament by writers who were perfectly familiar with the Hebrew Scripture, and could and did make an independent translation where it suited their purpose.

But if this be the case with the Sacred Canon of Holy Writ, how much more forcible are the arguments in favor of the use of the Services in the Vernacular. Here, too, the Primitive Church used them in the several dialects necessary. Greek, Latin, Syriac, Coptic, Georgian, Bulgarian Liturgies are preserved, and show fully that as each country was converted the Faithful used the Liturgy in their own tongue. It was in direct obedience to St. Paul's rule, as quoted above. There were causes which led for a while to the universal use of the Latin throughout the West; but these could not endure, and we have proof that the rule was broken through in the baptismal services, and probably in much else that yet has only been preserved in Latin. Surely the plain sermons of St. Boniface to his German converts could not have been of any use to them if they were delivered in the Latin in which we now have them. So, too, of other discourses. But after a while the bondage of the Latin Service in Teutonic countries became too heavy, and it was one of the first things to be removed when the Reformation began. (Vide PRIMER.) So now wherever the Papal yoke is thrown off, thereupon the Liturgy is at once given to the people in the Vernacular. It is only common sense to do this. Scripture and Early Church History are full of suggestions which commend themselves to every mind that but considers the great importance that public prayer is to the people. All these facts readily prove the need that every Church should use only the plain, common speech of the people to which it ministers. To this end the Prayer-Book has been translated into French, German, and Swedish, for our own populations, and for the English subjects it has been translated into eight different languages.

Verse. Verses are the short subdivisions of a paragraph, including one or more sentences. The word also means a stanza of a Hymn. In its first meaning it refers to a short sentence in the Bible. The Bible was first reduced to chapters, it is said, by Cardinal Hugo de Sancto Caro, about 1240 A.D. But the chapters were divided into verses for the Old Testament by Rabbi Nathan 1440 A.D., and for the New Testament by Robert Stephens 1551 A.D. A verse is also a short passage of Scripture that is sung, or an anthem is often so called.

Versicles. The short verse and its response are so called whether they be of Benediction, as, "V. The LORD be with you. R. And with Thy Spirit," or of praise, as, "V. Praise ye the LORD. R. The LORD's name be praised," or of precatory intercession, as, "V. O LORD open Thou our lips. R. And our mouth shall show forth Thy praise," or of invocation, as, "O CHRIST hear us." In all these versicles and responses the people's share is an important one, as it is an exercise of their priestly office of intercession. These versicles and responds are very old. The principle was taken from the Synagogue worship, and they were at first framed out of the Psalms, as they in fact still are. They were in use at least thirteen hundred years ago.

Versions. The translation of the Old and New Testaments into the Vernacular of the several countries into which Christianity has gone. As for modern versions, either of the whole or a part of the Holy Scriptures which are designed for mission work, the number is upwards of one hundred and fifty and is yearly increasing, as missionaries in new stations find need and acquire facility in the language.

The chief ancient Versions were: The Septuagint (g.v.). The old Latin, which may have been made for the North African Church, and a revision of which is called the Itala. The Vulgate of St. Jerome (380-400 A.D.), supplanted the Itala translation, so that only a few fragments beside the Psalter remain. The Peschito of the Syriac Church was a very early translation, probably in the second century. It became gradually obsolete, and was corrected and revised and otherwise changed as time went on. Three Arabic Versions of the Old Testament. A Coptic Version in three forms, which may date from the rise of Monasticism (250 A.D.). An Ethiopic translation, which was made at an uncertain period, probably about the sixth century.

The value of these translations of the New Testament is very great, for they not only throw light upon the meaning of obscure words, but they help to determine the true reading of disputed passages. The student of the New Testament has a task of no small magnitude before him to attempt to co-ordinate and reduce to order the value of the several translations which early Christianity had to make, into the different languages, to take into consideration the general skill of the translator, and to understand the conditions under which he labored. The work also helps to determine the value of some of the MSS. of the Greek text, which may represent in some distant land a very different reading from that in use in another country. The question is a very fascinating one. The history of our modern Versions is much more important. The history of the Authorized Version is one of growth. Translations of parts of the New Testament were early made in the Saxon. The Psalms and parts of the three Gospels, and then that of St. John, by Bede, were made before 735 A.D. King Alfred (890 A.D.) retranslated the Psalms. In the next century Aelfric of York translated parts of the Old Testament, but these efforts went no further for the time. The Norman Conquest disturbed the quiet needed for such work, and it was not till much later that any effort was made; though much Biblical knowledge was within reach (as is shown in the long Poem of Piers Plowman), and some paraphrases were made. Wyckliffe was the first to make a complete translation into English of the whole Bible, but it was taken from the Vulgate. He had two co-workers, Richard Purvey and Nicholas of Hereford; the former of whom revised the work, finishing his revision after Wyckliffe's death, 1384 A.D. Through the studies for successive translations, Wyckliffe's terse English has entered largely into our Authorized Version.

This translation exists in a good many MSS. in England, showing that it had become quite diffused. It contains many obsolete words, and were the uncouth spelling modernized it would still be remarkably near the common language yet to be found in retired places in this country, spoken as it was brought over from England. Tyndale began to translate his Version of the New Testament from the Greek (1502 A.D.) at Oxford, but apparently did not do much till 1522 A.D., when he went to London, but had to leave for the Continent because of his reforming sympathies. He began to print at Cologne, but was driven thence to Worms, where he finished the first edition and issued another, 1525 A.D. He resided probably at Wittenberg while translating parts of the Old Testament,—the books of Moses, and Jonah (1530-1531 A.D.). He was a fugitive during this and succeeding years, but was arrested in 1535 A.D., and martyred 1536 A.D. He laid the foundation for a translation, using Luther, Wyckliffe, and the Vulgate, but working from his own clear judgment. Taking into consideration his difficulties, the translation is a remarkably excellent one. Coverdale, (titular) Bishop of Chalcodon, made a translation of the Bible in 1535 A.D., using the German and the Vulgate. The next edition, for it really was such, of the English Bible (1537 A.D.) was put forth by John Rogers (afterwards the Marian martyr), who placed the name of Thomas Matthew on the title-page. It was a revision of Tyndale and Coverdale, with notes and prefatory matter, which made his edition a valuable one to English readers, especially as it was strongly anti-papal. Taverner, a Greek scholar of the same time, also issued (1539 A.D.) an edition of the Bible. His revision of the New Testament showed his knowledge of Greek, and some of his renderings were retained. But for the Old Testament he trusted to the Vulgate. These different editions were not entirely in accordance with the intention of those who were then using the efforts of Cranmer for reform for their own purposes, and the Lord Protector, Cromwell, ordered another revision, which was made by Coverdale, who went to Paris to have the work printed. He used all the latest revisions and translations at hand, and at last (forced by the Inquisition to return to England when his work was finished) he produced what was known as the Great Bible (1539 A.D.). It was from this Bible that the passages of Scripture were taken for the Prayer-Book, some of which, as the Commandments and the Comfortable Words, still remain, though the other portions were made to conform to the King James translation. These different editions had the sanction, more or less fully, of Henry VIII., under the advice of Cromwell or of Cranmer, who of course would willingly go further. The succeeding editions (1540-1541 A.D.) of the Great Bible had prefixed to them a short preface by Cranmer and his coadjutors, Tonstal and Heath. The next revision, for it became a revision now, was made by the Marian Exiles (1555-1560 A.D.) at Geneva, principally by William Whittingham, assisted by Thomas Sampson, Anthony Gilby, and others. They used Tyndale and the Great Bible, and Beza's Latin Version, with much independent work of their own. Its strong antiprelatical leaning, the attempt to introduce the Hebrew and Greek names unchanged, and sometimes a harshness of rendering are the notable points in it. It is also known as the Breeches Bible from the translation of Gen. iii. 7, "And they sewed fig-leaves together and made themselves breeches." It was published in 1560 A.D., at Geneva. It was so much better than the previous translations that Archbishop Parker determined to have the Cranmer Bible revised accordingly. He selected a company of learned men, who made a more pretentious than successful revision.

The Books were rearranged, according to subjects. The chapters to be omitted in public reading were marked. There was some additional matter—as Genealogical tables—added. There were two editions (1568-1572 A.D.). In the mean time the Romanists found it best to prepare an English version also, and after some delay (in 1582 A.D.) they issued at Rheims a translation of the New Testament, which had been prepared by Martin, Allen, and Bristowe.

The Old Testament was published at Douay in 1609 A.D. It was as strongly marked with polemics as the Genevan Version was. Its language was as uncouth and its translations of words as nearly a transference of the original words as possible. These several efforts, over so long a space, 1480-1600 A.D., had leavened the English people with a knowledge and love for their English Bibles, but something yet was wanting in all of these several translations, revisions, and re-editions. After much controversy, a feeling that these should be in some way superseded was very prominent. The Puritans at the Hampton Court Conference (1604 A.D.) wished to have a new translation undertaken. King James was caught with the idea that it would be the glory of his reign to have it effected. He took up the work and had the instructions prepared, which were given to the translators. Fifty-four men eminent for learning and ability were chosen, and the work distributed among them. Three companies were formed, under the direction of six persons,—the two Hebrew and two Greek Regius Professors at Oxford and Cambridge, and Andrews, Dean of Westminster, and Barlow, Dean of Chester. Suggestions were invited from every quarter. The work was begun in 1606 A.D., and was conducted by the separate companies till the work drew near completion. The heads of the companies then were selected for final revision and arrangements for printing, and after much labor and devout toil a task which had no moneyed considerations involved in it was brought to a close in 1611 A.D. Bilson, Bishop of Winchester, wrote the "arguments" prefixed to the several books, and Dr. Miles Smith the dedication and the Preface, which, most unfortunately, has been left out of nearly every edition of the Bible. It should be replaced to the great gain of every careful reader, who would know upon what principles the translation and revision were made. They consulted every accessible version in French, German, Spanish, Italian, Portuguese, and spared no labor to give, as nearly as the state of learning then permitted, the most thorough translation yet produced. And they succeeded. The Version had to work its way into public favor. From the first it was quietly but really accepted, displacing slowly but surely all previous Versions. It was freely criticised, and was objected to at first, but the approval of those who, like Bishop Walton, the Editor of the London Polyglott, knew its value, was much in its favor. It was the work of men who were masters of a noble English style, quite the contemporaries of Shakespeare, Raleigh, Spenser, and of Hooker. No better time could have been chosen, when the English was at a robust strength that could not exist at any other stage. The previous translations were freely used, and the broiery of phrases that can be traced to Wyckliffe, Tyndale, Coverdale, Rogers, Taverner, the Geneva, the Douay, shows how diligently they compared, corrected, and incorporated all that they found of worth. There is hardly a passage which has not a rhythmic flow which is inimitable. The errors in it of translation are notably few when the state of Hebrew and Greek learning is considered, advanced as it was then. The chronological indices and the dates on the margin were placed there by Bishop Lloyd. The marginal readings are often to be preferred to the reading of the Text.

But the Version which has grown so dear to all Englishmen was charged with having too many obsolete words, mostly mistakes in the transference of proper names, chiefly in geography, and errors in grammar and in archaic expressions. Efforts were made for some years by such able men as Archbishop Trench and Bishop Ellicot and Bishop Lightfoot to get a revision undertaken. In 1870 A.D., in the Convocation of Canterbury, the first steps were taken. Fifty-two men were selected to do the work, and were divided into two companies,—twenty-seven for the Old Testament and twenty-five for the New Testament. Two years later a company of twenty-seven was formed in America,—fourteen for the Old Testament and thirteen for the New Testament. These worked in close correspondence, and compared results constantly with the English Revisers. The New Testament companies were able to issue their Revision in May, 1881 A.D. It has revised the Greek text in some places; has left out one text of more than doubtful genuineness, the seventh verse of the fifth chapter of St. John's first Epistle; the word HE is substituted for the word "God" in 1 Timothy iii. 16. Many marginal notes exhibit the result of a comparison of many texts and MSS. The poetical quotations from the Old Testament are printed exhibiting the ancient Hebrew parallelism. The most important doctrinal gain, however, is the substitution of Hades for Hell wherever the place of departed spirits is meant, while Hell is reserved for those passages where everlasting punishment is taught. The Revision has undoubtedly done very great service both in correcting some errors and, much more, in giving a vast impulse to the study of the New Testament among ordinary English readers. But it has not the delicate cadences of the old Version, and it has rudely shocked some prepossessions, while the practical gain on the whole is less than could have been looked for from the amount of toil expended. It will probably not become popular, but will always be a most useful and necessary adjunct to any study of the English Versions. The principles which guided the Revisers are stated very forcibly in the preface to the work.

There have been several French translations, which can only be mentioned here very hastily. The first Protestant Version of the Bible in French was made in 1530 A.D., by Lefèvre d'Étaples. This formed the basis for another translation, by Pierre Robert Olivetan, a kinsman of Calvin, who corrected his work and expressed a great wish to see a new edition put forth. The French Genevan Pastors issued another revised translation under the care of Beza, 1588 A.D. It was a great improvement, but the need of correcting it was felt as Biblical science progressed, but no effort was successful till recently, when, in 1874 A.D., Dr. L. Segond, of Geneva, published a new translation, which was afterwards republished by the University Press of Oxford. In Holland, Van Leeseveldt published a complete Dutch translation in 1526 A.D. After the publication of a second edition he was arrested and beheaded for so doing. His edition was afterwards replaced by Van Utenhove's, 1556 A.D., which is still held in esteem. As in so many Versions, as above recited, there was comparatively little original work. Luther's original translation was fully used so far as it had appeared, and was supplemented from other sources. This Version opened the way for another, perhaps the most perfect that has yet been made. This last was a direct translation from the original tongues, but was affected by the leading Versions of other countries. But from the conception of this work by the Pastor, St. Aldegonde (1593 A.D.), besides much previous private preparation, on to the final publication in 1637 A.D., lay an interval of forty years. In it were many political changes and fresh theological disputes, as that between Gomar and Arminius upon Predestination and Free-will, the holding of the Synod of Dort, and the distractions of a part of the Thirty Years' War. The work was done at public expense, and hence the Bible has been called the States' Bible. A recent effort (1854-1867 A.D.) for revision has failed to commend itself to public approval.

The translations in the Italian and Spanish that have been made are all defective in some one point or other. Diodate's translation (1607 A.D.) was the leading Italian translation, and is yet circulated. But Archbishop Martini's Version (1776 A.D.) is said to be more perfect, and is published by the British and Foreign Bible Society. In Spain, the several translations made from 1543 A.D. on to 1794 A.D. have not circulated freely. The translation of Miguel, a Spanish Ecclesiastic, was made in the latter year. This is the best received, and is in circulation through the British and Foreign Bible Society. The Portuguese have two Versions, one made in Amsterdam (1712-1719 A.D.), and a second in Lisbon (1784 A.D.).

The circulation of these Versions varies very much, according to the race. Most freely in the Teutonic, less so in the Celtic, and least in the purely Latin nations.

Vestments. Some have supposed that the Christian vestments were copied from those used by the Jews, but it seems much more probable that they are adaptations of the ordinary dress of well-to-do persons during the time of the Empire. It is impossible to fix the times when the present names and shapes were definitely given to the various vestments, but from an early date we find notices, lists, and canons which refer to one and another of them, and in ancient mosaics Bishops and Priests are pictured as wearing a regular ecclesiastical dress.

Different colors were probably not assigned to different seasons until rather a late date, the first definite mention of them being about the year 1200 A.D.; in early days White was the general color of all vestments, and was taken to signify the bright light of truth and spotless purity. Red, when adopted, typified ardent love; Green, the color of thriving vegetation, typified life; and Violet, compounded of red and black, the union of love and pain in hopeful repentance.

The different Eucharistic vestments are as follows:

The Amice.—This is a broad and oblong piece of linen with two strings to fasten it, and with an ornamented or embroidered strip on the middle of the outer edge. It is the first vestment assumed in preparing for a Celebration, and is placed on the head like a hood, and fastened by passing the strings under the arms and then round the back until they meet on the chest, where they are tied. After the Alb is put on, the Amice is pushed back from the head on to the shoulders, where it has the appearance of a loose ornamental collar.

The meaning of the various vestments is well shown by the prayers appointed by an old Western Liturgy to be said while assuming them; that used at the putting on of the Amice is, "Place upon my head, O LORD, the helmet of salvation, to drive away all the assaults of the devil."

The Alb.—This is a loose and long garment of white linen coming down to the feet, and having close-fitting sleeves reaching to the hands. It is slipped over the head after the putting on of the Amice, and is fastened by the Girdle, so that it hangs an inch or two from the floor. Prayer: "Cleanse (dealba) me, O LORD, and purify my heart, that cleansed (dealbatus) in the blood of the Lamb, I may attain everlasting joys."

The Girdle.—This needs no detailed description, and its use is given in the preceding paragraph. Prayer: "Gird me, O LORD, with the girdle of purity, and extinguish in my loins the fire of concupiscence, that the grace of temperance and chastity may abide in me."

The Maniple.—This was originally a narrow strip of linen about two and a half feet long, employed to wipe the sacred vessels, or the hands of the Celebrant. Subsequently it became a mere ornament, and as such it is now hung on the left arm of the Priest, and fastened with a loop to the wrist. Prayer: "Grant me, O LORD, to bear the light burden (manipulum) of grief and sorrow, that I may with gladness receive the reward of labor."

The Stole.—This is a strip of silk about three inches wide and eight and a half feet long; it may be either plain or richly ornamented. It is hung around the neck of a Priest, and when celebrating should be crossed on the breast and passed under the girdle. The Deacon should wear it suspended over the left shoulder, crossing the back and breast and fastened on the right hip. Prayer: "Give me again, O LORD, the robe (stolam) of immortality which I lost by the sin of my first parent; and although I unworthily approach Thy Holy Mystery, yet may I attain everlasting joy."

The Chasuble.—This vestment is worn over the Alb. Originally it was nearly circular in shape, having an opening in the centre, through which the head of the wearer passed; at a later period the portions on the arms were reduced, and the general shape became more elliptical, and the extremities more pointed. The English Chasuble resembles the pre-Reformation vestment, while in the modern Roman Chasuble the sleeve portion has been entirely cut away, leaving the arms free, but showing to the eye the unpleasant "fiddle-shaped" stiff back and front, instead of the graceful folds of the older pattern. The back of the Chasuble is frequently ornamented with a Latin cross, but more usually with what is called the Y Orphrey. Prayer: "O LORD, who hast said, My yoke is easy and my burden is light, make me to have strength so to bear it that I may attain Thy grace. Amen."

The other vestments may be more briefly described. The common Surplice and the Bishop's sleeveless linen Rochet are modifications of the Alb. The Tunicle and Dalmatic are different names given to the similar robes of the Epistler and Gospeler. They should resemble the Chasuble of the Celebrant in material and color; in form they are a kind of loose frock or coat reaching below the knees, open partially at the lower part of the sides, with full though not large sleeves. The Cope is a long, full cloak of semicircular shape, reaching to the heels, and open in front. From the top downwards it has a richly-ornamented hood, and is fastened at the throat by a large clasp called the Morse. The Cope is used at litanies and choir services, and, according to the Prayer-Book of 1549 A.D. and the Canons of 1603 A.D., may be worn at Celebrations instead of the Chasuble.

By the first Prayer-Book of Edward VI. the Bishop was to wear at Celebrations beside his Rochet, an Alb or Surplice, and a Cope or Chasuble, and to have in his hand or that of his chaplain a Pastoral Staff. A brass of the date of 1631 A.D. represents a Bishop in Cope, Rochet, and Mitre, with a Pastoral Staff; and the Mitres of Laud, Trelawny, and others are still preserved in England, while that of our own Bishop Seabury can be seen in the Library of Trinity College, Hartford. In the reigns of Henry VIII. and Edward VI. the Bishops often wore their Doctor of Divinity scarlet habits with the Rochet, and in the latter part of the reign of Elizabeth black satin was substituted for the brighter color. The present dress, therefore, consists of the sleeveless Rochet and the Doctor's gown, or black satin Chimere, with lawn sleeves, which properly belong to the Rochet attached to it.

It would occupy too much space to discuss the question of the legality of the different vestments in the United States. Briefly, however, they depend, in the absence of any definite legislation by the General Convention, on the connection of the daughter with the Mother-Church, and the statement in the Preface to our Prayer-Book, that "this Church is far from intending to depart from the Church of England in any essential point of doctrine, discipline, or worship." We are therefore thrown back on the Ornaments Rubric of the English Prayer-Book, which directs "that such Ornaments of the Church and of the Ministers thereof shall be retained and be in use as were in this Church of England, by the authority of Parliament, in the second year of the reign of King Edward the Sixth." For the fuller discussion of this whole subject, the reader is referred to the Introduction and Appendices of Blunt's Annotated Book of Common Prayer.

REV. E. M. PARKER.

Vestry. The Vestry (Vestiarium, Wardrobe) was either an apartment, or a distinct building of the Church, in which the vestments, and sometimes also sacred vessels and treasures, of the Church were kept. It was also used as a place of meeting and gave its name to the assembly held therein, hence is derived our use of the words Vestry Room and Vestry.

In the Primitive Church nothing is found corresponding to the modern Vestry; circumstances then existing did not demand nor even permit such a lay adjunct. Later, when fuller organization became practicable, the sacerdotal power absorbed all ecclesiastical control, the lay element was ignored, the entire management of the Church was in the hands of the various ecclesiastical orders. The office of Church-warden may be traced to the later part of the Middle Ages, when the duty of keeping the nave in repair and of providing utensils for the Divine Service was laid upon the laity. To the vestrymen corresponded in some features the ancient Sidesmen (Synodsmen), who at synods reported under oath to the Bishop the moral condition of the Diocese. In the Church of England, parish churches generally have wardens and vestrymen whose functions are regulated by custom and by legislation; on account of the connection of the Church with the State their duties are partly civil and partly ecclesiastical, so that they furnish no precedent nor guide for us, though we inherit from that Church this feature of the parish, and find in their "Select Vestry" that which corresponds to our own.

The relations, rights, and duties of Vestrymen are not defined and determined by generally acknowledged authority, they vary with the canons of the different Dioceses, and with the charters and by-laws of different parishes; this diversity has resulted in much confusion and occasionally in conflicting claims between Bishops, Rectors, and Vestries. Recognizing this defect, and in order to remedy it, the General Convention of 1877 A.D. appointed a Joint Committee of both houses "to consider and report to the next General Convention what are the several functions of Rectors, Wardens, and Vestrymen in the control and administration of the Parishes, ascertaining the right and authority of each in the premises, according to the principles and laws of the Church." By this committee a valuable report was presented to the General Convention of 1880 A.D., and printed in the Journal. The committee again reported in 1883 A.D., when at their own request the committee was enlarged and continued; accordingly they still have the subject under consideration. In their last report they state that they "have found themselves unable as yet to agree upon any substantive measures which would be practically available in meeting the difficulties and settling the important questions involved in the subject. It is, however, one of growing importance, especially in view of the difficulty of avoiding bringing the law of the Church in conflict with the laws of the several States regulating the organization of Church corporations, and the powers and functions of their office. The proper adjustment of these relations will require patient investigation and conference." In the present state of the inquiry this article must be content to accept and to define existing conditions, to deal with general principles. Handbooks and guides have been published which cite and codify such laws as are in force in certain dioceses and parishes, to these reference may be made for details to which no room here can be given. Diocesan canons are passed and Parochial organizations formed for the express purpose of carrying on the avowed mission and legitimate work of the Church, therefore if they conflict with the general principles and laws of the Church they violate the essential principle for which they were created, they are therefore bound to consult and to conform to the will of the Church in so far as it has been expressed. To ascertain this expressed will we must refer to the utterances of the Church, given in the Book of Common Prayer, and made from time to time by legislative bodies.

The time and manner of electing Vestrymen, the number to be elected, and qualifications for the office vary in different Dioceses. Efforts have been made repeatedly to bring the General Convention to require in Vestrymen some guarantee of conformity and loyalty to the Church with the interests of which they are intrusted. In attempting to make such a general law difficulties have been encountered of embarrassing feeble parishes, and of coming into conflict with existing terms of incorporation. The House of Deputies in 1883 A.D., by resolution, "earnestly commends to the Diocesan Conventions the importance of requiring that none but communicants shall be Churchwardens, and of requiring some proper regulations as to the conformity of Vestrymen with the worship and discipline of the Church."

I. To the Bishop the Vestry is related as to the head of the Diocese, its chief ecclesiastical authority, in whom is vested primarily the spiritual care and jurisdiction over all its Rectors and parishes. Accordingly, when a parish becomes vacant it is the duty of the Vestry immediately to give notice thereof to the Bishop. It is the common practice for the Vestry through its Wardens to provide ministerial services for a parish during its vacancy, but some Dioceses provide that this be done by the Bishop, recognizing that to him reverts the spiritual management of a parish while it is without a Rector; this accords with the established polity and avowed principles of the Church. "On the election of a minister into any church or parish, the Vestry shall deliver or cause to be delivered to the Bishop, or where there is no Bishop to the Standing Committee of the Diocese, notice of the same according to the form prescribed" (Title i., Can. xiv., Sect. 1). Not unless the Bishop, or the Standing Committee, which in certain cases represents and acts for a Bishop, is satisfied that the Rector-elect is a qualified minister of the Church and in good standing, is the Rector recognized as such and placed upon the record and list of the clergy which is kept by the Secretary of the Convention. The relations here indicated are still further expressed by the "Office of Institution," which, whether used or not, utters and helps to interpret the law of the Church. In this office the action of the Vestry receives the Bishop's sanction and seal, by him the newly-elected minister is authorized to claim and enjoy all the accustomed temporalities appertaining to the cure; and in any difference between him and his congregation as to a separation, the Bishop is declared to be "the ultimate arbiter and judge."

The canons and the Office of Institution agree in recognizing that the Bishop is the source of ecclesiastical jurisdiction in his Diocese, and that by his permission and under his authority Ministers act as such within his Diocese. Evidently it is the will of the Church and for its peaceful and best administration that the Bishop should have a voice in both the appointment and the removal of Rectors within his Diocese, should counsel and influence, though not control, the Vestries in their choice of those who are to administer the parishes which are under the Bishop's supervision, and for which he ultimately is responsible. The relations of the Vestry to their Diocesan are still further indicated by the canonical requirement that the Wardens and Vestry shall give to the Bishop, at his annual visitation, such information of the state of the Congregation as he may require of them (Title i., Can. xiv., Sect. 5).

II. To the Rector the relations of a Vestry begin with his call to the parish. The practice of requiring or expecting a clergyman to preach on trial as a candidate for the position to be filled has been, and deserves to be, severely censured by representative men of the Church, both clerical and lay. It reverses the original and true relations of minister and people, degrades his office, disturbs the parish, and embarrasses the Vestry, inviting general discussion and expression of opinion, and furnishes no reliable test of his abilities and adaptation to the parish. Full inquiries should be made covering the question of his ability and faithfulness at his last post, he should be seen and heard in his parish, if practicable, his visit to the parish to be filled should follow, not precede a call; then, if on an interview with the parish electing him he should appear to be not adapted to the position, he could decline it, and on learning that this is the desire of the Vestry, he would do so, if worthy to be thought of at all for the position. The call should be made in writing, and should distinctly state the provisions made for the minister's support. The extending and accepting of the call form a legal contract unlimited in continuance, unless limitations be expressly stated. The salary offered is a legal debt recoverable by law, and cannot be either withheld or reduced, except by consent of him to whom it is due. Should the minister neglect or fail to perform his duties, it would be the duty of the Wardens and Vestry to make complaint to the Ecclesiastical Authority of the Diocese. Should serious disagreement arise between the Rector and his Vestry, and a dissolution of the pastoral connection become desirable, relief may be had according to the laws and by methods duly provided (Title i., Can. xiv., Sect. 6, and Title ii., Can. iv.). A Rector cannot resign his parish without consent of his Vestry, nor can the Rector be removed against his will except for the causes named and in the manner prescribed in the canons. The Church has carefully provided that the Rector's tenure of his position should be undisputed, undisturbed, and permanent, that the pastoral relation should not be dissolved except for "urgent reason," that the incumbent should be independent of the unstable opinion and preferences of those whom he is to exhort and rebuke, as occasion may require. For his own offenses he is amenable to his ecclesiastical Superior and to the Chief Shepherd and Bishop of souls. His authority as a Minister of CHRIST is not derived from nor dependent upon the Vestry who call him to a parish, but is conveyed to him in his ordination, as indicated in the words, "Take thou authority to execute the office of a Priest in the Church of God, now committed unto thee by the imposition of our hands." The Vestry, in calling him to a parish, recognize this authority, place the parish under his spiritual care and control, and pledge to him that of which they are legal custodians.

The use of the "Office of Institution," if not made obligatory by Diocesan Canons, is left to the option of the Vestry. It confers no new rights or powers upon either Rector or Vestry, but by its strong expressions and significant acts it declares and helps to define the mutual relations into which they have entered, and of which the call made and accepted is sufficient evidence. In conveying to the Rector the "Temporalities" and the "Keys of the Church," the Vestry do not surrender their trust as custodians of the property of the parish and as managers of its revenue. The Rector cannot of his own motion alienate, or make any alteration in any of the property which belongs to the parish, nor can he incur any expense for the Vestry nor involve them in any obligation without their consent. The temporalities to which he is entitled are that portion of the revenue which the vestry has pledged for his support. The "keys" placed in his hands indicate that to him is given the use and control of the church edifice for all purposes of worship and ordinary parochial work; he has the right to enter the church at all times, to open it when and as he may deem proper for worship, or instruction, for all rites and offices of the Church. To him belongs the control and direction of all Sunday-schools, parish schools, associations, or meetings held within the parish for its work or welfare; ex officio he holds the first place in all spiritual interests and activities of the parish, in spiritual matters he has no co-ordinate authority in the parish; in temporal affairs he is associated with his Vestry, with it he forms a part of the corporation. In theory the corporation represents three interests or estates, as indicated by the title "Rector, Wardens, and Vestry." In some Dioceses the State law requires that, in order to legally transact business, each of these three must be represented. To mention and to regard the Vestry apart from the Rector is an usage which has grown out of the power and privilege exercised by the Vestry during a vacancy of the Parish Rectorate, but the Rector is or ought to be an integral part of every parish, related to it as a Bishop is to his Diocese, sharing in the care of its temporality, present at the meetings of the Vestry, presiding in them, and taking such part in the proceedings as the laws of the Diocese and the Parish prescribe or permit, acting by virtue of his office as head of the Vestry as well as of the parish. (Hoffman, Law of the Church, pp. 255-56 and 262-66.) The understanding of this subject, and the practical observance of the principles and distinctions here indicated, would promote the order and peace of parishes; would, on the one hand, deter vestrymen from transgressing the limits of their official duties in making themselves judges of spiritual matters and in attempting to control that which the Church has intentionally placed beyond their reach; and, on the other hand, would withhold Rectors from extending their exclusive direction of spiritual things over those matters which are intrusted to the Vestry, and which should be left to its management, or at least not be taken in hand except by its approval and consent.

III. To the congregation the relations sustained by the Vestry have been implied in the statements already made. The Vestrymen are elected by the congregation to represent it in law; to have charge and care of its property; to look after its temporal interests; to collect and disburse its revenue; to elect Delegates who may represent the congregation at Diocesan Conventions; acting for the parishioners, and under the jurisdiction of the Bishop, they choose and call a minister and make provision for his support; in the absence of a Rector they are bound to see that no person ministers to the congregation without sufficient evidence that he is duly qualified to do so. If the Rector prove unworthy, unfaithful, or incompetent, they in the interests of the parishioners make complaint to the Bishop. They provide that all things needful for worship and for the work of the Parish be furnished. Although they act officially as vestrymen only when in Vestry meetings, yet the relations which they hold and the interests with which they are intrusted, should prompt them to be foremost among parishioners in promoting the welfare and growth of the parish, stimulating others, sustaining and aiding the Rector, cheerfully undertaking and faithfully performing such duties as may be assigned to them, and such as the welfare of the Parish may require.

Via Media. The position of the Church between the extremes of Papal usurpation and of Dissenting rejections has procured for her the name of the "Via Media" (Middle Way). It describes her position with tolerable accuracy, but it implies that it is a deliberate compromise. But this is not so. The Truth which lies between extremes of false statement is in itself no compromise. It is simply "the Truth." So the Church in all countries is not the result of compromises, but she is the visible Body to whom the proclamation of the facts of the Gospel and their consequent power over our lives is committed. That in some countries too great assumptions are made and the truth overlaid with false tradition, while by reaction others have torn off too much of the truth in ridding themselves of false tradition, does not make the Church, which is affected by neither, a middle way. It is no half-way house between extremes. But there is yet another consideration. In holding all truths the Church must hold them in their proper relative positions, and not exaggerate any one at the expense of others. It is the "proportion of the faith" which the Apostle shows we must set forth: "Having then gifts differing according to the grace that is given to us, whether prophecy (i.e., preaching), let us prophesy according to the proportion of the faith" (Rom. xii. 6). Since the majority of men can only grasp a portion of the truth and hold that with enthusiasm, it requires some balance of mind to see that these may drag all other truths, whether as pendent or independent, out of their true relations, and so may disturb the due proportion of the Faith, i.e., the Articles of the Creed. Here again the "Via Media" is only so because the Church can admit no disproportions in the use of Scripture, and allow no depression of one Article at the expense of the other. No Scripture can be alleged against another, no text interpreted at the expense of another, no meaning of Scripture either minimized or pushed to extreme consequences. For this reason the concurrent tradition (not oral, but recorded) of the Church upon Scripture and upon practice and discipline determine her wise Politeia, her statesmanship now under her divine Constitution. The Via Media is popularly and from one view correctly expressed in that name under which her chartered and corporate rights are secured to her by the Civil Law,—Protestant Episcopal. It may cover a higher, nobler right, but it cannot obscure it, and only forces us to bring out more strongly, her right as a part of the Church Catholic and Holy. But Protestant she is against the blunders and excesses or defects of those who heedlessly delight in or abuse the name and misuse its Christian meaning. Episcopal she must be by force of her divine Constitution. In these senses her name in Law is proper. It expresses that balance which is hers to uphold, and which in the end will draw all men to her who are not utterly blinded. The Via Media of her position is not the result of a pitiful shrinking, but the balanced and clear enunciation of the principles of the Faith once committed to the Saints, and which she has to uphold.

Viaticum. (Literally, the provisions for a journey.) It is usually used to mean the Holy Communion administered to a dying person. The spiritual food for the soul upon its last journey. It was a very ancient name for it. Clement of Alexandria (172-206 A.D.) so employs it,—"the provision for the journey to the unseen life;" possibly, in this sense, also, Clement of Rome, a hundred years earlier. From the time of the Council of Nice (325 A.D.) the term was most usually employed to mean this administration of the Eucharist to the dying.

Vicar. A term not occurring often in this country, since in our parish system a Vicar, a locum tenens, has no proper existence. It is usually supposed to refer to the same person, who may be called a Rector or a Parson as well indifferently. It was the result of the complications of the English system of Patronage, by the gift of, and the holding of, a Benefice. The Vicar was, in the complex mode of arranging the incomes of the parishes, the stipendiary Curate of the Parson in such cases where the Parson, from some cause, gives the Parish into the Curate's hands and has no cure of the souls in the Parish. "A Vicar (vicarius) is one that hath a spiritual promotion or living under the parson, and is so denominated as officiating (vice ejus) in his place or stead, and such a promotion or living is called a vicarage, which is part or portion of the parsonage allotted to the Vicar for his maintenance and support." The causes which led to the formation of these Vicarages are rather intricate, and are not of value to us here, but can be found in Burn's Eccl. Law and in Blackstone's Commentaries.

Vicarious Sacrifice. Vide SACRIFICE.

Vice. Vice is the habitual characteristic breaking of the moral Law. It is characteristic, and therefore it is one of the most fearful forms of sinfulness. It may be displayed in only a single evil habit, or it may be shown in a thoroughly debased character. It is the fault or defect of the spiritual nature of the man, so that, prone by inherited aptitudes for some form of sinfulness, he does not care to free himself from its power, and so loses that power for a spiritual life which is the true health of the soul. For viciousness is very largely the result of evil education, of sinful thoughts falling on congenial soil, of a blunted or a defective consciousness of sin and the loathsomeness of it, of habits it may be carelessly taken up, but certainly not striven against and not controlled. It was against the vicious of the age that our Lord uttered His severest denunciations, and there is no subtler viciousness than that which cloaks itself under spiritual form. Throughout the Holy Scriptures the sinner from weakness or sudden temptation is tenderly dealt with, but the vicious character is held up to view in the most scathing terms. Our LORD's denunciations of the vices of His own day, the writings of St. Paul, St. Peter, and St. Jude against the sins of the heathen around them, the terrible passages in Hebrews against willful sin under whatever secondary guise it may be shown, are all directed against the root form of viciousness of life. In pagan countries it was far more prominent and unrebuked of course than it is now. And yet it is but too general, too easily found, here and now. The purlieus of our cities, the street corners and lounging-places where lewd fellows of the baser sort do congregate, are places that have a terrible attractiveness for young men who have been but irregularly controlled and are still more irregularly reached by holy influences. Since vice is for a proportion of our population largely the result of an education in it, to root out vice is one of the great ends of the Church's influence, and the purpose of the educational and training agencies which are organized or should be organized in every parish. These are the chief causes for the existence of a parish. It is to supply a better, healthier education to the soul. It must create by its agencies an influence in the community which will raise the starveling soul fed on vice out of the mire of its groveling lusts. As an instrument of living power used by the HOLY GHOST, it must exert itself for good. In co-operation with His ceaseless strivings and pleadings with the heart, the Church's parochial and social influences must be exerted so that those classes may be reached who are now more or less under vicious living. It is, then, a very important responsibility that rests upon the men in the Church of to-day, in actively using those means and instrumentalities which are almost at hand, and can be organized in every parish, by Guilds, by Brotherhoods, by co-operative associations, which can readily be begun and with tact carried on with success. Were it but a Guild for intercessional prayer it would be an instrument of vast good. And it certainly is one of the simplest that can be instituted. But whatever means may be used in any case, the object must be still the same, to prevent the accession to the ranks of the criminal classes, and to save from their souls' peril, the large floating mass of our young who are by their impressibility readily attracted in either direction, and whose dimmed sense of sin and of responsibility makes them peculiarly open to temptation. To do this successfully is a problem which needs the lay co-operation in each parish to the utmost extent.

Vigil. The eve of a festival which is kept as a fast-day. An eve is unfasted. A Vigil is observed with a fast. The English Reformers cut off a large number of Evens and Vigils in their rearrangement of the Calendar, but retained sixteen. These are Christmas-day, Purification, Annunciation, Easter-day, Ascension-day, Whit-Sunday, St. Matthias, St. John Baptist, St. Peter, St. James, St. Bartholomew, St. Matthew, SS. Simon and Jude, St. Andrew, St. Thomas, and All-Saints.

As the observance of a Festival begins at the evening service of the day before, and its Collect is properly read then, the fast is for the day till the Evening Prayer if the Feast have a vigil. But Evens are not fasted. We have retained but one of the Evens or Vigils, but we have kept in popular phrase Christmas-Even. Easter-Eve is the only one we have retained in the Liturgy.

Virginia. Rev. T. Grayson Dashiell, D.D., has done a good work for this Diocese in preparing a Digest of its Conventions and Councils. This sketch will be a synopsis of that volume. It is very desirable that every Diocese should have such a compend.

The history of the Church in Virginia is a matter of especial interest to Churchmen, as in that State the first regular services of the Church were celebrated, and as that ancient Diocese has been the mother of Bishops and clergy who have not only gone throughout this land, but also to heathen shores.

In 1607 A.D. the Jamestown colony landed, with good Parson Hunt as their spiritual leader. He was a godly man, a peace-maker, and a cheerer of the colonists in their difficulties. In the reign of Charles II. a charter was drawn up for the erection of a Bishopric in Virginia, making Jamestown a cathedral city.

In beginning an account of Virginia Conventions, it must be noted that those gatherings in old times were not merely business meetings, but they also had a social character. The hospitality of patriarchal and early Christian times was renewed, and the fervent religious services served to knit together CHRIST's people in love, as Bishop Meade expresses it.

After the Revolution, the Church was greatly depressed, and was robbed of much of her property by wicked legislation, though the Church-people had done much to advance the war, and Washington himself was a Churchman.

The first Convention after the Revolution met in Richmond in 1785 A.D.; Rev. Jas. Madison, D.D., was President, and 36 clergy and 71 laymen assembled. An address was prepared to stir up the wills of the faithful and call forth their aid.

In 1786 A.D., Rev. David Griffith was elected Bishop.

In 1787 A.D. the parishes were exhorted to provide for the expense of educating two youth from their early years for the ministry.

In 1789 A.D., Dr. Griffith relinquished his election to the Episcopate. The Church did not come forward to meet the expense incident to a voyage to England for consecration, and domestic affliction also proved an obstacle. He was an excellent man, and worthy of the position offered him.

In 1790 A.D., Rev. James Madison, D.D., was elected Bishop, and was consecrated the same year in Lambeth. He was President of William and Mary College. Bishop Madison's first address in 1791 A.D. was a forcible exhortation to build up the kingdom of CHRIST. A resolution was adopted looking to the formation of a society for the relief of widows and orphans of clergymen, and the next year a plan presented by Rev. Samuel Shield was adopted.

In 1792 A.D. upwards of 600 were confirmed in 5 parishes.

In 1805 A.D. the vexed question of the right to glebes was before the Convention, as it had been previously under consideration. The trouble continued for many years. Bishop Madison asked for an Assistant Bishop, but the nomination was deferred until the next Convention. Bishop Madison died in 1812 A.D. His addresses show an earnest spirit, but the obstacles before him were great. In the Convention this year a canon concerning itineracy was reaffirmed. Rev. John Bracken, D.D., was elected to fill the vacant Bishopric, but the next year declined the position.

In 1814 A.D., Rev. Richard Channing Moore, D.D., rector of Monumental Church, Richmond, was chosen Bishop. The choice was a happy and blessed one.

In 1815 A.D. a proposition was made by the President of William and Mary College concerning the support of a Theological Professor in that institution, and the Convention considered the object a desirable one.

In 1815 A.D., Bishop Moore made an encouraging report to the Convention.

In 1816 A.D. a Common Prayer-Book and Tract Society was formed. About 730 confirmations were reported.

Up to 1814 A.D. the Conventions met in the Capitol at Richmond, for two years after that date in Monumental Church, Richmond, the next year in the church at Fredericksburg, and then rotation commenced through certain parishes which were selected as proper places of meeting.

In order to supply clergy the ministers were recommended to receive young men into their families, and to make use of them as lay-readers during their preparatory studies. In 1819 A.D. the Convention recommended the organization of a Missionary Society for the benefit of vacant parishes.

In 1823 A.D. over $10,000 were reported as subscriptions to a proposed Theological School. The attempt to educate candidates at William and Mary College was not a success. In 1823 A.D. the funds for the Widows and Orphans of the clergy reported over $5000. Rev. Reuel Keith was appointed a Theological Professor, and the next year it was resolved to locate the young Seminary in Alexandria for the present. In 1825 A.D. there were 21 students and 2 Professors, Mr. Norris being the second one. In 1829 A.D. a property for the Seminary was bought near Alexandria.

In 1829 A.D., Rev. Wm. Meade, D.D., was elected Assistant Bishop.

In 1830 A.D. the number of organized churches was about 100, the clergy being less than half that number.

In 1835 A.D. we find, by Bishop Moore's commendation of the Southern Churchman in his address, that the idea of the importance of a Church newspaper was already felt. Rev. William F. Lee was the editor. The paper still does a good work. This year attention was reported to Sunday-schools and Bible-classes, and to the spiritual necessities of the colored people.

In 1838 A.D., Bishop Meade speaks touchingly in his address of the old churches of Virginia. This is one of the most interesting subjects connected with the history of this State. It is very sad to read that some of these buildings had been lost to the Church. Sometimes the materials were ruthlessly taken away to construct other buildings. The grave-yard walls were falling, and the beautiful locations became a grief to the passer-by, as presenting a scene of desolation. The churches in King William County were named after the creeks, and it sounds strangely to hear of Mangohick and Aquinton Churches. Some of the old churches were cruciform. Yeocomico Church was built in 1706 A.D., and it was believed at the time of the Bishop's visitation this year that no new shingle was ever put upon its roof. That these churches were strongly built is shown by the fact that they so long endured the ravages of time when exposed to the weather within as well as without. Any one who has seen Christ Church, Alexandria, or St. Paul's, Norfolk, may have a fair idea of their appearance. The antiquarian may still find much to delight him in these old churches of Virginia, while the Churchman feels deeply moved to think of the alienation, spoliation, and destruction which has been the lot of many of them.

Farnham Church, unused for worship for thirty or forty years, and abused by worldly and improper uses, was consecrated this year, having been refitted, it being believed that the old churches were never consecrated. The Wicomico Church was without doors and windows. Inside the church were the wagon, the plow, and barrels of lime and tar, and lumber. Cattle had free admission, and the slab of marble which covered the body of one of its latest ministers was covered with dirt and rubbish. The old bell, which had called the faithful to worship God, lay in a pew near the falling pulpit. Steps had been taken towards repair, though the Bishop was doubtful of the result. A more cheerful view was presented at Christ Church, Lancaster County, which was a fine edifice, built at the expense of Mr.

Robin Carter. Bishop Meade passed the ruins of Pope's Creek Church, in which Washington was baptized and attended service in early life. The Bishop loved to hold service in these deserted churches, even when they were in a ruinous condition. His descriptions of them are poetic, and he wails like an ancient prophet over the desolations of Zion. He was deeply moved at the desolate appearance of Pohick Church, near Mount Vernon. Washington selected its location and worshiped in the venerable building. An effort to repair it has since been made. The visitor at Mount Vernon may readily prolong his drive to see this hallowed spot.

In 1841 A.D. the eloquent and loving Bishop Moore died. He was a man with a great heart, loving all, and beloved by all. Bishop Meade speaks of him as being peculiarly amiable and interesting, and venerable in form and countenance and manner.

In 1842 A.D., Rev. John Johns, D.D., was elected as Assistant Bishop.

In 1843 A.D., Bishop Meade reported 31 candidates for holy orders, and that more than 1000 persons had been confirmed by Bishop Johns and himself. The Virginia Conventions: at times passed very strong resolutions with regard to Christian morals, protesting against gambling, dancing, theatre-going, intemperance, and the desecration of the Lord's Day. Both Bishops and Conventions have also constantly protested against changes in the order of worship, and a great simplicity has been observed with regard to ornamentation of churches. The feeling of the Church, like that of the State, has been exceedingly conservative, and everything like novelty or change has been generally discouraged. A scattered country population is not easily moved, and walks readily in the ways of its fathers.

In 1844 A.D. the Bishop gives a report of old churches "repaired and once more rendered vocal with the praises of God, after the silence and profanation of many years." In reference to this matter it must be remembered that after the Revolution the number of clergy was greatly lessened, and the Church was fearfully depressed. Even at Bishop Moore's election Bishop Meade states that but seven clergy were present in Convention. When Bishop Meade was ordained Deacon by Bishop Madison, in Williamsburg, on a bright Sunday morning, only about fifteen gentlemen, young and old, and two ladies were present. On the other hand, in 1845 A.D., Bishop Meade, in the same address which records the weakness of the Church in Bishop Madison's day, exclaims, "What hath God wrought!" as he notes the full employment of two Bishops in visiting nearly 200 churches and stations, while the Diocese contained 100 clergymen, and 50 persons studying for the ministry. While formerly English clergy served in Virginia, in later years she has sent Missionaries to Europe, Asia, and Africa. Bishop Boone, of China, Bishops Payne and Penick, of Africa, and Bishop Williams, of Japan, were from her Theological Seminary. In addition to her diocesan work the Virginia Church was interested in the Bible and Colonization Societies. In 1860 A.D. the contributions, exclusive of current expenses, were $113,510.57, the largest sum reported up to this time.

Bishop Meade died in 1862 A.D. He was a strong, earnest, godly man, to whom Virginia is deeply indebted. He was uncompromising as to what he considered to be the truth in CHRIST. As an evangelist he gladly endured hardness, and made his visitations faithfully throughout a vast Diocese. In friendship he was kind and sympathetic. At the Convention preceding his death he gave a semi-centennial discourse, humbly giving his experience of a lifetime. Bishop Johns says of this address, "There was impressively evident 'a ripeness and perfectness of age in CHRIST,' which might have advised us that his maturity for Heaven was attained, and 'the time of his departure at hand.'" When we compare the deadness of the Church in Virginia in the beginning of Bishop Meade's clerical work to the life shown in it at the end of his Episcopal work, we can but say that, under God, the blessed change was largely due to his untiring labors and constant faith. When even Chief-Justice Marshall, and the General Convention itself, doubted concerning the future of the Virginia Church, Bishop Meade gave little heed to evil forebodings, but toiled on in storm as well as sunshine, and he was blessed in his deed. His remains lie in Hollywood Cemetery, Richmond, and a costly monument has been erected over them by a sorrowing people.

The War separated Virginia from the General Convention for a short period. The Church then found work to do among the Confederate soldiers by means of her chaplains. When peace was restored, Bishop Johns wisely advised the Council to resume its former relations with the North. In reflecting on the terrible devastation suffered by Virginia during the war, he must be blind indeed who cannot see the good hand of our God in this action. The address of Bishop Johns was full of love, and not bitterness, and in due time the Church in Virginia again sent her delegates to the General Convention. The return of the Southern Dioceses is one of the fairest pictures in the history of the Church of CHRIST. It is very easy to keep up divisions after they have taken place. If the whole religious world could imbibe the spirit which influenced the Southern Bishops at this juncture, the words sect and schism might be forgotten on earth. May this loving act be a precursor of the time when all the people of God shall see eye to eye, and join hand with hand. In 1866 A.D., Cassius F. Lee offered a resolution in favor of resuming connection with the General Convention, which was adopted.

Frequent notices occur in the Conventions of interest in work among the colored people. In 1879 A.D., Bishop Whittle commends the noble work of Mrs. F. E. Buford, and calls attention to the movement guided by her mission in the Zion Union Apostolic Church.

In 1867 A.D., Rev. Francis M. Whittle, rector of St. Paul's Church, Louisville, Ky., was elected Assistant Bishop.

In 1870 A.D. it is reported that an Episcopal residence has been purchased in Richmond; Bishop Johns resided near Alexandria. Bishop Johns died in 1876 A.D. Bishop Whittle speaks of his peaceful and triumphant death, after a ministry lacking but one month of fifty-seven years, comprising abundant labors as Assistant Bishop, and Bishop for nearly thirty-three years. He was a Christian teacher, faithful and beloved. The Council made an appropriation towards building a monument for him.

In 1877 A.D. consent was given to the erection of a Diocese in West Virginia. After the loss of West Virginia, in the Council of 1881 A.D. there were 12,778 communicants reported. From 1865 A.D. to 1881 A.D., 119 were ordained as Priests and 136 as Deacons, and 16,174 confirmed. The contributions noted for that period for diocesan and external objects amounted to $2,500,000. The last report of communicants as given in the Church Almanac for 1884 A.D. is 14,153.

In 1883 A.D., Rev. Alfred Magill Randolph, D.D., of Emmanuel Church, Baltimore, was consecrated Assistant Bishop. Being a Virginian by birth and a graduate of William and Mary College and the Theological Seminary of Alexandria, he will minister among his own people.

The educational institutions of Virginia are the Theological Seminary and the High School near Alexandria, the Virginia Female Institute, Staunton, and the Episcopal Female Institute, Winchester.

The history of the Church, in Virginia would be incomplete without a sketch of the Theological Seminary, which has been in a great measure the means of its revival and increase. Prof. Packard's discourse at its Semi-Centennial gives the following facts: Rev. Dr. Reuel Keith and Rev. Dr. Wm. H. Wilmer were the first Professors; from a small beginning hundreds have now been educated and over thirty have gone as Missionaries to the heathen. Bishop Meade was interested in founding the Seminary before he was advanced to the Episcopate. Dr. Keith was a man of great fervor in devotion, and rendered the Liturgy most impressive by his manner of reading it. Bishop Meade pronounced him the most eloquent preacher he had ever heard. Dr. Wilmer did more than any other man except Bishop Meade to revive the Church in Virginia. The Professors in this Seminary have been men of holy lives, and have done much to infuse a proper spirit into the minds of the students. Rev. Dr. Clemson, in his reminiscence of Seminary life, quoted in the Rev. Philip Slaughter's address on this occasion, speaks of the Rev. Oliver Norris as "a lovely man of the sweetest piety," and adds, "he always reminded me of the Apostle John." Dr. Keith he describes as "a man of fine intellect and attainments." "All respected and revered him. The Rev. Dr. Wilmer was a bland, cheerful, companionable man." The amiable Mr. Lippitt and Charles Mann and Dr. Sparrow must not be forgotten as early workers in this field. The Rev. James May, D.D., by his devout life and faithful teaching left a strong impress on this school of the prophets. Over the grave of Bishop Meade is the inscription, "The Founder of the Theological Seminary of Virginia," and certainly the Seminary itself is a noble monument. The Apostolic Bishop Moore was interested in the institution and attended its annual examinations, with "his massive and noble countenance, his long flowing locks, his sonorous voice." A pleasant incident in the Seminary's history is the erection of Aspinwall Hall by the Aspinwalls, at the suggestion of Bishop Bedell. Bohlen Hall was the work of the Bohlen family, and munificent gifts have been received from Anson G. P. Dodge and others. Bishop Griswold's widow gave his library.

Any one who has visited the Seminary must have been struck with its magnificent situation on a hill, which covers a view of great beauty, stretching many miles towards Washington and Georgetown. In such a place, and among such teachers, were domestic and foreign Missionaries trained, and a feeling of social and private piety engendered. From this spot Hanson, Hazlehurst, Hening, Syle, Nelson, Parker, Thompson, and Dr. Hill, with many others, went forth to work in foreign fields. In the graveyard at Cape Palmas five alumni rest,—Minor, Holcomb, Messenger, Robert Smith, and Colden Hoffman. Let us hear the devoted Hoffman from his African grave calling with his dying breath to the American Church, "Tell them by the Crucified One not to hold back their hands." While this Seminary has been distinguished for its foreign missionary work, other Divinity Schools are now learning its lesson of devotion. The General Theological Seminary in New York is a little older than the Alexandria Seminary, though the subject of Theological education was broached in the Virginia Convention some time before the Alexandria Seminary was founded. These two Divinity Schools are our oldest Theological Institutions, and from them a great number of our Bishops and Clergy have graduated, though as the country advances in extent and population, it has been thought necessary to open other schools of this kind. May they long send their healing streams throughout this land and foreign lands,

"that the comfortable Gospel of CHRIST may be truly preached, truly received, and truly followed, in all places, to the breaking down the kingdom of sin, Satan, and death."

Virginity. While the sanctity of marriage, its honor, and its holy estate are not by any means undervalued in Holy Scripture, and it is commanded of all men to be had in reverence, still the state of virginity is highly commended in Scripture. One of the traditional sayings of our LORD is with reference to it. The Apostle St. Paul commends it. In the Revelation it is a mark of those who alone sing the song of the Lamb. The Virgins, as an order in the Church, probably existed from its first practical organized work. St. Philip the Deacon had four daughters who were Virgins. To merely say that they were unmarried does not convey the full force of the passage. And immediately after the Apostolic age we have constant references to virginity of both sexes. This was an almost inevitable state for those who would escape the fearful pollution of heathen society, and who would live in religious seclusion. It was to be a life-long vow. Those who broke it, either by sin or by marrying, were in many places marked persons, and were in some way made to feel that they had fallen in the Church's estimation. It must have been so marked, since it was a natural and healthy movement within the Church and among the Laity. It gave to the Church many earnest, unattached lay-workers, who could be employed by her in undertakings which would have been impossible to married persons. This state of things continued for two hundred years, but the necessity for secluding them into communities led to the formation of religious associations of a more regular and positive rule, and from this grew up the institution of nuns.

Virtues, Theological. Virtue, in the Christian sense, is moral goodness. It arises from love to God, and love to man (Phil. iv. 8). "Actions to which we are rightly directed by our Reason are Duties. The Habits and Dispositions by which we perform our Duties are Virtues" (Whewell). "Truth," says Warburton, "and Virtue are twin-born sisters, . . . Truth being speculative Virtue, and Virtue only practical Truth." A truly virtuous man rises above popular opinion, and, as Bacon declares, would be virtuous in a desert. It was a pretty conceit of Plato that if virtue "could be made the object of sight, it would excite in us a wonderful love of wisdom." Hypocrisy is a compliment paid by the wicked to virtue, but it is easier to be virtuous than to feign the appearance of goodness. Swift shows that as health is one thing, but diseases are many, so we may reduce the virtues to a few heads, while vices are without number. The various Christian virtues combined in unity form a Christian life, though no man is perfectly innocent. The three virtues styled Theological are Faith, Hope, and Charity (1 Cor. xiii. 13). Faith is placed first, for it is the foundation-stone in the Christian edifice. "Without faith it is impossible to please Him; for he that cometh to God must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him" (Heb. xi. 6). By faith weak man lays hold on God, who is his "refuge and strength." The human garment of rags is replaced by the robe of CHRIST's righteousness, and guilty man stands acquitted because his Saviour has borne the penalty of his sin. Hence, when in Holy Baptism the person is introduced into CHRIST's Church, the question is properly asked as to his belief in the Creed, which is the sum of Christianity. In the first prayer in that service the Theological Virtues are welded together thus: "steadfast in faith, joyful through hope, and rooted in charity." With such faith the believer passes safely "the waves of this troublesome world," and comes to CHRIST's Heavenly Kingdom. The question of our LORD to the man whose blindness He had removed was, "Dost thou believe on the Son of God?" And he said, "Lord, I believe. And he worshiped Him" (St. John ix. 35, 38). Such faith accompanied with Christian acts brings salvation.

"If Faith begins the Christian life, Hope continues and supports it. Even the heathen in the myth about Hope remaining in the bottom of the box of Pandora, when a multitude of evils had flown from it, saw its wonderful power. Hope bends over the infant's cradle, and relieves the watcher by the sick-bed. It nerves the laborer's arm, and gives the patriot assistance in oppression. In religion St. Paul tells us that "we are saved by hope" (Rom. viii. 24). Such hope breeds patience (v. 25). It is the "anchor of the soul" "which entereth into that within the veil" (Heb. vi. 19). The hope of an open heaven and a waiting CHRIST, as seen by St. Stephen, brightens the lot of God's children, and in the midst of toil holds out the promise of blessed rest (Heb. iv. 9).

And now follows the crowning grace of Charity. The word comes to us from the Greek, and means love, though in common speech it is often restricted to alms-giving. "God is love" (1 John iv. 8). The suffering of CHRIST for man (vs. 9, 10) is the highest manifestation of God's love. St. John brings the duty into practice in saying, "Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another" (v. 11). Hence the long-suffering, modesty, and endurance of love, as described in 1 Cor. xiii, show how this virtue is the mother of many virtues, and is needed to complete faith and hope. "Love is the fulfilling of the law" (Rom. xiii. 10). On love to God and love to man "hang all the law and the prophets" (St. Matt. xxii. 40). A man who loves his neighbor will not rob his goods, or seek his life, or injure his good name, and man's whole duty may be comprehended in this thought of love, or charity. "And now abide faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity" (1 Cor. xiii. 13).

The four Cardinal Virtues are Justice, Prudence, Temperance, and Fortitude. Justice is one of God's perfections. He is just in His nature and in His acts. "Justice and judgment are the habitation of Thy throne: mercy and truth shall go before Thy face" (Ps. lxxxix. 14). The ruler is to display justice as the agent of God. Job says, "My judgment was as a robe and diadem" (Job xxix. 19). See, concerning Abraham, Gen. xviii. 19. Pilate's wife well styles our LORD "that just man" (St. Matt. xxvii. 19), and St. Peter charges on the Jews that they "denied the Holy One and the Just" (Acts iii. 14. See also vii. 52, and xxii. 14, with regard to this term). The true idea of Justice is that of giving each man his own due share in property, position, and in all things. The Golden Rule, given by "the Just One," covers our whole duty in this regard: "As ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise" (St. Luke vi. 31).

The second Cardinal Virtue is Prudence. It was one of the gifts of Solomon (2 Chron. ii. 12), and he declares that wisdom dwells with prudence (Prov. viii. 12), and that "the prudent man looketh well to his going" (vs. 14, 15). This virtue is seen in Our LORD's life constantly. It is especially to be noted in the case of the tribute money, and in His walking "no more openly among the Jews" (St. John xi. 54) when they plotted His death. St. Joseph's life is held up by F. W. Faber as a model of prudence, as in doubts, and dreams, and perplexities he was quiet and docile, doing all for God, leading an interior life, never looking before light and grace were given, but childlike and prompt the moment the divine command came. Bishop Butler, in his "Dissertation of the Nature of Virtue," shows that a due concern of our interest or happiness and a reasonable effort to secure it is praiseworthy. Raise this thought to heavenly things, and reflect on CHRIST's promises of endless joy, and prudence and religion meet, and the foolish man is seen to be the wicked one.

The next Cardinal Virtue is Temperance. This word of late years in this country has been used to signify abstinence from intoxicating drinks. St. Paul uses the word in a much wider sense (Gal. v. 23). It signifies a proper and decent moderation in all things, bodily and mental. True temperance cannot be restricted to the idea of refraining from one particular sin. The temperate man bridle his animal nature, and keeps his body in "subjection" as if it were a well-tamed horse or an adversary whom he was overcoming (1 Cor. ix. 27). Still, he knows that the mind rules the body, and therefore he strives to think temperately, as well as to act temperately. To such a man anger, hatred, and envy are unpleasant, as indications of a lack of that self-restraint imposed by Christianity upon him.

The last of the Cardinal Virtues is Fortitude. As the word virtue is derived from the Latin vir, "man," and means manliness, so Fortitude comes to us from the same language, in which fortis signifies strong. This is the virtue which helps men to "suffer and to be strong." Locke calls it "the guard and support of the other virtues." Fortitude animated the thousands of martyrs in the early Church who died for CHRIST. St. Ignatius writes in an Epistle to St. Polycarp, "Stand firm and immovable as an anvil when it is beaten upon." Adversity only helps to bring out fortitude. Misery has been called "virtue's whetstone." The highest instance of fortitude is that of our Blessed LORD, in His great agony, crying, as He looked forward to a painful and shameful death, "O my FATHER, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me: nevertheless not as I will, but as Thou wilt" (St. Matt. xxvi. 39).

These various virtues combine to form a Christian and Christlike character. Virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness, and charity are enumerated by St. Peter as Christian virtues, and he adds to his enumeration these words of application: "For if these things be in you, and abound, they make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our LORD JESUS CHRIST" (2 Pet. i. 5-8). By the life he describes men may receive the benefit of the "exceeding great and precious promises," and become "partakers of the divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust" (v. 4). Such a life in CHRIST promises a happy immortality.

"Only a sweet and virtuous soul,
Like seasoned timber, never gives;
But, though the whole world turn to coal,
Then, chiefly lives."

Visitation, Episcopal. The visitation of the Bishop is looked forward to in every Parish with a very varying appreciation of its purpose, its blessing, and the power which is implied in the Bishop's right to visit. It is not merely the visit of the Chief Pastor of the Diocese for the purpose of preaching, confirming, and blessing; these are essential parts of his duty. Anciently he was the only one properly intrusted with the power to preach. It is his office to declare and pronounce to the people the forgiveness of sins as well as to bless them. It is a great privilege to receive from his hands the food for the Resurrection (St. John vi. 54) the LORD hath left us. For the Bishop is the representative and living holder of the one sole order of the ministry our LORD commissioned after His resurrection. The Covenant made and executed in the visible Church is through him, though the Priest or Deacon may be the administrator of the action. So in the rite of Confirmation there is a Confession made before him of the binding force of our baptismal vows, and we upon this public acknowledgment receive the grace of the HOLY GHOST.

But the powers implied in a visitation reach further. Whether they are used at all, or in part, or in full would depend upon the need, fitness, or expediency the Bishop may wisely see should be used. But he has certain powers further which have been used, and these rights as being disciplinary are a part of his office. He has the right to inquire into and ascertain the true condition of each Parish in his Diocese. It is a part of his office formerly exercised in person, but in after-times delegated to the Arch-deacon whose office was created for this use. He may question either Rector or Vestry, or both, as to the strength, resources, and spiritual condition of the parish; may inquire into the frequency of the services and the zeal of the people in attending upon them; into the proper furniture of, and reverent care for, the Church; into the sympathy and moral support the people give their rector; indeed, into all those things which enter into the proper welfare of the Parish as a living part of the Church of God, so that he may be enabled to give right counsel, and to correct faults or remedy defects, and, too, that he may be enabled to obtain from the Parish such aid as may materially forward his work in the Diocese.

Whether in all cases it is well to carry out this authority depends upon many local and temporary causes, but it is a right that inheres in the office of a Bishop by virtue of the commission from our LORD. That a right so to visit is a part of the office is seen both by the visitation St. Paul threatened to hold at Corinth (1 Cor. iv. 21; 2 Cor. xiii. 10), and by the directions he gave both SS. Timothy and Titus as to their duties.

Vocation. A calling, or "inward motion by the HOLY GHOST" (Jer. xxiii. 21; Heb. v. 4; Rom. x. 15) to the ecclesiastical state, is marked by right motives in seeking it,—that is, without desire of the glory of this world, or of income, or a pleasant, easy life, but by readiness in enduring pain and labor, and by desire to promote the glory of God and the edifying and salvation of man. Bishop Andrews explains to Peter du Moulin, that the words "pastor" and "vocation," in the sense placed upon them by Protestants, that is, with the meaning of ordination and ministers, were innovations of the sixteenth century; as the pastorate of Scripture (1 Pet. ii. 25) and of ecclesiastical writers designates the office of Bishops, and "vocation" has its special meaning. The XXIII. Article is distinct upon this point: "It is not lawful for any man to take upon him the office of public preaching, or ministering the Sacraments in the Congregation ("Ecclesia," Lat. vers.) before he be lawfully called, and sent to execute the same. And those we ought to judge lawfully called and sent, which be chosen and called to this work by men who have public authority given unto them in the Congregation, to call and send Ministers into the LORD's vineyard."

"Our Apostles," says St. Clement, "knew, through our LORD JESUS CHRIST, that there should arise contention touching the name of the Episcopate, and for this cause, being endowed with a perfect prescience, they constituted the aforesaid (Bishops and Deacons), and thenceforward laid down a succession, that when they were fallen asleep, then other men approved (of the HOLY SPIRIT) might receive their office and ministry." (Ad Corinth, c. xlv.). The XXXVI. Article further and explicitly asserts that "We decree all such to be rightly, orderly, and lawfully consecrated or ordered" according to the rites of the Ordinal; and in the Preface to the latter it is said, "No man might presume to execute any of them" (the orders of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons), "except he were first called, tried, and examined, and known to have such qualities as are requisite for the same; and also by Public Prayer, with Imposition of Hands, were approved and admitted thereunto by lawful Authority;" that is, "hath Episcopal consecration or ordination." The candidate is therefore required to state that he "thinks he is truly called, according to the will of our LORD JESUS CHRIST and the due order of this realm (Ordering of Deacons, "this United Church of England and Ireland;" Ordering of Priests and Consecration of Bishops) to the ministry of the Church." (Blunt's Dict. of Doct. and Hist. Theol.)

Vulgate. The famous translation of the Bible which St. Jerome made of the Hebrew into Latin and the Greek. It is called Vulgate as being in common use, but the term belonged also to the Septuagint and to the Italic Version upon which St. Jerome worked. The New Testament was first translated. He revised the Psalter twice. The first revision was used in Italy, the second revision was accepted in Europe generally, and was the one from which our Version of the Psalms in the Prayer-Book was made. St. Jerome first translated Samuel and Kings, and after that he worked with zeal and rapidity, but seems to have withheld his translations, except from intimate friends, till he could revise them; still, though he labored sixteen years at the translation, to the last there was something to revise. It had to work its way against the old Latin translation made before 177 A.D., and against the Itala which was a revision of this latter work made through the Greek text, and which was held to be a very close and faithful rendering.

It mastered all opposition at last by its great superiority, but itself fell into gross inaccuracies from transcribers, so that a revision and correction was called for, and partly effected by Alcuin (800 A.D.), but was not fully done till the art of printing was discovered and successive editions passed through editorial scrutiny. Still, it has not been completely effected even yet. When Sextus V. (1582 A.D.) put forth his edition, he so changed it that "he brought peril on the Church." The Vulgate was, however, again revised after many delays, and the last text which was authoritative was issued 1598 A.D. There is still great room for revision and correction. There is large work yet to be done by a competent scholar in the collation of materials for a proper edition of the Vulgate.

Wafer. The unleavened bread used in the Holy Communion in the Roman Church. Bread, i.e., leavened, was the unchanged practice of the Eastern Church, but unleavened bread was the use of the West generally. It was left as an indifferent matter in the last revision of the Prayer-Book in 1662 A.D. In fact, the leaning in England being generally towards wafer bread, instances of its continued use down to the beginning of the last century can readily be adduced, and its use is partly revived in many English Churches. But the remark of Scudamore upon this is well worthy of careful heed, at least in our own American Church: "Legally we are in the same position as our forefathers; but, looking at the long and general disuse of the wafer bread, we are morally bound, in deciding which kind we ourselves will use, to give unusual weight to every alleged consideration of expediency and charity." For ourselves no legal, but all ordinary, moral considerations would prevent our using aught but the finest and best wheaten bread.

Washington Territory. (Vide OREGON.) The history of the Church on the Northwestern coast is to be gathered from pamphlets containing the proceedings of the Convocation of Oregon and Washington, which formed one jurisdiction, having been organized in 1854 A.D. The records of the first meeting were not published in the form of a pamphlet, and those of the ninth session only appeared in brief in the first number of the Oregon Churchman. For a list of these rare pamphlets, see Bishop Perry's Churchman's Year-Book, 1870 and 1871 A.D., under "Oregon and Washington Territory." Since Bishop Morris took charge of the jurisdiction, the clergy of Washington Territory have organized a Convocation. St. Helen's Hall and the Bishop Scott School have done good work in educating the children of Washington, as well as Oregon. They have proved a great blessing. Washington was under the charge of Bishop Scott, of Oregon, and afterwards fell under the care of Bishop Morris. He reported to the General Convention of 1874

A.D. that there was an Episcopal Seminary for girls, at Walla Walla, in Washington Territory, with 13 teachers and 120 male and 140 female pupils, having an endowment of $9000. In 1880 A.D. the Rev. T. A. Paddock, D.D., the busy rector of the active St. Peter's Church, Brooklyn, was consecrated as the Bishop of Washington, as Bishop Morris found that his extensive field needed division. In 1882 A.D. the Living Church Annual reports a second school, at Spokane Falls, named the Rodney-Morris School. The school was under the charge of the Rev. Dr. Nevins.³ The population of this Territory in 1880 A.D. was 75,120, and it contains 69,994 square miles. There is a Diocesan Board of Missions, and Episcopal and Disabled Clergy Funds are on the report.

St. Paul's School for Girls, Walla Walla, is now in charge of Rev. H. D. Lathrop, D.D. The Fannie C. Paddock Memorial Hospital at Tacoma is a monument to the Bishop's devoted wife, who died while on the journey to the scene of her husband's labor. Rev. D. H. Lovejoy, M.D., formerly at the Episcopal Hospital, Philadelphia, is chaplain and superintendent. Statistics for year ending June 27, 1883 A.D.: Clergy, 11; confirmed, 22; communicants, 406; scholars in Sunday-schools, 464; contributions, $12,406.47. Bishop Paddock has received some aid from the East in his endeavor to establish Church Schools, and needs and earnestly solicits much more to enable him to lay foundations deep and strong in that new land. Bishop Paddock was born in Norwich, Conn., January 19, 1825. He is the son of an Episcopal clergyman, and his brother is Bishop of Massachusetts. He graduated at Trinity College, Hartford, in 1845 A.D., and from the General Theological Seminary in 1849 A.D. Ordered Deacon July 22, 1849 A.D. Ordained Priest April 30, 1850 A.D. Was Rector of CHRIST Church, Stratford, Conn., for five years, and of St. Peter's, Brooklyn, L.I., from 1855 A.D., to his elevation to the Episcopate. Consecrated Missionary Bishop of Washington Territory in St. Peter's Church, Brooklyn, on December 15, 1880 A.D., by the Rt. Rev.

Benjamin B. Smith, D.D., the Rt. Rev. Alfred Lee, D.D., the Rt. Rev. Benjamin Paddock, D.D., the Rt. Rev. Daniel S. Tuttle, D.D., the Rt. Rev. Horatio Potter, D.D., and the Rt. Rev. George F. Seymour, D.D.

In Bishop Paddock's Report for 1883 A.D. he states that he has baptized three children and eleven adults, and confirmed thirty in the Territory, and one in Idaho at the request of Bishop Tuttle. He had visited the Indian station at Aloha Bay, and baptized five adults of the Makah tribe, instructed by Mr. J. H. Y. Bell, teacher of the Government School, and candidate for holy orders. About sixty are here under instruction. The Bishop writes that as far as he "can learn, these are the first Indian adults who have been baptized by a clergyman of our Church in this northwestern region. We labor and pray that they may be followed by many who shall help to make up the 'great numbers' to be gathered out of 'every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation.'" At St. Luke's, Vancouver, a sweet-toned bell has been placed in the church tower by an association of young persons belonging to the parish. At Fort Townsend the church had been removed and repaired. St. Peter's Church at Pomeroy had been consecrated, and services were conducted there by Rev. Wm. A. Fair. St. Luke's Memorial Church, New Tacoma, had been consecrated. This is the finest church building on the Pacific coast north of San Francisco. Bishop Morris was present at the consecration of this church, and preached the following day at the ordination of Rev. H. S. Bonnell to the Priesthood. The Memorial Hospital at Tacoma has done a good work "for the healing of the body and the saving of the soul." The Bishop is naturally deeply interested in Christian education, and quotes the report of the Committee on that subject at the General Convention of 1880 A.D. thus: "There is no subject more vital, more closely connected with the well-being, nay, the very life of the Church, than this subject. The whole growth of Christianity and the stability of society depend upon the kind of education which our children are securing." That Convention requested Bishops and clergy to "remind the people of their duty to support and build up our schools and colleges, and to make education, under the auspices of the Church, superior in all respects to that afforded in the institutions." The Church School for Girls at Walla Walla, in the southeastern part of Washington, has done a good work for ten years past. A new building is required. For this the citizens pledged $5000 "if the Bishop would aid." Valuable offers of "land and money" have been made "for a like school at New Tacoma, in the northwestern part of the Territory." The Bishop has received from the Atlantic States $3000 for a chapel at Walla Walla, "and about $25,000 for the school for girls at New Tacoma." The corner-stone of this school was laid August 22, 1883 A.D. This the Bishop is very anxious to secure. "If," he says, "by the expenditure of any time and toil on my part it shall be my privilege to see these institutions for the promotion of sound learning and Christian education established on good foundation, I shall be very thankful, believing that a work will be done that will not only be a blessing to the young now growing up, but for the temporal and eternal good of multitudes in age after age, and for generation after generation." The Bishop closes thus: "Grateful to God and to Christian friends for that which has been done, I humbly supplicate His aid and earnestly ask the co-operation of His servants for the accomplishment of that which we are called to do for the good of souls and the glory of His Holy Name."

REV. S. F. HOTCHKIN.

Wave-Offering. The wave-offering, together with the heave-offering, was a rite peculiar to the peace-offering. The right shoulder was holy to the LORD, and so was "heaved" and belonged to the priest; the breast was waved before the LORD. Their significance was connected with our LORD's Ascension and presentation of Himself as the heave-offering and wave-offering of the one sacrifice, holy and perfect, that should belong to the High-Priest by an ordinance of the LORD from the Children of Israel. But another wave-offering, that of the sheaf of the first-fruits, was still more significant. "The type in respect of the day was the waved sheaf in the feast of the first-fruits, concerning which this was the law of God by Moses: 'When ye be come into the land which I give unto you, and shall reap the harvest thereof, ye then shall bring a sheaf of the first-fruits of your harvest unto the priest: and he shall wave the sheaf before the LORD, to be accepted for you: on the morrow after the Sabbath the priest shall wave it. And ye shall offer that day when ye wave the sheaf, an he-lamb without blemish of the first year for a burnt-offering unto the LORD' (Lev. xxiii. 10-12). For under the Levitical Law all the fruits of the earth in the land of Canaan were profane; none might eat of them till they were consecrated, and that they were in the feasts of the first-fruits. One sheaf was taken out of the field and brought to the priest, who lifted it up as it were in the name of all the rest, waving it before the LORD, and it was accepted for them, so that all the sheaves in the field were holy, 'the lump also is holy' (Rom. xi. 16). And this was always done the day after the Sabbath, that is, the paschal solemnity, after which the fullness of the harvest followed; by which this much was foretold and represented, that as the sheaf was lifted up and waved, and the lamb was offered on that day by the priest to God, so the promised MESSIAS, that immaculate Lamb which was to die, that priest which dying was to offer up Himself to God, was upon this day to be lifted up, raised from the dead, or rather to shake and lift up and present Himself to God, and so to be accepted for us all, that so our dust might be sanctified, our corruption hallowed, our mortality consecrated to eternity. Thus was the resurrection of the MESSIAS after death typically represented both in the distance and the day." (Pearson on the Creed, p. 391.)

Wednesday. It was observed as a fast, together with Friday, as early as 150 A.D.; it being one of the days for the Christians to gather in their week-day assemblies. The Litany is to be recited on that day as well as on Friday, marking it in our use as a day if not of abstinence, yet a day of penitence. Wednesday in Holy Week in the older pre-reformation offices was marked with solemn recitation of the Tenebræ, an office which was as old as the eighth century, in which the fifteen candles burning at the beginning of the Vesper Service were extinguished one by one, as the choir chanted the fifty-first Psalm, till the church was in utter darkness. This Tenebræ Service was repeated for three days in succession in Holy Week.

Week. However much we may be persuaded that the earliest observance of the week was one of the very earliest ordinances given to man,—as we find a notice of the week in Noah's waiting seven days before the dove was sent forth, and in Laban's bidding Jacob to fulfill Leah's week, and then to marry Rachel,—yet on purely historic grounds, as a sacredly-appointed measure of time, it belongs to the Mosaic Law. Seven was a main factor in the ritually and nationally recurring feasts. It was a very remarkable measure of time, and one which furnishes such a common measure of longer periods at only long-recurring intervals, that its observance must have rested on only divine ordinance. Seven is not the measure of the three hundred and sixty-five days of the year, and by the use of it forces the Sabbath-day or Sunday upon every day of the year in the course of a cycle of nineteen years. It forms, very singularly, the just division of labor and of rest. Other periods have been tried, but they have proved unsatisfactory, as, e.g., the Decade of the French Revolution. After a trial of some years the French were compelled to return to the six days of work and the seventh of rest.

Political division of the State of Virginia.—The question of a division of the State of Virginia had long been agitated. As early as 1829 A.D., after the call of a Convention to alter and amend the old Constitution which had been the fundamental law for more than forty years, a body of distinguished citizens of the State assembled in the city of Richmond. This Convention, composed as it was of eminent Divines, Jurists, and Statesmen from every section of the State, north and south, east and west, than whom none more distinguished had met in America since the celebrated Convention which framed the Constitution of the United States, the charter of our liberties, now within five years of a century old, that governs us to-day.

At this Convention the rights of the western portion of the State were asserted, and a Constitution framed, which was submitted to the popular vote and ratified. Twenty years more elapsed, when another Convention was called, and met in Richmond, in 1850-51 A.D., and the Constitution again amended and by a vote of the people adopted. In these Conventions of 1829-30 and 1850-51 A.D., the relative condition of the two sections was ably and fully discussed; concessions were made by the east which in a measure pacified and satisfied the claims of the west. The question uppermost in the minds of the people, for a division, was again deferred.

Ten years later, 1860-61 A.D., the late war between the North and the South precipitated events, and the State was divided, or at least so much of the territory of Western Virginia as was occupied by the Federal forces (dividing the State by an unnatural line), was formed into a separate State,—whether wisely or not is not a question for discussion here. Such is the political feature of the division.

Ecclesiastical.—The division of the State has certainly been of very great benefit to the Church. A division of the Diocese of Virginia was first agitated as early as 1821 A.D., over sixty years ago, when we had but 15 Dioceses.

Western Virginia, that portion of the State lying west of the Blue Ridge, was sparsely populated, and at that early period there were not more than three or four self-supporting parishes west of the Alleghany Mountains. The Episcopal Church was scarcely known, and to-day there are large counties where perhaps a minister of the Church has never been seen; at the sight of one clothed in his surplice, or a Bishop in his robes, the people would flee to the woods. But by the blessing of the great head of the Church, our faithful clergy, and able, energetic, efficient Bishop, this state of things will not long continue. We have no records, nor are there any persons living, from which or from whom we can learn what steps were taken in the direction of securing such division. The venerable Bishop Meade was consecrated as Assistant Bishop of Virginia in 1829 A.D.; in the latter part of the summer of that year he first visited Western Virginia, and in his intercourse with the few prominent Episcopalians the subject of a division may have been talked of. And it is understood that he always opposed the measure on the ground of inexpediency, and the impossibility of an adequate support of the Episcopate in a country so destitute of friends and members of the Church as ours was.

The first decided practical move made in the matter was in 1851 A.D., at a Convocation of the clergy in Western Virginia, some seven in all, held in Charleston, County of Kanawha. A memorial which had been prepared by the late Rev. James D. McCabe, D.D., at Wheeling, setting forth the wants and the claims of the western portion of the Diocese, and looking to a division, was presented. Bishop Meade was present. The paper was read. The Bishop reiterating his sentiments as often previously expressed, as to our inability to maintain a separate organization, and objecting to the petition going to the Diocesan Convention to assemble the following year, and any further action upon the subject, the paper was withdrawn.

It was doubtless true that the Church west of the mountains was too weak at that day to support an independent Diocese, and we must conclude the Bishop was right.

The Church was very much weakened and its growth retarded in Western Virginia by the war, many parishes were without ministers, and no services at all for four years. Upon the reorganization of St. John's in Charleston, under the Rectorship of the late Rev. W. F. M. Jacobs, at the close of the war this energetic minister revived the question of a division here, while some steps were in progress at Wheeling and at Parkersburg, under the leadership of Rev. W. L. Hyland, now of the Diocese of Maryland. Mr. Jacobs had corresponded with the Clergy and some prominent Laymen of those sections of the State, and a time and place had been agreed upon for a conference with the late Bishop Johns upon the subject. This meeting took place at Clarksburg, in Harrison County, the 24th August, 1865 A.D. It led to no favorable result for the new Diocese, as the Bishop met with no encouragement from the Clergy and Laymen present that an Episcopate could be supported, and he advised the meeting to make no application to a Diocesan Council for a separate organization until they could go up with a guarantee that such support would be given. Thus this effort ended.

By some it was proposed to place West Virginia under a Missionary jurisdiction. This measure was not favored by the wise Bishop, and he would never give his consent. It must be an independent Diocese, on an equal footing with the others, or none at all.

The result has proved the wisdom and foresight of this distinguished and eminent Prelate, and it is a matter of regret that he was not spared to see how signally his views have been verified. He knew the west was not yet ripe for a separation.

During the period that elapsed after the failure in 1865 A.D. to accomplish anything towards effecting a second Diocese, the subject was constantly brought before the people; but no definite action was taken by Clergy or Laymen, vestries or congregations, until seven years later.

At a Convocation held at Charleston the 15th of November, 1872 A.D., for the district south of the South Kanawha River, composed of Clergy and Laymen, the subject of creating a Diocese of the State of West Virginia was introduced. A. T. Laidley, a lay delegate from St. John's Church, Charleston, presented a paper asking the co-operation of the Convocation in measures looking to such organization. Much discussion was elicited. Action was finally taken, and Mr. Laidley was appointed a committee to open a correspondence with vestries upon the subject, and to report to a Convention to be held at Volcano, in the county of Wood, on the 23d day of April, 1873 A.D.

Such correspondence was had, the Convention held, and the response laid before it; but these were so meagre and incomplete, that there was but little for the Convention to act upon. There was opposition to the measure, and but little acquiescence, and nothing was done favorable to the move.

Again, at a meeting of the vestry of St. John's Church, Charleston, held January 19, 1874 A.D., A. T. Laidley made another effort to get a full expression of the people in behalf of the new Diocese. A call was issued for a Convention to be held in the April following. The day was fixed, Clergy and Laymen invited, and vestries urged to send delegates. This met with little favor, —especially was there opposition in the counties in the eastern part of the State. Thus failed again the measure.

Bishop Johns visited the Churches west of the mountains in the autumn of 1875 A.D. (his last visitation). While in Charleston in October of that year, he was approached upon the subject. He told the writer, with great emphasis, that he was in favor of the new Diocese, and that if our people of West Virginia would go earnestly to work, and present to the next Council, to be held in Alexandria in May, 1876 A.D., an assured guaranty that the Episcopate would be supported, he would earnestly recommend the measure, and would give his consent to the division.

This was encouraging to the friends of a new Diocese, and we improved the opportunity thus given us. The important turn in events was imparted to friends of the measure throughout the State; and as the next Convocation was to be held in Wellsburg, in the April following, steps were taken looking to a final effort to be made at the Council in Alexandria. To our great grief and lamentation our venerable Bishop and friend had been called to his reward. With sorrowing hearts in our loss, we went before the Council; and though still meeting with some opposition from brethren in the eastern counties, such action was taken as to assure us that we would succeed at the Council to be held in Staunton the next year.

We had the misfortune to lose an able and efficient advocate in our cause in the death of General J. J. Jackson, a Layman from the Church in Parkersburg, occurring a few months previous to the assembling of the Diocesan Council in May, 1877 A.D.

To this body we repaired with a formidable force of the Clergy and Lay delegates, and presented our claims in a petition. The subject was referred to a Special Committee. The Committee made a favorable report to our claims, and on the 18th of May, 1877 A.D., by an almost unanimous vote of the Council, the report was adopted by which the new Diocese of West Virginia was created, and to embrace within its limits the territory within the boundaries of the State. The Rt. Rev. Bishop of the Diocese gave his consent in the paper following:

"STAUNTON, VA., 18th May, 1877 A.D.

"I hereby signify my consent to the action of the Council of the Diocese of Virginia in cutting off that part of the Diocese included within the State of West Virginia, and erecting it into a separate Diocese.

"FRANCIS M. WHITTLE,

"Bishop of the Diocese of Virginia."

It now remained for the General Convention, which met in Boston in October following, to ratify it. On the 8th of that month the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies passed a resolution adopting the report of the Committee favorable to the creation of the new Diocese, and on the 13th the House of Bishops ratified the act, and thus was the Diocese of Virginia divided and a new one created. The next step was to organize the new Diocese by the election of a Chief Shepherd. Bishop Whittle issued a call dated at Boston, October, 1877 A.D., appointing the 5th day of December, 1877 A.D., as the time, and Charleston as the place, for holding this Convention. This body, composed of the Clergy and Laymen within the Diocesan limits, met and elected the Rev. J. H. Eccleston, D.D., of the Diocese of New Jersey, as Bishop. Dr. Eccleston declined to accept. A second Convention was called to meet at Charleston, in Jefferson County, the 27th February, 1878 A.D. At this Convention Rev. George W. Peterkin, of Baltimore, was elected. This young and eminent divine accepted, and on the 30th of May, 1878 A.D., was consecrated in St. Matthew's Church, Wheeling. He entered upon the discharge of his duties at once. The machinery of a new organization thus completed has worked admirably the past six years, and with the blessings of God, to whom we ascribe all the glory, we hope soon to take rank with many of the older and more favored of the great galaxy of the States' vineyards of the LORD. We were once feeble. Within the recollection of a few living witnesses to-day there are parishes where there were but one, two, or three communicants; now they number their hundreds. To show the increase of the Church in the past few years, an abstract of the Bishop's annual address to the Council in June, 1883 A.D., may appropriately be given: "I may properly call attention to the encouraging fact that our little band of communicants has grown from about 1200 to upwards of 2000, the number of confirmations in the five years amounting to 909, our Clergy have increased from 14 to 23, our churches and chapels from 22 to 37, with the prospect of 12 more to be added from one to two years hence, and 10 parsonages have increased to 15, and another in progress; and upon this work our people have expended $100,000. Our Sunday-schools have increased from 878 to about 2000."

I feel that I ought not to omit from this paper a tribute to the memory of those faithful ministers and laymen who so ably and zealously aided in this work of securing to us this Diocese. In this connection I may name the Rev. Wm. Armstrong, so long the Rector of St. Matthew's, and the Rev. Doctor McCabe, then Rector of St. John's, Wheeling, the Rev. W. F. M. Jacobs, Rev. C. M. Calloway, and Rev. Andrew Fisher, of the Clergy, and General Jackson, of Parkersburg. Those have long since passed away, and gone to their reward in Heaven.

Of the living Clergy and Laymen who actively and energetically participated in efforts to get the measure through, the Rev. Dr. Hyland, Rev. S. D. Tompkins, and Dr. Armstrong, now of the Diocese of Virginia, and Rev. R. A. Cobbs, of Charleston, Hon. Judge Thompson, of Wheeling, and Drs. Patrick and Cotton, and Col. T. B. Swan, of Kanawha. ALEX. T. LAIDLEY.

Western Michigan. The first motion looking to a division of the Diocese was made in Detroit, in 1871 A.D., at the Convention held there, by Mr. P. R. I. Peirce, of Grand Rapids. It was referred to a Committee to report to the next Convention, but they took no action, as Bishop McCoskry proposed to speak of it in his annual address (1872 A.D.). This he did, and, in consequence of his promise to further whatever decision might be reached, after a thorough investigation it was decided not to proceed further at that Convention, but to issue a circular of information to the several Parishes to enable them to form an intelligent judgment in the matter. The result of this deliberate conduct of the matter, that in the Convention (1873 A.D.) the vote of the 55 Clergy present out of 79 belonging to the whole Diocese was 39 for and 16 against the division. Of those voting aye, 24 were from the proposed new Diocese, while 8 from the same section voted nay. And of the 53 Laity who voted aye, 24 were from this portion, while of those who voted nay, only 7 were from it. The decision of the boundary-line was referred to the next Convention. There the line was established as follows:

"Resolved, That the Counties of Branch, St. Joseph, Cass, Berrien, Van Buren, Kalamazoo, Calhoun,* Eaton, Barry, Allegan, Ottawa, Kent, Ionia, Montcalm, Muskegon, Oceana, Newaygo, Mecosta, Isabella, Clare, Osceola, Lake, Mason, Manistee, Wexford, Missaukee, Kalkaska, Grand Traverse, Benzie, Leelenaw, Antrim, Charlevoix, and Emmet be, and the same are, set apart and erected into a new Diocese (the assent of the Bishop and General Convention being given), under the name of . . . And the remainder of the Counties in the Lower Peninsula not above designated, with the Island of Mackinac and the Upper Peninsula, shall constitute the present Diocese of Michigan. And that the General Convention be respectfully requested to grant the request of this Convention for such division, when the Constitution and Canons relative to such cases are complied with."

The Bishop gave his Canonical consent, and the Committee who were intrusted with the details of the necessary papers and the arrangements preliminary to presenting their application to the General Convention were able to secure $34,545 for the endowment. Michigan retained 52 Clergy and 58 Parishes, while the new Diocese received 29 Clergy and 32 Parishes. The House of Bishops decided favorably, while at the same time the applications of Southern Ohio* and Wisconsin were denied, on the ground that they had not made the suitable provision required by the Canon. The new Diocese retained three of the oldest Parishes, —Trinity Church, Niles, 1834 A.D., St. Mark's, Grand Rapids, and Trinity, Marshall, 1838 A.D.

At the Primary Convention (December 2, 1874 A.D.) at St. Mark's, Grand Rapids, 21 Clergy and 49 Lay delegates took their seats. After the necessary rules of procedure were ordered, the name of Western Michigan was, after some discussion, decided upon, and Bishop McCoskry formally chose to remain in the old Diocese of Michigan. The new Diocese was placed temporarily under his charge. The Convention proceeded to elect a Bishop, and upon the seventh ballot Rev. George De Normandie Gillespie was elected. His consecration took place on St. Matthias' Day (February 24, 1875 A.D.), in St. Mark's Church, Grand Rapids. Bishop McCoskry was the consecrator. Bishop Littlejohn preached the sermon. Bishops Talbot and Paddock were the presenters, and Bishops Bissell, Robertson, and Welles assisted. In the new Diocese 18 Clergy were canonically resident, but 29 were within its limits; there were 32 Parishes and 12 Mission Stations and Chapels. There were 2588 Communicants. The increase has been slow. The population is one that is found so generally in mining and lumber regions. Church work among them does not make the striking exhibition which can be shown in other and more favored places. Nor can a rich harvest be gathered till the ground has been well prepared. The number of Clergy reported in 1880 A.D. were 29, the Parishes 28, the Mission Stations 30, the Communicants 3068. But in 1883 A.D. the Clergy reported were 23, the Parishes were 28, Missions 21, the Communicants 3111. The shifting population and the changes which occur naturally may account for the apparent loss, but a real gain is proven by the fact that the number of church edifices was increased to 43, and the contributions, which three years before were $143,817.50, were in 1883 A.D. reported as $193,476. These statistics show that this apparent lowering in numbers was due to the exigencies of the times and work. The cords may be shortened, but the stakes are strengthened.

In the General Convention of 1883 A.D., the county of Manitou, in the Diocese of Michigan, was transferred to the Diocese of Western Michigan.

Western New York, Diocese of. I. Colonial History.—The earliest Christian worship in Western New York was by the French Franciscans Le Caron, Viel, Lagard, and La Roche Dallion, about 1625 A.D., on the southwest shore of Lake Erie and the Niagara River; then in Jesuit missions at Onondaga, Cayuga Lake, and Avon or Genesee, 1642–69 A.D.; then at Fort Niagara by the French chaplain, Père Millet, 1686 A.D., and later; then by the Moravians under Zeisberger, at Onondaga, 1750–76 A.D., and by the Rev. Samuel Kirkland, Congregational missionary to the Oneidas many years, from 1765 A.D. No permanent fruits resulted from any of these missions. Church of England services began in 1759 A.D. with the occupation of Fort Niagara, whose chapel, and Brant's Indian church at Lewiston, 1776 A.D., were her only places of worship before 1797 A.D. A chapel for the Onondagas at Oswego was projected, but not built, and altar-plate sent out, but not used, under Queen Anne; and the early Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts' missionaries went no farther west than Schenectady and Fort Hunter (near Johnstown).

II. Diocese of New York.—The State of New York became a Diocese June 22, 1785 A.D. One-half of it, from Fort Schuyler, or Utica, west, formed in 1788 A.D. the town of Whitestown, with a white population of about 200. The "Committee for Propagating the Gospel in the State of New York," constituted in 1796 A.D., appointed in 1797 A.D. the Rev. Robert G. Wetmore their first missionary. He traveled within a few months through Western New York, 2386 miles, on foot and on horseback, baptized 47 adults and 365 children, and preached 107 times. St. Paul's Church, Paris Hill, the first in Western New York, was organized February, 1797 A.D., the next year the Rev. Philander (afterwards Bishop) Chase visited many places, organized several churches (only one of which, however, was kept up, St. Luke, Harpersville, 1799 A.D.), baptized 14 adults and 319 infants, preached 213 times, and traveled some 4000 miles. In 1802 A.D. the Rev. Davenport Phelps began a vigorous and successful missionary work throughout Western New York, mostly at Geneva and farther west, ending only with his early death in 1813 A.D. He founded a number of permanent parishes, and made Geneva from 1806 A.D. an important centre of Church work. The Rev. Jonathan Judd and the Rev. Gamaliel Thatcher were missionaries farther east in 1804 A.D., and the Rev. Amos G. Baldwin at Utica, 1806 A.D., when Bishop Moore consecrated Trinity, Utica, the first Episcopal act in Western New York. Most of the early parishes were many years without church buildings or clergymen, and were kept up and nursed into strength by regular lay-reading. The consecration of Bishop Hobart, 1811 A.D., gave a great impetus to Church work in Western New York. In the nineteen years of his Episcopate he made twelve visitations to this distant region (as it was then), promoted the founding of 64 parishes, consecrated 84 churches, added 46 clergymen to the 4 he found in 1811 A.D., confirmed nearly 2000 (among these 200 Indians at the Oneida Mission, afterwards removed to Green Bay), and established Geneva, now Hobart, College, the Christian Knowledge Society of Western New York, the Gospel Messenger (which continued for forty-five years as the Church paper of the Diocese), and other instrumentalities of growth. The population of Western New York had increased in that time from 275,168 to 875,016, and the communicants from 240 to 2331, nearly tenfold. Early missionaries of special note were Wm. A. and Orin Clark (brothers), Wm. B. Lacey, Russell Wheeler, Alanson W. Welton, Daniel McDonald, E. G. Gear, Henry U. Onderdonk, Joshua M. Rogers, and Geo. H. Norton. Their stipends, at first $150, were fixed in 1824 A.D. at $125, and so remained forty years. Under Bishop Onderdonk (Bishop Hobart's successor in indefatigable labor, though not in force of intellect) the parishes increased (1830-38 A.D.) to 96, and clergy to 74. The erection of a new See in the now overgrown Diocese was suggested as early as 1830 A.D., recommended by the Bishop in 1834 A.D. (after four years of annual visitations and rapid growth), and completed by the action of the General and Diocesan Conventions, November 1, 1838 A.D.

III. Diocese of Western New York to 1868 A.D.—The history of the original Diocese of Western New York is that of the Episcopate of William Heathcote De Lancey, consecrated May 9, 1839 A.D., died April 5, 1865. He found in the new Diocese, with its 75 clergy and 96 congregations

(68 of the latter being missionary stations), an Episcopate fund of $35,000, and permanent Missionary fund of $10,000; a college, small, feeble, and without endowments; and the days of rapid growth over. Diocesan missions, no longer sustained by the wealth of New York, became his first and greatest care. The Diocese never asked or received anything from the Church at large. Monthly offerings required by its own canons, for missions both diocesan and general, the distribution of Bibles, Prayer-Books, and Tracts, and Disabled and Infirm Clergy, have met all the demands of its work to this time; though as late as 1865 A.D. there were still 100 missionary parishes out of 160, while communicants and families had increased fourfold, and offerings sixfold. During Bishop De Lancey's Episcopate these offerings were $186,000 for diocesan, and $100,000 for general objects, besides special contributions doubling the original Episcopate Fund, $25,000 for the Diocesan Training School, $8000 for the Permanent Missionary Fund, and some $400,000, including bequests, to Hobart and De Veaux Colleges, in all not less than $750,000.

The Diocese had in its early years the services of clergymen of great ability at important points,—Drs. Proal, Leeds, Matson, and Brandegee in Utica; Whipple (now Bishop) at Rome; Gregory and Ashley at Syracuse; Hale, Bissell (now Bishop), Wilson, and Metcalf at Geneva; Whitehouse and Lee (afterwards Bishops), and Van Ingen at Rochester; Bolles at Batavia; Shelton, Hawks (afterwards Bishop), Ingersoll, and Schuyler at Buffalo,—mostly those who, like their Bishop, had been pupils of Hobart. Under such leadership it maintained a high standard both in Church principles and practical work, and became known as "the Model Diocese." The Bishop, a man of extraordinary energy and system, impressed these characters on all features of his diocesan work. He had the most entire confidence of both clergy and laity, and retained it through all the controversies and agitations in ecclesiastical affairs which marked the early years of his Episcopate, without giving way in the least to the claims of partisans on either side.

Hobart College, without endowments, and sustained up to 1847 A.D. partly by a State grant, had for several years from that time a hard struggle for existence. A considerable endowment, secured in 1860 A.D. mainly by Bishop De Lancey's earnest efforts and since increased to $300,000, has placed it on a firm basis, while from first to last its standard of scholarship, in classics and mathematics especially, has been of the highest. De Veaux College for Orphan and Destitute Children, founded in 1852 A.D. by a bequest of $300,000 from Judge Samuel De Veaux, of Niagara Falls, and the Diocesan Training School, now De Lancey Divinity School, founded in 1861 A.D. by Bishop De Lancey's personal efforts, are the chief, and indeed the only permanent additional educational foundations thus far.

The Bishop's health giving way in 1864 A.D., the Rev. Arthur Cleveland Coxe was chosen Assistant Bishop; consecrated January 4, 1865 A.D., and on the death of Bishop De Lancey succeeded as second Bishop of Western New York, April 6, 1865 A.D. In the following year he recommended the erection of a new See; and in 1867 A.D. the Diocese was divided into two, the western half retaining the former name, and the Bishop remaining in charge.

IV. Diocese of Western New York, 1868-84 A.D.—The Diocese as thus reduced contained 15 counties, 11,845 square miles, 774,762 inhabitants, 78 parishes (of which 37 only were "self-supporting"), 76 churches, 43 rectories, 82 clergymen, and 8636 communicants, an average of 1 to 90 of the population. Its offerings for 1868 A.D. were, parochial $180,440, diocesan $12,760, general $7801, in all $201,001; and its church property (parochial only), $1,057,643. The Journal of 1883 A.D. reports 90 parishes ("self-supporting" parishes not shown), and 9 missions, 100 churches, 104 clergymen, and 11,142 communicants (1 to 84 of population); offerings, parochial $187,903, diocesan $25,243, general $13,977, in all $227,124; church property, parochial $1,702,509. The fund for the support of the Episcopate is $41,717,* permanent fund for Missions, $28,579; for Disabled Clergymen, and Widows and Orphans of Clergymen, $16,338; for the De Lancey Divinity School, $47,200; other diocesan funds (not including Hobart and De Veaux College property), about $10,000. Church Homes have been founded in Buffalo, Rochester, and Geneva; the two former with substantial buildings and considerable endowments. Forty churches have been consecrated by the present Bishop. Trustees have been incorporated for a future cathedral in Buffalo, and in Rochester a costly and beautiful church, endowed, is held, through individual munificence, for a similar use when needed. The missionary work of the Diocese is directed by the Convocations of the four Deaneries of Buffalo, Batavia, Rochester, and Geneva, each holding quarterly meetings of clergy and lay representatives of parishes; the missionary stipends for 1883 A.D. were $5470. A very important revision of the diocesan constitution and canons is still in progress; and the Episcopate of Bishop Coxe has witnessed an immense improvement in the building, care, and decoration of churches, and the frequency and conduct of Divine Service, in all which the Bishop himself has been the leader of his Diocese.

REV. C. W. HAYES.

Western Texas, the Missionary District of. The Missionary District of Western Texas is a vast territory of about one hundred and ten square miles, and includes, with the exception of a few counties on and along the Colorado River, all that portion of the State of Texas lying between the said river and the Rio Grande, the Gulf of Mexico, and the thirty-second parallel of northern latitude.

Its surface is varied, low and flat for about fifty miles or more from the coast, where a gradual rise begins, which, with variations of hill and dale, level plains and rolling table-lands, reaches, in the mountain region west and northwest of San Antonio, an elevation of between two and three thousand feet above the gulf, while that at Fort Davis, Presidio County, is four thousand seven hundred feet, and the mountains in its neighborhood and farther west are still higher.

Though the sea-board towns sometimes suffer from yellow fever, which is always imported, the climate on the whole is exceedingly salubrious, that of the table-lands and mountain region west and northwest of San Antonio being specially suited to persons suffering from pulmonary diseases. The atmosphere of these portions of Western Texas is pure, dry, tonic, and so transparent that strangers are constantly deceived as to the magnitude and distance of objects.

It has large quantities of coal in its western portions, and also iron and other minerals, while its beautiful but unnavigable streams and rivers would furnish abundant water-power for manufacturing purposes. Though it has a fertile soil, the uncertainty of the rain-fall has confined agriculture chiefly to its eastern counties; but the motto of the rain-belt seems to be Westward Ho! and with its extension goes the farmer, who, should he fail to make a crop one year, is almost sure to make enough the next to compensate him for the labor of both. But, notwithstanding its ever-increasing number of farms, nearly the whole vast region west, southwest, and northwest of San Antonio is still the land and the home of the stockman. Here are those large sheep and cattle ranches of which almost every one has heard, though the small ones far outnumber the large, and men of small means, if honest and industrious, have as good a chance to make a comfortable living at the business as men of large capital to make fortunes.

Its facilities of travel have greatly increased within the last five or six years. There are over fifteen hundred miles of railroad in it to-day, the chief roads being the Great Northern and International, and the Galveston, Houston, and San Antonio; and other roads and branches of these roads are projected, which, if built, will make travel as easy and expeditious in Western Texas as in any other part of the State. Even now nearly all its important interior towns can be reached by rail, and even some of those on the coast, as Corpus Christi and Indianola.

The population of the District of Western Texas to-day is fully three hundred thousand. In it nearly all nationalities are represented. But, though the German element is very large in some communities, and also the Mexican along the Rio Grande frontier, the American predominates in the District as a whole, and is gradually increasing by immigration from the Northern and older Southern States. As in nearly all new countries, there is a lawless element in its society, but not as large as is often supposed, nor is it found to any extent in our older settled communities. Though its cow-boys may be wild, and the free use of the whisky-bottle may sometimes make them disorderly and dangerous, since the advent of the railroads and the presence of the State rangers acts of highway robbery and murder have become things of rare occurrence, and property and life are as safe here as they are in any part of the country. The vast majority of its people are law-abiding, peaceable, well-behaved, industrious, hospitable, courteous, and by no people are they surpassed in common sense and natural intelligence. Nor is everything among them of a rough kind or order. In many portions, especially in those that have been longest settled, are pretty towns and villages, beautiful homes, and refined and cultivated people, while even in its more western wilds are to be found, under a rough exterior, men of polished manners, of education, and culture, graduates perhaps of the universities of old England, or of our Northern and Southern colleges. No people set a higher value on education, and their first care is to provide good schools and teachers for their children.

In religious matters as in all others, there has been progress. The various denominations which divide older communities are all represented, and, with few exceptions, have their ministers, churches, and Sunday-schools, except in some of the more western portions, where, in consequence of the sparse population, it is difficult to gather congregations, and to build churches and support them. This is all still purely missionary ground, and the religious wants of the people, if supplied at all, must be supplied to a very large extent by the itinerant. But while there are encouraging features in the religious condition of Western Texas, there are also some that are very discouraging. If the people in certain portions still retain the religious habits which they themselves or their forefathers brought with them, it cannot be denied that in other portions, especially in the cities and larger towns, those habits have been seriously affected by those of the foreign element with which they have socially mingled. Till a few years ago the Rio Grande frontier had been left almost entirely to the missionary of Rome, and we need not wonder that under the influence of a Church which calls her people to mass on Sunday morning, but tolerates the bull- or the cock-fight Sunday afternoon, together with the love of gain which hesitates not, unless restrained, to turn the holy day into a day of worldly traffic, many even of American birth and training and education should have lost all sense of the sacredness of the Sabbath. But a change for the better is already taking place among these people, and no religious body has done more to bring about this change than our own Church, who, in many places at least, has been the pioneer on the Rio Grande.

With this sketch of the Missionary District of Western Texas, we now proceed to the history of the Church in it. There were no doubt among the first settlers in Western Texas a few Episcopalians, but it was not till some time after the independence of Texas had been achieved, and its annexation to the United States, that their number was sufficiently large at any point for mission or parochial organization. As a part of the State of Texas it formed a part of the Missionary District of the Southwest, which was first under the charge of the Rt. Rev. Leonidas Polk, D.D., and then under that of the Rt. Rev. George Washington Freeman, D.D. Bishop Polk visited Texas several times, but it does not appear whether he extended his visits to any points in Western Texas. Bishop Freeman's first visit to Texas was in March, 1845 A.D. If not in this year, he subsequently visited San Antonio, Seguin, and other points in Western Texas where his Episcopal ministrations were needed.

The Diocese of Texas was organized at Matagorda, January 1, 1849 A.D., and by resolution of the Convention was put under the charge of Bishop Freeman as Provisional Bishop. In May, 1852 A.D., Bishop Freeman was elected Bishop of the Diocese, but declined in May, 1854 A.D., preferring to act as Provisional Bishop till other arrangements could be made.

The first parishes in Western Texas that were admitted to the Convention were Trinity, San Antonio (May, 1850 A.D.); Advent, Brownsville (May, 1851 A.D.); Emmanuel, Lockhart, and the Redeemer, Seguin (May, 1854 A.D.). The parish of the Redeemer, Seguin, was organized by the Rev. J. W. Dunn, now deceased, but its name was subsequently, by resolution of the Convention, changed to that of St. Andrew's; while Trinity Parish, San Antonio, which had been organized by the Rev. J. T. Fish, U.S.A., was at length reorganized under the name of St. Mark's, and as such admitted to the Convention in 1858 A.D.

Others of the pioneer clergy of Western Texas were Rev. W. Passmore, who went to Brownsville in August, 1851 A.D.; Rev. C. S. Hedges, who went to Indianola and Lavaca in 1853 A.D.; and Rev. L. H. Jones, who was first in charge at Seguin, and then at San Antonio, where, in December, 1859

A.D., he laid the corner-stone of the church now known as St. Mark's Cathedral. Mr. Hedges still survives, and is now a Presbyterian of the Diocese of Louisiana.

After the death of Bishop Freeman several elections to the Bishopric of Texas were made, but declined; but on May 6, 1859 A.D., the Rev. Alexander Gregg, D.D., then a Presbyterian of the Diocese of South Carolina, was elected by the Convention, then in session at Galveston, who, having signified his acceptance, was consecrated at Richmond, Va., during the session of the General Convention there, October 13, 1859 A.D. Under this good and godly man, of apostolic zeal and courage, the Church in Texas grew and prospered, Western Texas receiving its full share of the benefit of his labors. But the herculean task of attending to the wants of a Diocese larger in territory than most of the empires of Europe, in which new communities were constantly forming and growing up, with Church people in them asking for his ministrations, was too great for even his indomitable energy and perseverance; so that, after deferring the matter again and again, he was at last, in October, 1874 A.D., compelled to ask relief of the General Convention, then in session in the city of New York. In response, the General Convention set off from the old Diocese of Texas the two Missionary Jurisdictions "ecclesiastically known as Northern and Western Texas."

By the same General Convention the Rev. Robert W. B. Elliott was elected the first Bishop of Western Texas, who, on November 15 of the same year, was consecrated in St. Philip's, Atlanta, Ga., of which parish he had been rector for the last three years preceding.

The new Bishop lost no time in visiting his large and distant jurisdiction, to make himself acquainted with its condition and needs, and to minister at the points where his presence was most needed. His first service was at Luling, December 20, 1874 A.D., where he officiated in a passenger-car, which was kindly loaned for the occasion, and which was well calculated to suggest to him, at the outset of his Episcopal career, new ideas, if he did not have them before, of the nature of the work to which he had now devoted himself.

Our young Bishop, young in appearance as well as in years, by his lovable qualities soon endeared himself to the hearts of both clergy and laity, while his ability in the pulpit, his wisdom in council, his resolution, energy, hopefulness, and courage, speedily convinced us that the General Convention had made no mistake in appointing him as our chief standard-bearer in this new, and at that time still, to a vast extent, untried region of country. With his advent began a new era of growth and progress for the Church in Western Texas, the signs and proofs of which, after the lapse of nine years, are seen in almost every part of his vast jurisdiction. New parishes have been organized, new churches built, to a number of which parsonages have been attached, schools and institutions of learning founded and put in successful operation, new missions organized, and new and distant points visited, the Bishop himself being often the pioneer.

At a Missionary meeting held in Christ Church, Hartford, Conn., November 13, Bishop Elliott said, "Since the last General Convention (Convention of 1880 A.D.) one building has been put up for every four months that have passed, and, leaving out Williams' Hall, three-fourths of the money has been given in Western Texas." This progress still continues, and goes on to-day as vigorously as ever. New churches are being built at points where, but a year ago, there was no Protestant worship at all, and new ones will be built at other points where they are as badly needed, as soon as the necessary funds are secured. One of the greatest services which Bishop Elliott has rendered Western Texas has been in finding and raising up for it generous friends abroad, but for whose assistance, not to speak of other things, he could never have kept in the field the staff of clergy by whom, under him, so much of this work has been done.

The Bishop's residence is in San Antonio, the chief city of the District, and the commercial capital of Western Texas. Always an important frontier town, with a large military post attached, since the advent of the railroads it has nearly doubled in size, and now contains a population of about thirty-five thousand. While the stranger may find in the somewhat foreign aspect of the city, its narrow streets, its tortuous river, and the manners and customs of its almost cosmopolitan people, much to excite his curiosity, he will also find there congenial society and many of the material comforts and conveniences which belong to an older civilization. But San Antonio, sunny and warm, and strange and picturesque, and, in some places, beautiful, is the stronghold of Romanism, and also of its twin-sister, Agnosticism; the first affecting a very large portion of its humble and more ignorant people, the other tinging the thought and influencing the lives of a large number of its educated citizens, especially those of foreign birth. As against both of these systems and their influences the Church of God must wage unceasing warfare; in no city of our land is aggressive work more urgently needed. The Bishop, with his small band of clergy there, two besides himself, is doing what can be done, with the means in hand, to stem the double current. In the city there are two parishes, St. Mark's and St. Paul's, and two Missions, St. Luke's and St. John's, and one school for girls and young ladies, called St. Mary's Hall. St. Mary's is doing a needed and noble work in keeping our girls from the convent by furnishing an education as good or superior to that which may be had there, and its usefulness could be largely increased by the addition of new buildings for the accommodation of boarders. St. Paul's Parish is without a church, but one is soon to be erected. The church of the parish of St. Mark's is also the Bishop's Cathedral. It has a history of its own. Its corner-stone was laid, as we have seen, by a former rector, Rev. L. H. Jones, December, 1859 A.D., but work was suspended on it during the war, and not resumed till July, 1873 A.D. It is perhaps, with its beautiful and imposing interior, the best specimen of church architecture in Texas, and is an enduring monument to the faith, skill, patience, and perseverance of its present dean, the Rev. W. R. Richardson, and the earnestness and liberality of his people.

The other important towns and villages in the District, where we have churches, are Victoria, Cuero, Goliad, Hallettsville, Gonzales, Seguin, Lockhart, San Marcos, Barne, El Paso, Uvalde, Del Rio, Laredo, Brownsville, Corpus Christi, and Rockport.

At Seguin are Montgomery Institute, and, attached to it, Williams' Hall, for girls and young ladies. The first bears the name of the late Dr. Montgomery, of New York, an old friend of the Bishop, by one of whose generous people, Mrs. S. J. Zabriskie, $500 were given towards its erection; the other, the honored name of the present Bishop of Connecticut, by whose liberal and large-hearted people the funds to build it were entirely contributed. At Seguin is also St. Andrew's Academy, for boys, which, though small, sufficiently answers the purpose intended.

The following is a statistical comparison between 1875 and 1883 A.D., which, though imperfect, is correct as far as it goes:

The Church in Western Texas is no longer an experiment. All that is needed now, with the blessing of God, are more men to do the work, and more means to sustain them. There is scarcely a clergyman laboring in Western Texas to-day who is not doing the work of two men, and some are doing more. Who will come "to the help of the LORD against the mighty"? Young men who are honestly striving to answer such a question for themselves need have no fear of burying themselves alive by coming to this District. If they have anything in them, this is the land and the people to bring it out. Men of thorough education, strong intelligence, and good sense, as well as of earnest piety, are needed, and by no people on the face of the earth will they be better appreciated. And if there are those who would secure and preserve health, and at the same time be useful in the Master's vineyard, we say the pure, dry, tonic climate of our mountain region will exactly suit. A better climate for the consumptive, if he will come in time, does not exist in the United States. REV. J. T. HUTCHINSON.

Whit-Sunday (Pentecost, Ger. Pfingsten, Old Ger. Whingsten, Old Eng. Whit-Sun). The fiftieth day from Easter,—the Sunday on which the Church celebrates the outpouring of the HOLY GHOST upon the Apostles, and through them upon His Church, to abide with it forever. It was commemorated in the Primitive Church with festival services. The whole period of fifty days was kept with a festal tone, which was crowned with the Whit-Sun celebrations. It was the completion of the work our LORD came to do. "It is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you" (St. John xvi. 7). Therefore this day was always observed with holy solemnities. The Acts were read throughout this season in the East and in the North African Church, as we do now. In our own Service, the Collect is the ancient one, being traced to Gregory's Sacramentary. Our Epistle agrees with the Eastern Epistle (Acts ii. 1-11), and our Gospel is the same as in the Latin use, being the old Sarum use (St. John xiv. 15-31). The Proper Preface is the composition of the framers of the first Prayer-Book of Edward VI., but is singularly like a fine Gallican Preface. Edward's Prayer-Book of 1549 A.D. was appointed to be used for the first time on Whit-Sunday. The account in the Act of its Compilation is very reverent,—"His Highness . . . hath appointed the Archbishop of Canterbury and certain of the most learned and discreet Bishops and other learned men of this Realm" who "should draw and make one convenient and meet Order, Rite, and Fashion of common and open Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments, . . . the which at this Time, by the aid of the HOLY GHOST, with one uniform agreement, is of them concluded, set forth, and delivered.

. . . And that all and singular ministers in any Cathedral or Parish in this Realm . . . shall, from and after the Feast of Pentecost next coming, be bounden to say and use the Mattens, Even-Song, Celebration of the LORD'S Supper, commonly called the Mass, and administration of each of the Sacraments, and all their common and open prayer, in such Order and Form as is mentioned in this same Book, and none other or otherwise." From that time forth, by the grace of the HOLY SPIRIT, the English-speaking people have had one of the noblest Liturgies any part of the Church Catholic hath ever possessed given to it.

Widow. In the Mosaic dispensation, widows who were friendless were to be aided by the triennial third tithe (Deut. xiv. 29; xxvi. 12). The forgotten sheaf in the harvest-field was to be left "for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow." The remaining olives and grapes were to be granted to the same needy persons, that God's blessing might rest upon the work of His benevolent people (Deut. xxiv. 19-21). The widow was to be remembered in religious feasts (Deut. xvi. 11, 14). Her raiment was not to be taken "to pledge" (Deut. xxiv. 17). It is the wicked who take the "widow's ox for a pledge" (Job xxiv. 3). The command was, "Ye shall not afflict any widow" (Ex. xxii. 22). "Plead for the widow" (Isa. i. 17). Our LORD accuses the Scribes and Pharisees of devouring "widows' houses" (St. Matt. xxiii. 14). In the Apostolic Church provision was made for widows by a "daily ministrations" to their needs (Acts vi. 1-6). St. Paul directs who are to be rightly admitted into this class (1 Tim. v. 3-16). The aged widow Anna, who gives thanks for the infant CHRIST, is a good representative of the class of holy women who were given to the service of God (St. Luke ii. 36-38). The touching petition in the Litany for "fatherless children and widows" may have been prompted by the fact that long after Apostolic times the widow was in a specially weak condition, when women were allowed so little opportunity to gain a subsistence, and the prayer is needful to-day. The widows in the early Church lived under certain rules and performed certain "charitable offices connected with the Church." In Tertullian's day the Deaconesses "were commonly chosen out of the widows of the Church." The Council of Laodicea calls them elderly widows, as the Deaconesses were generally somewhat advanced in years. A canon of the first Council of Orange speaks of a "widow's garment," so that these Church widows had a special dress. It was the duty of the Deaconesses "to be a decent help to the female sex in the time of their Baptism, sickness, affliction, or the like," as Epiphanius states. Virgins and widows, according to a statement of St. Ambrose, had a special place assigned to them in the church building.

Wisconsin. On the Feast of St. John the Baptist, 1847 A.D., the Clergy in Wisconsin Territory met, with Lay delegates, in St. Paul's, Milwaukee, a call having been issued for the meeting by the Missionary Bishop of the Northwest. The Bishop presided. The Bishop, in his address, noted the ordination of seven Deacons, while five candidates for holy orders were pursuing their studies. He expressed his satisfaction at the presence of Norwegians and Oneidas among the delegates. Rules of Order and "a Constitution for the Diocese, and one for Parishes, were adopted. The Rt. Rev. Jackson Kemper, D.D., LL.D., was unanimously elected Diocesan. Choice was also made of Diocesan officers, and a deputation to the General Convention. It was resolved that there should be Quarterly Collections for Diocesan Missions. Four Oneida Indians being present as Delegates from Hobart Church, Duck Creek, a congratulatory resolution was adopted on this circumstance. The principal Chief of the Nation, Tay-kawia-ti-on, through his interpreter, Nisatyerha, replied. A committee was appointed to apply to the Legislature for the incorporation of the Trustees of the Episcopal Fund. The second Annual Convention was in Trinity Church, Janesville, in June, 1848 A.D. Bishop Kemper presided. The church where the Convention met was consecrated. The Convention sermon was preached by Rev. Frederick W. Hatch. The Bishop spoke of the admission of Wisconsin into union with the General Convention," and reported four ordinations to the Priesthood, three consecrations of churches, one laying of a corner-stone, and seven candidates for holy orders, eight names being added before the Convention adjourned. Bishop Kemper "declined the Diocesan Episcopate, and was requested to take charge of the Diocese as its Provisional Bishop until the Diocese shall be in a condition to support a Diocesan. The act incorporating the Trustees of Church Property was accepted and members of the Board elected." Two Deacons were ordained Priests at the close of the session. The third Convention met in the same church, in June, 1849 A.D. Bishop Kemper reported three ordinations of Deacons, one for the Diocese of Indiana, and one ordination to the Priesthood, and eleven candidates for Holy Orders. He urged on the parishes the duty of becoming self-supporting. "A committee was appointed to confer with the Trustees of Nashotah, 'touching the expediency of placing said school under the supervision and control of the Diocese of Wisconsin.'" The fourth Convention met in St. Matthew's Church, Kenosha, in June, 1850 A.D. The Bishop made report of three ordinations to the Diaconate and two to the Priesthood, thirteen candidates for Holy Orders, and two consecrations of churches. A renewed effort for the increase of the Episcopal Fund was commended. The Missionary Committee urged the importance of "procuring glebes and building sites in all parts of the country." The Trustees of Church Property were instructed to loan the Episcopal Fund only upon unencumbered real estate.

The fifth Annual Convention was in St. Paul's, Milwaukee, in June, 1851 A.D. The Bishop reported the ordination of three Deacons and one Priest, twelve candidates for orders, and commended the Nashotah School. An effort to establish a Female Seminary was indorsed. The Bishop was requested to divide the Diocese into Convocational districts. The sixth Convention met in the same church in June, 1852 A.D.

The Bishops of Indiana and Pennsylvania were present with the Missionary Bishop. The Bishop had ordained seven Deacons and one Priest. Four candidates were studying at Nashotah. Two corner-stones had been laid, and one burying-ground consecrated. One church had been consecrated. Racine College had been established. One church was admitted into union. The seventh Convention, in 1853 A.D., met in the same church. St. Ann's Hall, Milwaukee, Racine College, and Nashotah were commended. The eighth Convention met in the same church, Rev. W. W. Arnett, D.D., preaching the sermon. "Another Female Seminary, St. Mary's Hall, at Janesville, had been established." Bishop Kemper was a second time elected Diocesan, and accepted. A committee for securing glebe land and lots for churches was appointed. At the ninth Convention, in Mineral Point, the Bishop reported the death of Rev. George Thompson, and resolutions were adopted respecting it. Trinity Church, where the Convention was sitting, was consecrated, and there was an ordination to the Priesthood. The tenth Convention met in St. Paul's, Milwaukee, the Rev. Geo. B. Eastman preaching the Convention sermon. A communication was received from the parish in Watertown announcing that it was self-supporting. A resolution strongly urging the support of Church Schools and Colleges was unanimously adopted. "The Board of Missions was requested to raise $12,000 for Diocesan Missions the ensuing year." Bishop Kemper, who is shown in this record as the beloved Bishop of Wisconsin, was born in Dutchess County, N. Y., in 1789 A.D. He graduated from Columbia College, N. Y.; was ordained Deacon in 1811 A.D., and Priest in 1812 A.D., and was for years at Christ Church, Philadelphia, and afterwards in Connecticut. He was consecrated as the first Missionary Bishop of Missouri and Indiana in St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia, September 25, 1835 A.D. He was the first Missionary Bishop in the American Church. Missouri, Indiana, Iowa, and Minnesota were all within his original jurisdiction. He was revered throughout his wide field, and as he brought in one Diocese after another to the General Convention, his spiritual children, who were called on thus to part with him, blessed the good providence of God, which had given them such a founder. The writer of this sketch once asked him, on one of his many journeys, "Do you ever get tired?" He gave one of his earnest looks, and replied, "Do you get tired of doing your daily duty, sir?" And so the tireless man worked on, exchanging Eastern comforts for his simple Western home, near his much-loved Nashotah, until God called him to rest.

In 1866 A.D., Rev. W. E. Armitage became Assistant Bishop. He was born in Brooklyn, educated at Columbia College and the General Theological Seminary, and was Rector of St. John's, Detroit, when elected to the Episcopate. After the faithful work of a few years, he died in 1873 A.D. In 1869 A.D., Bishops Kemper and Armitage were present at the Convention. There were 13 candidates for orders, 618 had been confirmed, 307 of whom had come in from various denominations, 10 having been Roman Catholics. Both Bishops referred to the death of Rev. W. M. Hickox. Associate missions were approved. A plan was reported of raising up an order of self-denying, self-supporting missionaries as "teaching Deacons." At the Council of 1870 A.D., Bishop Kemper's death was officially announced by the Standing Committee: "He fell asleep in Jesus, . . . and now rests in hope on the soil which, for a third of a century, has been consecrated by his prayer and love." "With you who knew him, loved him, and honored him, there needs no prompter of his praise." An appeal was made by Bishop Armitage for the purchase of a girls' school, called Kemper Hall, as a monument to the late Bishop. It was resolved that an early division of the Diocese was desirable, and a committee was appointed on the subject. The Mission Farm at Green Bay was put in charge of Christ Church Parish in that place. Bishop Welles was consecrated in 1874 A.D., in St. Thomas' Church, New York. He is a native of Waterloo, N. Y., and a graduate of Hobart College. He was Rector of Christ Church, Red Wing, Minn., at the time of his election to the Episcopate.

In 1875 A.D. the Diocese of Fond du Lac was set off from Wisconsin. (Vide FOND DU LAC.) Nashotah has been the great feeder of the ranks of Wisconsin clergy. Dr. Cole says, "When towards the close of the day, in the autumn of 1842 A.D., the first occupants of the Mission knelt upon a spot covered probably by this chapel (St. Sylvanus', Nashotah), and prayed for a blessing on their endeavors, they had nothing in hand for the morrow. It was venture of faith. . . . The LORD in whom they trusted opened the hearts and hands of His people. He that fed Elijah by the brook Cherith, that gave manna to Israel in the wilderness, brought help to His servants in the daily mail." Kemper Hall, Kenosha, is under the charge of the Sisters of St. Mary. There is a Day School at the Cathedral in Milwaukee; St. John's Home, Milwaukee, under the chaplaincy of Rev. H. B. St. George, Sr., St. Luke's Hospital, Racine, under the chaplaincy of Rev. Dr. Conover, and St. Luke's Hospital, Chippewa Falls, of which Rev. S. J. Yundt is chaplain, are worthy of mention.

Witanagemot. Witanagemot—i.e., meeting of the wise men—was an assembly among the Anglo-Saxons, summoned by the King (probably at stated times) for council in all the main acts of government. It consisted of the principal men of the nation,—the aldermen of the shires, the chief ecclesiastics, such as Bishops and Abbots, and perhaps other, both lay and clerical. It lay within its province to settle the laws, to elect, or at least confirm the King, and to choose Bishops. Each kingdom of the Heptarchy had its own Witanagemot; but on the conquest of England by William the whole system was swept away. Some of its features, however, survive in Parliament, such as the Bishops sitting in the House of Lords; yet it cannot be said that the latter assembly is modeled upon the former.

Woman. The position and obligations of woman in the Church are determined, like her place and duties in society, by the object of her creation, which was to be "an helpmeet for man." Simple as this ought to be from the teaching of nature as well as from the statements of Revelation, it has yet always been difficult for man to understand it, and the mistakes of the highest civilization upon this point are quite as great as those of the rudest savagery. There are two distinct and apparently contradictory accounts of her origin in Genesis, which are yet perfectly reconcilable if read aright. In Gen. i. 27, we are told that "God created man in His own image; in the image of God created He him, male and female created He them." This is a plain, intelligible statement, involving co-equality of man and woman in their relative positions and giving to neither priority of origin. Its textual connection and its assertion first clearly establish it as the purposed revelation of a fact. Man, therefore, is male and female, either part being incomplete without the other. Not man generically, but the man needed an helpmeet for him to fulfill the objects of his being, and only in woman could such help be found. Nature teaches the same truth, woman being in every aspect, physical, mental, and even moral, the complement of man. Without woman man, therefore, cannot rightly and fully accomplish his work in the Church any more than in the world. But the converse of this is equally true, and it follows necessarily that there is much to be done in the work of the Church which it is not woman's place to do. We can find no better guide to determine the particulars in this respect than the Scriptures of the New Testament. There we always find woman a co-worker with man, active and zealous, not in an inferior position, but in a distinctive line of duty. Only when seeking to go beyond her sphere, as was evidently the case among the Greek converts, do we find her reminded of her subjection—not inferiority—to the stronger sex (1 Cor. ii. 8, 9; 1 Tim. ii. 11, 12). St. Paul distinctly and very emphatically forbids a woman to teach, and we find no instance of any female in holy orders, or intrusted with the public ministrations or administration of the Church. It is, of course, evident that St. Paul's language is not to be accepted literally, at least in any general application, for we should then be deprived of the services of woman as a teacher in schools or mission-fields to her own sex, and as a matter of fact the Apostle speaks approvingly of the instruction received by Timothy himself, to whom he is writing, from his mother Eunice and his grandmother Lois,—for such is the fair interpretation of his language. But enough is clear to condemn as altogether unscriptural the assumption by woman of the office of public preaching or exhorting. Neither is there any scriptural authority for the ordination of women as "Deaconesses," the term applied to Phœbe (Rom. xvi. 1) meaning simply "a servant," as translated in the King James' Version. It may be accepted as a principle, therefore, that woman is debarred by her sex from all strictly masculine employment in the Church, and restricted to work in subjection to and by direction of a higher authority. Her proper sphere is in all those private ministrations which demand especially the gentleness, patience, and watchfulness of her nature, and in the care and oversight of those matters, necessary and abundant, in the working economy of the Church which are analogous to the household duties of domestic life. First among these is the religious instruction of young children. Remembering that the child cannot be taught too early the knowledge of God and His Church, and that to woman peculiarly belongs the care of his earliest years, it becomes evident that he must learn this from her or lose the golden opportunity. To teach her children the Holy Scriptures, the Catechism of the Church, and the high value of their birthright therein is a solemn duty and a blessed privilege which no mother may delegate to others. Where this duty is properly realized and performed its influence is marked on the character of the community no less than of the individual. The Sunday-school assumes its proper place as a missionary work and a means of bringing the Rector into close acquaintance with the children of his charge, and in it the younger women and those who have no children of their own find a field to minister instruction to those little ones who are deprived of a mother's training.

Another most useful department of woman's work, in which a field is open to every one who is willing to do personal service, is found in ministering to the physical comfort and spiritual needs of the poor and ignorant. In every neighborhood some object for such ministrations may be found. A visit of inquiry with a few words of kindly sympathy, or a small contribution to the comfort of some poor sister, personally offered is a good work for CHRIST's sake, which will bring more happiness and blessing than it bestows. A half-hour spent in reading the Bible and Prayer-Book to some sick or aged person who cannot read them for herself is one of the best ways in which a Sunday afternoon can be occupied, and hundreds of women might thus utilize the leisure which hangs heavily upon their hands. There should be in every Parish some organized association for woman's work by means of which the peculiar qualifications and leisure hours, few or many, of all may be turned to account. The regular "Sisterhoods" (q.v.), of which there are at least thirteen in operation in the various Dioceses, are adapted to those only whom circumstances permit to give their entire time to charitable and religious employment. But Parish Guilds may accomplish a great deal without so complete a self-devotion, and indeed without any serious inconvenience to those, even, whose time is largely occupied by the demands of other duties. The Rector will know what are his needs in this direction. Let him organize an association comprising all the active women of his Parish. Visiting Committees of two should be appointed in monthly turns, whose duty should be to inquire for and call upon the poor, the needy sick, or strangers, inviting the latter to church and calling for them on Sunday, and reporting all cases of necessity, illness, or ignorance to the Rector; if need require, nursing for the sick is to be supplied either from the membership or by competent nurses hired and supervised by the association. A very small contribution from each, paid monthly, will, if the membership be general, furnish an ample treasury for all ordinary requirements. As a rule the whole Parish will readily join the list of contributors, and there should be two members appointed monthly to make the collections. Another most admirable form of organization, perfectly practicable in every Parish, is the "Ladies' Church Aid Society." Twelve managers, or fewer, if the Parish be small,—a President, Vice-President, Secretary, and Treasurer form the association. Subscribers for small amounts monthly—five or ten cents—are obtained among the congregation, larger amounts, or semi-annual subscriptions, being accepted. Permanent committees of two, as in the former case, collect these sums monthly, and exercise an active rivalry in gaining new subscribers. The officers never collect. It is wonderful how much is accomplished by this simple machinery, assisted, when some extensive work has been undertaken, by a supplementary Offertory in the church. No Rector who has once experienced the aid and comfort of such an organization will ever willingly be without one in his Parish. The chief aim of the society should be to accomplish each year some important and permanent work in the adornment and furnishing of the church edifice or some similar enterprise, or in giving a tangible shape and practicability to some plan which has seemed beyond the means of the congregation. No church, however poor the people, will remain dingy and shabby or ill equipped in proper appointments for public worship with such an organization at work. Even the building and furnishing of a rectory is not too great a task for it to undertake and push to completion by stirring up the zeal of the congregation to help carry out a determined purpose. The Rector should guide and advise, but leave the managers abundant liberty of choice and action. A definite system should be maintained in the direction of the work, always doing something which no one else is likely to undertake, and avoiding those matters which must be done.

In addition to these objects, the society should take charge of the surplices and altar-linen, the chancel and its furniture, the Christmas and Easter decorations, and all similar matters, assigning each to a special committee of two, and holding the treasury responsible for such slight expenses as their duties involve. An extremely valuable and practical work may be done by such a society in bringing together the members of the congregation who would be otherwise unknown to each other, and thus fostering mutual acquaintance, if not sociability. This may be accomplished in various ways, as circumstances may suggest. The "Parish Sociable" is an excellent method, the members in turn keeping open house for one evening in each month, and personally inviting all to be present, the duty thus falling on each less frequently than once a year. Where this is not practicable, the "Garden Party" once or twice a year in summer is an admirable substitute. A suitable place and evening are selected, and the grounds made attractive with torches, Chinese lanterns, and similar devices. Cakes, ices, and lemonade are served from rustic tables, the privilege of purchasing these refreshments relieving constraint and inducing the attendance of many who would otherwise hesitate to come. The boys of the congregation gladly act as waiters under the direction of the committee, while the managers mingle among the guests, introducing and entertaining them. The result is always happy, and the influence for good in thus bringing people together lingers long after the occasion has passed by.

These are a few of the ways in which woman may find an active field for usefulness in the Church without in any way interfering with her domestic and social obligations. The practice of these will itself be suggestive of many others.

REV. R. WILSON, D.D.

Word of God. The title WORD of GOD as applied to the second Person of the Holy Trinity, is derived from the Old Testament to us. That the Jews understood the theological import of the term Word as the Christian understands it is not likely; but that the Apostle took it from any other source than Holy Scripture is not possible. The term was found in the writings of Philo Judeus, a wealthy, influential, and learned Jew of Alexandria in our LORD's time, and a little later, and his works gave the term Logos (WORD), by which he meant a divine influence, an exhibition of the divine mind, but not a Person in the Unity of the Divine Nature. The MESSIAH was indeed in the Targums set forth as the SON of GOD, and so the two parallel teachings prepared the minds of the thoughtful for the reception of the divine revelation that the MESSIAH was the WORD of GOD, and in a far deeper sense than the uninspired paraphrasts and recorders of Jewish interpretation and the speculative platonizing Jew of Alexandria could have fathomed. They cleared the way by using terms in a lower sense than the full truth demanded. But it was given to the disciple whom JESUS loved to declare this full truth. The second Person of the Holy Trinity of the very substance of the FATHER was by the Psalmist declared to be the Word of GOD, by whom the heavens were made, and so, though not knowing its fullness, anticipating the doctrine of St. Paul and the declaration of St. John, that not only the "Word was with GOD and the Word was GOD," but that by Him were all things made, "and without Him was not anything made that was made." St. John's full enunciation was reserved as the last and crowning declaration of our LORD's Divine Nature, the setting forth of the secret intimate union of His Person with the Person of the FATHER, like as, by a most distant analogy, the Word is most intimately bound up in the power of expressing Himself each Person possesses. That it is a mystery not to be known here is most true, and it is to be devoutly and faithfully accepted. But with this confession we yet may be allowed to speak of this form of His Personality. "For ever, O LORD, Thy Word is settled in Heaven" (Ps. cxix. 89), carries us back to the eternal nature of the WORD, and sets forth the worker before the works. The Word of GOD came to the Prophets, and they spake the mind of CHRIST; the mysterious secret one who in man's appearance, with man's voice, sent the Angel Gabriel to strengthen the fainting prophet (Dan. viii. 15, 16). Already St. Paul had used this term as a title of our LORD, commending the Ephesians to GOD and to the WORD of His grace (Acts xx. 32), and alluding to this commendation in his Epistle to them, in their trust when they heard the Word of Truth (Eph. i. 13); warning the Hebrew Christians that the WORD of GOD is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword (Heb. iv. 12), and saluting Titus with a reminder that GOD had manifested His Word through preaching. St. John had already in his Epistles called his Master the Word of Life. And in the vision of the Rider going forth in His righteousness, whose name is called the Word of GOD (Rev. xix. 13; comp. Ps. xlv. 3, 4). So far had the title been applied to our LORD in even deeper appreciation of its truth, till the Church was prepared to have the full deposit made with her in the sublime words, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with GOD, and the Word was GOD." Now that this is declared, other terms and titles of our LORD, other descriptions of Himself and His work, gain immeasurable importance,—the Wonderful, the One whose name is secret, the numberer of secrets, He that hath a name that no man knoweth. The mystery is not removed, but the Word of GOD must be a Person if these are His titles and are descriptions of Him and His Nature; and again, without this last title we might hold Him to be a Mighty Being, only now we know Him to be intimately GOD of GOD of the One Substance of the FATHER.

WORD of GOD is generally the name given to the Holy Scripture; but while it is perfectly correct for us to use it so now, we must remember that wherever this phrase occurs in Holy Scripture itself, it is to be usually understood of our LORD, since the usual name in the New Testament for the Old Testament Books was the Scripture or Holy Scripture, but not the Word of GOD.

Work, Church, for the Future. When the thoughtful and observant eye looks back over the past century, there is nothing more astonishing than the influence exerted by the Church upon every other variety of Religion in this land. Just after the Revolutionary war, nearly dead,—supposed to be past the possibility of a revival,—despaired of even by some Churchmen, and that for a whole generation after the Episcopate was obtained, who could have expected such a result as we see to-day? Moreover, her claims were, of course, rejected by Rome, and her "Apostolic Succession" and her "prayer by a book" were the scorn of the rest, while her "exclusiveness" made her beyond measure odious to all the Protestant denominations. But now all this is changed, and is still changing. These denominations have all been moving from the ground they occupied half a century ago, and the steady drift of their changes brings them daily nearer to the Church. The uncompromising aspirates of their original sectarian shibboleths are softening down or disappearing. The architecture, the music, the decorations, the liturgical devotions, the reverence for houses used for public worship, the organs, the stained glass, the memorial windows, the use of chanting, the public recital of the Creed, the LORD's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments, and many other things first known in this country only through the Church, have been creeping into more and general use among all the Evangelical Denominations, and even among some who are not Evangelical. Christmas and Easter are already well observed; the New York Stock Board adjourns over every Good-Friday on the motion of a Jew; and seventy non-Episcopal ministers of Brooklyn have agreed together this year to keep a part of the season of Lent. The Church element is so strong in all our great cities that the whole social current is largely regulated by the Feasts and Fasts of the Church. The Church of Rome, the hardest to move, is nevertheless moving also. By the operation of the free atmosphere of this country, by the common-school system, and specially by the anxiety of the priests to conciliate Protestants as much as possible by not making prominent those things which they know to be most repugnant to the Protestant mind,—by all these things, the quality of Romanism itself is perceptibly changing. Every such change dilutes the intensity of Ultramontaniam, gives more and more of an American tone, and thus brings the masses of Romanists gently but inevitably nearer to us. Now, if all this has been accomplished in one century (and nearly all only in the latter half of it), what reasonable man can refrain from looking ahead and anticipating what will be the result of the same changes going on for a hundred years to come? We Churchmen should have coolness and clear-headedness enough to measure the vastness of the responsibility which Providence has placed upon us, and see what practical changes we need to make in our own working system in order to accomplish our task.

We inherited, by tradition from our Mother-Church of England, a cast-iron system, with close union of Church and State (meaning, too often, the undue dominance of the State), a body of Canons largely obsolete, and a Church legislature (the Convocations of Canterbury and York) unable to act at all. The spiritual tone of that Church was at the lowest point it had ever known. We received it in that its lowest, poorest, and coldest shape. Our task has been to accommodate a Church and State system to a country where there could be no union between Church and State; to take a cast-iron system and melt it over, and make it more like spring steel; to work out a body of Canons suitable to our own condition, and by a Church legislature deriving no authority from the Civil Power; and to put warmth and heartiness into a worship which was cold and almost dead. This we have done: but much more yet remains. We need to get rid entirely of the pew system, so that no one can secure, by a money payment, a right to a seat in the House of God. In a country where all are equal in the eye of the law, it will never answer that there should be more of fraternity in the law than in the Gospel. The social element—which is so strong a binding power among the Denominations—cannot be used with us as with them, for we must include all grades of society. But the missing link may here be supplied by the formation of Guilds, Brotherhoods, Sisterhoods, and all manner of organizations for mutual help, grouping them all around the Church as their real Mother. The Sisterhoods devote themselves to hospitals, to out-door nursing of the sick, to teaching, to church embroidery and decoration, etc.; and the Brotherhoods are mainly priests trained for the holding of parochial Missions, although lay Brotherhoods also have accomplished much good. There is a vast field here which has only just begun to be worked, and in which social fellowship, in good works and material help of all sorts, will give the needed practical activity to our parishes and Dioceses. These organizations may be made to supply precisely that want which leads so many into the ranks of the Freemasons, Odd-Fellows, and other Orders of like character.

Among other wants, a Financial System which will have more distributive equality and more spiritual efficacy than our usual corporation of "Rector, Church-wardens, and Vestrymen" supplies, is a need felt more and more deeply by very many among us.

The old rigidity of public worship has already been wonderfully changed for the better. Hardly any two parishes can now be found whose order and manner of worship is exactly the same. And this is like the living variety of Nature, where no two leaves can be found exactly alike on the same tree: while bullets run in the same mould by machinery can be made exactly alike, because they are things without life. Even the immovable Prayer-Book has felt the new spirit, and a nearly unanimous vote of General Convention has declared that it must acquire both enrichment and flexibility. In music—especially in the establishment of Surpliced Choirs—much has been done, and improvement is going on rapidly. The quartette music of modern shallowness is steadily retreating before a style of more Churchly simplicity, strength, solemnity, and grandeur. Orchestral accompaniments, on great festivals, add still further to the effect. And the variety and freedom of additional services brings with it a freshness and earnestness which are continually deepening and increasing the spiritual magnetism and attractiveness of the Church.

The perfecting of our own traditional organization is one of our most imperative wants. The true theory of Episcopacy does not require that a vast territory should be put under one man, which no one man can possibly attend to efficiently. Where population is reasonably dense, a Diocese ought not to be more than from twenty to fifty miles square. Every one of our present States and Territories (except, perhaps, Rhode Island and Delaware) will eventually become a Province containing three or more Dioceses, and some of them are now large enough for six or eight Dioceses, or even more. Not until this subdivision is carried out will it be possible to carry ecclesiastical filth to the proper point of personal and proper care. Then, also, our Judicial system is wretchedly defective. Each Province should furnish a ready Court of Appeal, where every complaint or grievance could be heard, and nothing that is wrong be left without a possible and practicable remedy. The sooner this part of our machinery is put into good repair, the better it will be for every other branch of the operations of the Church.

The School question is, in this country, one of vast importance and almost insoluble difficulty. The endowment of education by State Governments, the General Government, and private bequests or gifts, is so vast, that in less than a century from now this interest will be the richest that the world has ever seen. Against this overwhelming preponderance of wealth it were vain to expect that Church-people alone should, by voluntary gifts, set up another educational system able to compete with that of the public. The Roman Church is trying to do this, and its efforts have been heroic. But the Roman system enables them really to levy large sums from the pockets of Protestants: and a very small proportion of the public school taxes is paid by their people. In both respects we stand on very different ground from them. And yet with both these advantages, their success is very incomplete. As all the Evangelical denominations, together with the Roman Church and our own, are agreed in professing to accept the Apostles' Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments, it is theoretically possible that they should all combine to have that much, at least, of religious teaching in the public schools. But though theoretically possible, it is not now within reach practically. It may become so by and by, however, as sectarian bitterness and suspiciousness decrease. The most that can be done is to establish Church schools of high grade, for boys and for girls, the advantages of which shall be within the reach of those who are of moderate means. It will be found that, by placing these under the charge of members of some Religious organization, the best organization and the highest kind of influence will be secured, with the greatest steadiness of administration, and at the least possible expense. As to Church colleges, those we have are in great need of further endowment, yet without much chance of getting it. Owing to the wide comprehensiveness of the Church, no two Church colleges have exactly the same ecclesiastical tone. Each can appeal, therefore, only to the sympathies of a portion of Churchmen: and no one of them is likely to get anything from outside. In all the older denomination colleges, the denominational spirit has become so unpopular, that all organic guarantees of denominational supremacy have been voluntarily removed. Their growing unsectarianism has drawn rich additional gifts and endowments. The better Church policy will be to establish Halls or Houses for Church undergraduates in connection with every such college. Thus organizing our Church strength will make it far more effective as a leaven for the whole lump. And we can do it the more safely, as there is not another religious body in the country that is likely to make any effort in that direction. This would render all the older and wealthier colleges even more useful to the Church than if they were her own: for few will come to a Church college except youths of Church families; while, on the other plan, a definite Church influence will constantly be brought to bear on the larger number of undergraduates who are not Churchmen.

There are special fields of Church work, each of which has its own special claims. First in magnitude should be mentioned the colored population, mainly—though not exclusively—to be found in the Southern States. Wherever—as in the larger cities—any appreciable portion of that population has risen to a certain grade of cultivation and comfort, there we always find some congregations of them in the Church. But these are miserably few in proportion to the vast numbers of that race. The Church has shown such phenomenal slowness and want of success in getting hold of this element, that we need to look facts squarely in the face and find out the reasons. The race difficulty is the first to meet us. That all men are equal in God's House is a principle that cannot be abandoned. There is neither Jew nor Greek, male or female, Barbarian or Scythian, bond or free; but all are one in CHRIST JESUS. Yet generally, in the earliest ages, Jewish congregations had usages of their own, and were separate organizations (or parishes) from the Gentile Christians. This distinction was carried up to the highest point—the Apostolate—when St. Peter was specially commissioned, as the Apostle of the Circumcision, and St. Paul as the "Apostle of the Gentiles." Taking human nature as it is, the most of our congregations of white people would not permit any large number of colored people to come in and help run a parish on the same footing as themselves. And the great majority of colored people, who are sufficiently elevated to appreciate the Church and her worship, do not enjoy trying to be members where they feel (whether justly or unjustly) that they are looked on by some as intruders; and they are not really comfortable until they have a church of their own. This does not imply a colored minister; but they like to feel that the place where they meet, the organization to which they belong, is their own. Now here is a practical contradiction. The pride of equality with the whites theoretically demands one thing: the actual comfort of a practical working system demands the other. In the supply of the Ministry the same thing is true. The vast majority of the colored race being yet ignorant, it is vain to hope for a competent supply of ministers of their own color, if the high literary requirements of our present Canons are insisted on. Practical common sense would therefore be willing to lower them. But when this was proposed to the last General Convention, a Convention of Colored Clergy and Laity of the Church protested loudly against the indignity of any such color line, and insisted that only those colored men should be ordained priests in the Church who could sustain the full examinations required of the whites. Moreover, the middle and lower classes of colored people are exceedingly clannish, and must be dealt with rather in masses than as individuals. They are bound together by a subtle sympathy, which makes them act together.

In any plans for their improvement this peculiarity must never be lost sight of. The work cannot be thoroughly done among them unless by a Ministry largely, if not wholly, of their own race. Moreover, our liturgical and disciplinary system needs to be seriously modified before it will be able to meet the requirements of the work. With millions, so large a proportion of whom cannot read, it is nonsense to try to teach them to respond all through our regular service, Psalter and all. We must find some mode of worship which will give them quite as much to do, if not more: and yet give it in such a shape as to make it easy for them to do it. This lies ready to our hand in the old original Antiphon system, by which one verse—as characteristic of the day as possible—was selected, and taught to the people as a burden or chorus, and they introduced it after each verse of Canticle or Psalm. This frequent repetition is what the colored people—who are all singers—greatly delight in. The one hundred and thirty-sixth Psalm, with the burden, to every verse,—“for His mercy endureth forever,”—is an exact mode of what we mean. The Benedicite is another specimen. It would require one who has an intuitive perception of the simple, the sympathetic, and the striking, together with great natural musical taste and feeling, to revive this feature of ancient Church worship. It was originally invented in order to interest congregations of unlearned people, who had no printed Prayer-Books in their hands: and it would succeed as well now as then. The entire service should be made as musical as possible. Much may also be done in the way of vestments, lights, and other decorations to interest a race whose temperament is decidedly more sensuous than our own. That sensuousness now shows itself in their protracted nocturnal orgies, where shouting, clapping, jumping, dancing, and similar “exercises” are kept up until a physical excitement is produced of a kind wellnigh destructive of true Religion. The orderly and regulated attractiveness of a musical service, with colored vestments, light, and incense, would give elevation and dignity, while yet free from the evils of the other plan. Nature has clothed our dusky brother in mourning anyhow, all over. When only white is combined with black, it is merely another variety of mourning. In nothing does he delight more than in bright and positive colors; and why not let him have them in his Religious services? He is very fond of lights also, and why not let him have them? And of the propriety of incense, few, who have had experience, would doubt. When race peculiarities are in question, things of slightest importance in themselves may be the key to success; and the neglect of them, and attending only to great matters, may insure total failure. The lubricating oil is a very slight item in the outfit of a railway train: but if it be omitted, all the rest will soon come to a stand-still. In ascertaining, by practical experiment, what will be likely to succeed, there must be reasonable freedom from Canonical and rubrical fetters. It is a work for individuals of peculiar gifts and qualifications; and in which legislative bodies, deciding in advance of experience, can only show their impotence for any good.

Of the two very different efforts now attracting great attention in the colored field,—that of St. Mary's Church, Baltimore, and that of Mrs. Buford at Laurenceville, in Virginia,—the former comes the nearest to the suggestions made above. The services are largely choral, and highly “ritualistic;” and the ten-years-old experiment, beginning with nothing, now shows a fine stone church seating over 800 people, with 3 clergy, and a body of Sisters at work. They have an Orphanage with 20 boys, 188 children in the Parish School, and 250 in the Sunday-school. The offerings of the congregation for the last year were $1343.14. Mrs. Buford's work is purely rural, and the peculiar and unaccountable obstacles placed in her way have prevented the development of any settled plan of ownership as yet. But her care for the sick and suffering and ignorant has already made her a power in that part of the country. She has a daily school of 260, a hospital with 18 beds, a night-school of 56, and a Home prepared for Sisters to reside in and take charge of part of the work. She has herself stood as sponsor or witness for 425 persons at their Baptism. The remarkable work of the Rev. A. Toomer Porter, D.D., in Charleston, the Rev. G. B. Cooke in Petersburg, the Rev. Dr. J. L. Tucker in Mississippi, and others, as well as the excellent service rendered by St. Augustine's Normal School, Raleigh, N. C., ought not to pass without mention. In coping with the difficulties of the work, it will probably be found that the peculiarities of primitive practice may give still further points worthy of revival; for instance, it is well known how strong an impression is made upon the imagination of the colored people by being put under the water by the Baptists.

A similar effect, in a different and more desirable way, might be produced by reviving the ancient chrisom robe, and clothing every person, as soon as he is baptized, and as a part of the service, with a white garment. It would be a most impressive way of teaching the baptized person that CHRIST had given him forgiveness of all his sins: and that he must take care to keep this purity unspotted by fresh sins in future. For open and scandalous sins, committed after Baptism, it would also be well to revive the public penance of the Primitive days. The childlike immaturity of mind and character, the absence of the personal sensitiveness and high-strung self-respect of the whites, and the intense clannishness of the colored people, all combine to point out this as one of the most indispensable means towards the moral elevation of the Race. But it is a very large problem. And its solution will probably be very slow, especially since there is no general agreement as to the direction in which that solution should be sought.

There are other Race problems,—the Indians and the Chinese, for instance. As to the former, much has been done; and no Missions among them have been more successful than those carried on by the Church. The effort has been to advance the whole man, so that the Indian shall become a civilized Christian instead of a savage Pagan. The services of Dr. James Lloyd Breck and of Bishop Whipple in this field have made for both of them national reputations. These efforts cannot fully succeed, however, until the Indian is recognized as a citizen, and is clothed with the legal rights of citizenship. Work has already been begun among the Chinese; but with the rooted antipathy to further immigration, and the legal barriers erected to prevent it, the extension of this work is not a matter of immediate and growing pressure.

A much more important subject is the question of foreign nationalities subsisting here in their distinctness of language and religion for several generations, and in large numbers. In Colonial times, the Swedish Churches in and near Philadelphia remained distinct for a long while, with pastors from Sweden, and services in the Swedish language. Eventually, all these were absorbed into our Church, and still remain among our parishes, with no distinction as to services or anything else. The Huguenot settlements in and around New York and in the Carolinas, as well as in some other places, have also been largely absorbed into the Church. In the case of the Eglise du S. Esprit in

New York, the service is still in French,—a French translation of our Prayer-Book,—in other cases there is now no difference between these and other parishes. The German settlers of Pennsylvania, Georgia, and elsewhere have been more tenacious, keeping up their own services in their own language, and with Lutheran or other religious organizations to preserve and perpetuate their distinctness. From these have arisen the various Lutheran and German Reformed sects, some of whom are the most Churchly in doctrine and worship of all the Evangelical denominations. Among the very large immigrations of Swedes and Norwegians in late years not much has been done, as yet, to draw them Churchwards; but there is a strong probability that the earlier history will repeat itself as soon as the barrier of the foreign language begins to disappear. The true policy, in all these cases, is to relax our rubrical and canonical rigidity somewhat, so that congregations of all these foreign nationalities may be brought into a vital connection with the Church, through an Apostolic ministry, while yet retaining the worship to which they are accustomed, in their own language, and as nearly as possible in the very words which they have always used. Their customs as to parochial organizations should also be followed as closely as may be. All subordinate details should be left unchanged, in order to secure the one point of union in a regular ministry and valid sacraments, the Catholic Creeds being the only tests of faith required.

The same principle, expanded, would easily permit of the union of the greater body of English-speaking denominations in this country on the foundation of our Apostolic Church. We began by speaking of the general movement of all these great denominations towards the Church. What will be the natural result of this but actual union? The dropping of our sectarian name "Protestant Episcopal," and calling ourselves simply "The Church in the United States," would greatly facilitate such a union. And we ought to make this actual union as easy as possible, provided no fundamental principle be violated. It would be enough to require that every such congregation uniting with us should, 1st. Accept the definitions of the Faith as set forth by the undisputed General Councils; 2d. Have a ministry of Apostolic succession, given hypothetically if not absolutely; 3d. Should receive Confirmation at the hands of a Bishop; and, 4th. Should pledge themselves to the use of only valid forms in the administration of the two great Sacraments of Baptism and the Holy Eucharist. Outside of these essentials, everything should be left free. On the other side,—that towards Rome,—it must be remembered that, although the Pope excommunicates Anglicans, the Anglican Church has never excommunicated the Pope or any other branch of the One Apostolie Church. The XXXIX. Articles, in which some Romish opinions and practices are condemned, are not a Creed, and are not required of the Laity in any wise. All that is required of the Laity is the Baptismal vow, ratified in Confirmation; and every baptized and confirmed Romanist has complied with those conditions as completely as any of our own people. On our own principles, therefore, we cannot but be ready to admit all Romanists to our communion now. The obstacle is on their side,—they are not willing to come. But as they draw nearer and nearer, the time may arrive when they will be willing. We should then remember that—whatever may be their errors—their Liturgy contains no heresy that has been condemned as such by the whole Catholic Church. We should, therefore, admit them to union without demanding any change in the form of worship to which they are accustomed, and with no change in Discipline further than is inseparable from the act of union itself. The same principle would apply to congregations of Oriental Christians, or any other branch of the Apostolic Church, should such be found in our country.

And this brings us to the last and greatest of the works which the providence of God seems to be laying at our doors, although we are the youngest and the weakest of all the Apostolic Churches. The principles which necessarily underlie the attempt to bring together, into one body, all the varieties of Christianity found in this “Home of all Nations” are precisely the same principles which, if carried out, would reunite the sundered communions of Christians everywhere. Historically, those melancholy separations were due more to the unions of Church and State, and complications of worldly politics and national jealousies, than to the odium theologicum alone. The Papacy itself—the fons et origo malorum—is in its essence a wrong polity; and if that wrong polity were reformed, all other evils would soon reform themselves. If the Absolute Despotism of the Papacy were to yield to the ancient Catholic polity of Liberty regulated by Law,—the free Spirit speaking through the organs of the Body,—what more could be asked? Now, owing to the fact of our entire freedom from entanglements with the State, our action cannot be liable to any suspicion of covering up a political purpose. We can, therefore, take the initiative, in a way that is possible to no other branch of the Church in Christendom. The tendency towards reunion with the Eastern Church was begun by us more than half a century ago, when the Rev. Messrs. Hill and Robertson were sent as missionaries to Greece, with instructions which breathed a purely brotherly spirit towards the Greek Church; and that mission has been maintained on the same principle ever since. In 1862 A.D. the appointment of a Russo-Greek Committee by our General Convention marked a new era in the good work, which soon caused the appointment of a similar committee by the Convocation of Canterbury. The impulse thus given went on until it culminated in the Bonn Conference of 1874 A.D., where a formula of agreement was adopted which, logically, ends a controversy that has raged between the East and the West for a thousand years concerning the Procession of the HOLY GHOST. Formal intercommunion has already taken place between the Orientals and the Old Catholics and between the Old Catholics and ourselves. The Lambeth Conference,—the first suggestion of which was made by an American, the first Bishop of Vermont,—at the opening meeting in 1867 A.D., carried its doctrinal requirements for a reunited Christendom no further than the acceptance of the definitions concerning the Faith set forth by the undisputed General Councils.

The position of the Eastern question is giving more and more influence to Russia and England; and neither France nor Austria are as zealous for Papal propaganda in the East as they once were. It looks as if, before many years, all branches of the Anglican and Oriental Churches, together with the Old Catholics, will be in full communion with one another; and that way lies the best hope of the peace of Christendom.

In the Roman Communion itself there are numberless brave souls groaning under the evils of their false system, and turning to us with eyes of faith and hope. Campello and Savarese—coming to us from St. Peter's in Rome, and from the immediate service of the Pope in the Vatican—are only samples of thousands of others. As the visible unity consolidates around us, the signs of change for the better will grow stronger even in Rome itself, and thus at last all may be One.

Let no narrowness, or coldness, or blindness, or prejudice on our part hinder this greatest of all the works which the wonderful providence of God has given us to do.

REV. T. H. HOPKINS, D.D.

Workingmen's Clubs and Institutes. The origin of the associations now known under the general designation of Workingmen's Clubs and Institutes is said to have been the agitation in 1825-30 A.D. in England in favor of Mechanics' Institutes “originated by that true friend of the working classes, Dr. Birkbeck. Then came various unconnected intermittent attempts to provide what were called “Reading-rooms” for working men, in which the chief element was the supplying a place where time might be innocently passed, but where neither education, social intercourse, nor recreation was offered, except so far as reading a newspaper or book in the same room with other people might be supposed to afford all or either. Next came the formation of Mutual Improvement Societies, which met chiefly in school-rooms, and aimed at classes, discussions, and especially at the preparation of short papers on interesting and improving topics. There was often a good deal of the sociable spirit in these little organizations, but they were seldom long-lived."*

Several somewhat similar organizations were started at about the same time; but the most important was the Brighton Workingmen's Institute, founded by the Rev. F. W. Robertson in 1849 A.D. Then followed in other places the formation of night-schools and societies for promoting adult education. In 1852 A.D. was opened in the Colonnade Clare-market "The Colonnade Workingmen's Club," which undertook to provide amusement and refreshment for the members as well as newspapers and books; and shortly after village clubs were established in many places throughout the United Kingdom. In 1854 A.D. the Rev. F. D. Maurice and his colleagues established the "London Workingmen's College," which has been said to be "one of the greatest, if not the greatest impulse yet given in this country [England] to the movement for elevating workingmen in the social scale."† In this "College" were combined both amusement and instruction, and its success was so marked that a general interest was excited, culminating eventually in 1862 A.D. in the formation of "The Workingmen's Club and Institute Union,"—an organization whose object, as stated in a prospectus issued at the time, is that "of helping Workingmen to establish Clubs or Institutes where they can meet for conversation, business, and mental improvement, with the means of recreation and refreshment, free from intoxicating drinks; these clubs at the same time constituting societies for mutual helpfulness in various ways."

From that time to the present (1884 A.D.) the formation of clubs having these objects in view in England has gone on in an increasing ratio, until at present there are at least one thousand such clubs scattered throughout the United Kingdom. In the United States, the initiative in the movement was taken by a number of gentlemen connected with St. Mark's Church, Philadelphia, Pa., in 1871 A.D., and after a few years other clubs, chiefly founded in connection with parish work, were organized in Philadelphia and elsewhere. At present there are, however, in the United States, so far as known to the writer, not more than twenty-five or thirty organizations which strictly come within the designation of "Workingmen's Clubs." In 1883 A.D. there was formed a union called "The Congress of Workingmen's Clubs," whose object is to promote the formation of clubs and to give advice and encouragement whenever practicable. A Workingmen's Club, as now understood in England and in the United States, is an association formed for the purpose of affording to workingmen the means of healthful and innocent amusement and recreation, an opportunity for intellectual cultivation, and the promotion of habits of economy and thrift. It may be connected with other work, as are those clubs formed and managed under the auspices of a particular parish or union of parishes, or it may have no connection of any kind with any other organization, but be wholly autonomous. If founded in connection with parish work, the usual form of government is by a Board of Trustees or Managers, from twelve to twenty-five in number, appointed by the rector of the parish, or if several parishes are united in the undertaking, each rector appoints an equal number. If the club has no necessary connection with church or parish work, it may be governed by a self-constituted Board, which itself fills its own vacancies, or it may be wholly democratic, and the Board of Directors may be annually elected by the members of the club. Sometimes both features are adopted, and one-half of the board is appointed and the other half elected. A workingmen's club is never intended or expected to be a purely charitable undertaking, and in many cases the clubs are wholly self-supporting. The funds are partially contributed, in the case of parish clubs, by the church or churches with which the club is connected, or by any benevolent person who may be interested in the work; but there is generally an initiation fee, and always a monthly payment made by the members. The initiation fee is never in excess of $1, and the monthly payment about 1s. in England, or 25 cents in America. In the English clubs, though not, so far as known to the writer, in any American club, a restaurant connected with the club is often a source of revenue. There are, of course, in addition, various entertainments given by the clubs, which frequently prove very lucrative. In the annual report of the Workingmen's Club and Institute Union, in England, for 1882-83 A.D., it was stated that the answers received to inquiries in regard to club statistics showed that upwards of 73 per cent. of the clubs were reported to be entirely "self-supporting, and without any pecuniary aid from outside friends." This could not be said, however, of the clubs in America, where the proportion of self-supporting clubs is very small, if it really exists at all.

In all clubs there are the two departments of education and amusement, and there is sometimes a third relating to economy. The educational department is of course always represented by a circulating library and reading-room, and no feature of the club work is better calculated to be of service than this. In the reading-room should be at least two or three daily and weekly papers for the current news of the day, and so many magazines and periodicals as the finances of the club will permit, care being taken to select them with reference to the tastes and appreciation of the members. It is usual also to have at stated intervals, once or twice a month, lectures or "friendly talks" upon subjects of interest, supplemented at times perhaps by occasional readings: to these the members are frequently allowed to bring their friends. In England the local clubs derive much valuable assistance in this respect from the Union, which has for many years circulated books among the smaller clubs, and in some instances even made grants of books which have been presented to it for this purpose. It has also for many years obtained the services of lecturers, but at present this particular branch of its work has been undertaken by "the Social Educational League," formed for this purpose. There are established in connection with many clubs classes for instruction in the elementary branches of learning if the members are of a very humble and uneducated class, or if they are mechanics, and belong to the better educated classes, there are classes in History, Philosophy, or other similar branches of learning. In England the Union fosters this work by offering prizes for papers sent in on various subjects, as well in History as in Poetry, Industrial and Social questions. Not the least useful of all of the educational features of the club is the debating society, which meets once or twice a month, or perhaps weekly, where the members learn not only to think of subjects, which, but for its suggestion they would pass quite unnoticed, but also to think upon their feet and express themselves, so that others may understand them. For debates also the English Union offers annual prizes, and the debates are held in a hall convenient to the purpose, at which the competing clubs attend.

The amusement department of a club depends in large measure upon the local circumstances. If situated in a village or country town, it may have an athletic club, or cricket, foot-ball, or base-ball club, indeed, any outdoor sport that is popular in the neighborhood and feasible for the members. For winter evenings there should always be, however, a game-room for chess, checkers, backgammon, or any other games, if nothing in the nature of gambling is permitted, and where it can be afforded, pool or billiard-tables, or both. The two latter are frequently made a source of revenue by charging a moderate fee for each game. There are also social gatherings of various kinds, concerts and recitations, either by friends or by the members, if they develop any taste or capacity for such work. There is in many clubs a glee-club or singing-class, and perhaps, although not so frequently, an orchestra. If really successful in their efforts, the vocal and instrumental societies by their concerts are sometimes enabled not only to pay their own expenses, but to contribute handsomely to the treasury of the club itself. In all of the club-houses there is a room or hall adapted to lectures and social gatherings, and where the club-house has been built for the purpose, this hall is large enough to accommodate a fair audience, and is usually supplied with a stage, and perhaps with the ordinary curtain and stage scenery, if anything like dramatic performances take place. In the economical department of the club work may be included Beneficial Societies, of which there are two kinds, perpetual and annual; in the former the members continue to pay annually, and so long as they are in good standing are entitled to the benefits of the society; in the latter the society dissolves each year, and whatever balance may be in the treasury is divided pro rata among the members, and a new society is then formed, from which are eliminated all those who would be deemed undesirable members if making an original application. The Annual societies seem to be preferred. In some of the Philadelphia clubs there are building-associations, societies until recently peculiar to that city, by which, through a system of contributions and loans, the members are enabled to buy or build their own houses at a great saving of expense and by easy payments. There have also been tried, and with some success, savings-banks or societies, for the purpose of saving pure and simple. Co-operative societies have been established, but so far as known with no great success.

It remains to point out some of the elements of success and failure in the clubs.

The most vital element of success is the co-operation in every club of a minority of well-educated and intelligent men, with a majority whose opportunities have been fewer. The key-note of the whole movement is the brotherhood of all men, and the desire on the part of those who have been highly favored and whose advantages, both in respect to education and amusement, are great, to enable their less-favored neighbors to share in a measure in these blessings. To this end the two classes must mingle in a fraternal spirit, with no patronage on the one hand, or cringing acceptance of favors on the other. The presence of the higher class is essential in directing the various enterprises connected with the club, and in pointing out new fields of interest and profit to their humbler companions, whose experience would quite fail them in this direction; for this reason it is highly important that at least the preponderating influence in every Board of Management should be composed of members of what are called the upper class. In England, at one time, in some clubs two governing bodies were made use of, the one composed of "gentlemen," with whom lay the ultimate control and disposition of everything, while under them was a committee of the club-members proper, but the plan was a signal failure. Not only is it necessary that the Board of Management should be so largely represented by the more educated class, it is equally important that they should be in constant and friendly intercourse with the members, and to this end, as well as for the general purpose of preserving order and giving necessary information, it is customary for the members of a board of management to have one of their number present at the clubhouse every evening, the members serving in rotation for this purpose. By this means the use of the library may frequently be most usefully directed, and important influences for good in other ways be brought to bear. It is equally important that the members themselves, of whatever class they may be, should feel the responsibilities as well as share the privileges of membership. To this end there should be a representation of the workingmen's element, as distinguished from the gentlemen on the governing board, whatever may be the form of government. Judging from the experience of the clubs, it should be the aim of the managers to provide such influences as will enable the members to feel that they have something to gain by continuing their membership besides the mere social pleasure which it affords. Experience has also demonstrated that no one under twenty-one years of age should be admitted as a member. The men who seek the club for study or quiet recreation, which they frequently are unable to obtain in their own homes amid a family of children, do not find themselves benefited in the society of boisterous boys, and many clubs have either actually perished, or nearly done so because of their membership dropping off in consequence of this evil. Another most important rule to be observed is the exclusion from public discussion of religious and even political questions, two topics which unfortunately are very apt to excite ill feeling.

The conditions under which clubs may be successfully carried on in America are not essentially different from those in England, except that perhaps, as the American laboring classes are generally more comfortably housed and fed, the need of the creature comforts of a club may appeal less powerfully to them. But the best of the laboring classes will usually find enough advantages in a well-managed club to more than repay the trifling expense attending membership. On the other hand, republican manners and habits render the intercourse between the various classes much more easy and friendly, and, if approached in the right spirit, to that extent more effective in imparting and receiving information and instruction. For a detailed history of the movement in England, the reader is referred to "Workingmen's Clubs and Educational Institutes," by the Rev. Henry Solly, London, 1867 A.D., published by the Workingmen's Club and Institute Union, and to the occasional papers published by that association, and the Club and Institute Journal, published fortnightly by the Union at its office, No. 31 Southampton Street, Strand, London, W.C. The present Secretary is Mr. J. J. Dent, and his address the office of the Union. The Workingmen's Club Congress in America are also prepared to furnish information and suggestions on application to the Corresponding Secretary, John B. Pine, Esq., 41 Pine Street, New York City.

Works. Every being must act in some way. It is a condition of life. Every intelligent human being by the powers given him gives some one of these three characters to each act. It is either an act indifferent, or involving moral principles, or involving spiritual principles. It most frequently has two of these characters; it is seldom, when rightly viewed, without some moral force, and often has spiritual power, and always has spiritual consequences. If the sorrowful taint and weakness of sin be in the actor, then all of his acts will be affected by this weakness, will have this taint. And it will make no difference in the act viewed alone whether this weakness was inherited or not. It does make a great difference in the responsibility of the actor, but not in the act. It is a distinction to be kept in mind when we consider the consequences of the act to the actor before a just judge. But, since actions are the inevitable concomitants of life, and our life is a complex one, and our acts have a like complex character, it follows that with the best intentions on the part of the doer, yet everything done cannot be perfect, even though the limits placed upon a finite being be not considered. Works, then, done by every child of Adam, no matter how well-intentioned, must be affected by the taint of original sin. So the XIII. Article puts it, "Works done before the grace of CHRIST, and the Inspiration of His Spirit, are not pleasant to God, forasmuch as they spring not of faith in JESUS CHRIST; neither do they make men meet to receive grace, or (as the School-authors say) deserve grace of congruity: yea rather, for that they are not done as God hath willed and commanded them to be done, we doubt not but they have the nature of sin." But baptism is our adoption into His household as sons, and the gift of all things necessary for a true and filial obedience, for the forgiveness of the guilt of original sin, and for a discipline that shall remove the taint and heal the weakness of the child of God, and shall fit him for the higher and better estate of which he is the heir.

In God's saints the sense of weakness and the strength of a dependence upon Him and upon the inspiration of the HOLY GHOST is ever clearer as they grow in grace, and the imperfection of their works, nay, their uselessness without CHRIST, is much more humbly felt.

So, on the other hand, the rejecting, the unregenerate man can do nothing which can be received, because he refuses this obedience, which must be a condition precedent to redemption. It may be even that the act of the indifferent and disobedient man may be externally better than the obedience of the earnest child of God. But the difference is clear when we consider that the kind act of a stranger cannot have the characteristic notes of the filial act of a son. It is this obedience of a son that makes the works done in faith acceptable to God, and makes the doer of them righteous through Christ. It is the indifference with which these acts are done by one who rejects the loving call of his Lord, and willfully does or does not what may be in itself right, together with the weakness proper to the act itself which leads to their rejection. All things not done either directly for His sake and in His name, or by one who is habitually a lover of holiness, are said in Holy Scripture to be done in unrighteousness. A statement relating, indeed, to one extreme form of heathen and Jewish hardness of heart, but to be received in principle as applicable to works, is to be found in the second chapter of 2 Thess. It is the love of the truth that is rejected, and so the truth cannot be believed, and pleasure in unrighteousness follows. As a general proposition (which must be essentially modified we must admit both by the love and mercy in the Redemption, by the changed relation of the person to God through Christ by his adoption, and by the fact that it is all by gift by grace, as to sons, and not by wages, as to servants), the relation of either party—those who reject the Gospel and those who accept it—to God is something of the relation of those who accept employment to the employer. What is the attitude of the employer to those who accept his terms and those who reject them, and yet expect to receive some wages? The answer is ready at once. Put, then, the employed into the relation of a son lovingly received and cared for, yet upon probation and under a disciplinary education, and treated by a wise and loving father according to a plan of training that relates to a higher and more blessed relation, and which the son is directed to obey without hesitation, that he may prove his fitness for a truer companionship with his everlasting Father. "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world," is spoken to sons and is founded on works done in love for Christ's sake. Placing the righteousness which is by faith as precedent and essential, the righteousness which is by works upon that faith is equally essential. It is, then, upon this foundation that the XI. and XII. Articles proceed.

"We are accounted righteous before God, only for the merit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ by Faith, and not for our own works or deservings." "Albeit that Good Works, which are the fruits of Faith, and follow after Justification, cannot put away our sins, and endure the severity of God's judgment; yet are they pleasing and acceptable to God in Christ, and do spring out necessarily of a true and lively Faith; insomuch that by them a lively Faith may be as evidently known as a tree discerned by the fruit." There are many side issues and discussions which spring out of these statements, but they do not seriously affect our own duty, and not at all the fundamental truth of the statement. The condition of the heathen who have not known God, the condition of those who, even in a Christian land, have never been reached by the Gospel by counteracting causes, the relation of intention to the value of the deed, are all questions which may puzzle us, but which can be of no use. The plain, straightforward duty of doing all we can obediently, with the grace of the Holy Ghost guiding us, and the certainty that our Lord will as lovingly accept our bounden duty and service as it is lovingly done,—this is all we need. If we grasp these facts, we have enough to guide us in the justification by works.

Wrath of God. A declaration often occurring in Holy Scripture. His anger is not as our anger, as His thoughts are not as our thoughts, or His ways as our ways. His wrath is indeed most fearful, but it is so in its calmness, its terrible serenity, if we may be permitted so to word it, in its freedom from menace in any human sense, for He does not threaten as one who hath to take trouble or great exertion to execute, but as one whose threatenings are only the declaration of results which are inevitable from such evil course of conduct. His is a wrath that, since His nature is love, is only the expression of His absolute Justice, and therefore constantly in Holy Scripture He declares His readiness to put it away, to forgive, to restore, to bless a thousandfold. His mercies are ever new; His compassions fail not. His continual warning to the chosen people of His wrath and yet of His purpose to forgive and to restore are prophecies of His wrath towards our sins, and of His forgiveness through His Son and His restoration of men upon their repentance. God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself. It is this that gives the Incarnation of the Son of God such glorious yet terrible significance. For our sakes He trod the winepress of the wrath of God alone. For our sakes, in our Flesh, as true Son of Man, He made an atonement for our sins. For our sakes, though sinless and pure, He, putting Himself in our place, endured the hiding of His Father's face, and made His soul an offering for sin, and could cry out in agony, Eli, Eli, lama sabaethani. His love and the utter unreserved putting of Himself into our place, not merely to be touched with a feeling for our infirmities, but to be stricken and smitten of God and afflicted for our transgressions, to be bruised for our iniquities, to make our peace by taking our chastisement, to heal us by His stripes,—all these show us the terribleness of the wrath of God. How it is to be displayed hereafter, how sinners who disdain His mercy are to suffer, and what the punishments will be that are to be apportioned, are recorded for us, but in words that by their very weakness reveal the terror and awfulness of the wrath. There are two other points to be noted. This wrath and vengeance is not as human wrath or vengeance; so the FATHER in mercy hath given judgment to the SON, who gives us the revelation of His FATHER's pity and of His own love, and who is yet to be the upright Judge, and is to impartially award love to them that love

Him, and indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, upon every soul of man that doeth evil. And the execution of the sentence is committed to the Angels of Judgment, who are appointed for that purpose to gather all from the four corners of the earth and to lead them away to suffer their sentence.

Year. Not the secular, but the ecclesiastical year is dwelt on here. The Church year is the consecration to GOD of a natural cycle of time in a holy round of services, each separate one offering to Him praise and worship for His own great glory and for the noble and wonderful acts of creation, preservation, and, above all, redemption, with earnest thanksgivings and commemorations of the several acts of Redemption, from the Incarnation to the Gift of the HOLY GHOST, and remembrances thankfully made for the good examples of those who have become His Saints. There is here subject-matter enough for the whole year. If we add to these the penitential acts with which we must constantly discipline ourselves, we will feel that He has given us so much to dwell upon and to study over of His love, mercy, superintending care, and forbearance, that the wonder is why so many should think so little about it, and why others should need to seek for fresh subjects of devotion.

With such abundant cause for rejoicing and for humility before GOD, with the great central acts of our Redemption demanding from the Christian fervent adoration for the mercies in them, it was impossible to avoid making a division of the fifty-two days sacred unto GOD into a full, orderly, and connected cycle of services. The Feasts of Christmas, of Easter, and of Whit-Sunday marked the broader outlines of this holy year, and indeed Easter and Whit-Sunday fell upon times already sanctified unto GOD by His appointment under the Mosaic Law. The Jew, because of his national feasts, could readily accept the Christian Year. The Gentile was trained in religious feasts occurring at stated periods, and found everything to satisfy him. In fact, these probably were larger and more frequent in the earlier history of Christianity than it is usual to suppose. It would readily result from this that the Christian Year, having certain fixed festivals which were universally observed in all national Churches throughout the world, there would be most naturally developed the intermediate festivals and fasts, each according to the needs of the Church locally, and the bent or characteristic temper of the people to which the Church had to minister.

In this way, without interference and clash, there would be the widest room for those services, and those lessons in them, which the Church could select, both for Worship and Adoration from the people to GOD, and of instruction into all Faith and Practice of holy living. These two, Faith and Practice, must be ever brought prominently forward; so we find in the many links of the Liturgic service of the successive Sundays a principle that interweaves a confession of Faith with the substance of the Worship, which serves also as an instruction in the truths, and seizes upon certain secondary facts and acts of our LORD's Life, and upon the examples of His Apostles, and holds these up for imitation and practice in the holy conduct of life.

The Calendar of our own Prayer-Book exhibits this. The year is divided into two grand divisions: the first, of the Sundays that extend from the first Sunday in Advent to Trinity-Sunday, and the second, from Trinity-Sunday on through the half-year to Advent-Sunday again. The first part is used to teach doctrine, the second, given up to practical instruction, not so exclusively, however, that there is not a free interchange. But from Advent to Christmas the historical facts of the preparation for CHRIST's Coming and His Advent, and His Second Coming and our preparation therefor, are dwelt upon. And, following an ancient custom, Isaiah is the Prophet chosen for this part of the year. From Christmas through Epiphany, with its Sunday, the LORD JESUS is shown by His miracles to be LORD over all nature. Diseases yield, demons are quelled, the storms are laid at His word. Then come the three Sundays of solemn preparation for Lent, when our duty of self-control and of self-renunciation are brought forward, and so we enter into the remembrance and the sad faltering, distant, imitation of our LORD's great Fast and of His resistance to temptation.

It calls up to our remembrance the reasons why our LORD suffered, it reminds us that for our sins He endured, and so step by step it prepares us for the solemn Fast-ing Services of the Holy Week, which terminate at last in the great Fast of Good Friday, which is followed by the glories of the Easter-Feast. The Sunday on which the doctrine of the Resurrection is proclaimed, is made the centre around which all the preceding and succeeding Sundays throughout the universal Church arrange themselves. All refer to this as the crowning act of that Incarnation which the whole Church commemorates at Christmas. The period of forty days from Easter to the Ascension, and of ten days from the Ascension on to Whit-Sunday, are taken up with setting forth the doctrine of the Church, and are always counted as a continuous Feast. The doctrines of the Resurrection, of His sitting as Intercessor and Mediator at the Right Hand of His FATHER, and the Descent of the HOLY GHOST to abide forever with the Church, are all Festal facts for our humanity. Trinity-Sunday is peculiar to the Anglo-Saxon race and to those countries of Northern Europe influenced by Anglo-Saxon missionaries. But for the succeeding Sundays the subjects of teaching change. The Historic pivotal facts are not now dwelt upon, but the practical lessons which yet involve doctrine are taken up one by one, and something of the facts of the unseen world about us is taught. What with the unvarying parts of the Liturgy and with the broiery of Scripture and the key-note struck by the Gospel and Epistles, a rich variety, and yet a continual adherence to a fixed system, is the result. In the mediæval Church the several Sundays had their significant names, which served to keep these several lessons in mind. The Eastern Church following the same plan for the first half of the year, varies the latter part of it by having a different series of Epistles and Gospels and formal names for the several Sundays of the year.

But with this variable system the Church has interwoven a series of holy-days upon fixed dates. These are for our LORD's Life; the Christmas Feast (December 25), Circumcision (January 1), Epiphany (January 6), the Presentation of CHRIST in the Temple (February 2), Annunciation to the Blessed Virgin Mary (March 25), and the Transfiguration (August 6). The Nativity of St. John the Baptist, the commemorations of our LORD's Apostles, and of the Holy Innocents, and of St. Stephen the First Martyr, and All Saints, and St. Michael and All Angels, form special holy-days. In other portions of the Church Catholic a larger calendar of saints has been in use, but the American Church has wisely kept to the commemoration of those Saints and blessed ones whose names are written not merely in the yet sealed book of life but in God's book here, and has recognized these only as being worthy to publicly thank God for, as gifts to His people. And she returns thanks "for all His servants departed this life in His Faith and Fear, beseeching Him to give us grace so to follow their good examples that with them we may be partakers of His heavenly Kingdom" at every celebration of the communion. A study of the wise and comprehensive plan upon which the Church year is arranged does bring out the truths of the Christian Faith, and enforces them upon the attention in a way that no other that can be devised can do. Its flexibility, its unity of purpose, its various teachings, its insistence Sunday by Sunday of the same essential verities, all these make it as nearly an inspiration as an institution which is the outgrowth from the Christian longings and worship can be.

Our Feasts and our Fasts are influencing those devout Christian bodies around us, who draw near our Common LORD in His Spirit. Imitation and concurrent observances are becoming more and more usual, year by year attesting to the vital power over the Christian life, in a Christian community, which a Christian year devoutly planned and consecrated by ages of holy use must wield.

Z.

Zacharias. The Father of St. John the Baptist, who was an aged Priest of the order of Abijah, the eighth in the course of the twenty-four appointed by King David. A righteous man looking for the promise to Israel, blameless of life. It was his by lot to burn incense at the inner altar of incense at the season of the Atonement. While performing his office there was fulfilled to him the promise made when the altar of incense was commanded: "And thou shalt put it before the veil that is by the ark of the Testimony, before the mercy-seat that is over the testimony, where I will meet with thee."

With reverent bowing towards the veil, alone in the sanctuary, he put upon the altar the incense, and there met him an angel, with the message that he was to be the father of the stern Herald of CHRIST. His incredulity so natural, yet strange in one so full of faith as he was, was given a sign which was at once a judgment and a sure token of the fulfillment of the vision. He was stricken dumb, so that he could not put the blessing upon the people when he came forth from the sanctuary. It continued till after the birth of his son, and then the dumbness was removed when he was required to name his son, and he "wrote saying, His name is John." His hymn of praise is a noble prophecy, with the first verses of which we are thoroughly familiar. It is worthy of note that Zacharias speaks first and most fully of the MESSIAH, and only the latter third of his prophecy dwells upon the mission of his son, the greatest born of women, the mightiest of the messengers of God. Beyond what is told us in Holy Writ, we know nothing of this blameless Priest.

Zealots. A fanatic sect of the Jews who were in great vogue in the time of our Lord. They claimed to hold in great honor the commandments, but the spirit in which they interpreted these was a distortion of the zeal of Phinehas the High-Priest who slew the sinning Prince of the tribe of Simeon (Numb. xxv.). They were numerous, daring, and resisting not only the civil power, but their spiritual rulers as well. Annas the High-Priest tried to curb them. Of their number at one time was Simon the Apostle. In the last terrible days of the siege of Jerusalem the Zealots were one cause of the miseries suffered, and of the final fall of the Holy City.

Zechariah. Zechariah, the eleventh of the Minor Prophets, calls himself (Zech. i. 1) the son of Berechiah, the son of Iddo the priest; but in the book of Ezra he is called the son of Iddo (Ezra v. 1). This seeming discrepancy may be explained by the Eastern use of the word son to mean any descendant; or by the suggestion that Berechiah, the father, died about the time of the birth of his son, and that Iddo discharged a father's duty by his grandson. This Iddo is thought by many to be "Iddo the priest" mentioned in Neh. xii. 4, whose son Zechariah (v. 16), doubtless the prophet himself, was a priest contemporary with Joakim, the son of Joshua the High-Priest of the return from captivity (Neh. xii.). It is not known where Zechariah was born, nor at what age he began to prophesy; but as he was with his grandfather, among the first of those who returned to Jerusalem, he must have been born in captivity, and have been about thirty years old when called to the office of prophet; and he is related to have lived to a great age, and to have been buried beside Haggai at Jerusalem. Zechariah the prophet has been identified, or rather confounded, with others of the same name, especially with Zechariah the son of Jeberechiah (Isa. viii. 2), and with Zechariah the priest, son of Jehoiada, murdered by Joash (2 Chron. xxiv. 20), owing probably to the text of St. Matt. xxiii. 35. But the date at which Zechariah the prophet lived and prophesied is sufficient to show the impossibility of these suppositions. For it was in the eighth month of the second year of Darius (520 B.C.) that he was called to the office of a prophet; just two months later than Haggai, with whom he was constantly associated in exhorting the Jews to energy in the work of rebuilding the Temple. In the Septuagint titles of the Psalms the following are attributed to Haggai and Zechariah together: cxxxvii., cxiv., cxlvi., cxlvii., cxlviii. The Peschito Version adds cxxxv., cxxxvi.

In making an analysis of the prophecy of Zechariah it is found convenient to divide it into two parts (chap. i. to viii. and ix. to xiv.), and to consider these separately. In the first part, which is admitted by all to be the genuine work of Zechariah the son of Iddo, three sections are distinguished. The first (chap. i. 1-6), which is introductory, consists of an appeal to the people, founded on experience of the truth of God, to repent and be energetic in the work on the Temple. The second section (chap. i. 7 to vi. 15) is made up of a series of visions, all seen in one night, "descriptive of all those hopes and anticipations of which the building of the Temple was the pledge and sure foundation." The third section (chap. vii. and viii.), communicated two years later, is an answer to certain questions addressed to the priests and prophets, followed by a prophecy of the glory of Zion, when the Lord shall return to her, and dwell in the midst of Jerusalem. The second part of Zechariah is the subject of much dispute; some denying that it is indeed by Zechariah the son of Iddo, others maintaining that it is his work; so that critics are nearly equally divided in opinion; and still further, there is much dispute over the authorship of the two sections into which the second part is to be divided, viz.: 1 (chap. ix.-xi.), a prophecy against Damascus and Tyre, with promises of protection to Jerusalem; and, 2 (chap. xii.-xiv.), "The burden of the word of the Lord for Israel," —i.e., for the whole nation of the Jews. It is impossible to enter into these questions in so limited a space as a short article, and the reader who desires to pursue them further must be referred to fuller works. (Art. Zechariah in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible.) Whatever view he may adopt concerning their authorship, the moral lesson to be gathered from these chapters is the same, "in either case they satisfy the condition, 'To Him give all the prophets witness;' in either case they are God's words addressed to the hearts and consciences of mankind." (Bible Commentary, Introd. to Zech.) Zechariah concludes his prophecy with a grand picture of all nations coming up to Jerusalem to worship, in that day when the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our LORD and of His CHRIST, and everything shall be sanctified to His Service; the trappings of worldly pomp and pride, "the bells of the horses;" the meanest utensils, "every pot in Jerusalem" shall be inscribed "Holiness unto the LORD." Zechariah is frequently quoted in the New Testament; the prophecy of the progress of the SAVIOUR into Jerusalem riding upon the foal of an ass, and that of the purchase of the potter's field with the thirty pieces of silver, being from his book. The name Zechariah means "whom the LORD remembers."

Zephaniah. Zephaniah, the ninth of the Minor Prophets, announces himself to be the son of Cushi, the son of Gedaliah, the son of Amariah, the son of Hizkiah (Zeph. i. 1). As this name is the same as that of the King Hezekiah, it is thought that the prophet was of the royal house of Judah. But, as the interval between the time of the King and the date of the prophet is rather short to admit of three intermediate generations, others adopt the tradition that Zephaniah was of the tribe of Simeon. His prophecy was delivered in the days of Josiah, King of Judah; probably in the early part of it; as the denunciations, warnings, and promises of Zephaniah would have been a great assistance to the religious reformation effected by Josiah in the eighteenth year of his reign. Some, indeed, find reason for thinking that Zephaniah preceded Jeremiah, who prophesied in the thirteenth year of Josiah's reign, because the latter seems to speak of certain abuses as corrected against which Zephaniah had prophesied (compare Zeph. i. 4, 5, 9, with Jer. ii.). Hence the date of this prophet would be from 642 to 629 B.C.

The book of Zephaniah, which is addressed to Judah and Jerusalem, is short, its chief characteristics "are the unity and harmony of the composition, the grace, energy, and dignity of its style, and the rapid and effective alternations of threats and promises. Its prophetic import is chiefly shown in the accurate predictions of the desolation which has fallen upon each of the nations denounced for their crimes; Ethiopia, which is menaced with a terrible invasion, being alone exempted from the doom of perpetual ruin. The general tone of the last portion is Messianic, but without any specific reference to the person of our LORD." (Art. Zephaniah in Smith's Dict. of the Bible.) The following analysis of the prophecy is given: "In chap. i. the utter desolation of Judah is predicted as a judgment for idolatry and neglect of the LORD, the luxury of the princes, and the violence and deceit of their dependents (3-9). The prosperity, security, and insolence of the people is contrasted with the horrors of the day of wrath (10-18). Chap. ii. contains a call to repentance (1-3), with a prediction of the ruin of the cities of the Philistines and the restoration of the House of Judah after the visitation (4-7). Other enemies of Judah, Moab, and Ammon are threatened with perpetual destruction (8-15). In chap. iii. the prophet addresses Jerusalem, which he reproves sharply for vice and disobedience (1-7). He then concludes with a series of promises (8-20)." (Student's O. T. History, App. i.) The name Zephaniah means "Watcher of the LORD," or as some will have it, "One whom JEHOVAH guards."

L'ENVOI.

This CHURCH CYCLOPÆDIA, which is offered to the Laity of the American Church, is intended to convey to the Churchman all necessary instruction upon the History, Doctrine, Worship, and Ritual of his own branch of the Church Catholic. Only such reference is made to other parts of the Church as will explain his own position. Its purpose is to set forth as clearly as possible the Person and Redemptive Acts of our Blessed LORD; the foundation and organization of the Church as His Body; the facts of the historical continuity of the Church in these United States in that Body as a living integral portion of the Church Catholic; the proof that She is the Keeper and Witness for, and defender of, the Integrity, Authority, and Inspiration of Holy Writ; that Her Priests are Stewards of the Mysteries of GOD; that She carries out in our modern civilization the great Nicene principles; and that She boldly meets, and by the grace of the HOLY SPIRIT will solve, the religious problems of the day.

How far the CYCLOPÆDIA has fulfilled this conception others must decide; but the very valuable papers contributed by writers authorized to speak on their several topics will go far to substantiate the claim. All the articles have been written anew for the CYCLOPÆDIA. The Dictionaries of Broughton, Hook, Blunt, and Smith have been freely used. The editor is responsible for all unsigned articles except those upon the COUNCILS and the MINOR PROPHETS, which are from the pen of the Rev. R. A. Benton, of St. Paul's School, and the article upon the Atonement, which is contributed by one recently called to the highest office in the Church. To the Rev. S. F. Hotchkin the editor's hearty thanks are due for valuable aid in procuring Diocesan Histories.

Two contributors have been called to their rest. The grief of the whole Church has burst forth at the loss of one of her foremost Bishops, the Rt. Rev. Robert H. Clarkson, of Nebraska. The like shadow of grief fell no less deeply upon the little circle of those who were bereaved of a beloved mother, summoned most suddenly into the Presence of the LORD.

May He bless the work to which His sainted servants have contributed.
